BRUNSWICK.—The 25th anniversary festival of the North German Sängerbund was celebrated here, in the most solemn and worthy manner, on the 19th, 20th, and 21st July, by 1,000 singers, representing 63 unions. The reception of the members of the various societies at the railway station, and the procession to the magnificent Rathhaus, as well as the hearty welcome pronounced by the upper burgomaster, Herr Caspari, and the father of the Männergesangverein, Herr Grassau, formed an elevating introduction to the festival. The general rehearsal, under the direction of the Court Capellmeister, and musical directors, Herren Spohr, Abt, Fischer, Otto, Tschirsch, and Zabel, in the Ägidien-Kirche, so admirable for its acoustic qualities, went off so excellently that it appeared almost impossible to attain a better ensemble. Tenors and basses, the latter down to E flat, outvalled each other, both in strength and decision, as well as in softness and distinctness of pronunciation, and were supported by the admirable Hoboist corps of the Ducal regiment of infantry. On the 20th, three festive songs, under the direction of the musical director, Herr Daub, resounded from the Altstadt-markt, and then three others, under the direction of Herr Julius Schneider, in Holland's-garden. After breakfast, the procession set out from the Altstadt-markt. Three bands and forty flags preceded the joyous singers through the streets, which were richly adorned with floral festoons, while the windows were densely thronged with lovely women and young girls, scattering wreaths and flowers. The performance in the church was even more successful than the rehearsal the day previously; this was the case with the overtures to Jessonda and Oberon; of the vocal pieces, a solo quartet by Otto, a "Prayer" by Abt, "An das Vaterland" by Kreutzer, and "Meerestille und glückliche Fahrt" by Fischer, were the best executed. The separate performances of the various societies took place, during the grand dinner, under the marquee in Holland's-garden; the Liedertafel of Brunswick, and then the Liedertafeln of Hamburg, Minden, Dortmund, Bielefeld, Magdeburg, and Berlin especially distinguished themselves. To the Berlin Liederverein, under the direction of Herr Julius Schneider, was awarded, by the committee, the praise "of being the gem of the Brunswick Festival," and on this account the usual rules were suspended, and it was immediately admitted into the North German Sängerbund. Herren Spohr, Abt, Fischer, Otto, Tschirsch, Mühlhng, Jul. Schneider, were elected honorary members of the society. While the musical portion of the Festival was thus brilliantly carried out, the extraneous arrangements, which materially tended to the success of the whole, were not less so. Among these must be mentioned the festive hall in Hollandt's garden, the splendid pyrotechnic display, and illumination with Bengal fires, the charming ball, the most agreeable trip to the Harzburg on the 21st, the many comical scenes there, the indefatigable attentions of the committee, the excellent cheer, in the shape of eatables and drinkables, &c. The North German Sängerbund will meet next year in Pyrmont.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 13, 1856.

Bach's Chorals.

It has long been a matter of wonder with us, considering the flood of wishy-washy, commonplace, mechanical and un-religious psalmody in which we have been weltering, that some one has not felt moved to give us, in convenient form, the incomparable old German Chorals (Choral-Gesänge) as harmonized by JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. Could these be studied in our more advanced choirs, our choral societies, our musical classes and "Conventions," their influence in developing a love and taste for what is true, and pure, and high, and really devotional in sacred music, would be incalculable. It is not possible that any one can once become familiar with Bach's Chorals and not love them—not feel that the highest ends of music are wonderfully realized in their most soul-ful and unworldly harmony. Bach never wrote for money or for cheap effect; he was a religious artist; his artistic efforts were his aspiration to the beautiful and good and true—to the Most High. All that he did was genuine. Hence his works never grow old. To those who study them now, a century since his death, they are the newest of the new. "In all his works he stands out great and bold and new."

Bach did not write these little masterpieces for use in public worship; nor did he even allow them to be printed. He wrote them occasionally, partly as examples for his scholars in composition; partly for the choir of the Thomas-Schule, over which he presided in Leipzig, to be used in their various private occasions, New Year's festivals, &c., and partly as interludes in his larger pieces, his Motets, Cantatas, Passions, &c. For these purposes he took the old German choral tunes, which the people loved during the religious excitement of the Reformation, and harmonized them for four voices, in his own incomparable way; taking for words a verse or two of some of those quaint and homely, but really religious hymns, of which the Germany of that period was so prolific. These old tunes have always been named from the first lines of the hymns with which they were originally associated. But Bach has in most instances used other hymns. The first collection of them was published at Berlin and Leipzig by his son, Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, in 1765-69, in two parts, containing one hundred Chorals each. Afterwards (in 1784-89) Kirnberger published a larger collection in four parts. The later and now commonly received collections are that made by Becker in 1831, which contains 371 Chorals, without words, and that by Erk, in 184-, of which the first part only is now out, containing 200 Chorals, with the words used by Bach, and with conscientious restoration of the harmony, wherever it had been altered, to the original form as Bach wrote it.

Congregational singing in unison is the practice all over Germany, and hence the Bach Chorals are not used there in the churches. We, on the contrary, have our small trained choirs, who sing in parts. Why, then, should we not, instead of common-place and trashy psalmody, make some use of these purest, noblest models of four-part sacred music that exist? The reasons why we have not done it are obvious. In the first place, as works of Art, they imply a more refined and cultivated taste than has prevailed or ever can prevail in our churches, so long as we have only the cheap and easy psalmody of everybody's manufacture for the musical religious sense to feed upon. And then it might spoil the enormous trade in psalmody, to allow the love for the true thing to be nurtured; for just so surely as any company of singers, who have music in their souls, shall get familiar with these chorals, will they find the common psalmody become "flat, stale and unprofitable." (We do not mean, of course, "Old Hundred" and the few grand old tunes.) In the next place the rhythm and metre of these old German hymns is so peculiar in most cases, abounding in double endings, or what is called female rhymes, that the tunes cannot be used much in connection with our hymn books. The Bach Chorals cannot supplant the psalm-tunes in our common forms of worship until the forms themselves are changed. But not the less is it desirable to have them made accessible. They may be put to many excellent uses, of which we name the following:

1. They may be sung as voluntary pieces for opening or closing of service, &c., by choirs; and they suit equally well the largest or the smallest (simple quartet) choir; provided they be executed with the utmost precision and true feeling by good, well-trained voices.

2. They may be used with admirable effect in alternation with congregational singing; a verse of the latter, with organ accompaniment, in strong, homely unison, followed by a verse of the former, by trained voices, without accompaniment, the same hymn responding as it were from a more spiritual height, glorified in the fine harmonies and modulations of Bach; for as he has treated them, you have the religious essence of the music expressed, and purified from all that is low and common.

3. For great Choral or Oratorio Societies, to be sung in their more miscellaneous sacred concerts, or at the beginning and ending of a performance. Nothing has made a finer impression in such concerts here than two of these same Chorals, similarly treated by Mendelssohn in his "St. Paul." When perfectly sung by a great mass of voices, as our Mendelssohn Choral Society gave them, the effect is sublime.

4. In little private musical clubs and circles they will afford the very best sort of practice.

5. For organists and pianists, to be used simply as instrumental pieces, their purity and marvelous beauty and significance of harmony must commend them. There is more religious satisfaction in just playing them on the piano, than in listening to most of the music to be heard in any of our churches. The way in which each of the four parts, and each note in each, so perfectly serves the end of the great whole, is in itself a type of pure devotion.

6. But their most important service will be to musical schools and classes. As models in the art of four-part composition, within the short form of a choral or psalm tune—an art at which so many try their hands in our day—they will be invaluable. The harmonizing of chorals, with Bach for a model, is made the foundation of all exercises in composition by Marx and the other masters in the German schools. Many of these Chorals Bach has harmonized in several different ways.

We have not room to say all we would upon this subject now. But we are happy to inform our readers that a beginning is soon to be made in introducing to the American public some of the Chorals of Bach, precisely as he wrote them, and with English words. Mr. Oliver Ditson, our enterprising publisher, has the matter in hand. When the first number appears we shall resume the subject.

Old Hundred.

MY DEAR DWIGHT—You may perhaps remember that in reply to the kind and friendly letter of Rev. W. H. HAVERGAL, which appeared in your paper in June 1854, I promised him to look a little farther into the question of the origin of our popular "Old Hundred."

I am not yet ready to go extensively into the matter, and send you the few following notes, to show that I have not forgotten my promise.

In Mr. H.'s "History of the Old Hundredth Psalm Tune," page 12, you may read: "The earliest copy of the tune, so far as it is known, stands in a Geneva edition of a portion of the English Psalter. * * * The date of the Psalter is 1561." Herr Becker, of Leipsic, has in his collection "Marot & Beza's Pseaumes," of the date, 1560. In this collection the 135th Pseaume has the tune just as given by Mr. H. in his English book of the year subsequent. At Wolfenbüttel a "Bible et Pseaumes," printed by Antoine Rebul—no place, but date 1560—gives us the same tune to the same Pseaume. The same is true also of an edition of Marot & Beza in the same fine library, of the date of 1559, which is two years earlier than Mr. Havergal's earliest known copy.

On page 24 of Mr. H.'s history, he speaks of the Hymn-book of the Bohemian Brethren, printed at Ulm, 1538, and in a note says: "The only known copy of this most beautifully printed work is now in the author's possession." If Mr. Havergal will visit the library at Berlin or that at Zwickau, he will not only find other copies of that "most beautifully printed" edition, but also of various editions of earlier dates.

If Mr. H. will turn to Calvin's prefatory letter, published in editions of Marot & Beza, he will see that that great and severe reformer speaks of the tunes as having been moderée to the present version of the psalms. I follow Winterfield and other great German authorities in supposing that this term is employed to denote that, in taking secular and popular melodies for the psalms, they were stripped to some extent of their florid character, and rendered more grave and suitable to religious words. Two years ago I believed Mr. H.'s theory, that "Old Hundred" is made up of Gregorian phrases. I believe now that it is one of those secular melodies which Calvin says were moderée; and moreover I believe I have a copy of the original melody from which it was thus moderée.

As to Guillaume Franc, I was asking Ludwig Erk one day if he could give me any information about him. "I do not think," said he, "that there ever was any such man. I think Franc a misprint for"—I am not ready to say what name yet, as I have not yet finished my investigations. I asked Mr. Erk on several occasions his reason for his strange idea.

He had entirely forgotten what had led him to think so. I turned to Fetis, to Hawkins and Burney, and to the Dictionary, and find that all, without exception, only quote Bayle; so I went and bought Bayle—four huge folio volumes in French. I examined him, and found all that he gives in relation to Franc was from a manuscript letter of a Lausanne professor. I am fully satisfied that Mr. Ludwig Erk may prove right in his conjecture—may, not will.

In conclusion, I renew my promise to Rev. Mr. Havergal, not to give up the search until some satisfactory results are attained. If those results are such as to substantiate "the only claim to originality" which Mr. H. "ventures to advance," (see p. 51) it will be a source of gratification to me. I fear, however, that "Old Hundred" will prove to have been picked from the kennel, washed, combed and made decent for the church. Yours truly,

A. W. T.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The Exhibition of the Mechanic Association, in Faneuil and Quincy Halls, commenced on Wednesday, and will continue a fortnight longer. The display of products of artistic and mechanical ingenuity is uncommonly brilliant. The entire upper story (the armory rooms) of Faneuil Hall is occupied with the piano-fortes, melodeons, &c. The farther end of the hall is shared between the Messrs. Chickering & Sons, and Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co. who have put up extensive decorations. The former makers have on exhibition some six or eight of their most splendid grands, semi-grands and parlor-grands, and as many more square pianos. Grand pianos are also exhibited by Hallet & Davis, A. W. Ladd & Co. and T. Gilbert, (the latter for the first time.) There are also square pianos by Brown & Allen, Jacob Chickering, W. P. Emerson, J. W. Vose, and others. Melodeons and other reed instruments are exhibited by Messrs. Mason & Hamlin, Nichols & Gerrish and S. D. Smith & Co. All that we noticed were from Boston manufactures, and the collection contains many admirable instruments. In the centre of all Mr. Nathan Richardson has erected a tasteful pagoda surmounted with busts of Beethoven, Mozart, &c., around which are displayed his various musical publications. The Judges in the Musical department, we understand, are Messrs. Otto Dresel, J. C. D. Parker, George Minot, Dr. Wm. Read, Gen. H. K. Oliver, of Lawrence, and George W. Warren, of Albany: gentlemen who have knowledge and conscientiousness enough among them, we should think, to ensure impartial justice.—We must be pardoned one suggestion. Some of the loudest exhibitors employ a person to keep one of their instruments resounding all day long, without cessation, with the loudest and most dashing sort of modern piano music. Sometimes two or three are going at once in this way, so that one is absolutely stunned on entering, and it is quite impossible to test the quality of any other instrument; the majority are literally cried down by these two or three, and get no chance to speak a modest word for themselves. Would not a spirit of mutual accommodation and forbearance in this matter be for the good of all? Or is it the only ambition of A, B, or C, to have his instrument pronounced a "stunner"?

At the New York Academy of Music Ernani was presented on Monday night. Mme. LAGRANGE was admired, as she is always. Sig. TAFANELLI had fair success as the King; and Sig. CERESA, the tenor, who so agreeably surprised a Boston audience in the early summer, more than met the public expectation. The Tribune says of him:—

Since he appeared here he has devoted himself to earnest study of his art, and the improvements is manifest. His voice is fresh and sympathetic in the middle register, and the higher notes have that ringing metallic quality which is so effective in concerted pieces. Over the combined effects of the chorus and orchestra in the noisy finale of the third act it was distinctly heard. He would be classed probably as a tenore robusto, but this term scarcely describes the quality of his voice. It more resembles Bolcioni's than Brignoli's, and, to our apprehension, would be more permanently effective than either in rôles which require power rather than sweetness. Unlike some artists, he exhibited no inclination to husband his voice during the first act, and was apparently entirely unfatigued at the close. As an actor, he is far below his position as a vocalist.

On Wednesday evening they had Il Tronatore again, which drew $2,700 on Monday of last week—said to be the largest amount ever received at the Academy. This time again the house overflowed, the freshest attraction being ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, who appeared as the gypsy Azucena. It is telegraphed in all the papers, that "she sang and acted with spirit, and was heartily greeted by the immense audience." The other principal characters were sustained, as formerly, by LAGRANGE, BRIGNOLI, and AMODIO..... The new German Opera, with CARL BERGMAN as conductor, is to open on the 16th with Robert der Teufel, not exactly a German opera, although Meyerbeer is a German. The German merchants have subscribed very liberally for the season.... GOTTSCHALK announces his readiness to give lessons on the piano—terms only five dollars per hour!

Mlle. PARODI gave a successful concert in Philadelphia this week, assisted by STRAKOSCH, PAUL JULIEN, BERNARDI, the baritone, and TIBERINI, the new tenor, of whom the Bulletin says:

He made quite a hit, and gave the most satisfactory contradiction to the depreciating criticisms of New York. Since Salvi and Mario we have had no such finished artist among the tenor singers who have visited us. His voice is of excellent quality, extensive compass and completely under control. His method and delivery are admirable, and the only fault we have to find with him is a disposition to overload his pieces with ornaments. In the cadenza to "Spirito gentil," there were many inappropriate embellishments, which marred the effect of a romance otherwise exquisite sung.

MARIO and GRISI are recruiting at the Isle of Wight.... Duke ERNEST, of Saxe-Coburg, is composing his fifth opera. It is entitled Diana... MEYERBEER was expected in Paris on the 25th ult. He has a new comic opera ready, in which there are only three characters and no choruses. M. Royer, the new manager of the Grand Opera, has been promised Meyerbeer's Africaine, or another opera, which is also nearly ready.... The musical composer, PETER CORNELIUS, mentioned in our last, is not (it seems) the celebrated painter, Prof. Peter von Cornelius, but a nephew and godson of his. He lives at Weimar, is a musician by profession, and belongs to the artistic circle assembled around LISZT. He is considered a young man of much promise.... VERDI is in Paris, "which looks like business," (says the Athenæum).... THEODORE PIXIS, a violin virtuoso of the first rank, died suddenly at an early age on the first of August. He was a professor in the Rhenish Music School.... Mr. JOHN P. GROVES, the young Bostonian, who went abroad a couple of years since for musical improvement, is said to be the first violinist in the Brussels Conservatoire.... BOSIO, BETTINI and MARINI are engaged for the opera at Moscow during the Coronation festival....

Papers from Lima, Peru, mention the death in that city of Mme. BARILI THORNE, a favorite prima donna of the Italian Opera in New York, (in the days of Palmo's Theatre, when BENEDETTI first appeared,) who married the son of Col. Thorne.... Mr. HENRY C. TIMM, the modest and excellent musician, who has so long been looked up to by the musical profession and public in New York, has composed, it is said, a new Mass, which has already created a sensation among the knowing ones who have had a peep at it.

A NOBLE MAN AND ARTIST GONE!—It is with a sincere grief, which not a few of our readers will know how to share, that we read this morning in the Evening Post the following obituary:—

SETH CHENEY the artist, died yesterday, at Manchester, in Connecticut, about ten miles from Hartford. His age, we suppose, might be about fifty-five. In him a fine genius has been withdrawn from the age and the country.

Mr. Cheney's drawings in crayon are among the most remarkable things of their kind. The greater number of them are portraits of the size of life, but though portraits, they are informed with a noble idealism. It is almost impossible to look upon any work that came from his hand without acknowledging the presence of a certain purity, and spirituality, which the friends of the artist maintained was the proper expression of his own character. His strictly ideal pieces are of so high a degree of beauty and dignity that his friends scarcely scruple to speak of them as worthy of a place beside the drawings of Raphael. It was remarkable that he would never draw the likeness of any one for whom he had not a personal respect. His circumstances did not compel him to depend solely on his art for a livelihood, and when importuned to allow any distinguished man of defective morals, whom other artists might be proud to paint, to sit to him for a likeness, he steadily refused. He would not consent to copy traits of sensuality and dissimulation in the countenance of any man, whatever his station or influence.

Mr. Cheney had retired to Manchester, where with his brother, Mr. John Cheney, the eminent engraver, he had built a studio, and where he purposed to devote himself to painting—adding color, for which he is said to be possessed of a fine eye and delicate feeling to outline and shadow, by the management and disposition of which he has gained his reputation. Here he became a prey to the wasting disease by which he died, spoken of by some as consumption, but said by his physician to have been an exhaustion of the nervous organization, which in him was peculiarly sensitive. His personal character was of remarkable and blameless excellence, and he was greatly beloved by his friends.

Advertisements.

MR. AUGUST FRIES.

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

WANTED.—MUSIC TO COPY. Apply at No. 39 State Street, Room 6. Sep. 13 2t

SINGING AT SIGHT.

A Sight Singing School will be opened by D. U. MARTIN, at the Christian Baptist Church, corner of Kneeland and Tyler Streets, on Monday Evening, Sept. 22, when Prof. H. W. DAY, A. M., the well-known Inventor of the method, will deliver a free opening Lecture.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

Has the honor to announce that she will re-open her MORNING and AFTERNOON CLASSES for the instruction of YOUNG LADIES on the PIANO-FORTE, on MONDAY, Sept. 22, and on WEDNESDAY, Oct. 1. Terms, Fifteen dollars for Twenty-four lessons. Applications to be made, for classes or private lessons, at Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE's residence, No. 55 Hancock St.

A Magnificent Edition of Beethoven's Sonatas.

Printed from Engraved Plates. For Six Dollars.

The 32 Sonatas, complete, 524 pages of Music, in two volumes, with portrait, light binding. Price $6. The same, superbly bound in cloth, embossed and lettered, price $7.

Desirous of placing the best musical works within reach of the great mass of the people, the undersigned presents, as first of the series, the above celebrated compositions, and would direct special attention to the SUPERIORITY OF THIS EDITION OVER ALL OTHERS. It is printed from new, engraved music plates, each note being clear and accurate in its outline, rendering each page remarkably distinct. The copy employed has been the latest German edition, and an unusual amount of labor and expense has been bestowed on the work, in order to avoid typographical errors, however minute. Reliance can therefore be placed upon this edition as being in every particular an exact reprint of the best German, while superior plates, paper, press-work, binding, and general appearance render this American edition vastly preferable to all foreign copies, especially when the latter are printed upon type used for common Psalmody, &c.

In continuance of this series of Classical Musical Compositions will be issued in rapid succession, and sold at the same extraordinary low rate of additional prices, Piano-forte works of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart and others.

The great expense attending the publication of these works and the low price at which it is proposed to furnish them, can only be met by large sales; and it is hoped that all those favoring the circulation of an advanced style of music, and a consequent cultivation of a fine musical taste throughout our country, will so far aid the enterprise as to become purchasers of this edition of BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, as also of the works that may follow.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

NEW MUSIC BOOK! THE HOSANNA:

A New Collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Anthems, Motets, Sentences and Chants, for the use of Choirs, Congregations, Singing Schools and Musical Associations. Arranged and Composed by LEONARD MARSHALL, Director of Music at the Chambers Street Church, Boston, Editor of "The Harpichord," &c.

The publishers respectfully call the attention of parties in want of a new music book to "The Hosanna." The most eminent professors who have examined it, pronounce it the very best book, taken in all its details, ever published.

Prof. B. F. Baker says:
"I am much pleased with the spirit and general character of the musical compositions and arrangements for 'The Hosanna.'"

Prof. E. Bruce and L. O. Emerson say:
"We have examined with much care 'The Hosanna,' and can with confidence recommend it to the public. We predict for it an extensive circulation."

Prof. J. Sherwin says:
"The Hosanna will be one of the best books now in use. I shall give it my cordial approbation."

Prof. S. B. Ball says:
"Please send me copies for my choir. I most cordially recommend the work to those in want of a really good collection of Church Music."

Prof. G. W. Copeland says:
"It is the best collection which has been issued from the American press."

Prof. W. H. Gulliford says:
"It is the best American collection of Church Music I have yet seen. I think it peculiarly adapted to the present wants of our churches."

"The Hosanna" is a handsomely printed volume of 384 pages. A specimen of the work will be sent gratis, or copies will be mailed post-paid, on receipt of 75 cents.

WHITTEMORE, NILES & HALL,
PUBLISHERS,
114 Washington Street, Boston.

THE MUSICAL DRAMA:

A COLLECTION OF

Choruses, Quintettes, Quartettes, Trios, and Concerted Pieces,

FROM

Standard German, Italian & French Operas,
With English and the original words,

FOR THE USE OF

AMATEUR CLUBS AND SINGING SOCIETIES.

Selected, Arranged, and Translated by
J. C. D. PARKER, A. M.

In Nine Numbers, each 50 cents,—or in Three Vols., each $1.

PUBLISHED BY

NATHAN RICHARDSON,
Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasias, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 24 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols... $6
" additional volume of smaller works... $3
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols... $6
Haydn's " " 2 vols... $6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office. ALEX' W. THAYER.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works:

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION, WITH
AND WITHOUT ACCOMPANIMENTS,

Edited by CIPRIANI POTTER,
Principal Professor of Harmony and Composition in the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Vol. 1, Airs with Variations,.....	Bound in cloth, $4 88
" 2, Rondos, &c.....	Do do 2 18
" 3, Duets.....	Do do 4 25
" 4, Piano-Forte Sonatas.....	Do do 8 75
" 5, Do do.....	Do do 8 75
" 6, Sonatas for Piano and Violin.....	Do do 4 25
" 7, Do do ..	Do do 4 25
" 8, Quartets and Quintets.....	Do do 8 75
" 9, Trios for Piano, Violin and 'Cello, Do do	6 00

Each piece in the above volumes is published separately.

The fact of the collection and republication of Mozart's Pianoforte works in the middle of the present century shows that time instead of diminishing, has stamped their excellence and value. They are, indeed, true works of art, as useful as they are beautiful. Out of this school came the memorable artists, Hummel, and J. B. Cramer—players whose fingers expressed the deep feeling of music with which their nature was imbued; and if we may still hope to find their successors among the young, it must be by a train of studies similarly conducted.

Novello's Catalogue No. 4, containing an analytical and thematic index to the above works, to be had gratis at 389 Broadway, or forwarded to address on receipt of one cent postage.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean Street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,
ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-forte, Organ & Harmonium,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ma.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S

Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,

19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.

Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6 00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 233.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 25.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHAEFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÜRING.

(Continued from page 187.)

The realm of tones snatched Beethoven in his last years almost entirely from the actual world, from which his nearly total loss of hearing separated him. He shrank back into solitude, declining almost every invitation, lest he should be, through his deafness, burdensome to others. With this tender sparing of others there was united in Beethoven a citizen of the world sense of freedom which would brook no restraint. Without regard to consequences, when he appeared in public places he expressed his opinion freely and plainly, not seldom very sarcastically, about the government, about the police, about the manners of the great, &c. Everybody understood this in Vienna, and indulged him, whether on the score of eccentricity or out of reverence for his genius. Hence Beethoven frequently maintained that: "Nowhere can one speak more freely than in Vienna." His ideal of a constitution was the English. By that he tried every political manifestation. But he knew very well how much he and his works were prized in England.

He had an unmistakable proof of that in 1817, when the Philharmonic Society in London invited him to come there and to compose some grand symphonies. Beethoven was compelled by his sickness and by other circumstances to give up this journey. But the lively interest he took in the idea for a long time appears in the correspondence which he had about it with his friend and pupil, Ries, who had for some years lived in London. From the fact, too, that it sheds some light upon Beethoven's otherwise not very favorable situation, this correspondence is not without interest.

Beethoven wrote to Ries from Vienna on the 9th of July, 1817: "The commissions sent me in your last letter are very flattering. From this you will see how highly I esteem them. Were it not for my unlucky infirmity, which makes me require much more nursing and expense, especially upon a journey and in a foreign land, I should accept unconditionally the proposal of the Philharmonic Society. But place yourself in my position; consider how many more hindrances I have to contend with than any other artist, and then judge whether my requirements are unreasonable. Here they are, and I beg you to communicate them personally to the gentlemen directors of the Philharmonic Society: 1. I will be in London in the first half of the month of January, 1818, by the latest. 2. The two grand symphonies, entirely new, shall then be ready, and shall remain the property of the Society alone. 3. The Society gives me 300 guineas for them, and 100 guineas for travelling expenses, which, however, will come much higher in my case, since it will be indispensable that I take a companion with me. 4. Since I begin immediately to work upon the composition of these grand symphonies, the Society (on the receipt of my draft) will send me here the sum of 150 guineas, so that I may provide a carriage and other preparations for the journey without delay. 5. The conditions with regard to not appearing in any other orchestra, to not directing, and to giving the preference to the Society, other things being equal, are accepted by me, and would, by my love of honor, have been understood as a matter of course. I must hope for the countenance of the society in initiating and furthering one or more (according to circumstances) benefit concerts for me. The especial friendship of some of the directors of your estimable Réunion, as well as the kind interest of all artists in my works is to me a pledge of that, and spurs me on so much the more to realize their expectations. 7. Moreover, I wish to have the acceptance or ratification of the above drawn up in the English language, signed by three directors in the name of the Society." In a postscript to this letter he adds: "I have purposely used another's hand in this letter, in order that you may be better able to read it all and lay it before the Society. Of your friendly sentiment towards me I am convinced, and hope that the Philharmonic Society will accept my proposal. You may be assured that I will use all my power to execute the honorable commission of so select a Society in the most worthy manner." In the same postscript Beethoven inquired how strong the orchestra would be? how many violins, &c.? with or one with two proportions of brass? Is the hall large or resonant? &c.

Beethoven unfortunately was obliged to postpone the intended journey. "In spite of my wishes," he wrote to Ries on the 5th of March, 1818, "it was not possible for me to come this year to London. I beg you to say to the Philharmonic Society, that my feeble health prevented me. I hope, however, to be this spring perhaps entirely cured, and then to avail myself early in the autumn of the commission from the Society, and fulfil all the conditions of the same."

The following passage in this letter affords a deep insight into Beethoven's situation, which, according to his own statements, must have been very oppressive. "I wish," he says to Ries, "that your fortunes may improve daily. Alas! I cannot say that of myself. I cannot see another starve; I must give. So you can imagine what and how I suffer. Write to me very soon, I beg you. If it is in any way possible, I will get away from here early, to escape my utter ruin, and so reach London at the latest in the winter. I know that you will stand by an unfortunate friend. Had I been in the possession of my strength, and had I not been here, as always, bound by circumstances, I surely should have done far more for you."

Over a year had passed, when Beethoven, in a letter to Ries (April 3, 1819) saw himself obliged once more to announce, that for the present he could not possibly come to London, since he was entangled in so many circumstances. "But God will certainly," he added, "aid me to come to London next winter, when I will bring with me the new symphonies. I expect very soon the text for a new Oratorio, which I write here for the Musical Society, and which perhaps will also serve us in London. Do what you can for me, for I need it. Orders from the Philharmonic Society would have been very welcome. The accounts which Neate has sent me from London about the almost total failure of the three overtures, distressed me. Here each of them in its way not only pleased, but those in E flat and C major made a really great impression. The fate of these compositions with the Philharmonic Society is incomprehensible to me. You will already have received the arranged Quintet and the Sonata. Have both these works, especially the Quintet, engraved at once. With the Sonata there is less need of haste; yet I should like to have it appear within at least two, or at the most, three months. Your earlier letter, of which you speak, I did not receive; hence I did not hesitate to sell these two works here also—that is to say, merely for Germany. Meanwhile it will take three months before the Sonata appears here. But do make haste with the Quintet. As soon as you remit me the money here, I will send you, for the publisher, a certificate as proprietor of these works for England, Scotland, Ireland, France, &c."

About a fortnight later, on the 18th of April, 1819, Ries received from his old friend and teacher a very discontented letter: "It is incomprehensible to me," wrote Beethoven, "how so many errors could occur in the copy of the Sonata. The incorrect copying may have arisen from the fact that I no longer have a copyist of my own. Circumstances have brought all this about, and God must better it, until there comes a different state of things. This has lasted now a whole year. It is frightful how this thing has gone on, and what has become of my material; and yet no man can say what will come of it, until the promised year is passed. Should the Sonata not suit London, I could send another, or you could leave out the Largo, and begin at once with the Fugue in the last piece. I leave it to your discretion. The Sonata has been written in depressing circumstances; for it is hard to write almost for bread's sake. To this then have I come! To go to London were certainly the sole salvation for me, to free me from this wretched, irksome situation, in which I never can be well, and never do the work I could in better circumstances." In a later letter (25th May, 1819) Beethoven confessed: "I was confined by cares, as never before in my life, and that by excessive kindness towards other men."

Beethoven excused his long silence in a letter of the 6th of April, 1822, with the confession that he had been sick again for more than a whole year. "Still," he wrote, "I cherish the thought of coming yet to London, if only my health permit, perhaps next Spring. You would find in me, dear Ries, the true appreciator of my dear scholar, now great master; and who knows what new good thing for Art may yet spring up in union with you. I am, as always, given up entirely to my Muse, and find in that alone the happiness of my life."

In this same letter Beethoven mentioned a grand Mass, (Missa solennis) which he had not long before written. To his inquiry to Ries, whether something might not be made of it in London, he had received no answer. Accordingly he turned (in a letter of the 26th of July, 1822) to the music-dealer, Peters, in Leipzig, the head of the Bureau de Musique there. "I hereby inform you," he wrote, "that I will give you the Mass, together with the piano-forte arrangement, for the sum of 1000 florins in Convention coin. By the end of July you will receive this work well written off in score; perhaps a few days earlier or later, since I am always very busy and have been sick now for five months. But since one has to go through a work very attentively when it is going to a distance, it becomes a slow operation with me. The competition for my works is at present very strong, for which I thank the Almighty, for I have also lost much. Besides, I am foster-father to my brother's helpless child. As this boy of fifteen shows so much talent for the sciences, it not only costs a great deal for the instruction and support of my nephew, but his future must be thought of, since we are neither Indians nor Iroquois, who leave all to the dear God, and it is a sad life, that of a pauper. In relation to one expression in your letter, I assure you on my honor that it has always been my principle never to offer myself to any publisher; not out of pride, but because I like to see how far the domain of my little talent reaches."

On the 3d of August, 1822, Beethoven wrote to Peters in Leipzig: "I have already told you of my not yet being wholly restored to health. I require baths, as also mineral water, and medicine besides. Hence things are somewhat deranged with me, the more so, that I must still write. Corrections, too, consume time. In regard to the songs and the other marches and little things, I am not yet decided on the selection; but all may be ready to send by the 15th of this month. I wait for your directions, and will make no use of your remittance. So soon as I know that the price for the Mass and for the other works is here, all can be delivered by the 15th of this month. But after the 15th I must go to a mineral bath which is in this neighborhood. Hence it is important for me to avoid all business for a while.

About his physical condition Beethoven wrote some three months later, on the 22d of November, 1822: "My health is not indeed fully restored by my baths; but on the whole I have gained. I had one special evil here, which was hard to overcome; another person had sought me out a dwelling-place which did not suit me; and this put back my business not a little, since one never can get on well so."

A letter of Beethoven to Peters in Leipzig (20th Dec., 1822) contains the confession: "It is impossible for me in all cases to make a percentage arrangement. I find it very hard to reckon in that way, oftener than is absolutely necessary. Besides, my situation is not so brilliant as you suppose. I am not in a condition to give an immediate hearing to all orders. There are too many of them; and there are many things which cannot be refused. Not always does the thing required accord with the author's wish. Were not my income wholly without income, I would write nothing but grand symphonies, church music, at the least quintets." With the expressions in this letter, another of the same date, to his friend Ries in London, harmonizes. "With satisfaction," he writes, "I accept the commission to write a new Symphony for the Philharmonic Society. If the compensation from the English cannot be compared with other nations, I would write even gratis for the first artists of Europe, if I were not always the poor Beethoven. If I were only in London, what great things would I not write for the Philharmonic Society! For Beethoven, thank God! can write nothing else in the world. If God only gives me back my health again, which has improved, to say the least, then I can execute orders from all parts of Europe, nay, even from North America, and I may yet come to a green branch."

In a letter of the 20th of March, 1823, Beethoven pleaded his situation in excuse for his delay in sending some military marches to Peters, the chef of the Bureau de Musique in Leipzig. "You would not think it strange," he wrote, "that you receive the three marches only to-day, if you were here and knew my situation. A description of it would be too prolix both for you and me. But I find here something to remark on what I have sent. In the grand march there might be several regimental bands united, in order to man all the parts; and where a regimental band is not strong enough, a band master can easily manage it by leaving out some parts. In Leipzig even, you may find some one who can show you how this march may be set with fewer parts; although it will pain me if it should not appear in print entirely as it is. You must pardon the many corrections in the copy. My old copyist's sight is failing, and the younger one must first be broken in. But all is at least free from errors. It is impossible for me to serve you at once with a violin and a piano quartet. In case you write me betimes, however, whether you wish both works, I will do all I can. Only I must add, that I cannot take for a violin quartet less than 50 ducats, and for a piano quartet 70 ducats, as otherwise I should suffer loss. Indeed, 50 ducats have been offered me more than once for violin quartets. But I do not like to be exorbitant, and hence with you I adhere to these 50 ducats, which is actually now the common price. You know how quartets have risen now to the highest point, so that one is even shamed with a great work. Meanwhile my situation demands that I should have every advantage more or less for an inducement. It is quite another matter with the work itself. There I never think, thank God! of the advantage, but only how I write."

Beethoven often complained that he was obliged, for the sake of gain, to have recourse to giving lessons. On the 25th of April, 1823, he wrote to Ries in London: "The visit of the Archduke Rudolph here in Vienna lasted nearly four weeks. Then I had every day to give two and a half or three hours lessons, and lost much time by it. After such lessons, on the next day one is hardly in a state to think, much less to write. But my continually sad condition requires that I shall write for the moment that which brings me so much money, which is needed for the moment. What a gloomy revelation you have here! Even now I am not well of many troubles I have suffered; indeed I have bad eyes. But do not be concerned; you shall have the symphonies very soon. Nothing but this miserable condition causes the delay."

Beethoven had dedicated some piano-forte variations to the wife of his friend Ries, and had sent them to London. "They have perhaps already arrived," he wrote on the 16th of July 1823. "The dedication to your wife I could not make myself, since I did not know her name. Do you then make it in the name of your own and your wife's friend. Surprise her with it. The fair sex loves that. Between ourselves, what is surprising as well as beautiful is the best. As to the Allegri di bravura, I must first see yours. Candidly, I am no friend of such things, since they demand too much mechanism, at least those which I know. I will send you some choruses if I succeed in composing any new ones. It is just my darling passion. Whatever you can get for the Variations, take. I am content in any case; only I must stipulate, that for the dedication to your wife there shall be absolutely no other pay taken but a kiss, which I have to receive in London. You frequently write guineas, and I receive only sterling; but I hear there is a distinction. Be not angry about it with a pauvre musicien Autrichien; really my condition is still oppressive. I am writing now a new violin quartet. Might one perhaps offer this to the London musical or unmusical Jews—en vrai Juif?"

Beethoven's melancholy condition troubled him the more, since it everywhere set limits to the disinterestedness and liberality, which were fundamental traits in his character. In a letter to Ries, Sept. 5, 1823, he confessed: "Were I not so poor that I have to live by my pen, I would take nothing from the Philharmonic Society. I must really wait until the price for the symphony has been remitted. But to give a proof of my love and confidence for this Society, I have already sent them off a new overture. I leave it to the Society to do as it pleases with the overture. My brother Johann, who supports an equipage, has also wished to draw from me, and so, without asking me, he has offered the said overture to a publisher, Boosey, in London. Just say that my brother was mistaken about the overture. He bought it of me to speculate upon, as I perceive. O frater! Of your Symphony, dedicated to me, I have received nothing. If I did not consider the dedication as a sort of challenge, upon which I should have had to give you satisfaction, I should already have dedicated some work to you. But I thought all the time that I must first see your work, and how gladly I would testify my thanks to you by something of the sort. I am deeply your debtor for so much devotion and obligingness which you have shown to me. If my health should be improved by the mineral bath, then I will kiss your wife in 1824 in London."

The portrait which is sketched of Beethoven by an Englishman, who visited him about this time, is interesting in many ways. "The 28th of September, 1823," wrote that traveller, "will always be remembered by me as a Dien faustus. In fact I do not know that I ever lived a happier day. Early in the morning we went to Baden, a village near Vienna, where Beethoven was residing. As Herr H., one of his most intimate friends, accompanied me, I could not feel embarrassed at appearing before Beethoven. At first he looked steadily at me, and then he shook my hand as heartily as if I were an old acquaintance; for he remembered clearly my first visit in the year 1816, although that had been a very brief one—a proof of his excellent memory. I found to my deep regret a great change in his exterior, and it occurred to me at the moment that he seemed to be very unhappy. His complaints to H. afterwards confirmed my apprehension. I feared that he would not understand a word of what I said. But I was mistaken, for he comprehended all that I said to him aloud and slowly. From his answers it appeared that nothing of what H. said was lost, although neither he nor I used the hearing trumpet. Yet I must mention that when he played the piano, he as a general rule began so that twenty or thirty strings had to pay the penalty. Nothing can be more full of life and genius, and, to use an expression which characterizes his symphonies so well, more energetic, than his conversation, when one has once put him in a good humor. But an untimely question, a bad piece of advice, for instance, in relation to the cure of his deafness, is enough to alienate him forever. He wished, for a composition upon which he was just then engaged, to know the utmost possible compass of the trombone, and asked Herr H. about it, whose reply, however, did not satisfy him. Thereupon he told me that he had made it a rule to inform himself through the different artists themselves about the construction, character and compass of the leading instruments. He presented to me his nephew, a handsome young man of about eighteen years, the only relative with whom he lived upon a friendly footing. He added: 'You can, if you will, give him a puzzle in Greek,' by which he meant to inform me of the young man's intimate acquaintance with that language. The history of this relation places Beethoven's goodness of heart in the clearest light. The most affectionate father could not have made greater sacrifices for him than he did.

After we had been more than an hour with him, we took our leave, to meet again at one o'clock at table in the romantic Helenenthal. We visited the baths and other notabilities, went about noon again to Beethoven's house, where he was already awaiting us, and then set out on our way to the valley. Beethoven is a good walker, and takes delight in walks of several miles, especially through a wild and romantic country; indeed they told me that he passed whole nights on such excursions, and often staid away from home for several days. On our way to the valley he frequently stopped suddenly and showed me the beautiful points, or remarked the want of new buildings. Another time he seemed entirely buried in himself, and merely hummed to himself in an unintelligible manner. I heard, however, that this was his way of composing, and that he never wrote down a note until he had made himself a definite plan of the whole piece. As the day was singularly beautiful, we ate in the open air, and what seemed particularly to please Beethoven was, that we were the only guests in the hotel and had the whole day alone to ourselves. The meal prepared for us was so luxurious that Beethoven could not help making remarks about it. 'Wherefore so many different dishes?' he exclaimed. 'Man stands but little above other animals if his chief enjoyments are limited to the table.' Such reflections he made several times more during the repast. Of meats he is only fond of fishes, and among them the trout is his favorite. He hates all constraint, and I do not believe there is a person in Vienna who speaks of everything, even of political subjects, with so little reserve as Beethoven. He hears poorly, but he speaks extraordinarily well, and his remarks are as characteristic and original as his compositions. During the whole course of our table talk nothing was more interesting than what he said of Handel. I sat next to him, and I heard him most distinctly say in German: 'Handel is the greatest composer who has ever lived.' I cannot describe with what expression, I might say, with what inspiration he spoke of the 'Messiah' of that immortal genius. Every one of us felt deeply moved when he said: 'I would uncover my head and kneel upon his grave.' Repeatedly I sought to turn the conversation upon Mozart, but in vain. I only heard him say: 'In a monarchy we know who is first,' which might or might not refer to this subject. I heard afterwards that Beethoven is sometimes inexhaustible in his praise of Mozart. It is remarkable that he cannot hear his own earlier works praised, and I learned that it was the surest way to vex him, if one complimented him upon his Septuor and the Trios. He is most fond of his last creations, among the rest his second Mass, which he considers his best work. He is now engaged in writing a new opera, called 'Melusina,' of which the text is by the poet Grillparzer. Beethoven is a great admirer of the ancients. Homer, especially the Odyssey, and Plutarch, he prefers to all others. Of his own country's poets he has studied particularly Schiller and Goethe. He has the most favorable opinion of the British nation. 'I like,' said he, 'the noble simplicity of the English manners,' and added other praise besides. It seemed to me as if he still cherished a hope of visiting England with his nephew. I must not forget, that I have heard a Trio by him, for piano-forte, violin and violoncello, while it was still in manuscript. It impressed me as very beautiful, and I hear it will soon appear in London. I could tell much more of this extraordinary man, who, after what I have seen and experienced, has filled me with the deepest reverence. The friendly way in which he treated me and bade me farewell has made an impression on me, which will last for life."

[Conclusion next week.]

Meyerbeer.

(From the Paris Correspondence of the N. O. Picayune.)

Meyer Liebmann Beer was born rich. His father was a wealthy Jewish banker of Berlin, and by the death of his brothers, our hero is now the master of some eight or ten millions of dollars. This fortune has never been used except to advance his knowledge of Art—and for this he is always ready to sacrifice not only money but time, ease and pleasure. He paid the author of the "book" of "Romilda," bought all the costumes necessary, paid the performers' salaries, and gave the score as a present to the manager of the Italian theatre, where it was first brought out.

Meyer Liebmann Beer was born at Berlin, the 5th September, 1794, and he is consequently in his sixty-third year. It was at an early period of his life that he refined the harshness of his paternal name into the more pleasing appellation which he has since made famous. It appears he was induced to make this change by reflecting that as his name was about to become public property, and the prey of enemies who would be sure to lose no means of irritating him, it would be wise not to leave in their hands a topic for so much sport as the name Liebmann Beer, which means "bear philanthropist" when translated into English, would be certain to afford wittlings. He dropped Liebmann, united Meyer and Beer together, and after translating his father's Christian name into Italian, he signed himself Giacomo (James) Meyerbeer.

Like most eminent geniuses, his "turn" early exhibited itself. Although he had not then attained his fourth year, he never heard a hand-organ grind in the street that he did not hasten to the piano and repeat in an accompaniment, which overflowed with grace and delicacy, the popular air roughly interpreted by the anbulating musician. His father judiciously fostered these talents with all the appliances wealth so easily commands, and as he encouraged his eldest son William in the study of mathematics until he became an eminent astronomer, and Michael in the cultivation of the belles-lettres until he achieved reputation as a poet, (he is the author of two tragedies of merit: "The Pariah" and "Struensee,") so Giacomo was incited in the study of music. A celebrated player, named Lauska, directed his first musical studies; in his seventh year he was master of all the secrets of the piano key-board, and was eminent in all the private concerts of Berlin. When he was nine years old the Abbé Vogler, then the master of a highly esteemed musical school at Darmstadt, met him in Berlin, and after hearing him play said: "Courage! my lad, courage! If you persevere you will become the most famous piano player in Europe." He engaged him to choose for his master of musical composition one Bernard Anselme Weber, one of his old pupils, and then leader of the orchestra of the first theatre of Berlin.

This master appears to have been deeply acquainted with the science of instrumentation and dramatic style, but ignorant of the rules of harmony. One day Giacomo wrote a fugue, which he showed to his master, who proclaimed it admirable, and forthwith he would send it by a special messenger to the Abbé Vogler at Darmstadt. The special messenger returned, but he brought with him no reply; a month, two months, three months passed away, but not a line came from Darmstadt, and Weber began to boast that Vogler was silent from mere spite to see his whole school outdone. The boast was premature. Early in the fourth month a huge package came from Darmstadt; it contained a complete treatise on fugue in MSS., written entirely by Vogler, a critical analysis of Giacomo's fugue, wherein all its details were examined and proved wrong, and a fugue written by Vogler on the same thema and explained note by note, measure by measure, with the most exact logic. Weber went to bed sick. Giacomo studied the treatise by day and night, and in six months afterwards sent a fugue in eight parts to the Abbé Vogler. "Come," replied the Abbé, "come to my house; I will treat you as my own son, and together, we will delve in deepest mines of science."

Although the Abbé Vogler was the organist of the Darmstadt church, and he made his pupils study sacred music especially, Giacomo's family nevertheless sent him to the Abbé's house. Here Giacomo found Charles Marie von Weber (the composer of "Der Freyschütz," and who was Meyerbeer's fast friend until his untimely death,) Godfrey von Weber, and Gambascher (since chapel master at Vienna.) Their day commenced with a mass celebrated by the Abbé Vogler, Charles von Weber being at the organ—mass ended, they set to work, the master giving to each pupil the thema he was to study, and which was generally a piece of religious music, a "Kyrie Sancte," or "Gloria in Excelsis," Vogler himself working as hard as any of them. Sundays the whole school would go to the cathedral, where Vogler would take one organ and his pupils the other, and reply to him either by repeating his own strains, or by throwing the reins over the neck of their winged steed and plunging into the highest of the ideal.

Before he was seventeen M. Meyerbeer had written some scores of religious music, which are said to be very remarkable; but he has never allowed any of them to be published; because, so it is said, he knows very well they exhibit too frequent use of the scholastic formulas and contain too little harmony. Be this as it may, one of these pieces, "God and Nature," commanded the unanimous applause of the Court of Hesse Darmstadt, and the Grand Duke appointed him his composer in ordinary. In 1811, Vogler closed his school and made with his pupils a tour in the German towns. Meyerbeer had then in his pocket his first opera, "Jephtha's Vow," which his master and companions thought an admirable production: it was performed during his tour at Munich, but fell, with the silence of this lukewarm age, un succès d'estime. M. Meyerbeer is of too sensitive a nature to bear a check; and he hastened to Vienna to console himself by the triumphs of the piano-players for the defeat of the composer.

At that period of time Hummel and Clementi were the great piano-players of Europe. The latter had given Meyerbeer lessons at Berlin, but he had never heard the former. He made no appearance in public after Hummel's arrival at Vienna; for he felt instantly that though he possessed the fire and brilliancy of Clementi's school, he lacked the grace, charm and purity which distinguished Hummel's playing. M. Meyerbeer acted in a very characteristic manner. He shut himself up for six months, worked for eighteen hours a day, and then made his appearance in the Vienna concert rooms. Hummel acknowledged him his superior! Isn't genius the child of patience? M. Meyerbeer has constantly refused to publish his compositions for the piano.

But M. Meyerbeer's secret aspirations were not for the fame of Hummel's, Listz's, and Thalberg's. His defeat at Munich fired, rather than extinguished his ambition, and he wrote "Abimelech, or the Two Caliphs." It was "brought out" at the Imperial theatre of Vienna; Vogler; Vogler and Charles von Weber vowed it a masterpiece, but it fell stillborn. A few days afterwards Salieri, the imperial chapel-master, the author of an opera called "Les Danaïdes," and the composer for whom Beaumarchais wrote "Tartar," called upon him, and after telling him that he was not sufficiently master of his art, engaged him to go to Italy. M. Meyerbeer went to Venice, where for eight months he heard Rossini's music, and, as it is said, "Tancredi" wrought a wonderful change in him. Three years afterwards (1818) he gave his first Italian opera "Romilda e Constanza," Mme. Pisaroni singing the principal part. In 1819 he wrote at Turin, for Mme. Caroline Bassai, the part of "Semiramide Riconosciuta," and early the following year the San Benedetto theatre of Venice played "Emma di Risburgo," which had a great deal of success.

M. Meyerbeer returned to Germany, preceded by the fame of his Italian successes. They prejudicated, rather than advanced him. The most violent attacks against him rang through every newspaper in Germany; he was called a renegade, a traitor, an unfilial child, because he deserted, so they said, the German for the Italian school. He wrote a score, "Brandenburg Gate," for a Berlin festival, but the theatre refused to allow it to be played. Dresden, however, was more generous, and "Emma di Risburgo" was warmly applauded by the court and the people. This cold reception was, perhaps, of use to M. Meyerbeer, since they attracted him again to the German school—to that style in which his most lasting works are written. Milan invited M. Meyerbeer to La Scala, where "Margherita d'Angiù" and "Usule di Granata" were given. He wrote next an opera in two acts, "Almanzor," for Rome, but the illness of Mme. Caroline Bassai prevented the opera from being performed. It is said that M. Meyerbeer has introduced into his French operas the best music of "Brandenburg Gate" and "Almanzor." "Il Crociato" was next composed, and it was first played at Venice in 1824.

M. Meyerbeer heard, while he was at Milan, that the Italian Opera at Paris was about to produce "Il Crociato," with Mlle. Schiassetti (a contralto of the second rank) as the principal personage; Mme. Pasta as the "high" soprano, (so that she would have been obliged to transpose her part from one end to the other,) and the tenor's part by M. Curioni, (a worn-out barytone.) M. Meyerbeer flew to Paris, in a state of mind which has been described as bordering on distraction. He insisted that Mme. Pasta should take Mlle. Schiassetti's part; Mme. Mombelli, Mme. Pasta's; and Donzelli, Curioni's part. For eleven months poor M. Meyerbeer was annoyed by rehearsals which were constantly interrupted, then pressed forward rapidly: at last "Il Crociato" was played, but it met with no sort of success for this reason. See on what a slender thread success sometimes hangs!

In the admirable quartetto of the second act, a child is made to appear, a "walking" character, who is supposed to be the son of Palmide, and is presented to the Sultan to bring him to more merciful ideas. The child appears late in the course of the evening. It no sooner appeared on the stage than it began to gape; the public smiled; Palmide sang with inexpressible tenderness: "Frena le lagrime, (gape the second,) consolarte, (gape,) sapra, (gape,) il ciel," (gape.) The audience could withstand it no longer, and laughed in those immoderate peals which ruin a serious work. But three years afterwards "Il Crociato" was played here with some success.

M. Meyerbeer married in 1827 and for a long time remained silent, and his silence was prolonged by the loss of two children, the first and second issue of his marriage. For two years he composed nothing but religious music; among these compositions are the twelve Psalms with a double choir, the "Stabat," "Miserere," "Te Deum," Klopstock's eight canticles for four voices without accompaniment, which are now in every lady's hands.

He returned to Paris early in 1830. Before his marriage Pixérécourt, then manager of the Opera Comique, was anxious for him to write an opera for the Opera Comique, and proposed Alex. Duval and Dupaty as the best "book" writers he could find; but M. Meyerbeer declined them both, although Alex. Duval actually wrote a "book" for him. His brother, Michael Beer was on intimate terms with Casimir and Germain Delavigne, and Michael engaged the latter to promise that he would with M. Scribe write a "book" for an opera comique for Giacomo Meyerbeer. The book was written; it was a three act opera comique—its name was "Robert le Diable." M. Meyerbeer took the "book" with him to Berlin, but he became discouraged after the death of his children and threw up the "book." M. de La Rochefoucauld was then General Director of the Fine Arts, and he engaged M. Meyerbeer to write an opera for the Grand Opera; the latter asked two things—first, to read M. de La Rochefoucauld a scenario he had composed, secondly to procure M. Scribe to translate it into French. M. Meyerbeer read his scenario to M. de La Rochefoucauld, who was then anxious to find a ballet for Mlle. Taglioni, and who found it in the scenario, which M. Meyerbeer thereupon abandoned to him, and the latter agreed to decide MM. Scribe and Delavigne to change their opera comique into a grand opera; they, however, long refused to do any such thing. "Robert le Diable" was not performed until the 22d November, 1832, I need not say with an unparalleled success. The first fifty performances were of $2,000 each, and even now it never fails to bring in $1,600. The first performance came near causing the death of Mlle. Taglioni and of Nourrit. Strange to say, before the first performance and at the general rehearsal, M. Meyerbeer was annoyed by the beauty of the famous scene of the nuns leaving their tombs: "That's all very fine, but you have evidently no confidence in the success of my music, you are anxious to obtain a success of scenery."

This splendid success irritated Rossini to the last degree, and by that infirmity which so frequently attends genius, M. Meyerbeer detests Rossini even more than the latter hates him. Dr. Veron (who was then the manager of the Grand Opera) seeing Rossini's ill humor, sought to engage him to write an opera on M. Scribe's "Gustave," which he represented as containing all the great human passions. "Depend upon it, my dear Rossini, action, contrasts, splendid costumes and scenery aid a musical work immensely." "You forget, my good Veron," replied Rossini, while a sardonic smile flitted across the face, "to add to those attractions, eighty additional musicians in the orchestra." "True, true," said Veron, caught in the snare Rossini laid for him; "and they give force and volume to the music; the orchestra of the Italian Opera is too small." "Your principles are excellent," my dear Veron, "carry them into practice with your new work, 'La Juive': M. Halévy is also a Jew; some wit has said 'he is Meyerbeer's crime and punishment'; [you know M. Halévy is an imitator of M. Meyerbeer.] You will obtain as much success with it as with 'Robert le Diable.' I cannot write you 'Gustave,' for I am going to Italy. I'll return when your Jews have ended their Sabbat."

M. Meyerbeer does not express his aversion for Rossini so frankly, but he is accused by the malevolent of engaging his friends to go to sleep in conspicuous places when Rossini's music is executed. Last October, at the second performance of "Semiramide," M. Meyerbeer took a stage-box at the Italian Opera here. When Mme. Bosio sang her great air, he turned around to the stage and listened in such a way that it was evident to every body that he was paying a compliment to the prima donna rather than the opera. At the finale of the first act, he leaned back in his chair, and went, or seemed to go, fast asleep!

One curious remark about M. Meyerbeer's operas in France has been made: the cholera has visited Paris with each of them; when "Robert le Diable" was first played, 1832, this city was decimated by that hideous scourge, and when "Le Prophète" was produced in 1849, and when "Le Etoile du Nord" appeared in 1854! Somebody has said, "Oh! this is not at all astonishing."

When Meyerbeer's music is heard, plagues and pestilences must be near at hand; for he is not a musician, he is the Devil!"

Let me tell you a very good story of how M. Meyerbeer silenced some critics without opening his purse. He is morbidly sensitive to the least harsh criticism, and when he is attacked he exerts every means in his power to prevent the attack from being renewed. On the eve of every important performance of his works, he invites the leading feuilletonistes to a splendid dinner at the Hotel des Princes or Trois Frères Provençaux, to propitiate their critical acumen. He calls this chauffer la reclame. But to my story.

One day a gentleman entered M. Mires's office (he too is a Jew, and the proprietor of the Constitutionnel and Pays), and after discussing railways and the funds, he carelessly asked, "Do you know the author of 'Les Huguenots'?" "No, I have never seen him." "That's odd. It was only yesterday he was praising you up to the skies. If I were in your place I would go to see him." "Really? Then I'll go to-day." In due time M. Mires called at the Hotel du Danube, Rue Richemont, where M. Meyerbeer usually stays when in Paris. I need scarcely say M. Meyerbeer expected the visit of the opulent banker; and received him with the greatest cordiality. After they been talking an hour, M. Meyerbeer said very calmly: "Do you know I am constantly attacked in Le Pays?" "No! What, attacked in Le Pays, in my newspaper?" "I was sure you knew nothing about it." "Not a word, I pledge you my honor. And now I know it, rest assured you shan't be attacked again." That very evening the musical critic was summoned: "You must not attack my friend Meyerbeer." Mais—"There are no mais about it. You must exalt his wonderful genius." "Really...." "Well, if you do not choose to do so, resign your place, and I'll appoint another." "No; in Le Pays we will do as you please. But in La France Musicale we will express our own opinions." "Not at all! Unless you praise Meyerbeer, my friend, you shall not write in Le Pays." From that day to this, Meyerbeer is the Jupiter Tonans of Le Pays and La France Musicale!

The extreme care M. Meyerbeer takes with all his compositions has given rise to the accredited opinion that all his operas are the children of labor, and science, and skill, but not of inspiration. "Tu l'as dit, oui, tu m'aimes," (the famous duet which ends the fourth act of "Les Huguenots") may be instanced to disprove this belief. The whole of the duet was written the 20th November, 1835, between 11 o'clock at night and 2 o'clock in the morning. After the first general rehearsal, M. Meyerbeer ran home—he was then staying with his friend M. Gouin, his great Paris factotum—and fell into a chair. All's lost, Gouin! said he, "all goes to ruin. Nourrit swears he can never sing the last piece in the fourth act, and everybody sides with him." "Bah! why not write something else?" "Impossible. Scribe vows he will not touch the 'book' again." "The devil! Do you want many words?" "Mon Dieu! no; all I want is something for an andante." "I'll get Emile Deschamps; he'll do what we want." Off M. Gouin ran to the Divan Lepelletier, the favorite haunt of Deschamps, and brought him to M. Meyerbeer. The words were soon written, the maestro sat down to the piano, and in three hours the famous duet you applaud every winter was turned to shape, and the airy nothing had a local habitation and a name.

M. Meyerbeer scarcely slept that night. At day break he went to see Nourrit, duet in hand. Nourrit took the score, hummed the air, gave an enthusiastic huzzza, and fell into the composer's arms. The second day afterwards it was written for the orchestra; it was rehearsed; the orchestra laid down their instruments and cheered; Habeneck climbed over the foot-lights, followed by all his musicians, and M. Meyerbeer was carried around the stage in triumph, amid the cheers of the company; Raol applauded and Valentine wept.

At the rehearsal of his operas, M. Meyerbeer is the most timid of men. He consults everybody:

machinist, prompter, fireman, chorister, supernumerary, and especially the leader of the claque. He sits by the latter's side during rehearsal and listens to him as to an oracle. "There's a dangerous piece," the leader of the claque has but to say; "if you have many friends in the house who will undertake it, we will continue it, but I can't guarantee it." "But," replies M. Meyerbeer, "you know more about it than I do." But when once the opera has been played, and is successful, he consults nobody, and every body must yield to him. When his operas are at stake, M. Meyerbeer is as insensible as Sir Giles Overreach. Last spring a year, "L'Etoile du Nord" was in all its glory. Mlle. Decroix, who sang the duet of the Vivandières with Mlle. Lemercier, lost her mother very suddenly. The manager gave her a leave of absence, and supplied her place by Mlle. Belia, who knew the part. Meyerbeer heard of the change, and asked what it meant. He was told. "You were right to give Mlle. Decroix a leave of absence, but I cannot accept Mlle. Belia. Our contract interdicts you from doubling before the fiftieth performance." "Very true, but".... "Suspend the piece until Mlle. Decroix returns." "That I can't do; I can't afford to lose the money." "Then make Mlle. Decroix sing," was the heartless reply of the celebrated composer; and the poor, weeping girl was forced to give the public that gay song, the evening her mother was buried! He detests cats, and faints if he is thrown with a man who has a nervous twitch of the eyes, or other feature. He is very absent minded.

GAMMA.

TO A BOUQUET.

Tints the fairest,
Scents the rarest,
Make of thee a prize!
Let me place thee
Where I'll face thee
When I raise my eyes.

On the table—
'Tis no fable—
Thou mak'st radiant all;
Shedding sweetness
And completeness
O'er my room so small.

When thou'lt perish
Shall I cherish
Sadd'ning thoughts of thee?
Mem'ry painting—
No hue fainting—
Thus thou'lt live with me.

STELLA.

Worcester Palladium.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

HALLE.—This city was the birth-place of HANDEL. It is by no means one of the most genial homes of German Art at present, although it is the residence of one of Germany's truest artists, ROBERT FRANZ. It is proposed there to celebrate the centenary of Handel's death, and a committee has put forth the following announcement:

On the 13th April, 1759, George Frederick Handel, one of the greatest men of the German nation, and one of the most eminent men of his art, departed this life. The approaching centenary of his death calls upon all Germans to discharge the debt of gratitude yet due to their countryman. To our great satisfaction we learn that preparations have been made to honor the memory of Handel by a complete edition of his works. At the same time it is desirable that this mark of respect should be followed by another. Halle, the city where Handel was born, and received the first all-important impressions of youth, desires that a monument to him should be raised within her walls; and to carry out this object a committee has been formed. The original design is to found here an institution especially devoted to the cultivation of Handel's music. We are forced, however, to concede that a plan of this sort would favor local interests to the detriment of the main object, and hence propose that the memory of Handel should be honored by the erection of his statue in the place of his birth. This project will, doubtless, receive the support of all who are indebted to Handel for intellectual excitement and elevation—that is, of the majority of cultivated persons in every nation. With musicians, the accomplishment of the plan will be a point of honor. If our success is proportionate to the greatness of the master, we shall, perhaps, be enabled to carry out the original notion as well as the present one; but the proximity of the Centenary Festival compels us to request that all friends to our musical project may use all possible speed in enabling us to carry it out, by public performances, subscriptions, and other suitable means. We shall not fail to report publicly on the progress of the work, and the expenditure of the money contributed (to be addressed to Herr Geheimerath Wucherer, Halle). We request that this announcement may be circulated as widely as possible, and trust that the editors of the German papers will support us by inserting the same, and also by receiving subscriptions. Halle, June, 1856.

SALZBURG, the place of MOZART's birth, has prepared a great festival in his honor this month. The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung furnishes the following programme of it, (as translated in the London Musical World):

Saturday, 6th Sept.—When the visitors, passing through the gates, which will be adorned with appropriate inscriptions, garlands, &c., enter the venerable Juvavia, (the ancient name of Salzburg,) so renowned in the history of the world and of Art, the city will show them its joyous countenance by a torchlight procession, which directing its movements towards the statue of Mozart, will terminate with a cantata composed by Lachner, to words by Professor Beck, and a magical illumination of the mountains.

Sunday, 7th.—About 9 o'clock, A. M., Mozart's grand mass in C, in which distinguished "stars" will assist. In the evening the first festival-concert in the hall (decorated for the occasion,) of the Studiengänge. The music will be exclusively that of Mozart, and will comprise the symphony (Jupiter) in C major; an aria from Titus, with bassoon obligato; quartet from Idomeneo (two sopranos, alto and tenor); piano-concerto in D minor; concerto for violin and tenor; the Count's aria from Figaro; trio from Lo Sposo; scene from Idomeneo; overture to Zauberflöte.

Monday, 8th.—In the Cathedral, Mozart's grand mass in F major, as on the preceding day. At 3 o'clock, P. M., the great festival procession, consisting of all the Liedertafeln, with their banners and emblems, will march to the decorated tribune on the Mönchsberg, where the "Abendlied," "Bundeslied," Mozart's "O Isis," Lachner's "Kriegers Gebet," Storch's "Grün," the chorus from Mendelssohn's "Edipus," the "Frau Musica" of Rochlitz, the hunting chorus from Robert Schumann's "Pilgerfahrt," and amid the firing of salutes, "Prince Eugene" will be sung by the various societies in union, besides sundry intervening pieces by the different societies separately.

Tuesday, 9th, the second festival concert will take place, when the music will comprise: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, an aria from Handel's Acis and Galatea, Spohr's "Concerto in forma di scena cantante," march from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens, Mendelssohn's overture to Ruy-Bias, the second act from Glück's Orfeo, aria (tenor) from Weber's Euryanthe, "Wunderbare Harmonie"—a vocal quartet by Haydn, duet from Spontini's Vestal (?), Handel's "Hallelujah." The festival concerts will be under the direction of Herr Lachner, the performance of the "Liedertafeln" under Herr Storch, and the masses in the church under Herr Taux. The assistant artists for solos will comprise—Frau Behrend-Brand, Frau Mangstl-Stretzenegger, Frau Dietz, Herr Grill (?), Herr Härtinger, Herr Young, and Herr Kindermann. Several professors from Munich, and artists from far and near will also take part in the orchestra. Among the first violins will be many violinists and orchestra directors of repute, including men from the northern German states—even Schleswig-Holstein. During the festival, the relics of Mozart—the harpsichord, spinet, letters, portraits, etc., now in the possession of the "Mozarteum" will be exhibited in the room where the great composer was born.

DARMSTADT.—On the 31st August and 1st September, the Middle Rhine Musical Festival will take place at Darmstadt. The cities that join in the celebration are Darmstadt, Mayence, Wiesbaden, Mannheim, Giessen, &c. The orchestra will comprise the Grand Ducal band of Darmstadt, the band of the Court theatre at Mannheim, and several distinguished talents from Mayence, Wiesbaden, Carlsruhe, and Frankfurt. The programme is as follows: First day, Handel's "Messiah." Second day—Overture to Zauberflöte; Finale to Mendelssohn's Loreley; Concerto on the violin with harp obligato by Vieuxtemps; "Bachus-Chor," from the Hermannschlacht of Mangold; Chorus from Haydn's "Creation"; Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica.

PARIS.—A new bouffonnerie musicale in one act, called Deux Vieilles Gardes, words by MM. de Ville-neuve and Lemonnier, music by M. Delibes, has been produced at the Bouffes-Parisiens. The piece is bad, but the music is pretty. M. Delibes is a pupil of the late Adolph Adam, and his present composition augurs well for his future.

At the Grand Opéra, the revival of Guillaume Tell, with all the music, was announced. The Prophète, with Mme. Borghi-Mamo as Fides, will follow soon after; and later in the season it is expected that Mme. Medori will appear in Les Vêpres Siciliennes.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 20, 1856.

The Franklin Day—Inauguration of the Statue.

The 17th of September, already memorable in the annals of our country, has acquired a fresh significance in Boston. The festival of that day was in many respects the most successful of all the public celebrations which we can remember. It was in admirable contrast with our noisy, rowdy, senseless, semi-savage way of celebrating the Fourth of July. No firing of guns and crackers; none of that insane joy which seems to know not why it is rejoicing. Then we act like prisoners or slaves set free, with no thought of the ends of freedom and a great destiny to be fulfilled. But the rejoicings of this day were significant, pervaded by a true, a high American idea; the keynote given by the memory of a great man, "the great Bostonian," perhaps the first mind in our Revolution. We all went forth, amid the splendors of a perfect autumn day, to set up his statue, which should be a perpetual reminder to us of the true meaning of our freedom, the true mission of our country. A nobler type of the true American could not be erected. Here were the scenes of his early life. Here in poverty and honest labor had he laid the foundations of that character, that did so much to shape the destinies of a great people. Incidents from his life, maxims of practical wisdom and stirring words of true, of moral independence, taken from his pen and lips, illustrations in his person of the dignity of labor, of the union of the highest with the homeliest; lessons of true, free American manhood, borrowed from his whole life; these gave the hint for all the decorations of the streets, for the richest features of the immense procession, and inspired a sort of artistic unity in all the multifarious doings of the day.

From morning till night, with all that immense crowd poured out, there was no rude disorder, no intoxication, vulgarity, or stupid wandering about (as is the wont of American multitudes on feast days,) in solemn, unsuccessful search of pleasure; no sign of anything but joy and genuine entertainment, with renewed consciousness that after all we have a glorious mission in our hands, to work out the sublime moral of the struggle which has left us free. There was community of feeling on that day, and hence its pomp and pageantry became artistic.

The newspapers record the order of the great procession, the seeing or forming part of which was the chief occupation of the greatest number. The turn-out of the mechanic trades, with their implements and banners, was more imposing than any of the kind before. There were some small displays of Yankee peddling vanity and self-advertising, to be sure, mixed up with the rest. But by far the most of the representations were of those solid, noble arts of life, which make them elemental types of the true dignity of labor, and carry poetry and meaning with them. The workers in iron and in brass, those stalwart bands of men, with the products of their hands, uniting strength and beauty, for their emblems; the makers of bread; the printers (with Franklin's own press, and printing office in full operation; the miniature school-rooms, with beautiful and happy children at their desks—best fruits of the tree which Franklin with wise forethought planted; the innumerable wagons of the expressmen, loaded with bales and boxes lettered for all corners of the continent, showing at a glance the vast spread of our business relations;—all was full of deep suggestion. The Fine Arts too were there. Noble bodies of laborers bore their insignia. The 200 workmen from the Chicopee foundry, who cast the statue, and who bore above their heads small models of the same and other statues, as well as cutlery and silver ware made a goodly show. So, too, the workers in ornamental iron, the silversmiths, the makers of gas fixtures, hundreds of them, each man carrying a brass rod (they might call themselves the Fraternity of the Golden Rule).

And music was there. We must say a word of that. The 300 men from the piano-forte manufactory of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, and the 200 from the manufactory of Messrs. Hallett & Davis, were among the finest looking bodies of men. The former were preceded by an elegant and tasteful pavilion, on which stood the first grand piano made by Jonas Chickering in 1824, and followed by another containing the last grand piano by the brothers Chickering. A beautiful feature of their parade was the respect paid to those who had grown old in the service, who were drawn in elegant barouches. At the head of Hallett & Davis's column moved a pavilion, containing one of those very old ancestors of the piano, a veritable spinet, which has been for years in Worcester, and was labelled, "made 150 years before Franklin's birth," and by its side one of their last splendid grand pianos.

Other musical instrument makers we saw none; but there were bands innumerable in full blast, representing and trumpeting the makers of wind instruments, unfortunately all brass.

Of the ceremonies in Court Square, the unveiling of the statue, the eloquent and fit words spoken, we cannot report, for it was only a comparatively small and representative crowd that could find room there. Of the modern Olympic games and competitions of our brave firemen, too, upon the Common, and the happy outpouring of the children of the schools upon the Public Garden, green as an emerald, and flashing with masses of bright-colored flowers, as it was that day, we can but make mention.

The statue itself is a noble work of Art, and does the greatest honor to the sculptor, RICHARD GREENOUGH, as well as to the founders, who have cast it in light golden-colored bronze, and to all who have had part in the design and execution of the whole project. The figure is eight feet in height, and stands upon a beautiful die-stone of the Vermont verde antique marble, which surmounts a chaste granite pedestal. The old Franklin stands there in his plain, quiet, natural posture, the big, wise head inclining forward; nothing theatrical or for effect about it; no particular action; his hat held up under the left arm, the other arm dropped quietly; looking as you might have met him any day in Washington street, or in the streets of Paris, going thoughtfully along. The expression of the face is serene, thoughtful, benevolent, wise, happy: and with the drooping fulness of the head, the whole man seems as if full of a great future, as if serene and happy in the feeling that the ground has been faithfully cleared and the true seeds planted, and in the anticipation of a glorious harvest for posterity.

In the evening the square was illuminated by ornamental gas-lights covering the front of City Hall, and there were crowds and music; and at midnight the German Glee Club (Orpheus) and Serenade Band, with true German artist feeling, brought the tribute of their music, in the form of a serenade, to the image of this patriarch of their free adopted country.

A WORD FROM THE ANTI-SCHUMANN-ITES.

—The London Musical World has the following notice of our recent strictures upon the English criticisms of Schumann, Wagner, and others.

We have inserted in another page an article from Dwight's Boston Journal of Music, written in a gentlemanly tone, although somewhat dogmatic in spirit. The writer is, we think, mistaken in two ways—mistaken in his admiration of the late Robert Schumann (as a composer), and mistaken in his interpretation of certain views which have from time to time been advanced in these columns, and which have as often been attacked in those of our transatlantic contemporary.

Among other things we are rated with inconsistency for simultaneously objecting to the music of Wagner, Schumann, Brahms and Franz, the styles of those composers bearing (according to Dwight) no resemblance whatever to each other. Now our contemporary must excuse us when we tell him that he has assumed something on his own account, and then combated the assumption. We never said there was any relationship among the styles of his favorite composers. First, we do not admit them to possess what the term style is supposed to represent. A want of style indeed is among their various deficiencies. Secondly, we object to their music generally and individually because, according to our belief in what constitutes good in art, their music is essentially bad. Surely we may denounce several bad things together without being open to the charge of not knowing the difference between one and another. Lohengrin is a bad thing, Paradise and the Peri is a bad thing, and the sonata of Brahms is a (very) bad thing; but at the same time they have nothing in common but this badness for which they are condemned. Mr. Dwight finds that Wagner and Schumann have nothing in common but their "Beethoven-like unwillingness to be mere copyists." May the Muses pardon our contemporary his sacrilegious application of the mightiest name in music! We cannot.

There is one consoling point in all this vain preaching up of what is vicious in art—or rather, of what has really no claim to be denominated art—among our cousins, the Yankees. Those critics who are most enthusiastic about Wagner and Schumann are always either sneering at or endeavoring to throw cold water upon the greatest musical genius of his day—the legitimate successor of Beethoven (although no more like Beethoven than Schumann is like Wagner—resembling Beethoven alone in that high instinct which made both disdain to pass off charlatanism for art). We of course allude to Mendelssohn. It is the same in Germany as in America. In Germany, critics who are shallow enough, or mad enough, to be proselytes of Wagner, are furious against Mendelssohn, because Mendelssohn while he lived was a beacon to warn us from the rocks and quicksands that are always at hand for the unwary. The observation of certain "intelligent Germans" of Mr. Dwight's acquaintance that, "given half the ideas found in Paradise and the Peri Mendelssohn, by his consummate treatment, would have produced a wonder of the world," is merely intended to convey by innuendo that Mendelssohn had no ideas, or at least not so many as Schumann, which is neither more nor less than preposterous.

nonsense. If Mr. Dwight and his friends are unable to detect the difference between the two men, to know how one was a true and the other a false apostle, the one a great, the other a small musician, we are sorry for Mr. Dwight and his friends. And yet what have we a right to expect from critics who fancy they can see a resemblance between Robert Franz and John Sebastian Bach?

We cannot see that the above requires any answer, farther than to say, we still adhere to all that we have said. We must deny that Schumann, Wagner and Franz have only written music that is bad; for Brahms we have made no claim. And as for Franz, we still maintain, that any one who studies his music, even his songs, will find traces of the influence of Bach quite as distinctly as they are found in Mendelssohn; that Franz, even in the English sense, therefore, is classical in style.

Musical Review.

(Published by Nathan Richardson.)

The Musical Drama: a collection of Choruses, Quintets, Quartets, Trios and concerted pieces, from standard German, Italian and French Operas, &c. Selected, arranged and translated by J. C. D. PARKER, A. M. (See Advertisement.)

Here is a work which, judging from the first number, now before us, will be of real value to amateur clubs and singing societies. There are many treasures in the way of concerted pieces in the best operas, which have never been drawn forth (at least without alteration or curtailment) for the benefit of American singers. Especially is this true of German operas. No. 1 of the promised nine numbers in this series is devoted purely to German opera. It contains six admirable pieces. The first is that exquisite Chorus of Elves from the opening of Weber's Oberon (sung last winter at Mr. Dresel's private concert). Next comes the Quartet from Fidelio (sung at our Beethoven Festival.) The other pieces are a chorus from Gluck's Armide; a chorus from Mendelssohn's Die Heimkehr; the Trio (in masks) from Don Giovanni; and a Scene (Trio and Chorus) from Der Freyschütz. These alone have more meat in them than is found in all the opera chorus books which have appeared in English. Mr. Parker has done his work faithfully, with a true musician's feeling. In every case he gives the German words, with a good singable translation. In the case of the Don Juan Trio we should have thought it well to give also the usual Italian words: Protegga il giusto cielo, &c. Each piece is arranged with a piano-forte accompaniment.

(From George P. Reed & Co.)

Beauties of Mozart and Beethoven, in form of Petites Fantaisies, for Young Pianists. By TH. OESTEN. Op. 95.—No. 5. Quintet, Op. 16, of BEETHOVEN. Price 25 cents.

A simple piano-forte arrangement of the two quick movements from the Quintet in E flat, originally written for piano, obœ, clarinet, horn and fugotto.—It is clear, bright, buoyant music.

La Traviata, by VERDI. Arranged for piano by ADOLPH BAUMBACH. Part II. 50 cents.

The lover of operatic sweets has here in practicable form, and connected into one, the duet: Parigi, o cara; the arias: O mio rimorso, and Di Provenza il mar; and the chorus of gipseys.

Minnehaha Polka: for Piano, by J. W. BLENDIN. 25 cents.

Musical Chat-Chat.

MARETZEK, at the New York Academy, announced the Troratore again for the last time on Wednesday; the theatre to be closed thereafter for rehearsals of L'Etoile du Nord. . . . Mme. DE WIL-

HORST made her first appearance as a vocalist in a concert at Niblo's on Wednesday, assisted by Signori BRIGNOLI and AMODIO, with accompaniments on the Orgue Alexandre and piano-forte by Senor and Senora RANIERI VILANOVA. The pieces sung were wholly Italian operas. . . . The New York Harmonic Society propose giving four or five grand performances this winter, with full orchestra under Carl Bergmann's direction. They rehearse every Monday evening at Dodworth's. Among the compositions to be taken up are Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Beethoven's "Choral Symphony." . . . The Mendelssohn Union (New York) have commenced rehearsals, under Mr. Morgan's direction, of Costa's oratorio of "Eli."

The new German Opera opened on Tuesday evening with Robert le Diable (sung in German.) Niblo's Theatre was crowded; the price of admission being 50 cents, with 30 cents extra for reserved seats. The general opinion seems to have been that Robert was an unlucky selection for any but a first-class troupe, which this is not. The Tribune is by no means complimentary in its notice of the principal singers, and "cannot refrain from stating that their vocal efforts were generally crude and immethodical; exhibiting deficient phrasing, inexact bravuraism, and some inexorable shrieking." The Times is more considerate; thus:

Of all recent attempts at German Opera—and they have been numerous—this promises to be the most substantial and satisfactory. Although the company can scarcely be considered first-class in any of its departments, and is otherwise unsatisfactory in important respects, it is nevertheless the best that has been offered to an American audience. We have seldom seen Niblo's Theatre more densely crowded, and certainly have never sat in a more critical audience. So uncompromising were auditors in their denunciations, that at one period we had fears for the progress of the opera.

The cast was as follows: Robert, Herr PICKANESER; Bertram, Herr WEINLICH; Rimbaldo, Herr BRUTLER; Isabella, Mme. VON BERKEL; Alice, Mlle. PICKER.

Mme. Berkel has an acceptable voice, an interesting appearance and an impressive dramatic method. When she can tread the stage with the confident ease of a favorite, she will display all of these qualities to greater advantage, and especially in lighter operas where the compass of the voice is not overtaxed. In the upper register Mme. Berkel is anything but pure, either in quality or intonation, and it is these gusty sections which she should avoid. The rôle of the Princess is a never-ending one. All great artists improve on it, and contribute another to the traditions which already exist. Mme. Berkel's personation was not remarkable for force or originality, but it was clear and artist-like, and filled with brave little touches of excellence. It was the only effort of the evening that satisfied the audience. Mlle. Pucker (Alice) has a good voice, but it lacks cultivation and method. Like Mme. Berkel's it is harsh and gusty in the upper part. Of the gentlemen, we shall be brief. They were, so far as this opera is concerned, utterly beneath criticism. Whether they will be valuable in other operas remains to be seen. Mr. Weinlich appears to have a fine organ, but he is altogether unable to manage it, and its crudeness and inequality run riot. Herr Pickaneser is not an improvement on the ordinary run of German tenors—a race, which, we sincerely hope, is peculiar to this city.

The orchestra, under Mr. Carl Bergmann, is superb, and compensates for many of the drawbacks we have referred to. It is quite strong, but its sinews are held together by a master-hand. The chorus, although numerically strong, did not shine to great advantage,—the voices are twangy and nasal.

In point of neatness and propriety this version of "Robert the Devil" will bear favorable comparison with any former revival. Some excellent scenery has been prepared, and the costumes are rich and in good taste. These indications are particularly cheerful, and induce us to believe that, in spite of a somewhat disputed success, the new German Opera Troupe will gain in public favor, and make a prosperous voyage after all.

The New Orleans Picayune describes the prospects for French Opera this season in that very opera-loving city. It seems that M. Boudousquie, the impresario, has visited Paris and made the following engagements of singers:

Mr. Moulin, first tenor for Grand Opera, succeeding Mr. Duluc.
Mr. Martin, baritone, succeeding Mr. Cramflade.
Mr. Guillot, first basso for Grand Opera, and second basso for Comic Opera, succeeding Mr. Grant.
Mlle. Bourgeois, prima donna, mezzo-soprano, succeeding Mme. Cambier.
Mme. Latouche, chanteuse légère (or light singer for Comic and Grand Operas) and dugazon.
Mme. Guillot, dugazon.
Mr. Lacroix, leading comedian, succeeding Mr. Gustave.
Mr. Deligne, second comedian, succeeding Mr. Chol.
Mme. Berger Lacroix, leading lady, succeeding Mlle. Darmont.

The chorists will also receive an addition to their numbers in seven male and female performers.—M. Boudousquie was at last dates still in search of a prima donna soprano and a first light tenor. With these his opera troupe will be one of the most complete ever had in this country, and as he has hitherto shown a most laudable liberality and enterprise in securing artists of a superior class, no matter at what cost, doubtless the new comers will be very desirable additions to our operatic and dramatic circles. We notice among them the name of Mme. Latouche, a younger sister of our favorite Mme. Colson. She is spoken of as a very charming singer. She could not well be otherwise; and as Mme. Colson remains with us, too, next season, it will be quite pleasing to witness the exhibition of the fine talent of these sisters on the same boards. Mr. Delagrave and Mr. Juncu, first tenor and first basso, will also resume their respective posts, much to the pleasure of the admirers of artistic singing.

The Musical World gives us a list of the artists whom "the felicitous FELICITA VESTVALI takes with her as directress of the opera to Mexico; viz: "Countess Tasca-Tascani, Signorina Landi, Signorina Casali, and Signora Manzini, as prime donne assolute. Signora Ziegholi, as prima donna e comprimaria. Signora Gierafola, as seconda donna. Signorina Felicita Vestvali, prima donna contralto. Signor Steffani and Sig. Bianchi, primi tenori assoluti. Sig. Ottaviani and E. Barilli, baritoni assoluti. Sigs. Bellini and Solares, bassi assoluti. Signor Fattori, maestro del orchestra. We understand that these are all good and thoroughbred artists, and some of the very first quality. The repertory of operas to be produced is a very rich one: composed as follows: Il Troratore, La Favorita, Les Vepres Siciliennes, Nabuchadonoser, Rigolotto, Giovana d'Arco—all by Verdi. Tancredi, Donna del Lago, Cenerentola, Matilda di Schubran—by Rossini. Scaramuzza, by Ricci. Louisa Strozzi, by Martini. Buondelmode and Saffo, by Paccini. Normani in Parigi, by Mercadante. Beatrice di Fenda, by Bellini. Etoile du Nord, by Meyerbeer. Romeo and Juliette, by Bellini and Vaccai. Don Rocco, Birajo di Presto, Poliucto e Paolina, etc., etc. This list includes many operas unknown to the American public, which M. Vestvali has brought with him from Europe. It is said that Mexican audiences are fastidious as to any sameness in operas given. The Government has also something to say and partly sustains the opera."

Advertisements.

THOMAS RYAN,
Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

SINGING AT SIGHT.

A Night Singing School will be opened by D. U. MARTIN, at the Christian Baptist Church, corner of Kneeland and Tyler Streets, on Monday Evening, Sept. 22, when Prof. H. W. DAY, A. M., the well-known Inventor of the method, will deliver a free opening Lecture.

WANTED.—MUSIC TO COPY. Apply at No. 39 State Street, Room 6. Sep. 18 56

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

Has the honor to announce that she will re-open her MORNING and AFTERNOON CLASSES for the instruction of YOUNG LADIES on the PIANO-FORTE, on MONDAY, Sept. 22, and on WEDNESDAY, Oct. 1. Terms, Fifteen dollars for Twenty-four lessons. Applications to be made, for classes or private lessons, at Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE's residence, No. 55 Hancock St.

A Magnificent Edition of Beethoven's Sonatas.

Printed from Engraved Plates. For Six Dollars.

The 32 Sonatas, complete, 524 pages of Music, in two volumes, with portrait, light binding. Price $6. The same, superbly bound in cloth, embossed and lettered, price $7.

Desirous of placing the best musical works within reach of the great mass of the people, the undersigned presents, as first of the series, the above celebrated compositions, and would direct special attention to the SUPERIORITY of THIS EDITION OVER ALL OTHERS. It is printed from new, engraved music plates, each note being clear and accurate in its outline, rendering each page remarkably distinct. The copy employed has been the latest German edition, and an unusual amount of labor and expense has been bestowed on the work, in order to avoid typographical errors, however minute. Reliance can therefore be placed upon this edition as being in every particular an exact reprint of the best German, while superior plates, paper, press-work, binding, and general appearance render this American edition vastly preferable to all foreign copies, especially when the latter are printed upon type used for common Psalmody, etc.

In continuance of this series of Classic Musical Compositions will be issued in rapid succession, and sold at the same extraordinary low rate of additional prices, Piano-forte works of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart and others.

The great expense attending the publication of these works and the low price at which it is proposed to furnish them, can only be met by large sales; and it is hoped that all those favoring the circulation of an advanced style of music, and a consequent cultivation of a fine musical taste throughout our country, will so far aid the enterprise as to become purchasers of this edition of BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, as also of the works that may follow.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

THE MUSICAL DRAMA:

A COLLECTION OF

Choruses, Quintettes, Quartettes, Trios, and Concerted Pieces,

FROM

Standard German, Italian & French Operas,

With English and the original words,

FOR THE USE OF

AMATEUR CLUBS AND SINGING SOCIETIES.

Selected, Arranged, and Translated by

J. C. D. PARKER, A. M.

In Nine Numbers, each 60 cents,—or in Three Vols., each $1.

PUBLISHED BY

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasias, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 34 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols...$6
" additional volume of smaller works.....$3
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols.....$6
Haydn's " " 2 vols.....$6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office.

ALEX' W. THAYER.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works:

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION, WITH AND WITHOUT ACCOMPANIMENTS,

Edited by CIPRIANI POTTER,

Principal Professor of Harmony and Composition in the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Vol. 1, Airs with Variations,.....	Bound in cloth, $4 88
" 2, Rondos, &c.....	Do do 2 18
" 3, Duets.....	Do do 4 25
" 4, Piano-Forte Sonatas.....	Do do 3 75
" 5, Do do.....	Do do 3 75
" 6, Sonatas for Piano and Violin,...	Do do 4 25
" 7, Do do.....	Do do 4 25
" 8, Quartets and Quintets.....	Do do 3 75
" 9, Trios for Piano, Violin and Cello, Do	do 6 00

Each piece in the above volumes is published separately.

The fact of the collection and republication of Mozart's Pianoforte works in the middle of the present century shows that time instead of diminishing, has stamped their excellence and value. They are, indeed, true works of art, as useful as they are beautiful. Out of this school came the memorable artists, Hummel, and J. B. Cramer—players whose fingers expressed the deep feeling of music with which their nature was imbued; and if we may still hope to find their successors among the young, it must be by a train of studies similarly conducted.

Novello's Catalogue No. 4, containing an analytical and thematic index to the above works, to be had gratis at 389 Broadway, or forwarded to address on receipt of one cent postage.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,

TEACHER OF SINGING,

47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sign. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,

ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,

BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

Apr 29

17

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S

Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,

19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 234.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 26.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÖRING.

[Concluded from p. 195.]

Of not less interest than the preceding is the account by an English lady of a visit to Beethoven in October, 1825. Then also he was living in the little town of Baden, near Vienna. "I had been told," writes the lady, "that I must be prepared for a rough and forbidding reception. When we arrived, Beethoven had just come home in a shower, and was about to change his coat. From what I had heard of his brusque character, I was apprehensive that he might not receive us heartily, as with hasty steps he came out from a side chamber. He accosted us in a very polite, friendly and agreeable manner. He is very short-built and haggard, but attentive enough to his personal appearance. He remarked that Herr H. was very fond of Handel, said that he loved him also, and went on for a long time praising that great composer. I conversed with him by writing, since I found it impossible to make myself heard; and though this was an awkward mode of communication, it did not require much, since Beethoven always talked on freely and without prompting, and neither replied to questions nor seemed to expect long answers. I ventured to express to him my admiration for his compositions, and praised among other things his Adelaide. He remarked very modestly, that this poem of MATTHISON was very beautiful. He spoke French well. He would have learned also, he said, to speak English; but his deafness had prevented him from going farther into that language than to learn to read it. He preferred the English writers to the French. Ils sont plus vrais, said he. THOMPSON is his favorite author; but particularly great is his admiration for SHAKSPEARE. When we rose to take our leave, Beethoven begged us to stay longer. Je veux vous donner un souvenir de moi, said he. Whereupon he went into a side chamber, and wrote a short canon for the piano-forte, which he handed to me in a very friendly manner. Then he requested me to spell my name to him, so that he might superscribe his impromptu correctly. Then he took me by the arm and led me into the chamber where he had written, so that I might see the whole of his quarters, which were altogether those of an author, but perfectly neat. Although they betrayed no sign of abundance or of wealth, yet they showed no want of useful furniture or nice arrangement. I led him cautiously back into a chamber on the other side, in which stood his Broadwood grand piano; but he seemed to me to grow melancholy at the sight of the instrument. Also he remarked that it was not in a fit condition, for the tuner in the country was extraordinarily bad. He struck a few keys, to convince me of it. In spite of that, I laid the manuscript which he had given me upon the desk, and he played it simply through, after he had preluded with three or four chords. Thereupon he stopped, and I would not for any price have urged him more, since I found that he himself had no pleasure in playing. We then took leave of one another, and Beethoven told me that if he ever came to England, he would certainly visit us."

One of his brother artists, CARL MARIA VON WEBER, describes the reception which he found a few years earlier (1823) with Beethoven, in these words: "We went several times to see him. He was in bad humor, and fled all human society. But finally we succeeded in finding the favorable moment. We were conducted in, and we saw him sitting at his writing desk, from which however he did not rise to welcome us. Beethoven had known me for some years, so that I could enter into a conversation with him. Suddenly he sprang up, stood upright before me, and laying his hands on my shoulders, shook me with a sort of rough heartiness, saying: 'You have always been a clever fellow!' Whereupon he embraced me in an extremely kind and affectionate manner. Of all the marks of distinction which I received in Vienna, of all the fame and praise which I reaped there, nothing has so touched my heart as this brotherly kiss of Beethoven."

With the physical sufferings, which he was never altogether spared, and which came home to him in increased measure in the last years of his life, was coupled the humiliation of seeing all

Vienna intoxicated by the voluptuous melodies of ROSSINI, apparently almost forgetting him and his works. Then a few real friends of Art addressed a memorial to Beethoven, full of the most admiring recognition of his talent, and containing an urgent request that he would soon bring out his last two great works, the Ninth Symphony and the Missa Solennis. The concert in which these works were produced took place. But their creator heard them not. Only by turning round was his attention called to the storm of applause from the audience, which seemed as if it never would end. Yet at the repetition the house was empty; it was scarcely to be expected otherwise of a public enthusiastic about Rossini's melodies.

Beethoven had resolved to offer his Missa Solennis in manuscript to the European courts for the price of 50 ducats. But only the Emperor of Russia and the kings of France, Prussia and Saxony accepted Beethoven's offer. Besides these, Prince Anton von Radzivil in Vienna, and Herr Schelble, director of the Cæcilia Society in Frankfort on the Main, subscribed. The Prussian ambassador at Vienna had the question privately put to Beethoven, whether perhaps an order would not be more welcome to him than the 50 ducats. But Beethoven decided, without a moment's hesitation, for the latter. The King of France sent him a large golden medal, with his bust on one side, and the inscription: Donné par le Roi à M. Beethoven, upon the other. Beethoven also wrote to CHERUBINI upon this occasion, but received no answer. Still his works, especially the later ones, commanded a very respectable price from publishers. For every one of his last sonatas and quartets he got from 40 to 80 ducats; but for many other works much too little. There were not wanting cases in which he was cheated out of his well-earned reward. Thus, among others a Russian Prince, Nicolaus von Gallitzin, in 1824, had ordered three quartets for stringed instruments for a stipulated price of 125 ducats; yet, after receiving the quartets, he never sent the money, although repeatedly reminded.

But Beethoven had to suffer a still deeper wound, in the latter portion of his life, through the extremely culpable behavior of his nephew, for whose education, as we have before said, he had shrunk from no sacrifice, often depriving himself to do for him whatever lay within his power. It was on the 2d of December, 1826, that Beethoven returned to Vienna with his ungrateful protégé in an open carriage, because his brother Johana, at whose country seat he had spent some time, would not let him use the covered one. The inclement season and the bad weather had the most injurious consequences for Beethoven's health. He was taken with a lung fever, which soon passed into dropsy. In vain did he send for his old physicians, Braunhofer and Staudenheim. Only some days afterwards did Dr. Wavrch hear by accident of Beethoven's illness, and that he was in want of a physician. He went to him immediately. Nearly two months later was Beethoven's former physician and friend, Dr. Malfatti, moved to visit him, and join Dr. Wavrch in his treatment. Meanwhile the disease had made such rapid progress that Beethoven had at short intervals to undergo four operations.

In this melancholy condition he became anxious about the means of providing for the most necessary wants, since his entire stock of money only amounted to 100 florins, Convention coin. It occurred to him to turn to the Philharmonic Society in London, and ask their assistance. Accordingly he wrote to MOSCHELES in London, whose reply described the sad impression which his melancholy situation had produced. This letter was accompanied by the sum of £100, sent him by the Philharmonic Society. They begged him to accept this sum for the time being, and to apply to them farther should he be in need.

Beethoven viewed the approach of death with resignation. Whatever he left behind him he bequeathed to his nephew, little as he had deserved it. Upon his yet remaining original scores he wrote with his own hand, that he left them to one of his friends, who had especially assisted him in the last period of his life by word and deed. In the midst of various plans for newly projected works, among others an oratorio: "The Triumph of the Cross," he yielded, after many sufferings, to the final fate, surrounded by his brother Johann and a few of his most intimate friends. During a fearful thunder-storm, accompanied with hail, upon the 26th of March, 1827, a quarter before six o'clock in the evening, he rendered up his spirit.

An eye-witness informs us of his last days: "When I came to him on the morning of the 24th of March, I found his whole face disturbed, and himself so weak that he could scarcely with the greatest effort utter two or three words. Soon after came his physician, Dr. Wavrch. He looked at him a few moments, and then said to me: 'Beethoven is rapidly hastening towards dissolution!' Since we had concluded the business of his will, as well as could be, the day before, one longing wish alone remained to us—to make his peace with Heaven, and at the same time to show to the world that he had closed his life as a true Christian. Dr. Wavrch begged him in writing, in the name of all his friends, to receive the holy sacrament, to which he answered perfectly composed and calmly: 'I will.' The priest came about four o'clock, and the service was performed with the greatest edification. He now seemed to be convinced himself of his near end; for scarcely had the clergyman gone, when he said to me and the surrounding friends: 'Plaudite amici, comædia finita est! Have I not always said that it would so come?' Towards evening he lost his consciousness and began to wander. This continued until the evening of the 25th, when visible symptoms of death showed themselves. Yet he did not die until a quarter before six in the evening of the 26th."

Beethoven's early friend, so often mentioned,

STEPHEN VON BREUNING, together with the music-director, A. SCHINDLER, took charge of the funeral. It took place on the 29th of March. An almost immeasurable multitude of men, of the most different conditions, followed the bier in long procession from the house to the neighboring church, where the consecration of the corpse took place. Beethoven's earthly remains were then borne to the burial ground before the Währing line. There the actor ANSCHUTZ pronounced a funeral discourse composed by GRILLPARZER. A silver medal was stamped to Beethoven's memory, and soon his bust adorned the hall where the tones of his masterworks resounded.

Of Beethoven's outward appearance, one of his friends sketches a visible portrait in these words: "He was five feet four inches (Vienna measure) in height, of compact and sturdy frame, as well as powerful muscles. His head was uncommonly large, covered with long, snarly almost entirely gray hair, which not seldom hung in disorder about his head. His forehead was high and broad; his small brown eye in smiling drew back almost into his head. But suddenly it dilated to uncommon size, and either rolled and flashed about, the pupil almost always turned upwards, or it did not move at all, and looked fixedly before him, if any idea got possession of him. At such times his whole outward appearance underwent a sudden change, and wore a visibly inspired and imposing aspect, so that his little form seemed to lift itself upward like a giant."

In this insignificant bodily husk dwelt a beautiful soul. From the indications already given of Beethoven's character, it is plain that he was a thoroughly noble man, endowed with the most loving heart. All that appeared to him false, low, immoral, or unjust, he hated in his deepest soul. But on the other hand, worldly prudence and knowledge of men were wholly strange things to him. It has already been mentioned several times how easily he flew into a passion, and thereby did crying injustice to his best and truest friends, merely because he either saw things in a false light, or he had been excited and made mistrustful by ill-meaning persons. Fortunately, however, he soon recognized his own injustice, and was the first to hold out the hand of reconciliation.

Thus he wrote one day on sending his portrait to his friend Stephen von Breuning, with whom he had fallen out: "Behind this picture, my good, dear Stephen, be forever hidden what for a long time has passed between us. I know I have rent thy heart. My own pained feelings, which you must surely have remarked, had punished me enough for it. It was no wickedness on my part. Else I were no more worthy of thy friendship. Passion on thy part and on mine. But mistrust towards thee was awakened in me; men placed themselves between us, who were not worthy of thee and me. My portrait was already long ago intended for thee; you know that I had always intended it for some one. To whom could I so well give it with the warmest heart as to thee, faithful, good, noble Stephen? Forgive me if I have caused thee pain; I suffered not less myself. When for so long a time I saw thee no more about me, then I began to feel right vividly how dear thou art and ever wilt be to my heart. Now perhaps thou wilt fly back into my arms, as formerly."

The usual consequences of deafness—mistrust, ill humor and reserve—manifested themselves in a high degree in Beethoven. He hated all formality. Hence he only went unwillingly to the Archduke Rudolph's, his illustrious pupil, careful as that Prince was to exempt him from these formalities. So, too, he once abandoned beautiful lodgings at the villa of Baron von Pronay, for no other reason than because the Baron, when he met him, made him too profound bows. For similar reasons he often, as we have before said, changed his lodgings, so that he had to pay for two, three, and at one time even four dwelling-places at once. From this it is easily understood how he, although he had a decent income, never laid up anything, but rather, by the confession of his own letters, found himself not seldom in pecuniary embarrassment. Yet he never suffered real personal privations.

As a musician, there were united in Beethoven the most thorough musical knowledge with the happy talent for inventing charming melodies. In his earlier works, especially in his piano variations, Sonatas, Trios and Quartets, he followed essentially the direction, which Haydn, who moreover was his teacher, and Mozart had given to instrumental music. He sympathized with Haydn's humor and with Mozart's tender feeling. Even in many of his later works, in several symphonies and sonatas, above all in his wonderful B flat major Trio, that tendency predominated in him. But whereas Haydn turned afterwards especially to church music, and Mozart established his fame forever as a dramatic composer, Beethoven struck into an entirely opposite path. His withdrawal from the world and its appearances, from the pictures, forms and laws of the drama and the church, led him into the domain of instrumental music, and here again to the confidential, private, self-satisfying piano-forte. His piano compositions became the circle in which his musical creative power moved almost exclusively. By a more appropriate treatment, by a deeper entering into the character and capabilities of his favorite instrument, Beethoven soon left his great predecessors behind him. His tone-figures, his chords were richer and fuller; the melody came out clearer and more distinct, through the arrangement of the subordinate voices. Every connoisseur in the Art must have soon convinced himself how his genius buried itself in these tones and elevated this his chosen instrument to be his most peculiar organ.

With years and the steady ripening of his talent, Beethoven's musical ideas and outpourings of feeling became ever grander, mightier and more transporting. Deeper than formerly had a theme to be felt, to be able to enchain him long. His works rose gradually to a spiritual and plastic unity of feeling, which his great predecessors in similar compositions had not reached. His absorption in an idea, his revelling in a feeling, often led him to an insatiable pitch. He could not make an end, and always after every rich gush of feeling, he sent another deeper still. It was wonderful at the same time how the overflowing stream of his feeling never overstepped the prescribed lines of a form circumspectly chosen, but only expanded it in a legitimate way. He was always meditating upon new combinations, which to one not fully initiated in the art appeared often strange, or even bizarre.

Rich and deep as his piano compositions and Quartets, nay, grander and mightier, were Beethoven's orchestral works, in which his genius could move more boldly and freely. If anything remained unattainable to him, it was the innocent clearness, comparable to the blue heavens, of Haydn's instrumentation. It better corresponded with Beethoven's nature, as a gifted writer expressed it, to lead us into a clond or storm, or into the rosy atmosphere of an Indian night. He had grown so to live in the voices of his instrumental world, that he felt himself more related to them than to human beings, from intercourse with whom he was separated by his weakness of hearing. What intercourse with men did not afford him, these voices murmured and whispered to his soul; he infused his own feeling, his own consciousness into his instrument.

The greatness of his musical talent revealed itself already in his earliest works, in his first Mass, in the Oratorio: "Christ at the Mount of Olives;" then in his opera: "Leonora," afterwards remodelled under the title of "Fidelio," which may be called the most perfect dramatic creation since Mozart, and stands beside his masterworks. Beethoven's music to Goethe's "Egmont," his overture to "Coriolanus," translated the works of the poets better for him than he could have done it in the form of vocal music. The depth and inwardness of his feeling expressed itself in the most various states of mind. Touchingly resounded the melting, never-ending farewell of a loving pair in his Sonata: Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour. In his C minor Symphony Beethoven knew how to represent in an inimitable manner, how a strong soul, after severe, painful conflict with gloomy doubts, inspired by looking up to heaven, lifts itself in strength and clearness to an unshakeable conviction. His Sonata quasi una Fantasia he wrote when he had been deceived in a tender passion, and had to tear himself violently away. Among Beethoven's numerous compositions his "Battle of Vittoria," of which so much has been said, and his "Pastoral Symphony," have maintained no insubordinate place. Attractive also were the images from a heroic life in his Sinfonia Eroica.

The greatest part of his works show always a uniform succession of ideas, now resting upon outward circumstances, and now upon determinate views of human life in general, or of his own life. Never, or at the most very rarely, in his works, did a thought once heard return again. Even his accompaniment was always new. Each one of his compositions had its own peculiar circle, in which it coincided with no other; in each a new, self-contained world revealed itself: each brought forth special, unmistakable views, scenes of life or images of nature. Such a variety were hardly possible without that genuine poetic tendency to individual shaping of his creations, which reigned in Beethoven's nature. But to this tendency he could resign himself more uninterruptedly than most composers.

Withdrawn from the actual world, he lived only in the realm of tones. Into the voiceless solitude his love-craving and with-love-overflowing heart accompanied him. Deep, unsatisfied yearning seemed to be the ground-tone, especially in many of his later works. As in his outward life he longed in vain for the bliss of domestic life, so in his Art he turned with longing love towards men. He gave the deepest expression to these feelings in his masterly composition of the song of Schiller: "To Joy." Some striking remarks upon the character of his music in general are contained in a little pamphlet which appeared in Dresden in 1854, under the title: Beethoven's Symphonien nach ihren idealen Gehalt.*

Eighteen years after Beethoven's death had passed, when his native city, Bonn, honored him by the erection of a colossal monument in bronze, for which the sculptor HÄHNEL, in Dresden, modelled the design. The monument is 25 feet in height, the statue itself being 10 feet and the pedestal 15 feet. Beethoven is represented in the inspired moment of artistic activity. While the upward look betrays the lightning of a creative thought, the right hand lifts itself, as if involuntarily, to write down the thought at once upon the note-book held in the left hand. In the whole bearing of the figure and in the energetic expression of the features you see at the first glance a man who wills to achieve something great, extraordinary, and who is conscious also of the power to do it. The four reliefs, which adorn the pedestal, are happily conceived. On the front side we have Imagination in flying robe, hastening away upon the back of a Sphinx. On the opposite side is Instrumental Music, or rather Symphony, as its representative, a floating female figure, surrounded by four Genii, which indicate the four parts of the Symphony; the first holds the sword, the second the serpent and the torch reversed, the third the thyrsus and the castanets, the fourth the triangle. On the two sides we see two sitting female figures, one of which, playing the organ, represents Church Music, the other, with two masks, Dramatic Music.

The unveiling of the monument took place amid many solemnities on the 12th of August, 1845. Two days before, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in D, and his last Symphony, with chorus, were performed, under the direction of kapellmeister SPOHR, in a splendid hall then newly built. On the 12th of August, at 9 o'clock in the morning, a numerous procession walked to the cathedral, where Prof. BREIDENSTEIN conducted the performance of Beethoven's Mass in C. After the Mass the procession moved to the public square, where an immeasurable multitude were already assembled, including many strangers from all parts of Germany. At twelve o'clock the firing of cannon and the ringing of bells announced the arrival of the King of Prussia, Frederic William IV., and several members of the royal family. The unveiling of the monument followed a festival discourse pronounced by Professor Breidenstein, and was succeeded by a chorus of men's voices with an accompaniment of wind instruments. The festivities were closed by a second grand concert in the Fest-hall, in which, under the alternate direction of SPOHR and LISZT, several of Beethoven's works were performed: his overture to "Coriolanus," a Concerto in E flat major, a Quartet-canon from "Fidelio," a string Quartet in E flat, a grand scene with chorus from the oratorio: "Christ at the Mount of Olives," his C minor Symphony, and finally the second Finale from "Fidelio."†

* "Beethoven's Symphonies with reference to their ideal contents." For a translation of this clever essay see Vol. VII., page 73, et seq., of this Journal.

† For full description of this festival, borrowed from Chorley's "Modern German Music," see Vol. VI., pp. 1-18, of this Journal.

A letter of Beethoven's to MATTHISSON, whose poem, Adelaide, he composed, may be regarded as a relic. This letter, written in the earliest period of his life in Vienna, affords by its pervading tone of modesty an interesting contribution to the characteristics of Beethoven. "You have here," he writes (Vienna, Aug. 4, 1800), "a composition of mine, which has already been for some years published, and of which you perhaps, to my shame, as yet know nothing. I can perhaps excuse myself, and tell you why I dedicated a thing, which came so warm out of my heart, to you, and yet did not inform you of it, by stating that in the first place I did not know where you resided; and again on the ground of shyness, since I feared I had been too forward in dedicating to you anything, of which I knew not whether it had your approbation. Even now I send you the Adelaide with misgiving. You yourself know what a change a few years produce in an artist who is constantly progressing. The farther one has advanced in Art, the less do his earlier works satisfy him. My greatest wish is satisfied, if the musical composition of your heavenly Adelaide does not entirely displease you; and if you shall be moved thereby to produce soon another similar poem, and do not find my request presumptuous, that you will send it to me at once. I will then summon up all my powers, to come near to your beautiful poetry. Consider the dedication as a sign of my gratitude and high estimation for the blissful satisfaction which your poetry has always given me and will still give me."

"Professors."

A foreigner looking through the directory of this, or any other American city, would be apt to conclude us to be a remarkably musical people, judging from the innumerable "Professors of Music" whose addresses are to be found inserted in the cumbersome volume. Indeed, even we have often been surprised at the shoals of persons claiming this distinctive title, while in fact, they have no right so to dub themselves, and while no reason exists for their being so termed by others. "Artist" and "Professor" are rapidly becoming meaningless words, after having been for long years employed as the honorable indicators of those accomplished and learned men who devoted their lives to the services of the Arts and Sciences. To deserve and possess the rank of Artist—for rank it then actually was—constituted at one time the ambition of lofty genius; to be an artist was to prove an affinity with Raphael, Michael Angelo, and all the great Art names of old; now we see "Artists in Hair" on half the signs of the Wig stores in town, and in the cant of the day, dancers, actresses, sign painters, bootmakers, &c., are all indiscriminately called "Artists." What results from this wholesale abuse? Simply this,—the men who really possess the right so to term themselves, drop the word and announce themselves as "historical painters," "landscape painters," or "portrait painters" as the case may chance to be.

The word "Professor" is similarly misapplied, and has lost its correct signification, although as yet it has not produced so marked a result upon the class of men to which the title should be strictly confined. The reason of this non-result may be that the true Professors cannot find, or have not heretofore sought to find a different word to employ, in order to express their calling; that they know of none to answer their purposes as correctly and perfectly as Painter does for Artist. We have professors of dancing, professors of boxing, of magic, and of almost everything that one can call to mind. There can be no question about the fact that a Professor means one who publicly teaches any science or branch of learning; but it appears to us to be equally unquestionable that dancing, boxing, and fencing are but accomplishments at the best, and not sufficiently scientific or learned for the teachers to be dignified by the high sounding title so extensively employed by them. We have given the widest definition to the word, not the strict one which says a Professor is a man who is thoroughly conversant with the practice and theory of the science which he professes; this would shut out, and justly too, many whom we tacitly acknowledge to have a claim on the title.

It is in regard to the musical application of the word that we particularly wish to speak. No one can deny that Music is a science, aye, and an abstruse one also; therefore the propriety of having such a degree as Professor of Music is as undoubted as that of having a Professor of Mathematics, or of Chemistry. To return, therefore, to what we said at the very outset of this article, a foreigner might well conclude Americans to be a very musical people, on perceiving the great number of Professors pursuing their profession in our different cities. We, however, who live in the midst of these so styled Professors, know a great majority of them to be as unworthy of the designation as the magicians, fencing masters, and the rest.

A strange abuse has fallen on this unfortunate word, an abuse that a few years since, we believed was about to work its own destruction; it still exists, perhaps in fuller force than ever. "Professor" and "teacher" seem to have become inextricably entangled, and from the way in which the words are misused, one might imagine them to be synonymous. We grant that a Professor may be a teacher, yes, and the very best description of teacher, likewise, but we do not grant that a teacher is necessarily a Professor.

Nearly every teacher dubs himself either a Professor of Music at large, of the violin, the organ, singing, or of any other separate branch. As a general rule the less a man knows about the business the more he parades the "Professor," and we used to believe that the public would at length perceive the impositions perpetually practised upon them, so that the evil would work its own cure by carrying itself beyond even their endurance. We are mistaken; there are more "Professors" than ever, and the few who are really such, now sensibly style themselves Teachers of Harmony, Composition, Instrumental or Vocal Music, as they may chance to be.—Fitzgerald's City Item.

St. George's Hall, Bradford, England.

[The following description of this Hall is taken chiefly from the printed document prefixed to the programmes of the late Musical Festival, described in another column.]

St. George's Hall stands in the centre of the town, three of its sides facing into separate streets, and covers an area of 1,600 square yards. Its outer walls and columns are of Yorkshire stone. The front or western elevation is 75 feet in height from the ground to the apex of the pediment, and is composed of a rusticated basement 27 feet high, surmounted with Corinthian columns and pilasters which support the entablature. The principal entrance is by three arched doorways, with folding doors on the basement of this façade. On each side are niches containing bronze candelabra. The centres of the arches over the doorways are enriched with masks executed by Yorkshire artists. The lower parts of the intercolumniations are occupied by windows 14 feet high, and the upper with circular shields in stone, bordered with wreaths of oak leaves. The south side elevation consists of a rusticated basement story, with deeply recessed windows, between which are elaborately carved festoons of fruit and flowers. Above this story are Corinthian columns and pilasters, supporting an unbroken entablature the whole length of the building. The intercolumniations are filled with eight arched windows 14 feet high. The entrance leads into a vestibule 46 by 25 feet, and 22 feet in height. From the centre of the floor springs the grand staircase branching off to the right and left, and terminating in the gallery on each side leading to the stalls and area. At the foot of the staircase on either side are bronze candelabra 12 feet high, with 9 branches to each. The hall itself is 152 feet in length, 76 in breadth, and 60 feet high. It is divided into Area, Stalls, and Gallery. The first is 96 by 45 feet, and will accommodate 1000 persons with seats. The stalls are raised 12 feet above the area, and contain 528 seats. The front of the stalls is ornamented with foliated scroll work, executed in carton-pierre; in the centre of each scroll are two emblematic figures in alto relievo. The gallery is carried round three sides of the building, and contains 1,800 seats. The Hall is thus calculated to hold an audience of 3,328 persons. The eastern or orchestral end is semicircular, with a diameter of 45 feet: on either side of the organ are Corinthian pillars springing from the orchestra, and supporting the entablature. A space of 6 feet from the cornice to the ceiling is coved and divided into panels, enriched with a deep border of vine and ivy leaves, fruit and flowers. Around the ceiling runs a border of the same character. The ceiling itself is divided into four compartments by an inner border of scroll work, with central ornaments of water leaves and flowers.

At the Festival of 1853, the building had only been just completed, and possession given on the Monday in the same week. The intended decorations and painting, therefore, could not be carried out, and the performances were given within comparatively bare walls. The paintings and decorations are now all completed, and the interior of the Hall, for elegance and appropriateness combined, is not surpassed by any music-room in Europe. The walls are painted a buff color, the panels pale blue, and the ribs and mouldings a rich cream. The centre flowers and the foliage fruit and flowers of the beams "between the several compartments of the ceiling, are picked out in crimson, and the ornamental mouldings and flats around the panels relieved with dead gold and tertiary colors. The pilasters around the orchestra have been filled with scroll-work, with pale blue ground, and the capitals and mouldings gilded. Between the pilasters projecting from the wall, are placed elegant groups of musical instruments, in the form of trophies, surmounted by globes, from which spring angelic figures of nearly life size bearing coronals of light.

The Hall is lighted by 16 arched windows 14 feet high. The method of lighting it in the evening is by a continuous line of 1,600 gas jets from pipes carried round three sides of the Hall on the upper surface of the cornice, while the orchestra is lighted from the coronals borne by the figures between the pilasters. This affords a subdued and splendid light to all parts of the room, without the disagreeable effect of strong lights and shadows occasioned by the ordinary mode of lighting with lamps and chandeliers. The ventilation is effected by circular apertures 7 inches in diameter, pierced through the exterior moulding of the outer border of the ceiling, continued entirely round the four sides of the latter, and giving a ventilating surface equal to a superficial area of 130 square feet. The heating is by the usual hot water apparatus; cold air can readily be let into the building without creating any scarcely perceptible draughts, and at the same time afford an ample supply of fresh air. The organ used at the Festival in 1853 was not calculated for so large a building as the Hall. This has been replaced by the present powerful instrument, just completed by Messrs. Hill and Sons, of London. The exterior of the organ has been made to harmonize with the building in its decorations and architectural character, and is rich in ornament, with a bold, varied, yet chaste outline, presenting altogether, one of the most appropriate designs for a Concert Room organ. The decorations reflect the highest credit upon the taste and skill of Messrs. Briggs and Mensforth, to whom the whole of the painting, &c., has been entrusted. The general arrangement for the comfort of the audience has been carefully attended to. Separate entries are provided for each class of visitors, and all possible precautions taken to avoid a crush on entering or leaving the Hall. On a level with the stalls are refreshment and cloak rooms; the former 45 by 25 feet, for the accommodation of the occupants of that portion of the Hall; and a similar arrangement has been made for those of the area. It is believed, and competent authorities have expressed their opinion, that there are few, if any buildings, of the same character in which so large a number of people can be assembled, and where the comfort and accommodation of each class have been so much considered and so effectually provided for.

Music Abroad.

England.

BRADFORD TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL.—This great festival commenced on Tuesday morning, Aug. 26, in St. George's Hall. The first festival was held three years ago, when that magnificent music hall was finished. A large and powerful organ has been added, containing 51 stops and 2783 pipes.

The principal sopranos engaged were Mme. Clara Novello, Mme. Weiss, Miss Milner, and Miss Sherrington, together with the new and brilliant star in the musical horizon, Mlle. Piccolomini, who appeared on the last two evenings. Among the contraltos we find Mme. Alboni, Mme. Viardot Garcia, and Miss Fanny Huddart. Mr. Sims Reeves led as tenor, assisted by Mr. Montem Smith and Herr Reichardt; whilst Herr Formes and Mr. Weiss, with Signor Belletti, Signor Beneventano, and Mr. Winn, took the bass portions during the whole of the performances. Mr. J. L. Brownsmith presided at the organ; Mr. W. Jackson was chorus master; Mr. Costa conductor. The band consisted of 101 performers, and the chorus, nearly exclusively Yorkshire, of about 250 voices.

The first morning was devoted to a splendid performance of the oratorio of Elijah. The evening concert consisted of three parts. The first opened with Mozart's G minor Symphony. For the rest we copy from the Times:

Miss Sherrington followed, with Halévy's air, "Bocages épaïs," from Les Mousquetaires, in which the beautiful freshness of her soprano voice, and her evident feeling (notwithstanding the shake at the end of the andante), made a strong impression. This young lady has means which deserve cultivation, but she would have done wisely to choose an air by Auber himself, rather than one which, with all its cleverness, is little better than Auber and water. No one that we know of can sing "In diesen heiligen Hallen" (from Die Zauberflöte), like Herr Formes, who never sang it more impressively than on the present occasion. This was succeeded by a display of vocalization in which the genuine art of song was exemplified to the ne plus ultra of perfection—Rossini's "Una voce poco fa."—by Rossini's most accomplished disciple; it is scarcely necessary to name Alboni. * * * The chorus, were encored in Pearsall's madrigal, "Oh who will o'er the downs so free." Though capitally sung, this is by no means a striking madrigal, and could well have been spared the second time. All the altos in the Bradford festival chorus are men, we think a mistake. The female contralti are not only for the most part better in tune, but give a greater and more pleasing variety of tone to the vocal harmony; and this is particularly felt in part songs and madrigals. If Madame Clara Novello would introduce Weber's elaborate and lengthy scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," less frequently it would be more welcome. It seems to be her pet festival song. Nevertheless, although she gives it with great energy, and splendid power in the upper notes of her voice, it is by no means the piece best suited to her talents. She was applauded with great warmth. The first part ended famously, with a magnificent performance of Rossini's brilliant overture to La Gazza Ladra, which roused the audience to enthusiasm.

Next came a new composition by a name well known here in Boston; about which the Times shall speak again:

The second part of the concert was wholly devoted to Mr. J. L. Hatton's new cantata, entitled Robin Hood, the performance of which was directed by the composer himself. The libretto of this piece, by Mr. George Linley, is in the usual manner of that fluent verse-maker. The personages are Maid Marion (Miss Milnor), Robin Hood (Mr. Sims Reeves), Little John (Mr. Winn, barytone-bass), and "the Bishop" (Mr. Weiss). The cantata, which is written with that facility for which Mr. Hatton is noted, although with less of marked character than the subject might have suggested, and than was expected from the author of the music of Henry VIII. and The Winter's Tale (Mr. Kean's versions), may be shortly described. It opens with a lively chorus of outlaws, who "no tribute pay" and "no monarch obey," according to the fashion of mediæval outlaws in ordinary. The "Bishop" in a bass air, then threatens them for killing the King's deer, proclaiming his authority as "Custos Rotulorum." This air, while there are too many words to the notes, is at the same time a good specimen of mock bombast, and was delivered with appropriate grandiloquence by Mr. Weiss. The Bishop, however, reckons without his host. He is caught in a quæstus by the gallant Robin Hood, whose archers, clad in Lincoln green, surround the reverend father and his retainers. Robin then (doubtless at the instance of some wary and far-seeing publisher) addresses the Bishop in a sentimental ballad, inviting him and his companions to share the joys of his sylvan retreat, which are described after the most approved manner of drawing-room ballads, made "to sell." The first line of this ballad which sounds odd enough from the lips of Robin Hood, no carpet-knight, if chronicles tell truth, is after Shakespeare—"Under the greenwood tree." The rest—The music is tuneful and pretty, if not very new, and was sung by Mr. Sims Reeves with so much expression and tenderness that no one would have dreamed he was impersonating an outlaw; and so the song was redemanded. In a trio with chorus that follows, the fault of which is its length, the bold Robin Hood and his "merry, merry men" are supposed to strip the good Bishop, in spite of his tears and protestations, of all he has about him. They then force him to dance against his will and much to his discomfort, in a chorus, "Strike the harp," which is by no means the best piece of music in the cantata. A madrigal of "forest maidens"—whatever they may be (forest deers was suggested)—"In our forest dell," for female voices, completes the picture of sylvan felicity subsequent to the act of brigandage, and contains further allusions to the "greenwood tree," under which these gentlewomen are accustomed to

"—wile away
The sultry day."

This madrigal is extremely pleasing and ingeniously accompanied. It was well sung by the ladies, and encored. Now that the Bishop has been plundered of his wealth and furniture, Robin and Marion have time to think of other matters, and the cantata comes to a termination with some pastoral billing and cooing. In a fresh sentimental ballad, "Oh, love is like the ocean wild—now calm, &c." (not so good as its predecessors though aiming at the same mark), Maid Marion describes her heart as a "frail bark" upon the "waters of love," which, "when the angry storm descends," sinks "beneath the spray." A duet follows, in which the two declare their eternal affection for each other, and their perfect satisfaction with forest life, in glowing and passionate numbers. The music of this duet is well suited to the words. The finale is another lively chorus, in which Robin's followers express their disregard of "kings and courtiers" and their devotion to their stalwart chief. This, too, was encored, and at the end Mr. Hatton was honored by bursts of applause, both from the members of the chorus (who, however, had no perceptible right to applaud a performance in which they took so conspicuous a share) and the audience. His success could hardly have been more complete.

Viardot Garcia was the heroine of the third part, and was greatly admired in a trio by Cimarosa, which she sang with Mme. Novello and Mrs. Weiss; also in Ah! non giunge. There was the madrigal, "Down in the flow'ry vale," a song by Albini, and the concert closed with Cherubini's Anacreon overture. The attendance was small, owing partly to bad weather, but more, it is said, to aristocratic prices.

Second day. The same causes prevented a full hall to hear a work about which all England has so much curiosity as Costa's oratorio of Eli. As a matter of interest to the members of our own Handel and Haydn Society, who are about dipping into this new work, we copy what the Times says of the performance:

The choruses could not have gone better than in Mendelssohn's oratorio, but the solos assuredly did. This was the more important, since it is in the beauty of many of the recitatives and airs that the chief merit of Eli consists. Very few can write more naturally or more skillfully for voices than Mr. Costa, whose method of scoring for the orchestra, moreover, is so clear and well calculated that his instruments always support and enrich the melodious phrases, never clogging, obscuring or overpowering them.

That the Bradford audience were highly pleased with Eli was evident from the manner in which the oratorio was received. The perfection of the execution, indeed, would have charmed a more exacting tribunal, and have aided a composition even less meritorious than that of Mr. Costa in passing muster triumphantly. Madame Viardot's conception of the music allotted to the boy-prophet, Samuel, is as pure and unobtrusive as her singing in the Morning and Prayers (two of the most beautiful of the vocal solos) is faultless. Madame Novello's lovely voice is heard to signal advantage in the two airs, "Turn unto me," and "I will extol thee," in which the barren and disconsolate, the fruitful and exulting Hannah are so well contrasted by the composer, and which, though in such opposite styles, the popular English soprano renders with equal effect. Mr. Sims Reeves is as much at home in the smooth and tranquil melody given to the devout Elkanah, as in the fierce and boisterous defiance of the Philistine warrior Saph, embodied in music which, if not precisely the best, is among the most theatrically striking in the oratorio. Herr Formes is all that could be desired for the prophet Eli. The music is so precisely suited to his noble voice, his measured style of singing and declamation, that we may presume that Mr. Costa wrote it expressly for him. At the same time this, in a degree (apart from the view which the composer may have taken of his chief personage,) would help to explain the unvarying slowness and solemnity by which the airs and recitatives of Eli are distinguished, and which has laid them open to the general charge of monotony. To resume, we believe Mr. Costa might have searched Europe in vain for more admirable representatives of his four most prominent characters than Mesdames Novello and Viardot, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes, who on the present occasion, as was hinted yesterday, fairly surpassed themselves, singing their very best, at once charming the public and satisfying the composer. As the Man of God, too, a small but very significant part, Mr. Weiss was entitled to praise for his uniformly correct and careful singing; while Mr. Montem Smith did his best for the two concerted pieces which call the voice of the second tenor into requisition. A verdict of unqualified approval might with strict justice be passed upon the execution of the choruses; but some of these were sung to such a degree of perfection that we must instance them by name. First there was the thanksgiving: "Blessed be the Lord," where the fugue on the word "Amen" was given with wonderful precision; then the chorale of the people: "How mighty is Thy name;" then the "Hosanna" at the end of Part I. (with fugue No. 2, which, although the notes are not exactly the same, always conjures up the first bars of Handel's "Rejoice greatly,") just as vigorous, clear, and pointed as the first; then "Hold not Thy peace, and be not still, O God!" which includes the fugue in G minor, with florid accompaniments ("O God, make them like a wheel,") the ablest and most energetic movement of this kind in the whole work, sinning only through diffuseness; then the choral march: "God and King of Jacob's nation," (which, effective as it may be styled in conventional language, always appears de trop, the interest of the martial theme having been exhausted by the very long instrumental movement in another key when it is first presented); and last, not least, the concluding chorus, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," with the fugue on "Hallelujah," the most unlike a genuine fugue, by the way, of the four fugue pieces to be found in Eli. All these, as we have suggested, were splendid examples of choral singing.

Third Day. The anticipations about The Messiah have been partly but not entirely realized. The attendance this morning seemed much fuller than on the opening day, the greatest number of vacant seats being remarkable among the 15s. and 10s. places—a result which justifies what was said yesterday about the extreme ill judgment displayed by the committee in their tariff of admission prices. The 7s. places were very nearly filled, and those at 3s. 6d. crowded—two other facts worth noting. * * * The performance of Handel's immortal masterpiece went even beyond anticipation. It was indeed first-rate. The choruses were executed in a manner that renders criticism superfluous, since there was nothing to criticize, but everything to praise. It is unnecessary even to specify any of them, since all the comparatively less important were just as well rendered as the three most unparalleled in popularity—viz., "For unto us a child is born," "Hallelujah," (during the performance of which the whole audience, as usual, were on their feet,) and "Worthy is the Lamb! Amen"—perhaps the grandest and most stupendous of them all, if any choice may be permitted among things of such uniform sublimity. The solo vocalists were Madame Clara Novello, Madame Viardot Garcia, Misses Sherrington and F. Huddart, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, and Herr Formes, the two last named-gentlemen sharing between them the music for the bass voice.

The novelty of the evening concert was Macfarren's Cantata, "May Day," which the English critics seem to admire more than Hatton's "Robin Hood." The programme also included Beethoven's C major Symphony (No. 1); overtures to Oberon and Siege of Corinth; two-part songs by the chorus, and vocal selections by Mmes. Albini, Viardot, and Weiss, Mlle. Piccolomini, Miss Sherrington, Herr Reichardt, Signors Belletti and Beneventano. The Piccolomini became at once "the talk and toast of Bradford."

Fourth Day. The morning selections consisted of the 103d Psalm, by Mr. Jackson, chorus master at St. George's Hall; Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm; a portion of Mr. Henry Leslie's oratorio, Immanuel; a MS. Credo by Mendelssohn, and pieces of sacred music sung by Clara Novello, Viardot Garcia, Sims Reeves and others. The last evening drew an audience of some 4,000 persons. Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the overture to "Tell," a new choral part-song, by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew, madrigals, operatic songs, &c., composed the programme.

The English papers are full of musical festivals. There has been the festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester; the inauguration festival of a new music hall at Birmingham (where they had one splendid hall before); the inauguration of St. George's Hall in Liverpool, &c., &c., for some accounts of all which we hope to find room hereafter.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 27, 1856.

NEW VOLUME.—Our next number, Saturday, Oct. 4, commences a new half-yearly volume. The month of October too is properly the commencement of the academic year in music; it is the beginning of the musical "season." We shall be happy therefore to receive the names (and dollars) of as many new subscribers as desire a weekly paper, which shall keep them "posted up" in musical matters, and aid them to discern and to appreciate what is true and worthy amid so much that is pretentious and false. Give us a large subscription list this winter, and we will make your paper doubly worth it.

[We can furnish on any one only complete set of the Journal of Music bound; for which of course we must charge an extra price.—With the exception of two numbers only, (which occur in Vols. V. and VI.) we can furnish volumes bound or unbound of the Journal from the commencement. Also single numbers.

A New Organ.

Our enterprising organ builders, Messrs. SIMMONS & FISHER, No. 1 Charles Street, have just completed a fine organ for the Citadel Square Church in Charleston, S. C. Companies of musical persons have been invited to their manufactory nearly every afternoon and evening of this week, to see the noble instrument and hear it discourse fugues, and voluntaries, and fantasias, and "arrangements," under the hands of quite a number of our most accomplished organists. On Monday and on Thursday evening there were regular programmes. That of Monday was as follows:

PART I.

1. Pastoral Symphony, (from the Messiah),—Handel
2. Treble Solo—"O quam suavis," arranged for Organ,.....Mendelssohn
3. Voluntary, in Cathedral style,....S. P. Tuckerman
4. Introduction and Fugue, from the Anthem, "I will praise thee, O Lord!".....Dr. Croft
S. P. Tuckerman, Music Doctor.
5. Fantasia, for two performers,.....Hesse
Messrs. Bancroft and Wilcox.
6. Extempore Performance, ending with Fugue in E flat,.....Bach
Mr. S. A. Bancroft.

PART II.

1. First Movement from the Concerto in F,....Rink
2. "Priests' March," from "Athalia,"..Mendelssohn
Mr. J. B. Lang.
3. Extempore Performance,.....
4. "Songs without Words,".....Mendelssohn
5. Fugue—"Cum sancto spiritu," from the 12th Mass,.....Mozart

The first four pieces were played by Dr. TUCKERMAN; the last three by Mr. WILCOX, who is associated with Messrs. Simmons & Fisher, and whose skill in combining and contrasting the various stops of an organ, in extempore performance, so as to exhibit all its qualities, is known to most of our readers. The music and the instrument gave general satisfaction. A few pieces to be sure, were not strictly organ music, in the highest sense; but it was understood of course that one leading object was to put the instrument through all its paces.

The organ is not a very large one, but it is remarkably effective and powerful for its size. It contains about thirty sounding stops, some of which are of rare beauty and individuality of character. The pedal bass is grand and satisfying; the diapasons uncommonly rich and musical and telling; the reeds, the flutes, &c., are all finely voiced. We were particularly struck with the warm, rich tone of the Claribella, with the faithful imitation of the clarinet, especially in the characteristic lower octave, and with the purity and delicacy of the Violin stop. The full organ seems finely balanced, and is very impressive in great choral passages. The Swell too, is very perfect. The external figure of the instrument is singular, being built with reference to its position in the church, the two ends running up in separate piles, so as to show the window of the nave between them, and only connected for a few feet from the floor below. The key-boards form a separate desk in front, so that the organist fronts the audience. The style is Norman Gothic. The metal pipes are displayed in tasteful order, and are diapered, as it is called, after the old English manner, that is, richly ornamented in blue, vermilion and gold, and contrast finely with the rich oak-colored frame. The arrangement of the works within so singular a form must have been a problem of no little difficulty to the skilful makers.

The selections on Thursday evening were excellent. Mr. WILLIAM R. BABCOCK opened with the first movement of a Fantasia by Bach, and a Fugue from Graun's Tod Jesu, in plain, full, solemn organ style, without change of stops, and showing to great advantage the solidity and power of the diapasons and foundation portions of the organ generally. Next came selections from the second Mass of Haydn, and from Beethoven's Mass in C, by Mr. A. WERNER, organist at the Catholic Church in Franklin street. These were played with much skill and expressive alternation of stops. The Credo, Et incarnatus est, and Et vitam venturæ of Haydn, offered fine contrasts of sentiment and coloring, and were greatly enjoyed; but much more so the Sanctus and Hosanna from Beethoven, in which the deeper master was at once revealed. We only regretted that the selections from that Mass were not continued further. A Fugue by Bach in E minor, arranged for four hands, was then played by Mr. Werner and a young pupil of his.

Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN gave some good specimens of the sweet and flowing style, upon the softer stops, in a couple of movements from Palestrina's Motets, the introduction to Neukomm's "David," and the solo: Return, O God of hosts, from Handel's "Samson." He also played the Dead March from "Saul," introducing the Tremulante sub-bass with imposing effect, and a clear and spirited Introduction and Fugue by André. Mr. B. J. LANG played again, and in a very clean and spirited manner, the "Priest's March" of Mendelssohn (that second edition of the "Wedding March,") and the beautiful and florid movement from Rink's Concerto.

The Fantasia by Hesse was volunteered again by Messrs. BANCROFT and WILLCOX, to the great satisfaction of the company. Mr. WILLCOX played that beautiful and deeply pathetic Agnus Dei from Haydn's First Mass, with the concluding Dona Nobis; also Cherubini's Ave Maria, and the sublime concluding chorus: Worthy is the Lamb, from the "Messiah."

We think it was the general opinion of the many musicians and amateurs assembled on these pleasant occasions, that Messrs. Simmons & Fisher have produced an organ which may challenge comparison with any American organ of its size; while in certain important respects, as the sufficiency and beauty of its Diapasons, and the perfection of its Swell, it seems to surpass most that we have heard.

BEETHOVEN'S "BATTLE SYMPHONY."—In translating the biography of Beethoven, by Dr. Döring, which is completed in this present number, we could not but be surprised at the author's attaching so much consequence to a certain composition which Beethoven wrote for Maelzel, and which is spoken of sometimes as the "Battle of Vittoria," sometimes as "Wellington's Battle at Vittoria and Triumphal Symphony," and sometimes as if there were two distinct pieces, one called the Battle and the other the Triumphal Symphony. Apart from its accidental prominence, derived from the composer's quarrel with Maelzel, this biographer refers to it more frequently than to any other of Beethoven's works, and calls it a masterwork. He even singles it out in speaking of the symphonies, and couples it with the Pastorale in his praise. Yet it is very certain that among musicians this Battle Symphony is not esteemed as one of his important works. It is not counted among the immortal Nine Symphonies; and it is difficult for any one who ever heard it, (for instance as performed here once by the Musical Fund Society) to imagine for a moment that the great master was in earnest when he wrote it.

It is an ad captandum, trivial thing at best; an occasional piece, produced to order, and not in the way Beethoven usually wrote, inspired and seeking the ideal. So far as we can gather from the Life by Moscheles, the true explanation is this:—It was written for Maelzel, the "Conflagration of Moscow" man. Maelzel made, though unsuccessfully, an instrument to relieve the great composer's deafness, and requested in return a battle symphony for his Panharmonicon, which he might exhibit about Europe, himself dictating the drum and trumpet calls and all the principal effects. This Beethoven did, and afterwards expanded the same for a full orchestra, partly at Maelzel's suggestion, and partly by way of avenging himself upon the French soldiers who filled the theatre at Vienna on the night of the first production of his Fidelio, and whose poor appreciation damned that opera for the time. He luckily bethought himself of this Panharmonicon business, and resolved that he would write them something full of drums and cannon, music which they should understand, and yet not most flattering to their national pride. He turned it into the "Battle of Vittoria Symphony, in honor of Wellington's victory at Waterloo." It can hardly be considered more than a musical joke, therefore, although the master's strength and grandeur of conception cannot help betraying themselves here and there in the working up of the themes, especially in the finale with "God save the King."

It is quite possible that such a Symphony, for the very reason of its more trivial character and ad captandum title, was of more pecuniary worth to Beethoven than his far grander symphonies. At least Herr Maelzel, with shrewd eye to business, saw that; and the composer, smarting under the sense of wrong from him, may naturally have had his imagination wrought up to an undue notion of the value of the work itself. In this way must we account for certain phrases in regard to it in one of his own letters.

ERRATUM.—It is the 134th Psalm of Marot and Beza's version, which has the music of "Old 100," not the 135th, as misprinted week before last in A. W. T.'s communication.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Another concert season is approaching, and we begin to see signs of movement among our various societies. The Committee who managed the "Orchestral Concerts" last winter are already taking measures to secure a similar series of eight grand concerts, under the name of "THE BEETHOVEN CONCERT SOCIETY," of which more hereafter. Subscription lists will be opened in a few days, and the lovers of orchestral music must distinctly understand that the giving of the concerts will be made conditional upon the number of tickets subscribed for by a given day. . . . The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, under their new president, Mr. C. F. CHICKERING, and with Mr. ZERRAHN for conductor and Mr. MULLER for organist again, commenced their rehearsals last Sunday evening, with a first trial of Costa's oratorio of Eli, which has excited so much attention during the past year in England. Mehul's "Joseph and his Brethren," and one of Mendelssohn's two oratorios, as also his Christus fragment, some of his Psalms, Chorals of Bach, &c., are talked of among the other possibilities of the winter's programme. The president stated at the meeting that the negotiations with Mme. CLARA NOVELLO had failed, and that she will not probably come to America this season. . . . The MENDELSSOHN CHORAL and the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY also are stirring, and we understand that the bâton of the former has been offered to Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD, the teacher and composer, and a gentleman, we doubt not, admirably fitted for the post. . . . The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB will in a few days announce the programme of their winter campaign in the sphere of classical chamber music.

Mlle. PARODI has come round again, with her Concert troupe under the direction of M. STRAKOSCH. They announce three concerts next week in the Music Hall. Besides her own great attractions, she brings some superior artists. PAUL JULIEN, the young violinist, is always welcome. Then we are to hear for the first time Sig. TIBERINI the new tenor, about whom the Philadelphians are so enthusiastic, and Sig. BERNARDI, the baritone, who has made a fine impression in New York. . . . Negotiations are in progress, we are told, for Italian Opera (MARETZKE's troupe) at the Boston Theatre, commencing about the middle of October.

The New York Philharmonic Society have gone back to their old and popular conductor, Mr. THEODORE EISFELD. Their steadily increasing audiences the last winters, having overflowed Niblo's theatre, have forced them to engage for the coming season the Academy of Music, both for their concerts and rehearsals. The old C minor Symphony is to lead off. CARL BERGMANN, the conductor of last year, having his hands full of German Opera, Choral Societies, &c., steps gracefully back into the ranks as violoncello-player. In the same good spirit Mr. Eisfeld last year yielded the bâton to him and played the first tenor. . . . Flotow's Alessandro Stradella has been performed at the German Opera this week, with good success, exhibiting the talents of the company to much more advantage than Robert le Diable. . . . At the Academy of Music the long promised novelty of Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord was produced on Wednesday evening.

The well known German composer, Lindpaintner, died on the 21st August, at Nonnenhorn, on the Bodensee. Peter von Lindpaintner was born 1791 in Coblenz. His first opera "Demophon," was written in his 18th year. Besides his later operas, of which the Vampyr, die Geneserin, and di Sicilianische Vesper, are the most prominent, Lindpaintner wrote a great number of instrumental works. His was a productive and thoroughly-trained talent which never distinguished itself by great originality or strength. Lindpaintner was court-kapellmeister at Stuttgart. . . . Madame Clara Schumann has returned to Düsseldorf. Among the many gifts received by her in London is a handsome Erard grand-piano for concert use, presented by Madame Erard. . . . Richard Wagner, the composer, for the last six months has been in very feeble health, induced by hard work upon his new opera "Die Nibelungen." This is a triple opera, intended to occupy three evenings of performance. The first two parts are completed. To recruit a little and at the same time to complete the third part of this gigantic work, Wagner has left Zürich and betaken himself to the neighborhood of Genf. . . . The music-publisher André, of Offenbach, has just put forth a composition of Mozart which has never yet been published. It was composed in the year 1777, and its title is Litania de venerabili Altaris.

Mrs. DE WILHOEST's Concert in New York is chronicled as a great success. The Mirror calls her "a pretty little pocket edition of a woman; with a voice remarkable for clearness, accuracy and compass; well trained and well managed; but lacking in that quality of sympathy so essential to the highest achievements of genius." The Tribune (W. H. Fry) says: "The lady sings like an artist, and one who has already mastered the chief difficulties of vocalism. Her voice is true as a die, and her execution clear, rapid, brilliant. One or two tours de force of pre-eminent merit could be pointed out. The quality of the voice is a high soprano; light, flexible, and capable of being well heard in a large room. She was much applauded, and it was not simply the applause of friends but of admirers. Her aplomb before such an audience was very uncommon for a debutante."

The editor of Fitzgerald's City Item, Philadelphia, has set apart several columns of his pleasant weekly for a resumé of musical events, musical criticisms, &c. We borrow from him in another column some seasonable reflections on our alarmingly large crop of "Professors." We also learn from him that musical matters promise to be lively in Philadelphia this winter. In the first place their grand new Opera House (Academy of Music) is approaching its completion, and will probably be opened before Christmas. Then their musical societies are all in the field. Their Handel and Haydn Society have purchased the old organ of their namesake society in Boston, and are rehearsing the "Messiah," which is to be brought out soon at National Hall, under the direction of Mr. KNAUFF; they also talk of Loewe's oratorio, "The Seven Sleepers." The Musical Fund Society have issued their subscription lists; they think of performing Mr. Darley's "Cities of the Plain" at one of their concerts. The Harmonia Society will commence with a miscellaneous concert, to be followed by "The Deluge," "The Cities of the Plain," &c. The Musical Union will bring out "Moses in Egypt" and oratorios. Sig. PERELLI resumes his classes for the last time in Philadelphia; it is said that he goes next year to Vienna, having received a commission to compose a work for the Opera there. The lovers of Symphony and Overture in Philadelphia are congratulated on a forth-coming series of concerts by a new orchestra, composed of some of the oldest members of the "Germania." The names of Schultze, Sentz, Stoll, Albrecht, and others are mentioned. We trust this does not portend any withdrawal of musical force from Boston.

A Londoner, who was present at the Coronation ceremonies in Moscow, writes thus of the Grand Opera there:

I have just returned from the Grand Opera, which was opened for the first time this evening with Bosio, Lablache, Calzolari, and other London favorites. The appearance of this magnificent theatre, when lighted up and filled with a brilliant audience, fully realized the expectations expressed in a former letter. It has five rows of boxes, with twenty-eight seats in each row, and to each loge there is a retiring room as large as many a London drawing-room. The pit is all divided into comfortable stalls, and in no case are more tickets issued than the house will conveniently accommodate, a hint that might be taken with great advantage by the managers of our London houses. What with the elaborate gold scroll, raised on a groundwork of delicate green, the richly-carved pillars and pilasters, the scarlet velvet lining of the boxes, and the exquisitely painted drop scene, the interior of the imperial theatre presented a coup d'œil such as one could hardly have expected at a distance of 2000 miles from London. But when I add that the audience were mainly composed of officers in gorgeous uniforms, and ladies in grand toilette, you can easily imagine how surpassing must have been the general effect. It only wanted the presence of the Emperor and Empress, whose box is a little palace in itself, to make the picture complete. The embassies of the great powers were well represented, the French filling one box on the grand tier, and the English another. The opera was "Puritani," in which Bosio's singing so delighted the Russians that she was called several times before the curtain, although, I must add, that her acting did not satisfy me as to her fitness for the part of Bellini's heroine. Lablache looked stupendous, and rivaled the Greek priests in the depth of his intonation, and the rest of the performers acquitted themselves respectably. There were no encores—an admirable practice; and when the opera was over the audience could go home without suffering the purgatory of an interminable ballet. The performance of the orchestra of 150 performers was worthy of all praise.

The papers have the following romantic story about the new tenor, TIBERINI:—

"Young Tiberini, is said to be a Roman of pure noble birth and blood, and closely and intimately connected with a princely family, who trace their ancestry up to the days of the despot Tiberius, whose name is included in the list of those of the family who wore the imperial purple, or swayed the destinies of the mighty empire from the popular and elective tribune. Although no crowns are at their disposal now, the pride of a long line of rulers still clings to the heads of the T. family. Tiberini, the tenor, possessed of a beautiful voice, great musical enthusiasm, and fine personal appearance, and chafing under the disqualifications and restrictions which condemn to the church or the army all the cadets of noble families in the Old World, determined to carve out for himself a fame and fortune and add another honor to a name that history has recorded in her storied pages. To carry out the determination, and after secret but ardent study, he appeared under an assumed name in a distant city. His secret was, however, discovered, and the alternative was presented to him either to retire for ever from the profession of a singer, or be disowned and abandoned by all who bear his name. His choice was made at once; he would follow the art to which his aspirations led him, even at the sacrifice of name and prospective fortune. The bitterest trial that fell to his lot was the compulsory separation from his affianced one, who of birth equal to his own, and returning his love with equal ardor, was forced by her friends to retire to a convent to avoid collision with a mere singer. Every difficulty was thrown in the way of his success in Italy; every obstacle that could be raised through the agency of wealth or family connection rose up against him, and despairing alike of his art and his love, he fled hoping to find in another land a fair chance for the display of such talent as he might possess, and to meet in the approbation and sympathy of strangers a balm for that grief which words may indicate but cannot express."

The Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik gives for a leading article a glowing biography of ALFRED JAELL. We hear of the young pianist during the last month as concertizing at the German watering places—Hamburg, Ems, Wildbad, &c.—and in Austria, at Ischl and Gastein. The Tyrol and Italy are in his eye for the next months; and then Vienna, and Hannover, where he is pianist to the king.

Madame ANNA BISHOP appeared at the Theatre Royal in Melbourne, on the 9th of June, where she has produced a series of Italian operas. . . . THALBERG, the Pianist, at the last accounts, was about to leave Paris, for this country. His piano has preceded him.

At the Swiss music festival this year, among other works, Mendelssohn's Elijah and a Beethoven symphony were given by 700 performers. 3000 people, musicians and guests, partook of a princely banquet at the superb villa Bartholony. The banker Bartholony also laid the foundation of a new Conservatory of Music, with great accompanying pomp, on the 14th of July.

Mozart's Requiem has just been performed in St. Petersburg for the first time, under the direction of Schubert.

1500 singers took part in the late great festival at Brunswick. It was the 25th year of the gathering.

A gigantic organ is just being built by Merklin, Schultze & Co., Brussels, for the Cathedral in Murcia, Spain. It is to have 64 stops, four manuals, and two octaves of pedals. A great improvement has been secured in the touch, which resembles that of an Erard piano.

Meyerbeer is just now at Spa; Jenny Lind Goldschmidt and Rossini at Kissengen.

Advertisements.

Strakosch Grand Concert Company.

MLLE. THERESA PARODI

Begs leave to announce that she will give in this city, THREE GRAND CONCERTS, The first on TUESDAY, Sept. 30, the second on THURSDAY, Oct. 2, and the third and last on SATURDAY, Oct. 4, at the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, on which occasion she will be assisted by Sig. TIBERINI, Sig. BERNARDI, and PAUL JULLIEN, under the direction of M. STRAKOSCH. Concert commences at 8. For particulars see small bills.

REMOVAL.

THE Subscribers respectfully beg to inform their friends and the Musical public, that they have removed from 19 South Ninth Street, to their new and elegant Store,

306 CHESTNUT STREET,

Three doors West of Eleventh, where they intend keeping, besides their complete stock of EUROPEAN MUSIC, a large assortment of AMERICAN Publications, PIANOS, VIOLINS, and Musical Merchandise in general.

They respectfully solicit the further support of Dealers, Professors, Seminaries, Leaders of Bands, and other persons connected with music, to whom they can offer the advantage of selecting from a stock comprising the Publications of the leading Music Publishers of Europe and the United States.

A Catalogue of our own Publications may be had on application; also Part I. of our complete Foreign Catalogue of Orchestral Music. The other parts will be ready in a short time.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

306 CHESTNUT STREET.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 1, 1856.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

JOBB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by MME. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents. Orders may also be addressed to

A. WILLIAMS & CO., 100 Washington St.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

Has the honor to announce that she will re-open her MORNING and AFTERNOON CLASSES for the instruction of YOUNG LADIES on the PIANO-FORTE, on MONDAY, Sept. 22, and on WEDNESDAY, Oct. 1. Terms, Fifteen dollars for Twenty-four lessons. Applications to be made, for classes or private lessons, at Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE's residence, No. 55 Hancock St.

A Magnificent Edition of Beethoven's Sonatas.

Printed from Engraved Plates. For Six Dollars.

The 32 Sonatas, complete, 524 pages of Music, in two volumes, with portrait, light binding. Price $6. The same, superbly bound in cloth, embossed and lettered, price $7.

Desirous of placing the best musical works within reach of the great mass of the people, the undersigned presents, as first of the series, the above celebrated compositions, and would direct special attention to the SUPERIORITY of THIS EDITION OVER ALL OTHERS. It is printed from new, engraved music plates, each note being clear and accurate in its outline, rendering each page remarkably distinct. The copy employed has been the latest German edition, and an unusual amount of labor and expense has been bestowed on the work, in order to avoid typographical errors, however minute. Reliance can therefore be placed upon this edition as being in every particular an exact reprint of the best German, while superior plates, paper, press-work, binding, and general appearance render this American edition vastly preferable to all foreign copies, especially when the latter are printed upon type used for common Psalmody, etc.

In continuance of this series of Classic Musical Compositions will be issued in rapid succession, and sold at the same extraordinary low rate of additional prices, Piano-forte works of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart and others.

The great expense attending the publication of these works and the low price at which it is proposed to furnish them, can only be met by large sales; and it is hoped that all those favoring the circulation of an advanced style of music, and a consequent cultivation of a fine musical taste throughout our country, will so far aid the enterprise as to become purchasers of this edition of BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, as also of the works that may follow.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

THE MUSICAL DRAMA:

A COLLECTION OF

Choruses, Quintettes, Quartettes, Trios, and Concerted Pieces,

FROM

Standard German, Italian & French Operas,

With English and the original words,

FOR THE USE OF

AMATEUR CLUBS AND SINGING SOCIETIES.

Selected, Arranged, and Translated by

J. C. D. PARKER, A. M.

In Nine Numbers, each 50 cents,—or in Three Vols., each $1.

PUBLISHED BY

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasies, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 84 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasy, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols. . . $6
" additional volume of smaller works . . . $3
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols. . . $6
Haydn's " " 2 vols. . . $6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office. ALEX' W. THAYER.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works:

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION, WITH AND WITHOUT ACCOMPANIMENTS,

Edited by CIPRIANI POTTER,

Principal Professor of Harmony and Composition in the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Vol. 1, Airs with Variations,	Bound in cloth, $4 88
" 2, Rondos, &c.	Do do 2 18
" 3, Duets,	Do do 4 25
" 4, Piano-Forte Sonatas,	Do do 8 75
" 5, Do do	Do do 8 75
" 6, Sonatas for Piano and Violin,	Do do 4 25
" 7, Do do	Do do 4 25
" 8, Quartets and Quintets,	Do do 8 75
" 9, Trios for Piano, Violin and 'Cello, Do do	Do do 6 00

Each piece in the above volumes is published separately.

The fact of the collection and republication of Mozart's Pianoforte works in the middle of the present century shows that time instead of diminishing, has stamped their excellence and value. They are, indeed, true works of art, as useful as they are beautiful. Out of this school came the memorable artists, Hummel, and J. B. Cramer—players whose fingers expressed the deep feeling of music with which their nature was imbued; and if we may still hope to find their successors among the young, it must be by a train of studies similarly conducted.

Novello's Catalogue No. 4, containing an analytical and thematic index to the above works, to be had gratis at 389 Broadway, or forwarded to address on receipt of one cent postage.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,

TEACHER OF SINGING,

47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,

ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,

BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

Apr 29

at

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,

Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION

PIANO-FORTE,

Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion . . . $12.00
Do do each subsequent . . . $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 235.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 1.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BRACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

The Different Judgments about works of Musical Art.

[From the German of ROCHLITZ.]

About the productions of no Art do so many persons judge, and with such various judgment, as about those of the Musical and the Dramatic Art. This is natural. Their productions are themselves so very various, that everybody finds something for himself in them; they are everywhere publicly presented, and all the world goes to make itself acquainted with them. With the number that are interested in anything, since very few refrain from passing some judgment, the number of those that judge increases; with their varieties of character and wishes, increases the variety of their judgments. In the case of Music—for with that alone we have to do here—there is still this additional circumstance—that it has no prototype in the external world, which may serve in some sort as a point of rest and union between the judges. Thus, however different the judgments passed upon the painting of a rose-twig, in one important point they all agree; for everybody has seen natural roses, and compared the painted with the original; and when he comes to express his opinion, it may be a very unartistic one, but it is impossible that it should be wholly false. We read quite often, to be sure, that "Music has its prototype in the inner world of feeling in the human breast." Granting this for the time being, still a man must already know these constant changes of his state, which we call feelings, must be accustomed to bring them in the moment of judging to clear consciousness; must possess the difficult faculty of seizing them in idea, when he would judge of their effects, and in words when he would express the idea. But that this is not and cannot be the business of every one, needs scarcely to be mentioned. "He that cannot do a thing, ought not to judge of it." True; but he does judge. Nay, by far the majority, true to the well-known human weakness, judge of nothing so willingly, of nothing so quickly, as of what they do not understand; for in matters which they do understand they know the difficulty, both of performance and of judgment. "Well, but let every one start off boldly and straight-forward, whichever way he may be drawn, and as he pleases, despising the opinion of the many." So say you, you who are twenty years old, or scarcely more; when you are forty, you will talk differently; and if you get to be sixty, you will smile or repent that you ever spoke so. Still it is not our purpose to dwell here upon the judgment of unlimited numbers. We let these rest upon their own foundation; and not to leave so great a company without a parting word, we repeat the well-known observation: A work of Art which does not produce an effect upon the mass of those who are capable of feeling, whatever their relation to the Art, is certainly not good, although it is not for that reason bad; one which does produce an effect upon them is certainly not bad, although it is not therefore good; one which at once fully satisfies them, is, to say the least, not excellent.

We turn now to the judgments of those who are included under the names of musical artists and musicians, connoisseurs and amateurs of music, that is to say, of those who have susceptibility, not only in general, but for music especially; who have had more or less experience of its effect upon themselves, and who possess also more or less knowledge of the means by which this Art produces its effects. Should we not from these expect some harmony of judgment about works of musical Art, at least in the essentials? Experience teaches the contrary; and where we find this harmony about essentials in the case of a few of the most excellent works, it is only when it has been forced upon them after the lapse of a considerable time. This experience is so universal and so public as to require no examples. If any one desires them, let him only think of GLUCK and MOZART. Now whence this difference of judgment, even in such circles? Whence, but from the difference in the persons who compose them?

STERNE (in his "Sentimental Journey,") divides travellers, and after him, JEAN PAUL (in his Unsichtbare Loge) divides walkers into four classes. In the first go, according to them, the most deplorable, those who do it for mere vanity and fashion; in the second, the learned, for the sake of exercise, and less to enjoy than to digest what they have enjoyed. In the third we see those who wander with the eyes of landscape painters; in the fourth, those who cast not merely an artistic, but a hallowed eye upon creation, who into this blooming world transplant the second world, and among other creatures the Creator. We might in a similar manner arrange those who hear and judge of music in these four classes. It will not take from the force of our reflections, that much which is to be adduced of them may also be applied to the beholders of the works of other arts, indeed of life itself.

About the first class, who from vanity and fashion hear music, judge of music, perchance make music, we shall not trouble ourselves much; nor do they trouble themselves at all about us. To them the opera house and concert hall, (the church, too, when there is music made there) is nothing but a spacious place, where well-dressed people may assemble unmolested, merely for the sake of feeling that they have been there, and that they may talk about it. How the singer "looks," that is, how she is dressed, occupies them more than what or how she sings; they might be present at a concert of Mozart's, without finding anything more interesting than the circumstance that he, who has produced such grand and mighty works, was such a little, feeble manikin. To them in music all is right or all wrong which just at this day, and in just this society of ton, is so declared; and to them the correct and fine tone is that which the most admired lady, the most respectable gentleman, at just this day, in this society has set. With the most this is not narrowness, but voluntary self-limitation. They would be and would have nothing farther, even if they could. They have no wrong opinion; they have no opinion at all; they only think they have. You find these musical amateurs mostly among the rich and fashionable of both sexes in great cities.

To the second class belong those who hear attentively, but merely with the understanding (so to speak.) They wish to be called connoisseurs in Art, and they not seldom get their wish. Many of them shrink from all that is written to-day, and from the manner of performance. All this displeases them; why? Because it is not as it was forty, fifty or more years ago. Like certain scholars on examination, they have completed their course for their whole lifetime with their early schooling. What then delighted them, perhaps with good reason, is now not merely good, but good alone. With this one-sided prejudice, the present music, which has become so different, can move them little; and that little one can easily deny himself. Those who do not do so, but who proceed more candidly, refer to the small effect of the present music, compared to the infinitely stronger and deeper music of the past; but they do not consider that their judgment is derived merely from its effect on them; that the ground thereof lies in themselves. Their excitability is lessened, their sensibility is grown cold; and so the music lacks charm and expression. "But the music of my youth enchants me still, whenever I hear it!" Is it really the music that enchants you, and not rather the youth to which it transports you back?—youth with its thousand sweet remembrances, which even without clear consciousness, and the more powerfully the more vaguely, mingles with the charm? Or, if Phillis is fair, is Doris ugly because she is not? But this is the way with man when he acts like himself!

Others, and the smaller (though more fatal) number of this class, are the dead, conceited grammarians of music, who are nothing but grammarians. They do not willingly miss the performance of a new piece of music, simply or mainly for the sake of spying out some violation of a rule, were it only a traditional one. Some trifling reminiscence, a hidden fifth, a forbidden octave, is for them a real God-send, especially in any celebrated master; and they shrug their shoulders over the whole of Mozart's wonderful finale to the first act of Titus, because such a case occurs in the inversion of one of the accompanying figures. They are like those reviewers, who have nothing to report of a beautiful poem, but a false rhyme; or that critic in "Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship," who in Wilhelm's representation of Hamlet, found nothing worth remarking upon but the white ribbon which peeped out from under his black robe in the duel with Laertes. "But were it not better that the false rhyme, the white ribbon were not there?" O yes, it would be better; and you are right. We find these two classes of men (there are no women of this sort), in the nature of the case, almost solely among superannuated artists and passés judges of Art.

To this class belong also the virtuosos, who are nothing but virtuosos—ingenious sons of Tubal-Cain, "from whom descend the fiddlers and the pipers." These are interested in nothing, or in scarcely anything except what is full of break-neck difficulties, and the successful or unsuccessful execution of the same; like walking the tight-rope for rope-dancers by profession. What is easy to perform, they find indifferent; what is simple and natural is common-place and flat. The easy execution of difficulties is of course a part of the matter, especially with virtuosos; but it should be as a means to an end. Of this they seldom know, or they make small account of it. They hold to the former; this may come of itself. And in fact, (in such various forms does man's intellectual nature work, and on such different sides may the domain of music be approached!) to be candid, we must confess: If they possess, besides great facility, mind and talent, not to say genius, the end is actually realized, in a certain manner and in happy hours, under favorable circumstances; but otherwise not. Now, since the executive skill of distinguished virtuosos costs great labor, and thus the object upon which this labor is expended acquires to them a value from this very fact; since they see everywhere a great majority of persons who cannot do what they can, and yet who would like to do it; since they find everywhere admiration and applause, if not sympathy and satisfaction, (and admiration and applause break out more loudly and more suddenly than sympathy and satisfaction), and man's self-love or vanity is all too easily carried away by what is loud and sudden, especially in moments when he has been stimulated to unusual exertions and to a full sense, if not an undue estimation, of his powers: their habitual decision against what is not in their line, their enthusiasm solely for the article in which they deal, their positive condemnation on their own authority, and so forth, are easily enough explained. Amongst these virtuosos shine just now almost as many women as men.

The third class includes those hearers and judges of musical works who show a certain susceptibility to music, get animated and even enthusiastic about it, but yet listen only with the ear, and judge accordingly. They love music because it puts their blood in livelier motion and makes them feel more comfortable; because music, whether in solitude or in society, serves as an ever-present means of whiling away the time and filling the vacuum of the mind. They value and applaud compositions according as they promote this end; according to their more or less proficiency, they seize upon small or great, upon the trivial or the significant, nay, even upon the excellent, so that it serve that end, and only so far as it serves it. If you would know how great, nay, how enormous is the number of this class, ask the publishers of pretty dances and variations upon favorite airs; ask the arrangers of military music, the purchasers of operas arranged for every instrument (without text); watch the audience at a concert, and observe the entirely different degree of attention paid, during a symphony by HAYDN for instance, to the Adagio and to the Scherzando; ask experienced singers what is their surest way to set the hands in motion.

But we must carefully avoid ridiculing them, or even despising them; and this not merely out of prudence, if we are ourselves musicians, since in that case we need them; since youth (of either sex) belongs to them, and youth everywhere can clap the loudest, and its noise, even if it die away as fast as it breaks out, is yet indispensable to the musician, as well as to the actor, who lives immediately for the moment and generally of the moment; not merely for this reason, but also because the members of this class do actually possess some sensibility and love for music, do actually attach themselves to somewhat that belongs to the essential nature of music, and do even help to further all that makes up its nature, if at the same time it only fulfils this desire of theirs, which, with a few lawful exceptions, it really ought to do. A sound human nature may be so far trusted: Whoever shows a susceptibility and passion for any art, and for what is worthy in its products, must carry away with him somewhat of its nobler and higher quality, even if it be only with an indistinct feeling, and without will or knowledge. Only give them what is good; give it well, and give it constantly; the vagueness will clear up, knowledge and volition will be awakened—to a certain degree. And we must not be contented, anywhere, or in anything, with what has been accomplished; above all, we must learn to wait. How many of us, ourselves, were different in our early years? or must the world have changed because we have changed? We have, at all events. All this seems so obvious, that I shall be reproached with trifling in alluding to it. And yet how often is it overlooked! how often, therefore, are things done without fitness, without result, and even attended with much harm; or else nothing at all is done, from mortification that such is the way!

Finally, in the fourth class sit those, not over many, for the most part still, and seldom expressly consulted, but not unrecognized, not unesteemed, not without wholesome influence, who hear with their whole soul. They want, with the sensual enjoyment, the spiritual also; with hearing, feeling; and with both, also thinking; for even thinking affords them enjoyment. To them Music is, like Poetry, one of the means of pure joy; and through pure joy, of pure love; and through pure love, of the ennobling of the race. What science effects through conviction, that, they think, should Art effect through feeling. If that points man to his highest aim, this makes him more inclined to reach out for it. If that teach the way, this makes it smoother. Many of these persons recognize in music a second speech, granted to man in God's mercy, like the first, to distinguish his race from all the creatures upon earth, to elevate it, and bring it nearer to its final destiny.

Accordingly these persons recognize and feel in melodies not merely the melody, but the infinite spirit of love and peace; in harmonies not merely the harmony, but the original source of all unity and reconciliation of the diversely constituted, the ultimate goal of all which, separate, still strives to become one; the holy re-acceptance into the fulness of peace; the harmonizing of all that appears remote, apart and heterogeneous. And if one tells them: "This is fanatical dreaming and new-fangled mysticism," they say nothing, or at the most point among their books to Plato.

Now one who is accustomed to think, knows also how to distinguish. Accordingly the hearers of the fourth class distinguish between music which claims to be Art, and music which looks merely to the moment's entertainment. Only soul—soul they require even here, in whatever kind, in whatever form, it may see fit to manifest itself; for without soul, they think, the playing becomes mere child's play—for very little children. To them, therefore, ROUSSEAU's air of three notes is worth more than many a whole opera, which only makes a noise; and HANDEL's prayer for peace, which has scarcely more notes in it, more than many a fugue, which is a mere matter of correct calculation. So, too, he who delivers the former well and beautifully, is more dear to them than he who merely brings out a string of bravura arias with facility. They do not despise the unessential in music, any more than they do mere cleverness in that; but both are matters of indifference to them unless they serve the aspiration to a higher goal; and they naturally avoid what is indifferent and yet consumes time. They adhere neither to the new, nor to the old, but to the good, which contemplates and which approximates a higher end; but still more to the excellent, which reaches it. They do not despise the judgments of the second class; they only give them quietly their place; they do not quarrel with those of the third: they only give them credit in a friendly spirit for just what they are. Their applause not seldom coincides with that of both of them; their point of view, never. They understand them both quite easily, but are with difficulty understood by them. Yet, if they show themselves tolerant, they like also to be tolerated. The maxim: De gustibus non est disputandum, they hold to be a sheer truism, and all disputation, except between like-minded persons, to be fruitless effort.

"Ah! where are they then, these listeners and judges?"

Do you comprehend and love them? Then, my friend, you yourself belong among them, or you are on the way to it, if you but will to be!

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

By the Author of the New Philharmonic Programmes, London.

This remarkable work is admitted on all hands to be one of the finest examples in existence of that style of composition called descriptive music; the aim of which is not merely to raise emotions in the mind, but to suggest ideas of objects, facts, or scenes, properly appreciable only by other senses than that of hearing.

This purpose may be attempted in several ways; as, first, by the artificial imitation of natural sounds—such as the warbling of birds, the cries of animals, the noise of a storm, &c., &c. Or, secondly, there may be an attempt to imitate qualities not phonetic; as, for instance, to represent something rising by the use of an ascending scale, or something leaping by skips of intervals; a ludicrous example of this kind of description being the celebrated old catch, in which the notes formed a curve, to represent a rainbow! Both these styles of composition, however, though in skilful hands they may give rise to ingenious and not unpleasing effects (as may be seen in Haydn's oratorio of the Creation, and many other works), are but of a low grade, requiring no great amount of intellectual perception or musical genius in the composer, and giving rise to only very commonplace feelings of appreciation in the hearer. A far more noble kind of descriptive music is that which, avoiding trivial imitations, endeavors to make the general character of the composition serve for the depiction of the general ideal characteristics of the scene to be represented. The description in this case is effected by what may be called kindred emotions. The music is made to describe facts or scenes through the medium of sensations appertaining to them, which sensations are producible only by musical combinations. Thus, for instance, an impression of liveliness or solemnity conveyed by music may correspond with feelings of the same nature excited by certain objects or scenes, and so may be said to describe such scenes by recalling certain subjective qualities of them. The composer then will seek first to determine clearly what are the ideal characteristics of the scene he wishes to portray, and will write his music so as to excite corresponding ideas, leaving all trivial similarities out of the question altogether.

The best kind of descriptive music, therefore, combines in itself, to a certain extent, the qualities of music and drama together. In music written expressly for dramatic representation, the character must, of course, be suitable to the nature of the scene; and, in return, the scene aids in rendering the character of the music intelligible; but, in symphonic compositions, where no adventitious aids are present, the task of description becomes much more difficult, and the interpretation often much less clear. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was, as far as we know, the first attempt to give a symphony, as a whole, a descriptive character; and we would particularly draw attention to the fact, not generally understood, we think, that the method of description here followed is almost exclusively of the higher kind. An impression prevails amongst many persons who have not studied the work carefully, that it consists in a great measure of imitative music. This is quite a mistake; the author has most carefully avoided (except in one passage, which we shall hereafter point out) any common-place imitative effects, and has relied solely on the nobler design of acting on the mind by kindred impressions. If there were any doubt about this, we have Beethoven's own authority in proof of it; for it is on record that he described the symphony as "consisting more in the expression of sentiment, than in actual representation." And it is particularly in illustration of the character of the work that we offer the following remarks upon it.

The Pastoral Symphony was composed in 1808, and is numbered as Op. 68, corresponding to about the middle period of the composer's second or best style. It is the only symphonic composition, except the funeral march in the Eroica, to which any descriptive character has been expressly attached by the composer.

The first movement is intended to depict the cheerful sensations awakened in the mind by an arrival in the country; and this idea of a visit is a very striking one. Beethoven understood well the fact that the charms of rural scenery are much more keenly appreciated by visitors to, than by residents in, the country; and there are few inhabitants of large towns who cannot bear testimony to the delight experienced, when, after perhaps months of imprisonment in crowded streets, they first arrive amidst the freshness of a country scene. The original expression in the score, "heitere Empfindungen," is scarcely well translatable into English, the word heitere meaning something between "cheerful" and "gay," more lively than the former, more earnest than the latter; the kind of sensation we feel when something occurs to exhilarate the mind without disturbing its thoughtfulness; precisely that, in short, which is produced by charming scenery. And to raise sensations of this kind, through the medium of the ear instead of the eye, has been the composer's object in this first movement. It is in no respect whatever imitative, and it is scarcely possible to give a meaning to individual passages, as it is by the general character of the movement alone that its effect is intended to be produced. It is exceedingly simple, melodious, and flowing, exhibiting no feature calculated to distract the attention from the pure harmony and melody of the music, or even to call forth that startled admiration with which this composer's works are sometimes heard; all is quiet and calm, and may be listened to and admired with as little mental exertion as is required to appreciate the beauties of the woods and the fields. The second motive includes double counterpoint on three subjects, but is, nevertheless, perfectly clear; and the elaboration of the second part is singularly free from complexity—so true has the composer adhered to the plan he had in view. The instrumentation of this, as well as the second movement, is simple, the orchestra consisting only of the ordinary string and wood bands, with the addition of two horns.

The second or slow movement is entitled Scene am Bach; i. e., a scene by a brook or rivulet. It is not easy to define, with any pretensions to accuracy, the precise nature of the ideas that the composer intended to convey in this movement, further than that its general character is placid, flowing, rich, and melodious, and so may be taken to correspond with the feelings excited by the gorgeous natural coloring of some thickly wooded landscape, having a stream as its principal feature. The leading character of the music lies in the fulness of the harmony, the peculiar flowing style of the accompaniment, and the richness of the instrumentation. It has been sometimes thought that the accompaniment may be intended to represent the murmuring of a brook; but this, we think, would be inconsistent with the principle usually followed throughout the symphony. As an imitation, the thing would be a failure; as a suggestion of the idea of massive beauty, it is noble and effective. There is, however, a passage at the end of the movement which comes under the category of imitation of sounds—namely, a trio, of three birds, denoted in the score as nightingale, quail, and cuckoo, and represented by the flute, oboe, and clarinet respectively.

We have often wished this passage, so unlike any other part of the symphony, was not there, as compromising the dignity of the composition; and it is so obviously an episode, that we indulge a fancy it may have been a subsequent interpolation, added perhaps at the instance of some of the composer's lady friends, who thought the presence of good unmistakeable birds essential to complete the ideal landscape. We believe that if Beethoven had sincerely approved this style of description, he would have introduced the warblers into the body of the movement (as Spohr has done in his symphony "Die Weihe der Töne"); for the few shakes and ornaments that occur in the melodies are obviously only suggestive and not imitative. The bird episode, is, however, it must be admitted, in some measure redeemed by the admirable way in which it is expressed, and its skilful connection with the more legitimate part of the music.

The third movement, in which trumpets are added, is intended to represent a rustic fête, and its general characteristic is sparkling gaiety, mingled with a certain quaintness difficult to describe, but which admirably corresponds with the idea generally entertained of peasant sports. A kind of musette feature, frequently occurring, may probably be intended to embody the idea of the simplicity of rustic music. A kind of solo for oboe, repeated by clarinet and horn, and accompanied each time with the bassoon playing only the key note and its fifth alternately, points to the same resemblance. In the middle of the movement, occurs an episode in common time, the strongly marked rhythm and quaint construction of which evidently suggest the joyous abandon of unrestrained rustic merriment. At the end of this, a sustained trumpet note appears to call the revellers back; the former measure is introduced again, soon becoming more joyous as the time increases to presto, and the fête appears to come to a close. The final cadence is, however, not completed; for, instead of the expected close on the chord of F, the dominant harmony is succeeded by a low murmur of the basses on D \flat , forming the commencement of the storm.

And how shall we describe the stupendous display of musical genius here contained? This movement is alone a study for a lifetime; not only as an unparalleled example of the power of musical description, but also as one of the most masterly specimens of legitimate musical writing that is to be found in the whole range of Beethoven's compositions. For it is easy to show that, strong as is the temptation which a storm offers for unworthy devices, there is not a note of this which is not pure music of the noblest kind. We cannot lay too much emphasis on the fact that it is not imitative. There are people who think it necessary, in order to realize to their own minds the descriptive power of the composition, that they should be able to trace in it, not only the roll of the thunder, but the pattering of the rain drops, the howling of the wind, the cries of frightened animals, &c.; but all this is pure imagination, and we are convinced that the composer himself would not have considered such interpretations any compliment to his intellectual powers. His aim was not to imitate noises, which would have been but puerile work at the best, but rather to produce impressions or emotions—a far higher and nobler work, and one which gave him a much wider scope, as embracing elements of impressiveness out of the domain of sound altogether, such as the heavy sultriness of the air, the gasping of nature, as it were, for breath; the general impression of awe produced by the impending war of the elements, &c. &c., all of which are more or less typified in the scene now before us. The emotions excited by the awful phenomena of a heavy summer thunder storm are of the sublimest character; and their production by music, if practicable at all, certainly requires higher means than the clatter of peas in a tin case, or a series of thumps on a drum head. And it is particularly worthy of notice, as an evidence how Beethoven shunned mere imitation, that the drums, which in ordinary musical storms form the staple commodity, as giving from time immemorial the orthodox representation of thunder, are throughout this movement quite subordinate; they strengthen the effects of the other instruments but in no instance take any independent part of their own. For example, the first idea of any ordinary composer would have been to commence the storm with a roll of the drums pianissimo, to imitate distant thunder. Not so Beethoven. He produces the effect desired by music, not by mere noise. His first rumble is, as has been already stated, an interruption of a cadence by a tremolo of basses on the semitone above the dominant. This is followed by light piano passages, of a singular uncertain character, on the violins; the tremolo then is repeated a little louder and longer, with the addition of a few holding notes on wind instruments; the violin passages enter again, a gradual crescendo follows, then the first burst of the storm occurs. It is impossible to conceive a better representation, condensed into so short a space, of the feelings attendant upon the approach of a storm: the first distant alarm, the incipient fear, the listening anxiety, and at last the certainty of the impending elemental war! The crash itself is simply a fortissimo minor chord, with a tremolo on the violins. Here the drums enter for the first time; but we have a great doubt whether, either here or in any other part of the movement, the composer had the intention of giving any direct imitation of the sound of thunder. The idea is rather that of alarm and confusion; the latter being expressed by a very original device in the basses—namely, making the contra bassi play groups of four notes against corresponding groups of five on the violoncellos; the drums add weight, of course, to the general effect, as they do in any other forte passage, but nothing more. The strength of the storm is carried on by a series of vigorous erratic unison passages, giving a fine idea of a wayward force struggling, as it were, to expand itself in the strife of the elements. After this comes a lull of some length, interrupted by occasional vivid startling chords, with an echo instantly following, probably intended, not so much to depict any actual incident, as to keep the attention awake, and give a general idea of the constant power of the disturbing agency, though for the present subdued; and this is also impressed on the mind by the continual tremolo of the violins and the frequent low running passages of the basses, which, however, are here more regular than before. In time, another outbreak threatens; the violins take up again their first passage, the wind instruments join in sustained moaning notes, or in pitiful interrupted wails; the basses resume their confused rumble; and, after a gradual crescendo, comes another fortissimo burst of the storm. This, however, is not a simple sustained chord like the first one, but a regular musical phrase; in which the hurried descent of the violins through the chord in each bar; the fine march of the bass; the impressive prolonged unisons of the wind instruments; the double syncopated accents; and the simple, yet masterly and striking modulations, give not only a most forcible and appropriate effect, but also a character of great grandeur in a musical point of view.

The storm temporarily lulls again, and now comes the most striking part of the scene. It may be noticed by anybody who will take the trouble to observe the phenomena of a thunder-storm, that, immediately before the heaviest crash, there generally occurs a lull; during which, however, the stillness which seems to prevail is of an unearthly awful character, evidently only the precursor of greater violence: the heavens, so to speak, appearing to be gathering strength for their most terrible discharge. At this time the atmosphere is unusually oppressive; and it is impossible to avoid a sensation of fearful suspense, in expectation of the explosion, which we feel must be close at hand. Now Beethoven has seized this feature with the greatest skill. It is scarcely possible to describe the manner in which the representation is effected; but, for about twelve bars (pp. 136 and 137 in the Leipsic Score), the imagination is kept in a state of indescribable tension, precisely corresponding to the effect on the mind of the lull above alluded to. It is here, and here only, that the composer has used the chromatic scale; one of the most common devices to imitate storm and wind among commonplace writers; but its effect here is not imitative—it is used as a means of increasing the sensation of indefinite, restless anxiety; and, conjoined with the alternate moaning and starting of the other parts, expresses perfectly the feeling intended to be conveyed; namely, the anticipation of the coming explosion. And, accordingly, on the fourth beat of the bar; that is, just when it would be least expected, the whole orchestra, now strengthened for the first time by two trombones and a piccolo, burst into a terrific crash, which is the grand climax of the force of the storm. This is formed by the full chord of the diminished seventh, sustained for several bars, and followed by a succession of other similar chords, interrupted by sudden sforzandos, and leading into a repetition of the fine descending passage before alluded to.

But now the storm begins finally to abate; and here again the skill of the composer becomes strongly marked. It is a matter of observation that, generally speaking, a storm ceases very soon after the most violent outburst; the whole accumulation of the disturbing agent being then relieved. The thunder continues for a time in the distance; but the gloom begins to clear off, the clouds open, a peep of the blue sky is seen, which quickly expands, and relieved nature resumes her wonted appearance. All this is most admirably followed in the Symphony; the grand crash over, the force soon begins to slacken, a diminuendo commences, and soon reaches a piano; the basses descend, bringing the rumbling to their lowest notes; an occasional sforzando occurs, but the evidence of the brightening up of the elements gradually becomes more complete; and this not only by the cessation of the characteristics of the storm, but by a complete change in the nature of the harmony; the entrance of clear, open, major chords; first subdued in the lower octaves, and then taken more prominently, and combined with sweet, touching melody, offering a most striking and beautiful parallel to the natural effect above described. The basses ever and anon give a slight, deep roll; but this soon ceases altogether, and a few clear notes of the flute, used as a passing into the last movement, declare that the storm is over, and all is again serene.

Such is Beethoven's representation of a storm, which we may safely say is altogether unparalleled, not only in its effect, but in regard to the noble character of the means by which this effect is obtained.

The concluding movement represents Pastoral Songs, or the embodiment of feelings of joy and gratitude after the storm. It commences with a kind of pastoral call, taken first on the clarionets, and then on the horns; after which an elegant melody is introduced, which forms the principal subject of the movement. The character of the whole is highly melodious and cheerful; the instrumentation rich and full; the two trombones, first introduced in the storm, being here retained to fill in the harmony. The coda, from the diminuendo after the fortissimo, is singularly beautiful and impressive, and the conclusion is very original.

ROSSINI.—It is most interesting to hear him speak of Beethoven and Mozart. He calls the last "un homme colossal"—the greatest genius of which the musical world can boast. When only in his ninth year he knew Mozart's Sonatas, and a few years later, all his other works. His admiration for Mozart is unbounded. That he perfectly understood Don Giovanni and Le Nozze di Figaro did not astonish me; but that, on hearing the overture to Die Zauberflöte, he continually broke out in expressions of admiration, proved an amount of appreciation in him not generally suspected by Germans. He designated Così fan Tutte the first comic opera, and on my politely making an allusion to his own Barbiere, he exclaimed, discontentedly, as if I had wished to pay him a false compliment: "Ah, what is that in comparison!" To show the impression real German music produces upon him, I may mention that he praised Spohr's concertos very highly; of his operas, on the other hand, he had only found one or two good things in Faust; Spohr's other dramatic works he did not know. I asked him if he had never composed symphonies himself. He replied that, with the exception of the overtures to his operas, he had never written instrumental music. "What would you have?" he said. "That is a separate study; any one who, after Beethoven, would produce anything of importance in this branch of art, must devote himself, à corps perdu, to the most earnest and most profound efforts, and would not, even then, produce anything like what Beethoven has produced. I have neither attempted to acquire the necessary knowledge, nor have I had time to do so." He speaks with great reverence of Mendelssohn and Weber. He appeared to be but little acquainted with the more modern Italian composers; if any of their works were played on the Promenade at Kissingen, he was always obliged to refer to the programme for the names of the authors. Of his own compositions, he speaks with great modesty, and frequently replies to praise of them with deprecatory contempt. On one occasion, when Meyerbeer's Marche aux Flambeaux was performed, he suddenly stopped and exclaimed: "Mais de qui est donc cette marche de géants; c'est quelque chose de fort vieux." On my telling him the name of the composer, he merely said: "C'est fort beau!" and walked on.—Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.

THE VIOLIN.—Slow and tender melodies, confided too often, now-a-days, to wind instruments, are, nevertheless, never better rendered than by a mass of violins. Nothing can equal the touching sweetness of a score of first strings made to sing by twenty well-skilled bows. That is, in fact, the true female voice of the orchestra—a voice at once passionate and chaste, heart-rending, yet soft, which can weep, sigh, lament, chant, pray, and muse, or burst forth into joyous accents, as none other can do. An imperceptible movement of the arm, an almost unconscious sentiment on the part of him who experiences it, producing scarcely any apparent effect when executed by a single violin, shall, when multiplied by a number of them in unison, give forth enchanting gradation, irresistible impulse, and accents which penetrate to the very heart's core.—Berlioz.

Yankee Doodle.

(From the N. Y. Evening Post,)

A writer in Harper's Magazine for the current month seems to find his Dutch blood dancing to a new tune in the delight he experiences at a discovery in recent researches into American literature, concerning the much-disputed origin of Yankee Doodle. Of course we cannot find it in our hearts to criticize the "song in use among the Dutch laborers" which "trolls out thus:"

"Yanker didel, doodel down
Didel, dudel, lanter,
Yanke viver, roover vown
Botermilk und Tanther."

There is a genuineness in the look of these lines which reminds one of the works of Diedrick Knickerbocker; and we rejoice in the addition of this testimony to the mass of evidence going to show the immense value of the Dutch element in our population which the "losel Yankees" (we mean New Englanders) have so studiously obscured and covered up in history. We commend this subject to the Historical Society. And in this connection we desire to add another and a similar proof of the base spirit which has hitherto succeeded in preventing the merits of our early Dutch literature from shining by its own light in the darkness which always precedes the dawn of a great era.

These remarks have been suggested by finding among the curious Dutch works in the library of the Historical Society a copy of the poems of the learned Rijme-Laar, a much neglected writer, who accompanied Adrian Block in the "Tiger" to New Netherlands in 1612-13. It is well known that Block's ship was burnt at Manhattan while he was preparing to return to Holland, and that he was obliged to remain while engaged in building the yacht, which was the glorious Dutch bar-binger of the future maritime supremacy of New Netherlands. It was at this time that the first cabins were built on Manhattan Island; and it is supposed that the poet exercised his talent for composition "in the midst of the perils and trials of the early colonial settlement," "not repelled by the rudeness of the wild life of America, but drawing from its unkempt nature fresh illustrations and a bolder imagery."

But to our extract: (Vervolg der Gedichten van H. K. Rijme-Laar, 2, p. 66.) The intelligent reader will need no further introduction or comment, in view of such "flat burglary as ever was committed."

"Heile Kolombie's jollie landt;
Heile das burgher's belliepandt;
Vat held das laws und bond das stadt
Vat was nein loose, nein dawn, nein late;
Und ven licht of sonne was gone
Vas loosed und leit das honor daun.
Boosaarding mensch may carp and yaw,
Goedaardig mensch zorg nein von straw:
Allos ready for swaar-bier
Wanneer Hollandenschan appear:
Vast, vereenigd leit vos bee
Hauling taut our bandt-bellie;
On bewimpeld en our talk,
Leit us blazen for Nieuw-Jorck."

New York, Oct. 1, 1856. BLINK BOLLIKOT.

"Professors."

(Continued from Fitzgerald's City Item, Philadelphia.)

Our readers will remember that last week we spoke at length of the existing abuses in regard to the expression, "Professors of Music," and particularly of the wide latitude allowed by the public as to its true signification. The extent to which the abuse is carried almost exceeds belief. Every foreigner who comes to take his abode here styles himself a Professor, issues circulars and cards as if he were the most accomplished musician in the world, and on the sole strength, perhaps, of a tolerable execution on the piano, does his best to impose himself upon the public as the only person in the city worthy of encouragement. A young lad from the country or some inland town, with the small smattering of knowledge obtainable in his native place, and with the confidence naturally ensuing from having been lionized by people more ignorant than himself, comes here and does as the foreigners have done—he, too, announces himself a Professor. Still more unworthy recruits come from the ranks of trade, which they abandon upon discovering that pretentious claims, founded upon the smallest modicum of musical ability, are more profitable than manual labor. No matter how trifling the amount of information any of these pretenders may possess; if they proceed in a business-like way to humbug the people, success and patronage attend them for a time at least; so the blame should not fall solely upon their shoulders, but be divided between them and those who consent to foster the obvious imposition.

As the evil has not worked its own cure, it appears to us that the time has come for the real musicians to arouse and strive manfully to check, without delay, the spread of the abuse. There are many ways to effect this desirable end, but the most feasible and decisive method seems to be that of which we are now about to speak.

We have no conservatory of music such as those which exist in all the European cities of a population as large as Philadelphia's, and in many, too, that boast but half our number of inhabitants. The so-called Academies of Music, both here and in New York, are merely theatres for the representation of Italian or French Operas, not schools for the instruction of Americans in the science or practice of music, as their name would seem to imply that they should be. There is not a faculty of any college or university in the Union justly qualified to confer musical degrees, although one institution attempted to create a Doctor of Music, and thereby produced an infinite deal of amusement among the really musical circles. What we suggest, then, is that some well-established musical society in our city should obtain from the Legislature a supplement to its charter, empowering it to form a College of Music, consisting, we will say, of three professorships, of Vocal, Instrumental Music, and of Composition. These chairs must be filled by gentlemen of long experience and of unquestionable ability, and there are many such among our old ranks of "Teachers," as they now term themselves. They should form classes for instruction, lay down regular, complete and thorough courses of study, to be gone through by every pupil, and by strict examination assure themselves of the competence of each student before suffering him to pass finally. On graduating, the students should be furnished with diplomas, giving them perhaps the degree of Professor, or still better, that of Bachelor of Music, as is done in the English Universities. This would serve as a guarantee of their ability, and as a strong recommendation to the public should the graduates determine upon teaching music.

We think this plan would have the desired effect. It would give the native musicians opportunities of study which they do not now possess, and on their passing through the college, it would confer upon them a distinction that would at once give them a place in the consideration of the public, and show that they had a right to the position claimed. It would not, it is true, prevent imposture entirely, but it would give it a severe check, as the people at large would expect any person terming himself a Professor, to be able to show his diploma. The society undertaking to perform this work would deserve the thanks of all the true musicians of the country, and do more good to the cause of music than by giving fifty concerts in a season, gratis. It is, however, a plan that cannot succeed by means of half measures; the professors selected must be men of standing, musically and socially; their names must be widely known and their merit acknowledged; the course of study be severe and closely adhered to, while the examinations cannot be too minute, or too strict. These matters are necessary in order to prove that the rank of Professor cannot be properly obtained without toil and difficulty, and that the graduate has fairly won his degree.

We commend our suggestions to all our old chartered societies and to the musical circles at large, trusting that some steps may be taken to prevent the further intrusion of incompetent teachers.

The "North Star" at the New York Academy.

The production of MEYERBEER'S North Star—as an opera written in French and sung in Italian is facetiously called—drew a larger audience than has been gathered together by any musical event since Grisi and Mario left us; and judging from the manner in which the performance was received, a succession of well filled houses will reward the manager for the pains he has taken in bringing out this novelty. This North Star, or Etoile du Nord, or Stella del Nord, is in fact The Camp of Silesia, written to another libretto, and re-written in some parts of the music, if we mistake not. It is both in plot and style of composition much lighter than any other of Meyerbeer's works with which the public generally are acquainted. Peter the Great is the hero; and we first see him playing ship-carpenter at a village near Wyborg on the shores of the Gulf of Finland. Here, according to SCRIBE, the libretto-writer, he fell in love with a village beauty named Catherine, and here too found, in a pastry cook, a man who became afterwards one of his most favored officers and councillors. The origin of the Menshikovs was plainly in Scribe's eye. Catherine favors Peter, whose real rank she of course does not suspect; but she sends him off to win a cross of honor, in order to be worthy of her. (She wouldn't have made the same condition with the Czar. Why?) He goes; but meantime, she, by tact and boldness, has saved her native village from being plundered by a roving band of villainous-looking Cossacks; and she herself joins the army as a substitute for a cowardly brother, who is just about to be married, and who prefers the one companion-in-arms that he has, to the many that he might have; only on the principle, we suppose, that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. As she goes off in a boat to join the army, the first act closes.

The second act takes us to the Russian Camp, where we find her doing soldier's duty and just on the point of discovering a plot against the Czar. Peter himself soon appears, and as he is drinking and talking with the quondam pastry-cook, his mistress is detailed to stand sentry by his tent. She is a man and a soldier, however, only as far as her regimentals go; and she peeps into the tent. There she sees Peter, her Peter, with his cross of honor indeed, but, alas for the frailty of man, making temporary love to a vivandiere. This does not suit her notions of propriety; and being in her wrath, surprised at her peeping by her corporal, and reproved, she slaps his face. The crime is worthy of death, and to death on the spot she is condemned by Peter. She attempts to make him recognize her; but after his fashion he has got gloriously drunk, and she is carried off to be shot. She makes her escape, however, having previously sent to her Peter—the information which she has obtained about the revolt, which he is thus enabled to quell, and the second act closes in an outburst of loyalty and patriotism.

In the third act she has got to Moscow, and goes mad in white muslin. Could any young woman, with a due sense of propriety, allow herself to become insane in a toilet composed of any other material? Her Peter is profoundly touched, and attempts her restoration by building for and placing her in a village like that in which he first found her; and having made up this trifling little prescription, he adds to it, by way of condiments, some Finnish choruses and an air upon the flute by himself. The treatment is efficacious. The young lady comes to her senses in the arms of her Peter, and—being a lady—faints, of course. She revives, however, in time to have the imperial purple thrown over her white muslin before the curtain falls.

From this sketch of the chief incidents of the plot, it will be seen that the opera is altogether wanting in dramatic interest. The relations of the events to each other are not clearly defined, the situations have no striking import, and the story ends but does not culminate. Compare such a plot as this with those of Norma, La Sonnambula, Don Giovanni, Il Giuramento, Ernani, Lucia di Lammermoor, and see how utterly deficient it is in that grand dramatic element upon which rests so much of their success, and also of their actual merit as lyric dramas. To this lack of interest in its story, it adds the utter want of inspiration in its music. Meyerbeer, a musician of prodigious acquirements, an artist who has thorough mastery of his materials, the voice and the orchestra, a man of indefatigable industry and of singular ingenuity, has every quality necessary to the composer, but one—genius. Genius is a thing of degree, and men may have of it a high or an inferior order; but he has none of any kind—not a spark. In his best work, Robert le Diable, there is one air, and but one, which is almost as good as an inspiration; but even that is a miracle of labor; and every other that he has written is itself evidence that it was painfully perpetrated with malice aforethought. His success—such as it is—has been gained by making his operas splendid spectacles. In L'Etoile du Nord, there is a great deal of skilfully written concerted music, admirable use of the orchestra, singular and striking effects produced by a few instruments, but not one spontaneous melody; and we decline the ungrateful task of examining it in detail. Taken as a whole, however, it must always be entertaining to a general audience, when it is properly put on the stage. It is bustling, amusing, and striking in the way of spectacle. The performers generally do the music and themselves justice. Mme. La Grange and Sig. Coletti particularly distinguish themselves. Sig. Amodio has a part much too low for him, and with little music worth singing. Sig. Brignoli has a pretty-ish romance, daintily accompanied, which he sings in a pretty-ish way—not always in tune. The choruses are fairly, and the orchestral parts very creditably, performed.—N. Y. Cour. & Eng.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 4, 1856.

NEW VOLUME.—Our present number of October 4, commences a new half-yearly volume. The month of October too is properly the commencement of the academic year in music; it is the beginning of the musical "season." We shall be happy therefore to receive the names (and dollars) of as many new subscribers as desire a weekly paper, which shall keep them "posted up" in musical matters, and aid them to discern and to appreciate what is true and worthy amid so much that is pretentious and false. Give us a large subscription list this winter, and we will make your paper doubly worth it.

¶ We can furnish one and one only complete set of the Journal of Music bound; for which of course we must charge an extra price.—With the exception of two numbers only, (which occur in Vols. V. and VI.) we can furnish volumes bound or unbound of the Journal from the commencement. Also single numbers.

Orchestral Concerts—The Beethoven Concert Society.

There is a singular anomaly in the history of orchestral, or, as they are sometimes called, symphony concerts in Boston. We have had the name of being remarkably fond of hearing great instrumental music, and of being classical in our taste—at least, compared with most American cities. We have had during the past twenty years a great many more orchestral concerts than New York or Philadelphia, or than many a European city of our size. We have had all of Beethoven's symphonies performed in the course of a single winter, and with our great Music Hall crowded, or at least full, each time. We have had each winter two or three times as many public concerts, two or three times as many great orchestral works performed, and before larger audiences, than any of our sister cities. And yet, strange to say, and to our shame it must be confessed, Boston at this day is as far as it ever was from having any sure and permanent provision for the satisfaction of this still returning want. The thing is not yet organized and grown up into a live institution, to which we can look forward every winter as a matter of course, sure of our orchestral supplies, and not have to speculate and inquire doubtfully and anxiously: Are we to have orchestral music again? Is anybody moving in the matter, or will it be left to take care of itself, until it is too late to seize upon the true conditions of success? Are we simply trusting in our oft-attested love of music, taking the demand as earnest of the supply, and folding our arms in the comfortable assurance that something must and will "turn up"? Like a certain clerical bon vivant, who was supposed to look back from the other world upon the good things of this, we think of our musical seasons past and we grow "hungry from recollection;" yet our cuisine remains all to be organized as much as ever.

To build up a grand orchestra, worthy of Beethoven and Mozart and all the great composers whom we want to hear and know, is really a great work, a work of years. We have heard most of the masterpieces of these authors, we have had so many years of concerts, so many glorious performances and seasons full of present pleasure and of greater promise, and yet here at this day we have no orchestra. Boston is without an orchestra!—Boston, the classical-music-loving city. To organize good concerts on the grand scale, so that they shall both pay—that is, offer inducements to the musicians and artists to take part in them—and at the same time not sink into the category of mere amusements for grown-up children, but minister to a higher love, and educate and carry up the public taste, is also a work of time, requiring not a little management and toil, even with the good orchestra given and only waiting for the employer to say the word. Twenty years of concerts, some of them glorious to look back upon, and yet we have neither the organized management nor the established, constantly-improving orchestra, for which all the world, hearing of our concerts, credits Boston! To our shame must we own it.

Where lies the difficulty? It is not that we have lacked materials for an orchestra;—although these, deceived in the hope of sure and permanent support, may have somewhat dwindled in the last two years. It is not that the love and taste for Symphony and Overture is not yet enough developed in our people;—although the taste of a community, however high and promising to-day, is pretty sure to fall away from its high water mark to-morrow, without some sure progressive course of exercise and education; if we do not progress, we retrograde. It is not that we have not liberal and wealthy friends of music, who have stood in the gap many times, and are ready to do so again:—although the forcing process, as a substitute for growth, must in the nature of things lose virtue when too frequently repeated. It is not, that we have not had abundance of efforts, of external aid, and all manner of experiments and systems tried. The difficulty lies in the fact that no one method has been persisted in, until gradually it could shape itself into the right method. Many times we have had promising results, we have succeeded temporarily and approximately, and have closed a season with enthusiasm and rejoicing, and have taken it for granted that it would of course go on from glory unto glory in succeeding seasons. But the temporary success has never been pursued and cultivated into permanence. The whole want has been of organization; for other wanting elements would have been one by one supplied and made secure in course of time by that. Now we have tried a great many systems, and have got a great many good concerts out of them; but still where are we? Where we were at first, as to the power of using our advantages. We have had organized societies to provide our music. We have had our Academy, employing the musicians; we have had our Musical Fund Society, in which the musicians employed themselves; each did the best it could for a few years, did really much good, but had to give it up beyond a certain point. We have sat still and let music come to us from abroad;—and for a series of writers the taste for instrumental music was certainly quickened as it had never been before by the artistic performances of that little "Germania" orchestra, with its fine sketches rather than full presentations of the Symphonies; these were a good model, and we owe them much, but we could not hold them, they were not of us, and they scattered. Last year we tried the simple subscription plan, guaranteed by amateurs of means, who had their committee for raising an orchestra and managing the concerts; and the result was a larger and better orchestra and an excellent series of concerts—on the whole perhaps the best we ever had—a growing attendance and delight throughout the season; yet the concerts did not pay; there was a considerable deficit, which nothing but the extraordinary interest of the Beethoven Statue festival (justifying double prices for that evening) saved from being a very formidable one. The public had been appealed to, and the public only half responded.

Now it is perfectly right that the supply, in music as in more material necessities, should depend on the demand. If the public want good music, let the public pay for it. A very moderate price, if paid by all or half of all who anxiously inquire: What for orchestral concerts this winter? would be ample support for the best of concerts. It is the only wholesome and thoroughly reliable kind of support. To be reliable and to really amount to a support, it must come in the form of pledged subscriptions to a series of concerts promptly given beforehand. This is one prime condition of good concerts. To make it operative, there must be one other: a permanent, wise organization of managers, ready to meet the public, and on whom the public can rely to use the support so furnished in the most effectual manner for the end desired. These two levers are to set the ball in motion, and not let it spend its force and drop entirely to the ground at the end of each heat.

An appeal is now again made to the musical public of Boston, and a chance offered to secure a series of Eight Grand Orchestral Concerts, if said public care enough to have them. In the want of any established organization, the same committee of gentlemen, who managed the concerts last year, and in answer to repeated suggestions and inquiries, have undertaken to try the experiment again. They have thought that the ground gained last winter ought not to be lost; that a little systematic perseverance for perhaps only one year more, in building on upon that gain, may place orchestral music on a sure basis for the future here in Boston. Their aim is not simply to provide for the present want; their aim is now, as it was last year, to build up an orchestra and a machinery for giving concerts, which may prove permanent. Every musical city in Europe has its Philharmonic Society, on which it can depend for annual supplies of great orchestral music. New York, which never until the last two years has had as many concerts or as large audiences as our smaller city, has now its flourishing Philharmonic Society, with a large and long-trained orchestra, and a certainty of selling all its tickets at the slightest announcement of a concert. Why shall it not be so here?

With a view to this permanence, and taking a suggestion from the great Symphonies most frequently performed, and from the noble statue that presides in our hall, the committee have assumed the name of "THE BEETHOVEN CONCERT SOCIETY." It is a good name to conjure by. They who have taken it, and who have volunteered to work under it, will do their best, will do at least as well as they have done, and turn the past experience to account, if only their appeal is promptly met by our so-called musical public. With the public now the whole thing rests. The public must come forward promptly and take up the tickets before the concerts can be given. The usual democratic system of cheap prices is proposed. In order that the great risk may be covered at the outset, the inducement to subscribe for the series is made liberal: only three dollars for the whole eight concerts. And a broad difference is made in favor of those who take tickets for the season. For the single concert the price is fixed at one dollar—more than we have been used to, but not more than is usual in all other cities, and really very low for concerts of this order, which should be worth as much as any opera.

Let it be clearly understood then, that the concerts will not be given unless 1500 sets of tickets, at the low rate of $3.00, shall be subscribed for before the 20th of this month. Will not all who value opportunities of hearing good orchestral music come promptly forward and put down their names? Will you not settle it now once for all, friends, that there shall be no uncertainty in future about good orchestral concerts here in Boston, where we have enjoyed so many?

P. S. We have omitted to mention one part of the plan. Should the proposed concerts more than pay expenses, the balance will be applied towards the formation of a fund in aid of future Orchestral Concerts.

Mlle. Parodi's Concerts.

Mlle. PARODI is a singer who pleases the many, who always draws large audiences, and all whose efforts are applauded and encored. Mr. STRAKOSCH is a pianist of the brilliant, popular kind, who makes the tones of the Piano sparkle before the eyes, as it were, of those who are susceptible to the beauty of musical sounds, but who are children in musical taste and knowledge. That he can play also for the intellectual and classically cultivated ear, we do not doubt. But he chooses to please the public and to do a good business; and he has proved himself one of the most shrewd of concert managers. With such a partner and manager, and with such other excellent talent as they have known how to associate with themselves, Mlle. Parodi's concert all over our wide country have been attended with success; and she has made the tour of the States in this way we know not how many times. This week Boston has its turn again.

The Concerts of Tuesday and Thursday evenings had large and enthusiastic audiences, as usual: audiences composed largely of that class of persons who are most demonstrative when they are pleased. Everything, as usual, has been vehemently applauded, and almost everything encored. The programmes have been various and brilliant; the popular and well-worn predominating, but with some things also for the more classical taste. Mlle. PARODI seems in perfect health and voice. She does not sing out of tune, as she did frequently when she was here last. There is the same rich, clear, resonance in her voice, especially the middle and lower tones. She has great execution in a wide range of music. She charms more by her power of voice and energy of manner, a certain free abandon and impassioned air, than by any rare delicacy and truth of expression, or really satisfying refinement of artistic style. We have liked her best in the music of Verdi; there is something in its coldly intense character that seems to suit her. Her "Ricci waltz," with variations, her "Rataplan" and other such bravura fireworks, always bring the house down, but they have not the exquisite charm of SONTAG. In the La ci darem duet "by the immortal Mozart," we could not find the simplicity and innocent sweetness of Zerlina in her singing or her manner: certain points were coarsely overdone. Mendelssohn's "Jerusalem, thou that killest," &c., she delivered in a large and telling voice and style; but delicacy and depth of feeling we could not find in those tones. In "Hear ye, Israel," one could only think of Jenny Lind. There was force and brilliancy in Parodi's rendering; but it did not seem spiritual force. She is a very physical singer. Sometimes a high, emphatic tone is painfully harsh in quality, and in no sense sympathetic.

Sig. TIBERINI, the young Roman tenor, of whom romantic stories have been told, has a delicate, pure, penetrating voice, over which he has great control. He occasionally gives a note or a short phrase with great power of voice, like a true robust tenor. He seems to have sung Verdi a great deal, for he has a habit of contrasting very loud with very soft tones oftener than is necessary. Indeed, he is too apt to sacrifice the expression of a piece to vocal display. Hence his singing is cold and lifeless, even when he makes energetic effort. He quite mistook the character of Spirto gentil; beginning it in a soft cantabile, like SALVI, but making a bravura piece of it before he got through, introducing a wild flourish in one place, and in another repeating phrases in echoes, with which surely the song could have nothing to do. We liked him best, too, in Verdi, especially in the duet from Ernani. That from La Traviata is an odd musical conceit, which, however sung, we could not admire.

Sig. BERNARDI is an excellent baritone; in his serious look and manner much reminding one of MORELLI, and somewhat too in the character of his voice, which is rich and resonant, but requires forcing in the upper notes. He sang Vi ravviso, the duet from "Don Juan," a romanza by Balfe, and other pieces in very chaste and satisfactory style.

PAUL JULIEN is no longer the boy, but his extraordinary talent with the violin has ripened, so that it is more than ever a delight to hear him play. A Fantasia by Vieuxtemps, a difficult and thoughtful composition, was rendered by him in quite masterly style. So Paganini's "Witches' Dance," and other show-pieces. In purity and firmness of tone, in graceful execution, and in feeling, he is truly a young artist. The accompaniments were all played by STRAKOSCH, whose pretty, sparkling "Nightingale" and "Sylphide" pieces enchanted the multitude as usual.—The last concert is this evening.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB announce their annual series of Chamber Concerts. OTTO DRESEL, too, will give us more of his delightful Soirées. May both have plenty of subscribers; for such music as they afford is among the choicest privileges of Boston. Of the ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS we have spoken fully in another column; those who intend to subscribe must lose no time. . . . Mr. WM. SCHULTZE, our excellent violinist, we are happy to say will not leave Boston to settle in Philadelphia; and we are sorry to learn that Mr. AUGUST FRIES is in such poor health as threatens to deprive our concerts of his violin for some time. We can ill afford to lose either of them. . . . Mr. and Mrs. CARL ZERRAHN, our popular conductor and his wife, will live in town this winter, and are prepared to receive pupils at their residence next door to the Music Hall, fit place! We cordially commend them to those who wish to learn. See card below.

We understand that S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN, Mus. Doc., has resigned his place as organist and conductor at St. Paul's Church, and with him go a number of the singers, thus breaking up the fine double choir which it has cost long pains and practice to make what it was. Mr. J. H. WILCOX leaves the organ in the Baptist Church in Charles Street, to take Dr. Tuckerman's place.

Our worthy neighbors of the Telegraph consult the interests of Art and business in one and the same article, criticizing PARODI's concert, by the following ingenious method:

Our reporter says: "Mr. Strakosch never played so indifferently, and could not have given his audience more indifferent music, though his brilliant display of Lily Dale and other familiar Ethiopian melodies commanded the applause of his audience. With the great Beethoven looking down upon him, and an exquisite Chickering grand piano before him, we surely looked for some higher inspiration in a pianist equal to any effort in the highest department of his art, so far as mere finger dexterity goes."

But our reporter has a very delicate and severe taste in music, and is not very patient with any below that high-toned and severely classical standard which regulates his own estimate of such performances. Strakosch's concert performances certainly please the great mass of his audiences, and the result of our observation is, that he is the only pianist we have heard who makes a piano at a concert popular or even satisfactory to three fourths of those who attend. The select few of course require something "higher;" but the majority will continue to cheer what Strakosch knows they like.

This reminds us that we must thank the Telegraph for its very cordial notice of our Journal, now commencing a new volume, calling it "the best paper of the kind, not only here but in the world"!

It will be seen by our advertising columns that Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE commences two new classes next week, for pupils on the piano-forte, one for young misses just beginning, and one for advanced pupils. The lady's own musicianship, and patient, faithful and remarkably successful experience in teaching in classes for the two years past, must ensure her plenty of pupils. . . . We ask attention to the card of Mr. NATHAN B. CLAPP, who offers his services as a teacher on the piano. Mr. C. has talent, a high and cultivated musical taste, and has had the advantage of the best influences in his Art at the Conservatoire in Leipzig, from which he returns an accomplished pianist, and a musician with true and worthy notions of his profession. We trust he will not lack inducements to pursue his calling here in his native city.

Advertisements.

MUSICAL SOIRÉES.

OTTO DRESEL

Proposes to give his FOURTH SERIES of FOUR SOIRÉES, At the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, during the months of December, January, February and March, on Saturday evenings to be hereafter specified. Subscription for the Series, in packages of four tickets, $8. Subscription lists may be found at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, and at the music stores.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club,

Respectfully inform the musical public of Boston and vicinity that they will give their usual series of CHAMBER CONCERTS, to take place at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. Packages of eight tickets, to be used at pleasure, $5. Single tickets will be $1 each. Lists will be out in a few days.

MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY.

The Ladies and Gentlemen of this Society are notified that Rehearsals will be resumed on TUESDAY EVENING, Oct. 7th, and continued on each succeeding Tuesday evening, at the Piano-Forte Warerooms of Messrs. Hallett, Davis & Co., No. 409 Washington Street, commencing at 7½ o'clock.

L. H. SOUTHWARD, Esq., Director; W. R. BARCOCK, Pianist. Applications for admission to the Society either as active or privileged members will be received by the undersigned at any rehearsal, or at his place of business, No. 360 Washington St. The practice of the season will embrace the "Imperial Mass" and the "Passion," by HAYDN; the "Last Judgment," by SPOHR; "St. Paul" and "Elijah," by MENDELSSOHN; and several Chorals by BACH.

WILLIAM STUTSON, JR., SECRETARY.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,

FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
Gives instruction on the Piano. . . . Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

BEETHOVEN CONCERT SOCIETY.

It is proposed by the Committee who managed the Orchestral Concerts of the last season to give a series of EIGHT CONCERTS at the Boston Music Hall, during the coming winter, under the name of the "Beethoven Concert Society," provided fifteen hundred sets of tickets shall be subscribed for previous to Oct. 20th.

The Orchestra will consist of at least Fifty Musicians, under the direction of CARL ZERRANN.

Price of Tickets for the Series, to be used at pleasure, $3. Single Tickets, $1.

Subscription Lists may be found at the Music Stores.

NATHAN RICHARDSON, Secretary,
Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

PIANO.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE has the honor to announce that a New Class for Beginners (Young Misses only to be admitted) will be open on Wednesday, Oct. 8th, and another Class for Young Ladies will open on Tuesday, Oct. 7th.

Applications to be made at No. 55 Hancock Street.

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by Mme. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

REMOVAL.

THE Subscribers respectfully beg to inform their friends and the Musical public, that they have removed from 19 South Ninth Street, to their new and elegant Store,
306 CHESTNUT STREET,

Three doors West of Eleventh, where they intend keeping, besides their complete stock of EUROPEAN MUSIC, a large assortment of AMERICAN Publications, PIANOS, VIOLINS, and Musical Merchandise in general.

They respectfully solicit the further support of Dealers, Professors, Seminars, Leaders of Bands, and other persons connected with music, to whom they can offer the advantage of selecting from a stock comprising the Publications of the leading Music Publishers of Europe and the United States.

Our Catalogue of our own Publications may be had on application; also Part I. of our complete Foreign Catalogue of Orchestral Music. The other parts will be ready in a short time.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

306 CHESTNUT STREET.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 1, 1866.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,

Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasias, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 34 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols... $6
" additional volume of smaller works... $3
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols... $6
Haydn's " " 2 vols... $6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office.
ALEX' W. THAYER.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works:

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION, WITH AND WITHOUT ACCOMPANIMENTS,

Edited by CIPRIANI POTTER,

Principal Professor of Harmony and Composition in the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Vol. 1, Airs with Variations,.....	Bound in cloth, $4 88
" 2, Rondos, &c.....	Do do 2 18
" 3, Duets,.....	Do do 4 25
" 4, Piano-Forte Sonatas,.....	Do do 8 75
" 5, Do do.....	Do do 8 75
" 6, Sonatas for Piano and Violin,...	Do do 4 25
" 7, Do do.....	Do do 4 25
" 8, Quartets and Quintets,.....	Do do 8 75
" 9, Trios for Piano, Violin and 'Cello, Do	do 6 00

Each piece in the above volumes is published separately.

The fact of the collection and republication of Mozart's Piano-forte works in the middle of the present century shows that time instead of diminishing, has stamped their excellence and value. They are, indeed, true works of art, as useful as they are beautiful. Out of this school came the memorable artists, Hummel, and J. B. Cramer—players whose fingers expressed the deep feeling of music with which their nature was imbued; and if we may still hope to find their successors among the young, it must be by a train of studies similarly conducted.

Novello's Catalogue No. 4, containing an analytical and thematic index to the above works, to be had gratis at 389 Broadway, or forwarded to address on receipt of one cent postage.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 60 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,

TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,
ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,

BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE.

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,

Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION

PIANO-FORTE,

Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 SCHOOL ST. BOSTON.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$8.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 236.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 2.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

Translated for this Journal.

Robert Schumann's Impressions of various Operas.

THEATRICAL NOTE-BOOK, 1847—50.

BOIELDIEU'S "JOHN OF PARIS."

(May 4, 1847, in Dresden.)

A masterly opera. Two acts, two decorations, two hours in length—all admirably contrived. "John of Paris," "Figaro," and "The Barber," the first comic operas of the world; each mirrors its composer's nation.

Instrumentation (to which my attention now is principally directed) everywhere masterly; the wind instruments, especially the clarinets and horns, treated with partiality, nowhere covering up the vocal melody—the violoncellos effective here and there as independent voices.

The horns ring in a high register, when the voice part lies still higher, very finely and blend with the voice.

MARSCNER'S "TEMLAR AND THE JEWESS."

(May 8, 1847.)

Heard with great enjoyment. The composition here and there lacks repose, not quite clearly instrumented, with a fulness of happily conceived melodies. Considerable dramatic talent—some reminiscences of Weber.

A jewel, which cannot entirely divest itself of its rough exterior.

Treatment of the voice-parts ungrateful and smothered by the orchestra. Too much of the trombones.

The choruses went ludicrously bad; some of them should have produced a greater effect.

In short, after Weber's, the most important German Opera of recent times.

GLUCK'S "IPHIGENIA IN AULIS."

(May 15, 1847.)

Schröder-Devrient, Clytemnestra; Johanna Wagner, Iphigenia; Mitterwurzer, Agamemnon; Tichatschek, Achilles.

Richard Wagner has put the opera upon the stage; costumes and decorations very appropriate. He has also made additions to the music; I thought I heard it here and there. And he has added the conclusion: "Nach Troja. This is decidedly inadmissible. Gluck would perhaps have reversed the process with Richard Wagner's opera; he would have retrenched, cut out.

But what shall I say here of the opera? As long as the world stands, such music will continually come into prominence again; it can never grow old.

A great original artist. Mozart evidently stands upon his shoulders; Spontini copies him often word for word.

The conclusion of the opera again is extremely effective, as in Armida.

RICHARD WAGNER'S TANNHAUSER.

(Aug. 7, 1847.)

An opera not to be dispatched in a few words. Certain it is, it has a touch of genius in it. Were he as melodious a musician, as he is an intellectually gifted one, he would be the man of the age.

Much might be said about the opera, and it deserves it, but I must reserve it to another time.

DONIZETTI'S "FAVORITA."

(Aug. 30, 1847.)

I only heard two acts. Puppet-show music!

C. M. VON WEBER'S "EURYANTHE."

(Sept. 23, 1847.)

We have been transported, as we have not been for long before. The music is still too little known and recognized. It is heart's blood, the noblest he had in him; a piece of his life this opera has cost him, surely. But then he makes himself immortal by the means.

A chain of sparkling jewels from beginning to end. All in the highest degree genial and masterly. How admirably characterized the individuals, especially Eglantine and Euryanthe, and how the instruments ring!—out of the inmost depth they speak to us.

We were quite full of it, and talked it over a long time. The most genial piece in the opera seems to me the duet between Lysiart and Eglantine in the second act. So too the march in the third act in honor of the same; but the crown belongs not to particular parts, but to the whole.

ROSSINI'S "BARBER OF SEVILLE."

(Nov. 1847.)

With Viardot Garcia as Rosina. Ever enlivening, genial music; the best that Rossini ever made. The Viardot makes great variations in the music; scarcely a melody does she leave untrimmed. What a false view of virtuoso freedom! Still it is her best rôle.

AUBER'S "MASANIELLO."

(Feb. 22, 1848.)

The opera of a musical child of luck. The subject has kept it up. The music is indeed too coarse, soulless, and moreover hideously instrumented. Here and there sparks of genius.

WEBER'S "OBERON."

(March 18, 1848.)

Really too lyrical a subject. Also the music is inferior in freshness to other operas of Weber. A slovenly performance.

SPONTINI'S "FERNANDO CORTEZ."

(July 27, 1848.)

Heard it with rapture for the first time.

BEETHOVEN'S "FIDELIO."

(Aug. 11, 1848.)

Bad performance and incomprehensible taking of the tempi by R. Wagner.

CIMAROSA'S "MATRIMONIO SEGRETO."

(June 19, 1849)

In technical respects (counterpoint and instrumentation) thoroughly masterly; but otherwise rather uninteresting, and at last really tedious and empty of all thought.

CHERUBINI'S "WASSERTRAEGER" ("LES DEUX JOURNEES.")

(July 8)

With great delight have heard again for the first time for many years this genial, masterly opera. An excellent Water-carrier in Dall'Aste.

"THE PROPHET," BY GIAC. MEYERBEER.

(Feb. 2, 1850.)

The Piano-Forte.

From the London and Westminster Review, 1839.

"In treating of the piano-forte, in attempting to sketch its history and its capabilities—offering a few brief notices of those masters whose performances have given it new powers, and whose compositions have either founded or sustained its different schools—and separating the legitimate from the illegitimate, the ephemeral from the permanent, the true, in short, from the false—the reviewer is offering the largest contribution in his power to the advancement of chamber music. For in England, where the national character is solitary rather than sociable, and its reserve is strangely mixed up with an impatience of drudgery and research—where the physical facility of throat and finger seems to be denied, such as makes the Italian street-singer vocalize without knowing it, and the German tavern musician place his hands on the bow or the keys in a correct position—the piano-forte will always be the instrument most largely in favor. To play respectably a solo on the violin or violoncello requires a devotion of labor and a self-renunciation, which is not common; while a quartet implies, beyond this, a sedulous union of sundry personages submitting themselves to one presiding head. The flute, it is beginning to be admitted, is so poor an instrument as to be placed almost out of the reach of the higher order of music save in orchestral concert."

"Of the piano-forte—the history of its wood and wire—a few words must be said. The head of the family was perhaps the Psaltery, which, according to Mr. Hogarth, 'consisted of a square box, of small depth, over which was stretched a sounding-board of fir, and on this sounding-board were stretched a set of strings of steel and brass, tuned to the notes of the scale.' The psaltery being played upon with two little rods, was substantially the same as the present street dulcimer. * * * As time wore on, the little rods were discarded, and the psaltery became a clavichord, the feeble and tinkling grandfather of the piano-forte. Contemporary with the clavichord was the virginal, its own cousin, and progenitor of the larger and more complete harpsichord. * * * Early in the eighteenth century, the little octave spinnet, sometimes in its most ancient and triangular form, 'was used to accompany singing in private houses throughout Italy.' * * * The high esteem in which harpsichords were held from the first, may be gathered from the scull and music books which Salvator Rosa (that fiery and versatile genius) condescended to paint on the case of his instrument. * * * But the instrument's worthiest claim to modern respect lies in the fact of its increased capabilities and powers of effect, having called forth the exquisite Passacaglias and Sarabandas, and fugues and Allemandes of Scarlatti."

Such is a brief history of the progress of discovery, which has finally resulted in the present piano-forte, which, however, has received numberless improvements since its first invention, and is doubtless destined to receive many more. From the history of the instrument itself, the reviewer is led to some account of the eminent composers for it, whom he distinguishes into five classes or eras, which we digest and bring together in the following form:

1. The solid, harmonic school, of the first composers, with Sebastian Bach at their head.
2. The expressive, melodic school, at the head of which is Mozart.
3. The school of mere execution, of finger music, brought out by Kalkbrenner.
4. The school of genius, availing itself of all the former schools for working up its own distinct and original conceptions. The first of this school, chronologically, was Clementi.
5. The marvellous or hyper-romantic school, of which Sigismund Thalberg was the first.

We shall follow the reviewer through his notices of these five schools and their principal composers.

1. We have already mentioned SCARLATTI's compositions for the harpsichord. He is "one of the two earliest composers for keyed instruments, whose works are still heard with pleasure, the other being SEBASTIAN BACH." He is the first in whose works "the trammels of the old severe style, originating with the Church, are broken through," and that "with an intrepidity which must have been startling in the composer's day. But the name of Scarlatti has a further interest and significance, as belonging to the last Italian composer for keyed instruments. Since his time, a series of showy solo performers on stringed instruments—in their compositions little stronger than the flimsy but graceful writers of vocal airs of agility or expression for the Farinelli or the Pacchierotti of the hour—is all the contribution made by Italy during the last hundred years, to our enormous stores of orchestral and chamber music; a contribution as worthless as it is meagre."

SEBASTIAN BACH's works are "among music's least mortal possessions." The following are some of the reviewer's remarks upon this great composer.

"Any one who can execute the works of Bach perfectly, must have gained in the course of his study a force, a flexibility, and an equality of finger, which qualify him to attack the most impracticable of the great modern music; any one who can rightly give expression to his subjects, as boldly and beautifully conceived as they are at once strictly and variously brought out, may be trusted to approach the richest melody of Mozart, the loftiest and most dramatic phrase of Beethoven, or the wildest imaginings of Weber. We are not writing for the technical student, and it would therefore be superfluous in us to insist minutely upon the unapproached preëminence gained by Bach in one species of composition—namely, the fugue; to point out by what means he not only understood but sported with secrets merely talked about or awkwardly touched by others; to expatiate upon his preludes, at once strongly-knit and excursive, masculine in their boldness, child-like in their artless freedom. The public of musicians is already sufficiently alive to their rare excellence."

Even Bach himself, however, did not escape the French taste for frippery, which, from Couperin, spread over all Europe. The reviewer goes on:

"And yet, if we compare the piano-forte music of Bach with the harpsichord lessons of Handel, we shall find how infinitely small a portion of obsolete cadences and passages is to be ascribed to Couperin in the works of the former, compared with the no less obsolete roulades and trills and chains of mechanical sequences which the author of 'Otho' and 'Ariadne' borrowed from his mates of the Italian Opera. Each is a patriarch in instrumental writing; but Handel's periwig is the most obtrusive; and whereas Bach never wearies by his manner of descanting upon and amplifying his themes, Handel's instrumental compositions are often spun to a tedious length by contrivances of no greater significance than the modern Rossinian close, so happily compared by Liszt to the 'your humble servant,' with which every letter concludes."

"The august style of writing, carried to perfection by Bach, was maintained by none of his successors. The improvements made in the tone of the clavichord, now become a piano-forte, and the rapid spread of Italian music, alike tempted the composer to attend to pleasing and rhythmical melody, and to neglect those beauties and intricacies of structure, which in feeble hands, degenerate into wearisome formality. If we consult Charles Philip Emanuel Bach's (son of Sebastian Bach) 'Art of Playing the Piano-forte,' we shall find instances of all the modern airs and graces, nay, the very terms, which belong to the free style, and by an exaggeration of which, sentiment becomes affectation, and liberty licentiousness, as a thousand recent instances testify."

Thus Bach and his son prepared the way for the second school of the piano-forte. HAYDN followed, "uniting ancient science to modern melody;" and, so far as this instrument is concerned, should be regarded as falling between the two schools.

2. MOZART stands at the head of the second school.

"His remarkable facility of execution, in which the man kept the promise made by the infant prodigy—his prodigal fancy in extempore performance, the haunting sweetness of his melodies, and his legitimate employment of the daily increasing powers of the piano-forte—whether alone or in combination with other instruments—gave both the man and his music a sudden and extensive influence, totally unprecedented. It was his good fortune to appeal to and touch all classes. The uninstructed were fascinated by such delicious airs, as, till a recent period, had been the singer's exclusive property; the more enterprising among the scientific were enraptured by novel forms of composition and harmonies at once bold and smooth; while there was sufficient evidence of his power over the more rigid and stately forms of music, (as in his Sonata in the style of Handel, his duet fugues, &c.) to satisfy the purists that he had chosen a new path, not out of any disrespect to, or ignorance of, the old one, but from that eagerness of genius, which makes it always, more or less, a discoverer."

"So exquisite a compound of captivating execution, honeyed melody, and science wearing a form alluring rather than repulsive, as Mozart's music displayed, was certain to form the foundation of a school of art; and accordingly, we trace downwards from him a long line of pianists and composers, who reduced his works to principles, on which they formed themselves. Till a better title be found for it, this body may fairly be called the expressive school."

"As contemporaries of Mozart, but lingering far behind, by reason of their feebleness and self-iteration, even in one branch of composition which was common to both, LEOPOLD KOZELUCH and IGNACE PLEYEL may be grouped with him. Their accompanied Sonatas are now all but forgotten; but a student might do worse than familiarize himself with the simpler and more superficial forms of expression, by studying them as early lessons. They may also be thought excellent and natural practice for the hand, by those who have not yet subscribed to the principle of yesterday, which tends to make all the violent extreme positions of the fingers an elementary part of instruction. To this school, too, though possibly immediately influenced by the study of Clementi rather than Mozart, belong DUSSEK and STEIBELT. Each added something to the executive powers of his instrument—the former being of the two the more substantial and dignified, richer in harmony, more sterling in the progression of his passages—the latter being the more airy in his melody, the more picturesque in his general conception, and sometimes the more happily imaginative. * * * The Sonatas of both will form part of the library of every classical scholar."

"A far greater pianist and writer of the Mozart school—we mean JOHN NEPOMUK HUMMEL—is now to be noticed. 'To me,' writes Zelter, 'Hummel is a summary of the piano-forte playing of our time, for he unites, with much meaning and skill, what is genuine and what is new. You are not aware either of fingers or strings; you have music. Everything comes out as sure, and with as much ease as possible, however great the difficulty. He is like a vessel of the worst material, full of Pandora's treasures.'

"It appears to us that Hummel was capable of greater things than he ever achieved—greater things than the natural and delicious melody, never sickly, however sweet, sustained by harmonies rich and choice, and alternated by passages of execution at once brilliant and substantial. For in his grand Fantasia, and in his Sonata in F sharp minor, he so nearly reached that highest possible style of composition, which evidences grandeur of thought as well as of style, as to justify the belief just expressed, that there were powers born with him, of whose existence he had but glimpses of consciousness."

"There are many persons who would have placed another in the post of preëminence just given to Hummel, that other being of course JOHN B. CRAMER. And in one point of view, as an author of Studies, Cramer undoubtedly ranks the higher of the two. Wherever the piano-forte is known as anything better than a machine on which some unwilling child is compelled to hammer out the tunes of the latest new opera—wherever the true uses of the instrument are sought for, and expression made the one thing needful, even in the most complicated and rapid passages—Cramer's Studies have long been consulted and appreciated. The young composer suffered from his too willing co-operation with shops and schools, by which he was led to beat out his powers in manufacturing pretty lessons and fantasias, in which was no fancy; and hence his earlier Sonatas, written in those years of a man's life when art is loved more than money, are among his best works—but still not comparable with those of Hummel which have been cited."

"A name or two remain to be mentioned as having belonged to the expressive school. One of these is WOELFFL's, in his time—that is, about the beginning of the present century—considered as among the most surprising of European pianists. The name FIELD, too, must not be forgotten, as the artist whom we were rich enough to be able to afford to Russia. There is ALOYS SCHMIDT, whose mind is of far stronger fibre than Field's, and whose music is far too little known by those who profess attention to what is classical among us. Here, too, may be placed ONSLOW. None of these masters, however, has added enough of what is striking to the resources of his instrument, or to the student's library of noble thoughts and cunning combinations, to call for detail or analysis, where space is limited, so that a new and more important division of the subject in hand may be entered."

3. We now come to the third school,—“that showy, school, which fashionable executionists have, from time to time, attempted to establish by the legerdemain of their amazing mechanical powers. It will never be wholly deserted, inasmuch as the myriad prefer the false to the true: would rather be seduced than convinced—inasmuch as about two persons in ten, who learn music in England, are endowed with any real capacity for the art, and one in fifty is awakened to any perception of its real objects and bearings.” “Superseding the Sonata, the Rondo now had its turn;—just then, too, Rossini was in the zenith of his splendor, and his melodies, however fascinating on the stage, when sung by a Sontag or a David, could not but exercise an effect, destructive as it was fascinating, upon instrumental composition. Every thing was noise and sparkle and trickery. Though KALKBRENNER began with a better genius, it was presently laid aside for the popular idol, and he preferred to call down thunders of applause by wonderful flights of octaves, his exquisitely and glassy shakes, his brilliant divisions, round and clear comme une chaîne de perles, or his slower melodies meretriciously overlaid with ornament,—to receiving such less noisy but more permanent honors, as would have rewarded the exercise of thought and meditation. In England, at least, Kalkbrenner's music, with the exception of his Studies, is as wholly forgotten, as if he had not in his day been the Thalberg of the concert bill, while in the French capital his name is but sparingly mentioned by the passionate and enthusiastic jeunesse. His execution has been outdone in piquancy by Herz, in elasticity by Döhler, in velocity by Liszt, in delicacy by Chopin, in grandeur by Thalberg;—a fact to be clearly stated as a warning, for the benefit of those who permit themselves to be seduced from what is true and lofty by what is tinsel and superficial. A few other executive artists, far smaller than Kalkbrenner in their intellectual calibre, may be dismissed in his company. CZERNY, whose marvellous facility of covering music paper by the yard, is a weekly astonishment to those who make the tour of such music-shops as supply “schools”; PIXIS, who hid his light under a bushel, much about the time when Sontag quitted the stage, and who now travels Europe with his adopted daughter, Mlle. Francilla; and HERZ, only three years ago an indispensable at every London concert, but who last season was unwilling, unassisted, to risk a benefit entertainment on his own account—sic transit gloria! Before, however, the last named mechanist be passed over for worthier names, justice demands that he should receive such praise as belongs to an ingenious manufacturer of changes on airs—to a melodist, whose original themes have a nerve and piquancy partaking of the best features of ballet music. Nor let this be thought mockery in the place of commendation. Those who can write up to Taglioni and Fanny Elssler,—as Herz among the pianists and Mayseder among the violinists, are exactly calculated to do,—must possess such merit as belongs to elegance and vivacity. Some of the brilliant duetts for piano and violin, in which Herz has written the part for his own instrument, and De Beriot or Lafont that for the violin, may be mentioned as among the most vivacious and effective things of their kind. It is needless once again to point out how the wide circulation of all this music ad captandum, cannot but exercise a depreciating influence upon taste, and perpetuate the reign of what is tawdry and false, and fashionable among those, whom other nurture might have rendered capable of relishing thoughts as well as sounds, and expression yet more than finger-gymnastics.”

[To be continued.]

FAILURE OF ITALIAN OPERA IN NEW YORK.—The Courier and Enquirer makes the following comments on the last of the many fruitless attempts to make Italian Opera support itself at the Academy of Music.

The Academy of Music.—The prospects of the establishment of Italian Opera in New York appear to be no brighter than they were ten years ago. The Academy of Music, a building which—whatever the pretense of the charter by which its proprietors exist as a corporate body—was erected with the sole object of being the home and the permanent home of Italian Opera, is closed and is without a lessee: the only man who has managed it with any semblance of success—MAX MARETZKE—declining to take a lease on the terms prescribed, and no other we believe, and, we must say, we trust, being unwise enough to accept what he refuses. As our readers know, we have not sustained what is called “the popular view” of the opera question. For reasons so often stated that they do not need to be now repeated, we are convinced that no series of operatic performances worthy of anything but hisses, can be given here at the price of fifty cents or seventy-five cents for each admission; that price would not enable a manager to employ artists worth hearing and go through a short season without ruin or dishonesty. For the same reasons, we do not believe that a scale of prices ranging from one dollar to twenty-five cents will sustain a manager through the year. Mr. Maretzek has had a very successful month. But September is of all months in the year the month except August perhaps, in which the New Yorkers who are expected to support the opera are not in New York. The Academy of Music during the past month has been filled with strangers, almost exclusively: and to call the support of an opera house by strangers, the establishment of Italian opera, is an absurdity. It is very true that the opera houses of Europe look to travelers for a considerable part of their receipts; but they do not look to them for their support. In other words the opera would be ‘an institution’ in Paris, London, Vienna, Milan, &c., whether there were travellers or not; and the fact that it is ‘an institution’ in the great capitals of the other hemisphere, is one among the many inducements to visit them. The conductors of the opera there look at home for support, in one shape or another: what the travellers bring is profit. When the Italian Opera is on a similar footing here, then it will be established; and not till then. At present there are not enough people in New York—still less in any other city of the Union—who possess both the taste and the money to support, by the mere purchase of tickets of admission, such an opera company as a New York public now requires. For a poor operatic performance the New Yorkers will not accept: they will not even go and hiss it: they keep their money in their pockets, and stay away—the most ruinous of all courses to a manager, for it does not even get up an excitement. Years must elapse before an opera manager in New York can rely upon the money taken at his doors to pay his rent, and his company, if he ever can depend on that source three years together, either here or elsewhere, which we doubt. Italian Opera is a luxury, a part of the expense of which, over and above what is paid by the public, ever has been, and we believe for years to come must be, borne by a comparatively few enthusiastic devotees of music, or of fashion, or of both. An Italian Opera cannot be sustained from year to year without subscribers; and that these subscribers should have a choice of seats in return for advancing the money by which the opera exists seems only fair; and the outcry about exclusiveness is but a plausible clamor. But, as we understand the matter, the gentlemen who administer the affairs of the Academy of Music go much farther than this. They demand for the subscribers in the first place the interest for their money, in the next, the choice of two hundred and fifty and odd of the best seats in the house, and in the next, the privilege of transferring these seats, with their tickets of admission, to whomsoever they please, either gratuitously, or “for a con-si-de-ra-tion.” A lease of the house on such terms Mr. Maretzek very wisely has refused. The owners of the house have a right to demand what rent for it they please; but if they wish to be considered the worthy upholders of an institution established “for the encouragement of the Art of Music in the United States,” they should be content with a very moderate interest: and they may also reasonably claim the choice of seats, but the price of their tickets of admission, which should be untransferable, should either be paid by them in the current coin of this republic, or else deducted from the rent. This the stockholders as a body should seriously consider; and meantime, while their vast and expensive house stands with closed doors, they may well devote themselves to the careful study of the fable of The Dog and the Shadow.

The Handel Society in London.

In 1843 a number of musical professors met together and instituted a society for the purpose of bringing out a complete and correct edition of all the works of Handel. The editions of Walsh, which appeared during the life-time of the composer, were justly considered imperfect, while those of Arnold were not only full of errors, but contained several remarkable violations of the text. The importance of the undertaking may be imagined from a computation made at the time, that, to carry it out satisfactorily, no less than 12,000 plates would have to be engraved. As the speculation of a music-publisher, it could only be entertained at so vast an outlay that there was little chance of the risk being incurred. As the task of a single editor the impracticability was equally great, the time and labor demanded being far beyond the power of any one professor to bestow, however zealous, competent, and indefatigable. With this persuasion, the originators of the society elected from among themselves a permanent council, with absolute control over its affairs. They limited the number of members to 1000, who, in return for an annual payment of one guinea, should be entitled to a copy of each work produced by the society during the year of subscription. The council was composed of Sir Henry Bishop, the late Dr. Crotch, Sir George Smart, Mr. Moscheles, Dr. Rimbauld, Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, E. T. Hopkins, Henry Smart, and other gentlemen well known to the musical world. Proceedings were commenced with great activity, and in a very short time a vast number of subscribers were obtained, among whom were Her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, the King of Prussia, &c. The council allotted the labor of editing the different compositions to various professors of eminence, who consulted the original manuscripts in Buckingham Palace, and every other available source, for the purpose of emending and perfecting the text. The works were produced in full score, with a condensed adaptation to the instrumental parts for the piano or organ. The first publication included the Anthems for the Coronation of George II., edited by Dr. Crotch. Next, in close succession, came the Allegro, Penseroso, and Moderato (Mr. Moscheles), Esther, an oratorio (Mr. Lucas), Ode for St. Cecilia's Day (Mr. Mudge), Israel in Egypt (Dr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy), Dettingen te Deum (Sir George Smart), Acis and Galatea (Mr. Sterndale Bennett), Belshazzar, an oratorio (Mr. Macfarren), and The Messiah (Dr. Rimbauld). A strange oversight was made by the council in connexion with Israel in Egypt. Mendelssohn expressed a wish to compose additional accompaniments for that oratorio, as Mozart had done for The Messiah and Alexander's Feast; but, being overruled, he merely added a free organ part, and thus the council of the Handel Society entailed a loss upon the world which death has since made irreparable. There was the less excuse for this, since, subsequently, Dr. Rimbault printed the accompaniments of Mozart, in his edition of the Messiah, in small type, to distinguish them from the score of Handel. Notwithstanding the auspicious beginning made by the Handel Society, a relaxation of zeal, or some other antagonistic influence caused the subscription list gradually to decrease, until, at a meeting of the council, it was finally agreed that the society should be dissolved; and the plates of the works already published handed over to the firm of Cramer, Beale, and Co., with the condition that they should accept the liabilities of the society, and carry out the original scheme. The chamber duets and trios, composed by Handel, have just been added to the catalogue, under the new superintendence. These very interesting works were written by Handel in 1711, at Hanover, expressly for the study of the Electoral Princess; the words were provided by the Abbate Mauro Hortensio. Mr. Henry Smart the editor, has performed his task with consummate ability, and, in his independent accompaniment for the piano-forte, has imitated Handel's style with great success. There yet remains, we believe, enough for another book of chamber duets, including the four, to Italian words, which the great composer afterwards reproduced, in a more developed form as choruses, ("His yoke is easy," "And He shall purify," "For unto us a child is born," and "All we like sheep," in the "Messiah.") The style in which the present volume is brought out proves that Messrs. Cramer and Beale are disposed to follow with scrupulous fidelity the plan of the originators of the Handel Society. The publication merits encouragement, as one of the most important, interesting and costly connected with the art of music.—Times, 1852.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Dancing Pages.

On the evening of the 16th June 1854, being the next after that of "Corpus Domini," I went with several friends to the Cathedral of Seville to see a most extraordinary spectacle, of which I have never met with any account in print nor ever heard mention by travellers. It was just at twilight, and the vast cathedral was lit only by the blaze of candles on and about the high altar, and a few lights in sconces hung against the nearest columns, which served but "to make darkness visible"—and the long aisles grander and more mysterious. The solemn tones of the organ added greatly to the effect, and fitly gave voice to the feelings of the devout among the crowd who knelt or stood about the Altar. As the last sounds died away, the Archbishop in gorgeous robes of state ceremonial, entered the space before the Altar, which is shut off from the body of the Cathedral by an iron grating. Attended by a body of priests he took his station on the right hand, while opposite him, on the left, a small orchestra of twenty or thirty musicians with stringed instruments, horns, bassoons, and clarinets, was arranged, leaving a vacant space between them. Then appeared from either side of the altar ten boys dressed as pages, in doublets of white satin, striped with red, with plumed velvet hats upon their heads, and with castanets in their hands. Advancing into the vacant space, they at a given signal began to dance a stately minuet, singing with the accompanying orchestra. Then followed a bolero, in which the castanets played an important part, and which they executed with perfect grace, still singing and dancing as the Jews before the Ark of the Covenant. This is the theme of the bolero, which I noted down on my return to the house.

Anything more strange and theatrical cannot be conceived. The vast cathedral, the blazing altar, the priests and cardinals, the dancing boys in their quaint and charming costume, the kneeling crowd, and as a back ground the long dim aisles fading away into the black darkness, combined to produce an ensemble never to be forgotten. All grew spectral and like a dream as one by one the lights were extinguished, and we wended our way back to the streets filled with the crowd thronging its way homewards. Every evening for a week, the dancing was repeated at the same hour, and with the same strange ceremonies, and we went again and again to make sure that we had really seen with our bodily eyes so unusual and striking a spectacle.

The cathedral is at all hours a marvel of beauty—but at no hour more wondrous, than just towards sunset, when the rays of light pour through the painted windows, tinting the marble pavement with rainbow hues, and faintly struggling against the gloom gathering slowly in the far off corners of the edifice. A few kneeling figures, here and there, the beggar in his rags, side by side with the high born lady, over whose form the mantilla of rich black lace falls in graceful folds, equal in God's sight and in his temple, lend a living interest to the scene: and cold must be the heart which is not touched with devotional feeling, and dead the imagination which does not kindle with aspirations towards a better and a more spiritual life, while the eye is privileged to gaze upon the wonders of that most glorious of Gothic Minsters, the Cathedral of Seville. VIATOR.

Haydn's "Passion."

As this notable work is among the pieces announced for practice this winter by one of our societies, (the Mendelssohn Choral,) the following review from the Quarterly Musical Review, published in London (1828) may be of interest to many of our readers:

Haydn's Passione, or "Seven last words," with a separate Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-forte, arranged from the full Score, by V. Novello. London.

Those who have witnessed the solemn ceremonies of the Catholic religion, can but be aware that much of their impressiveness on the feelings is made through the imagination, and as the music corresponds with the devotions it accompanies in character, it can but be regarded with the same emotions. The Messiah requires no assistance from external circumstances to heighten its effect, but of Mozart's Requiem (as fine a composition, perhaps, in another style,) no adequate idea can be formed, unless it is heard on an occasion similar to that for which it was written. Thus it is difficult to judge of the work before us without the concurrence of "place and circumstance;" nor indeed can it fairly be done without fully considering the peculiar occasion for which it was composed. That this may be fully understood, we quote Haydn's own preface, a translation of which is prefixed to Mr. Novello's edition of the "Passione."

"It is about fifteen years ago since I was applied to by a clergyman in Cadiz, who requested me to write the instrumental music to the seven words of Jesus on the cross.

"It was then customary every year in Lent to perform an oratorio in the cathedral at Cadiz, the effect of which the following arrangements contributed not a little to heighten. The walls, windows, and columns of the church were hung with black cloth, and only one large lamp, hanging in the centre, lighted the solemn and religious gloom. At noon all the doors were closed, and the music began.

"After a prelude suited to the occasion, the bishop ascended the pulpit and pronounced one of the seven words, which was succeeded by reflections upon it. As soon as these were ended, he descended from the pulpit and fell on his knees before the altar. This pause was filled by music. The bishop ascended and descended again a second, a third time, and so on, and each time the orchestra filled up the intervals in the discourse.

"My composition must be judged on a consideration of these circumstances. The task of writing seven adagios, each of which was to last about ten minutes, to preserve a connection between them, without wearying the hearers, was none of the lightest, and I soon found that I could not confine myself within the limits of the time prescribed."

The difficulty of such an attempt was indeed enormous; a subject more extraordinary, more awful, or more sublime, for the inspirations of genius, could not have been found. It appears to us that the task was better suited to the vast and various powers of Handel, than to the milder feeling and more polished style of Haydn, although we are apprehensive that many of the followers of the ancient faith may perhaps differ with us in this opinion. Haydn has, with his usual method and uniformity of design, laid down a plan for the Passione, from which he has never swerved, and which has consequently ensured to his work a clearness and perspicuity that is doubly advantageous, since it almost ensures its certain impression and easy comprehension, both as a composition and as a performance. It must, however, be recollected it was first made for instruments alone, and that the voice parts were added at a subsequent period. Thus, in its original shape, it must be considered as addressing the feelings in a totally different language to that used when words affix definite ideas, and lead the hearers along in a given train. Upon such an occasion as the present, all the great and little differences that subsist between music and language must be brought to mind and allowed for. From the power possessed by the words of presenting definite ideas, its impressions are instant, distinct, and vivid; mere melody and harmony being unendowed with such absolute means, are constrained to draw their effects from resources less distinct. It would be impossible to add to the impression produced on the mind by the simple words of our Savior on the cross; Haydn has therefore merely adapted to each one characteristic harmony, and has then allowed his fancy to work its will, in portraying the varied feelings created by each sentence, which, by the spell of association alone, act sufficiently on the feelings to awaken such emotions as the composer loves to heighten by the powers of his art, and thus he has called into action all the secret springs of harmony, of which he alone possessed the impulse; and whilst parts of the composition may at first be thought to breathe too light a strain, it must be recollected, that adapting such words to music is like translating from a strong into a softer language. The original ideas may be expanded, and perhaps softened or refined, but the feeling is the same, put in a form congenial to its new vehicle.

A deep contrast between languor and force is the leading trait in the introduction, and induces the inference that the composer moulded his inspirations on the sufferings and the majesty of the Redeemer. The first largo, after the first word, Padre celeste, partakes of the same character; the words are adapted with exquisite feeling, and the construction of the parts combines strength with sweetness; and simplicity has been the composer's aim in the second movement, Tu di grazia sei sorgente, supported by the charms of melody. The first bar of the subject is one, however, from the Benedictus of Mozart's Requiem, even to the accompaniment, and the resemblance is preserved in the character of the air throughout. This analogy is curious, inasmuch as it proves the occasional concurrence of great minds, for the character of the two compositions is the same throughout. No. 8, Vergin Madre, is exquisitely tender in parts; a splendid transition takes place at page 23, bar 6, in perfect consonance with one of those minute shades of feeling which music has by this means a power of developing above that of language. This beautiful movement is also distinguished by one of those peculiarities that so perceptibly marks the style of the composer. One of the most expressive passages, (page 20, bar 6) begins in a manner that would lead us to anticipate something of what we should denominate Haydn's prettiness, but it instantly afterwards, by a delicate transition unexpected by the ear, alters its whole character, and takes the heart as well as the ear by surprise. This little manœuvre has evidently pleased the composer; it is often repeated, but is of a kind never to tire. At the last bar of page 18, there is, as appears to us, a slight defect, whether of the original score or the arranger we cannot tell; most probably of the former. It is the introduction of the D and B by the accompaniment before it is taken by the voices. The repetition weakens the force of the passage, which by its very nature is intended for the voice; and there is too wide a contrast between the treble sustaining the E against the instruments or organ without other support. This movement, however, is a perfect gem, bright from the mines of its creator, for its subject is particularly adapted to Haydn's style, and he has treated it with proportionate care. No. 5, Perche m'hai derelitto? is a splendid movement in F minor, and its greatest beauty consists in the solidity of its style, and the mystery which by means of modulation it is made to express, whilst at the same time a beautiful melody is maintained, which keeps up the interest. The accompaniments and intervening symphonies are exquisite.

A symphony for wind instruments is next interposed, of which it is impossible to judge without the score; but we depend on the word of the arranger, who, in a note, states it to be "a perfect model of masterly counterpoint and refined scoring." It cannot perhaps be better compared as a composition than to Haydn's own "Chaos," with which it ranges in equal companionship.

The whole construction and development of No. 5, Gesu sciamava, is perfect. The two opposite feelings of horror and supplication are combined and contrasted with the most exact discrimination and the nicest sensibility. The whole subject is contained in a few notes, yet it is developed in so masterly a manner that it is never monotonous, but acts with more certainty on the feelings from its very condensation. Thus the effect of confining the words "Gesu sciamava" to the tenor as a solo, and the simplicity of the passage is awfully splendid. No. 6, Consummatum est, is scarcely so intense as the rest; perhaps Haydn would have done well to have sacrificed his melody to the awful sublimity of his subject. The movement is characteristic, but not sufficiently so. No. 7, Nella tua mano, Signor, is also a little too florid. The Luom dio mori, with the earthquake, depends for effect on the orchestra. The chorus can only assist in that effect by the power which the combination of a number of voices bestows.

Splendid as the "Passione" really is, we cannot consider it as the finest of Haydn's works, in which light it stands, we believe, throughout Germany. It appears to us that the subject is of too awful a nature for the peculiar character of his mind. His intellect was of too refined a texture to be capable of encountering and developing an incident of such towering sublimity; one which stands alone in the history of the world, and would almost seem to require a corresponding elevation in the mind which would attempt its treatment. The "Passione" does not affect the feelings with the awful, irresistible solemnity of The Messiah, the Requiem, or even with the grateful emotion of its composer's own Creation. Yet in such a work the effect should be instantaneous and certain. Still it is a masterpiece, and the lovers of Haydn will recognize in it all his purity of harmony and unity of design, and welcome it as a substantial support, if not the most splendid of those raised by the genius to the fame of its immortal composer.

Music Abroad.

England.

BIRMINGHAM.—On the 2d and 3d of September a festival was held here for the inauguration of a new music hall. There appears to be a rage for splendid new halls and new organs in the larger towns of England lately. The excuse for the new one in Birmingham, where there already existed one so famous, is thus set forth in the Times:

The committee of the great hall in which the Birmingham Triennial Festival (the grandest periodical music-meeting in Europe) is accustomed to be held, with a view to the especial interests of the General Hospital, on behalf of the funds of which the festival is given, rather discourage than promote the frequent performance of oratorios and other great music works depending for effect upon the congregation of masses. They believe, or profess to believe, that if oratorios were often produced during the interval of the festivals, they would lessen the attraction of the triennial celebrations, and so militate against the just expectations of their noble charity. Thus, while Birmingham possesses one of the finest music-halls in the world, and is essentially a musical town, it enjoys fewer opportunities of offering musical treats to its inhabitants than either Liverpool or Manchester. The Festival Committee, who are also the committee of the General Hospital, will not let their hall (where the immortal Elijah was first presented to the world) for any performances whatever, except those in which they are themselves immediately concerned. Even their organ, a work of more than ordinary magnitude, is dedicated almost exclusively to the use of their own organist, who instituted the cheap Monday concerts, in which the attraction consists for the most part in his own playing. But the Birmingham people are notably a musical people, and consider that a festival on a large scale once in three years is not enough. A committee of gentlemen amateurs of music was therefore instituted some time since with the object of breaking up the monopoly of the Festival despots, and this resulted in the project of a new and spacious music-hall, at which oratorios or miscellaneous concerts might be given to the Birmingham public as often as convenient or necessary. The hall being completed, it was of course desirable to "inaugurate" it in an appropriate manner, and an engagement was contracted with Mr. ALFRED MELLON to get up a series of performances in honor of the occasion.

The "Messiah" was performed on the first day, and on the second the "Elijah." The orchestra (Mr. Alfred Mellon's Orchestral Union) numbered between 50 and 60; the chorus, chiefly local, hardly exceeded 100 voices. The principal singers, like the orchestra and chorus, were all English: Mme. Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, Messrs. Thomas, Montem and Sims Reeves. The solos and the orchestra are highly praised, but the choruses "left much to desire." There were miscellaneous concerts in the evenings, in which were performed Beethoven's Symphony in C, (No. 1); the "Tell" Overture; Fra Diavolo ditto; Der Freyschütz and Zampa ditto; Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Solos on the new organ, by Mr. Simms; Extracts from Costa's "Eli," and a variety of vocal pieces from Mozart, Haydn, Weber, Donizetti, Verdi, Hatton, Wallace, &c. &c.

GLOUCESTER.—The annual meeting of the three choirs of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester commenced Sept. 9th, and lasted three days.

The preliminary arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Amott, organist of the Cathedral, who also conducted the musical performances. The programme, although exhibiting little variety or novelty, was, on the whole, good. The principal vocalists included Mesdames Clara Novello, Viardot Garcia, Clara Hepworth, Locke, Temple and Alboni; Messrs. Locke, Weiss, Thomas, Gassier and Sims Reeves. The orchestra and chorus comprised in all 300 players; leaders, Messrs. Blagrove and Salnton; organist, Mr. Townshend Smith (of Hereford Cathedral); accompanist, Mr. Done (of Worcester Cathedral).

The festival opened as usual with a full cathedral service, including a voluntary on the organ, anthems by Handel and by Mendelssohn, the Process and Responses of Tallis, &c. "Elijah" was performed on the second morning, after a service of old English music; and on the third morning, Haydn's "Creation," Mozart's "Requiem," selections from "St. Paul," and the following miscellany:

Air—Mme. Novello, "Let the bright Seraphim;" Chorus—"Let their celestial concerts," Handel... Duet—Mrs. Hepworth and Mr. Reeves, "Forsake me not," Spohr. Air and Chorus—Mr. Weiss, "Qui tollis," Haydn. Duet—Mesdames Novello and Viardot, "Quis est homo," Rossini. Recitative and Air—Mr. Sims Reeves, "Deeper and deeper still;" Air—Mrs. Hepworth, "Farewell, ye limpid springs," Handel. Duet—Mme. Viardot and Mr. Reeves, "Te ergo," Graun. Chorus—"Hallelujah," (Mount of Olives,) Beethoven.

There were miscellaneous concerts each evening. The gem of the first was Alboni's splendid singing of the air, Deh per questo, from Mozart's Tito. The whole first part of that concert consisted of selections from Mozart's operas. Then followed the finale to Mendelssohn's Loreley, in which Mme. Novello took the solos of Leonora; and then the usual kind of miscellany of glees and operatic pieces. The programme of the second concert was as follows:—

PART I.—Overture, Der Freyschütz, Weber; Madrigal, "Down in a flow'ry vale," Festa; Aria, "Casta Diva" (Norma) Bellini; Trio, "Quanto a quest' alma," Rossini; Aria, "Deh vieni," Mozart; March and Chorus, "Crown ye the altars," Beethoven; Cavatina, "Ah, quel giorno," Rossini; Concertante, for two violins (No. 2), Spohr; Duetto, "Lasciami! non t' ascolto," Rossini.

PART II.—Symphony (No. 3), Haydn; Ballad, "I wake," Bergenswold; Duet, "Amor! possente nome," Rossini; Song, "The Village Blacksmith," Weiss; Song, "I love my little native Isle," F. Mori; Duet, "Di capricci," Rossini; Ballad, "Bonnie Jean," Linley; Glee, "Summer Eve," Hatton; Aria, "In questo semplice," Donizetti; Quintetto, "Sento, oh Dio," (Cosi fan tutti), Mozart.

BRADFORD.—As a sample of organ concerts in England we may mention one lately given at St. George's Hall, by Mr. W. T. BEST, of Liverpool. The organ performances were varied with vocal Selections by the Bradford Choral Union. The audience numbered upwards of 1600 persons. Mr. Best has engaged to give four similar concerts. The following was the programme:

PART I.—Organ Concerto, No. 2, Handel. Romanza, from Symphony, "La Reine de France," Haydn. Choral March, Becker, by the Bradford Choral Union. Fuga (F major), W. T. Best. Air with variations, Rode. Part Song, "Where's the gain of restless care," L. de Call, by the Bradford Choral Union. Wedding March, Mendelssohn.

PART II.—Overture (Preciosa), Weber. Part Song, "Go speed thy flight, sweet evening breeze," Otto, by the Bradford Choral Union. Andante, from Symphony in C minor, Beethoven. Prelude and Fuga (E major), J. S. Bach. War Song, "The banners wave, the drums are beating," Kücken, by the Bradford Choral Union. Chorus, "May no rash intruder," Handel. The Nightingale Chorus—Solomon. Grand Offertoire, (No. 3, op. 35) Lefebure Wely.

Paris.

THE OPERAS.—(Corres. of London Mus. World.)—As the summer wanes and the autumn sets in, the musical season here begins to exhibit some indication of life. For a long time nothing has occurred at any of the lyric theatres worth calling your attention to. The reprise of Guillaume Tell at the Grand-Opéra has been the latest novelty; but the reproduction of Rossini's greatest work has not proved as successful as was anticipated from the immense pains and time expended on it. The fault is principally owing to the cast, which does not comprise one great name. M. Gueymard, as Arnold, has entirely failed to recall one reminiscence of Nourrit or Duprez, and sings the music very indifferently. Moreover, the Parisians will never forgive him for not being able to sing the ur de poitrine in the "Suivez moi," which he most wisely did not even attempt. Besides, all the music of the original score is not restored, as was promised, so that the real musical public are disappointed and offended. The scenery, however, is splendid, and the ballets most admirable, which, with a band and chorus almost beyond reproach, goes far to conciliate the audience. Auber's Cheval de bronze, with new recitatives and ballet music, is about to be put into rehearsal. I have no doubt that it will prove even more successful at the "Grand" than the "Comique" Opera. The Cheval de Bronze I always considered one of the composer's most delightful works. At the Italiens, the most lively preparations are being made for the re-opening next month. M. Calzado has already enlisted a numerous and powerful company, including the following artists:—Mesdames Alboni, Piccolomini, Prezzolini, Fiorentini, Gambardi, Dell' Anese, Martini, Valli; Signors Mario, Carrion, Luchesi, Graziani, Nerini, Angelini, Mathieu, Ballestra, Solieri, Cuturi, Rossi, Zucchini, Soldi, and Corsi. Several of these names, are unknown to me, but I cannot refrain from pointing to that of Signor Corsi, who has long been considered one of the most eminent barytones in Italy, and I am certain will be much liked in certain parts. He is something in Ronconi's serious line. Mario and Piccolomini will not arrive until November, M. Calzado having extended their leave for one month. Signor Bottesini is reinstated as conductor. It is affirmed that Signor Verdi has made a large demand for permission to play the Traviata and other of his operas at the Italiens. M. Calzado has thought proper to refuse, and intends bringing out the Traviata on his own responsibility leaving it to the composer to prove his claim by law. The reprise of the Prophète and the début of Madame Borghi Mamo as Fides comes off to-night (Thursday) Sept. 18.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 11, 1856.

NEW VOLUME.—Our number of last week, Oct. 4, commenced a new half-yearly volume. The month of October too is properly the commencement of the academic year in music; it is the beginning of the musical "season." We shall be happy therefore to receive the names (and dollars) of as many new subscribers as desire a weekly paper, which shall keep them "posted up" in musical matters, and aid them to discern and to appreciate what is true and worthy amid so much that is pretentious and false. Give us a large subscription list this winter, and we will make your paper doubly worth it.

[We can furnish one and one only complete set of the Journal of Music bound; for which of course we must charge an extra price.—With the exception of two numbers only, (which occur in Vols. V. and VI.) we can furnish volumes bound or unbound of the Journal from the commencement. Also single numbers.

Thalberg.

The great pianist, so many times expected, is at last actually in New York. He arrived by the steamer last week, with the indefatigable Ullman for his business agent, and will commence a series of concerts there upon the 20th; after which he will of course visit Boston and the other cities of the Union. His presence will be something of an event in our musical world. We shall all of course be eager to hear one of the two most celebrated masters of the modern virtuoso school of pianism. With the exception of LISZT, no name has stood so prominent, so long, as THALBERG. Liszt has long since retired from the arena, in which he was always crowned and always excited the wonder of the crowd; he has abandoned solo-playing in public, and taken to composing and to bringing out the great ensemble pieces of the masters, and to playing patron to new aspirants for the honor of original composers. It must be ten years, too, since Thalberg closed his concert career, to which he now returns in a new country. Thalberg was the founder of this whole virtuoso school. It was he who first undertook to overcome the short-comings of the piano-forte by wonderful rapidity and wide grasp of execution. It was he who first made the piano speak through the whole length of its keyboard like an orchestra, letting the melody sing distinctly in the middle or tenor region, accompanied at once by a deep bass and a perfect aurora borealis of swift, flickering arpeggios above.

Many of us remember the time when HERZ, with his light arabesque prettinesses, in the shape of variations upon well-known airs, was the wonder of the age; for it is ever the few who know the deeper charm and inspiration of real master works of genius, like the Sonatas of BEETHOVEN. Herz came to America after his day had passed in Europe, and after even our ears had become accustomed (through the hands of skilful followers) to the then astonishing fantasias by Thalberg, with whose name all reports of concerts in England, France and Germany were filled. We all recollect the wonder and delight with which we first listened to the stately symmetry, the broad architectural splendor of his Fantasia upon "Moses in Egypt," with the light blaze of arpeggi accompanying the Prayer. It was, if we remember rightly, at the first concert given in our city by the elder of the brothers RACKEMANN, about the year 1839, who was the first to introduce us to the New School piano compositions—to THALBERG, LISZT, HENSELT, DOEHLER, CHOPIN, &c., although it is almost a sin to class a pure star of genius like the last with lights that must prove so much more ephemeral. Since then Thalberg has been played to us by all the brilliant concert pianists, who have visited these shores, and finally by not a few young rising virtuosos who were born among us. So far as it is possible to know Thalberg by his compositions, interpreted to us as they have been, not unskilfully, although at second hand, our musical public is pretty well acquainted with the style and nature of the man. We know his music, that is, we are familiar with those pieces of his by which he has been most known everywhere, and which he still chooses to make 'the chevaux de bataille of his concerts. We have heard Jaell, and Satter, and Heller, and Strakosch, and Mason, and we know not how many more, perform his Fantasias on Moise, Don Juan, Lucia and Les Huguenots—pieces which exhibit his chief power as an arranger, translator (traductor) and embellisher of operatic themes and scenes for the piano solo. And we have heard those gentler, less pretending pieces, like his Andante Tremolo, and some of his Nocturnes, in which there is a certain poetry and delicacy of feeling, something like original creation. It only remains now to hear them from his own hands, from the fingers of their creator, and of the, in many respects, first executive pianist of the world. For if he have not all the energy the fantastic boldness, the singular magnetism of Liszt, he is without his faults of questionable eccentricity. There is a symmetry, repose and clearness in his style, corresponding, it is said, with the gentlemanly ease and quietness of the whole man. Music, which owes its peculiarity of structure so entirely to the wants of the performer in connection with his instrument, ought surely to be heard at first hand, as the composer-player renders it, to give a perfect idea of its beauty. And this opportunity we shall soon have.

Besides his Fantasias, Nocturnes, Etudes, Waltzes, Impromptus, &c., Thalberg has composed in larger forms, Concertos, a Trio for piano, violin and cello, and more recently an Opera in four acts, Florinda, of which some account may be found in this Journal for Sept. 2, 1854. It is his intention, as we understand, to give quite a number of concerts in New York, commencing on the 20th of this month; and he will play almost exclusively his own compositions, including those with which we are familiar, as the Moise and Don Juan fantasias, the Andante, &c. The repertoire also contains his Trio, a Concerto by Beethoven, and one or two other classical pieces. Would it not be a fine thing for us here in Boston to hear him play that Beethoven Concerto, under the statue of Beethoven, in one of the grand orchestral concerts of the "Beethoven Concert Society"? Let us hope.

We shall be better able to speak of Thalberg hereafter. Meanwhile we commence copying on another page a good historical classification of the noted composers for the piano, written some years since by Mr. CHORLEY, which will help us somewhat to station the new-comer; and we place here an abstract, which we once made for another purpose, from the sketch of him in M. Fétis's Universal Biography of Musicians.

Sigismund Thalberg, the celebrated pianist, was born at Geneva, January 7, 1812. At an early age he was taken to Vienna, where his musical education commenced. He is said to have received lessons from Sechter and from Hummel; but M. Fétis, states that Thalberg himself denied this, as well as the assertion that he acquired his talent by indefatigable labor. At the age of fifteen he began to excite attention in saloons and concerts. At sixteen he published his first works, now regarded by himself as trifles, but in which there are indications of the peculiar style which he has since developed. One who knows Thalberg as he has since become, both as pianist and as composer, says M. Fétis, will find it interesting to examine his "Mélange sur les thèmes d'Euryanthe," (op. 1.) his fantasia on a Scotch air, (op. 2.) and his impromptu on motives from the "Siege de Corinthe," (op. 3.) which appeared at Vienna in 1828. Two years after this he made his first visit to England to give concerts. The journals of that day are full of him. He had written for this tour a concerto, (op. 5;) but it was not for this speciality that his talent fitted him; the constraint of the classical form and of the orchestra was too much for him. His thoughts then turned to the development of the sonorous power of the piano; to the combinations of various effects; and, above all, to a novelty of which the invention properly belongs to him. The old school of pianists was divided into two principal categories; namely, the brilliant pianists, such as Clementi and his pupils, and the harmonists, such as Mozart and Beethoven. Each of these schools was subdivided into several shades. Thus Dussek, by his national instinct, tended to the harmonic school, although he wrote incorrectly, and must be considered one of the brilliant pianists. Kalkbrenner afterwards followed the same direction. On the other hand, Hummel, and then Moscheles, pianists of the harmonic school, gave more of brilliancy to their compositions than did Mozart and Beethoven. But in both schools we remark that song and harmony on the one hand, and the brilliant traits on the other, are always separated, and that these two elements of piano-forte music only appear one by one in turn, and in an order nearly symmetrical. In the brilliant passages of these two schools it is the scales that predominate; the arpeggi appear only at long intervals, and almost always in the same forms. In the singing and harmonious passages, if the two hands are brought together they occupy but one side of the key board; if they are widely separated they leave a void between them; the harmony is not filled up. Such was the state of piano playing when Thalberg conceived the idea of uniting song and harmony and brilliant passages in one, instead of letting them alternate with one another by a sort of formula. He sought to make the whole key board speak at once throughout its entire compass, leaving no void in the middle. This thought, gradually matured and developed, led him to the discovery of a multitude of ingenious combinations of the figures, whereby the song or melody could always be heard strongly accented in the midst of rapid arpeggi passages and very complicated forms of accompaniment. In this new system the scales ceased to be a principal part in the brilliant piano music; different forms of arpeggi took their place; the fingering was greatly modified; and the frequent passage of the thumb became its essential characteristic. It was by means of the thumb, taken alternately in the two hands, that the melody established itself in the centre of the instrument.

In 1830 Thalberg made an artistic tour through Germany. In 1834 he accompanied the Austrian Emperor Ferdinand, as pianist to the imperial chamber, to Toplitz, to the meeting of his sovereign with the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia. There his playing awakened warm interest. But his true European fame dates from his success in Paris during his first visit there in the latter part of the year 1835. Since then he has made frequent tours in France, Belgium, England, Russia and Germany; and everywhere the precision, delicacy, and finish of his playing, the beautiful sound which he draws from his instrument, the brilliant effects which he combines, and the individual charm which he has put into his musical forms, have excited a general enthusiasm. These forms, imitated by most of the new school pianists in their compositions, or rather their arrangements of themes from the operas, have become the fashion of nearly all the piano music of our time.

CONCERTS.

Mlle. PARODI has continued her concerts through a second week, to close this evening. The audiences have been always large and the appetite, as indicated by encores, insatiable. Indeed, repetitions have been not the exception but the rule—the unjust rule of a half-musical majority, fatiguing to artists, and to the really musical minority.

We heard the concerts of Saturday and Tuesday. The former opened with a baritone aria by Mercadante, from Zaira, one of the most pleasing concert pieces of the kind which we have heard for some time, and the better for being new to most of us. Sig. BERNARDI sang it in his usually chaste manner, with rich, sonorous, manly voice, to which we find it a pleasure to listen. PAUL JULIEN played De Beriot's "Tremolo," that is to say, his violin fantasia on that solemn slow movement from Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," and he played it admirably. Mlle. PARODI sang the great song of Fides from "The Prophet": Ah! mon fils! The quieter portions of it sounded finely with her rich, large voice; but she overstepped the bounds of euphony, of music, in some of those passionate outbursts, betraying a tendency to overdo things by sheer physical energy. How different from the chaste, refined style of LAGRANGE! Sig. TIBERINI gave us Mozart's Il mio tesoro, not much a la MARIO to be sure, but yet creditably as to execution and expression; and one could take pleasure in the music itself and thank him for it. His voice grows upon us, but sounds better in simpler melody and in declamatory passages than in any thing so florid. PARODI sang Com'è bello from "Lucia," effectively in the main, beautifully in parts, but still wounding the ear and breaking the spell at times by a harsh loud high note. M. STRAKOSCH tickled the ears and dazzled the sensuous imagination of the crowd by "Musical Rockets" on the Grand Piano, whose tones he knows how to bring out in all their sonorousness and brilliancy and sweetness. His pretty showpieces do indeed belong to the category of musical fireworks; but the superb sweep and grandeur of the rocket we hardly found in this case. The Trio from Lucrezia Borgia was very finely sung by all three artists, and produced great effect. Of course repeated.

The Second Part opened with a French Romanza, from Halévy's L'Eclair, sung by Sig. BERNARDI. Edgardo died again in TIBERINI's sweet and die-away tenor. PARODI called forth roars of laughter by her romping "Rataplan,"—a clever piece of vocal tom-foolery. PAUL JULIEN played an ingenious fantasia by Allard, on themes from La Favorita, delighting by his exquisite execution, his firm, pure violin tone, his faultless truth of intonation, and graceful mastery of all points of expression. The concert closed with Martini's "Laughing" Trio, so long familiar in English. Parodi's laugh was of rather a forced order and not the most refined.

On Tuesday evening (first of the extra series) the young Paul played one of De Beriot's fine Concertos admirably well, and made the "Carnival of Venice" as grotesque and humorous as almost any one. Sig. BERNARDI made that hacknied baritone air from the "Trovatore": Il Balen, &c., sound better than we yet have heard it, and gained still more upon appreciative listeners by his dignity and truth of manner in the Trio from Attila and the Barcarole from Don Sebastian. Sig. TIBERINI gave us real pleasure in his twice singing of Mozart's O caro imagine, from the "Magic Flute." It was rendered with delicacy and with fervor. As before, he was less successful with Spirto gentil, still employing unmeaning echoes and other far-fetched bravura. Mlle. PARODI pleased us more than in any other piece this time by her large, simple, truthful and expressive delivery of Mendelssohn's "Jerusalem, thou that killest," &c. The singer seemed to subordinate herself to the noble and deep-feeling music. Her declamation of the Marseillaise was powerful, splendid as far as voice and physical energy go, but not imaginative in a high sense, not poetic and inspired; although it took hugely with the multitude. She sang it well, but we had rather hear RACHEL sing it badly. The trios were the well-known one from Attila, which went finely, and that coarse laughing piece again.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The subscription list for the Eight Orchestral Concerts of the BEETHOVEN CONCERT SOCIETY grows from day to day. Do not forget that it absolutely requires a pledged subscription of fifteen hundred sets of tickets, at the very low price of three dollars, to make it safe or possible to give the concerts at all. Certainly our musical public will feel it to be a great mistake, a calamity, if they lose them by any want of alacrity in subscribing. Our love of great instrumental music is now distinctly put to the test. After November, when the weight of long political anxiety shall be somewhat lifted from us, will there not be comfort in the Fifth Symphony? Shall we not rush to great orchestral music as one rushes from hot streets in dog-days to the sea-shore?

The great organ for the Music Hall is no longer a matter of uncertainty. At a late meeting of the Directors, it was finally determined that, the conditions prescribed by the stockholders having been complied with, a contract may now be made, and the President of the Boston Music Hall Association, Dr. J. BAXTER UPHAM, was authorized to proceed to Europe for that purpose. Dr. Upham left on his mission by steamer Canada on Wednesday, and the best wishes of many friends and of all lovers of music and Art go with him. To his enthusiasm and perseverance are we chiefly indebted for the success of a project, which we feel confident will reflect honor and credit upon Boston and its public-spirited citizens in all coming time.

We passed a delightful evening last week at the rooms of the German "Orpheus," or Männerchor. It was a social entertainment in true German style: music, conversation, lager beer, cigars and comic recitations blending or alternating in agreeable proportions. The Germans understand the art of having a good time. There was a healthy, hearty good cheer, a perfect sense of freedom, as well as a tone of artistic refinement about it. Yet most of the singers are plain mechanics. Under their excellent leader, Mr. KREISSMANN, they sang good German four-part songs and choruses among others, the Pilgrim Chant from Tannhäuser, "O Isis and Osiris," from the Zauberflöte, part-songs by Mendelssohn and others, and some very comical students' songs. OTTO DRESSEL, too, was present and contributed some pieces by Mendelssohn and Schumann on a fine Chickering grand piano. Also Mr. LEONHARD, a young pianist just from the Conservatoire at Leipzig, who played a very difficult Polonaise of Chopin admirably, and who is a musician of rare talent and a true artistic tone. It will be seen by a card below that he proposes to reside and teach in this city, and we wish him all success. Mr. KREISSMANN sang several songs by Franz, which were received with the most unfeigned enthusiasm; and there were other songs by members of the Club.

At the German Opera in New York last week the pieces were Masaniello and Der Freyschütz. This week, on Thursday evening, Lortzing's popular music to Fouqué's "Undine" was given for the first time. In spite of the slashing criticisms of those who have been so spoiled by Italian opera, that they regard the individual singer as of more consequence than the music, it seems to be the opinion of the best judges that this troupe presents a better musical and dramatic ensemble than our cities have been used to; Bergmann's orchestra is superior. . . . The Italian Opera at the Academy came to an abrupt close last week, Maretzek not having prevailed on the stockholders to relinquish their claim to the best seats gratis: a condition which has proved ruinous to every manager. The piece was L'Etoile du Nord. Max was called out for a speech, in which he set forth the reason of the repeated failures in quite pungent language. He has since given two operatic concerts, and it is said we may expect his troupe in Boston by the 20th.

Mme. DE WILHORST has given a second concert in New York, in which the Tribune thinks she fairly settled the question that she is destined to take rank among prime donne. . . . A musical society in New York, the oldest in the country, called the Euterpean Society—something like our Amateur Orchestra, we believe—held its 58th anniversary last week. . . . Ullmann, the indefatigable, who flies back and forth over the Atlantic like a shuttle, weaving star after star of European theatre and concert notoriety into the great American web of Art and—speculation, has engaged the famous contralto, Mme. ANGRI, who has been thought second only to Alboni. Her speedy arrival is looked for. It is not stated whether she is to concertize with THALBERG.

Advertisements.

BEETHOVEN CONCERT SOCIETY.

It is proposed by the Committee who managed the Orchestral Concerts of the last season to give a series of EIGHT CONCERTS at the Boston Music Hall, during the coming winter, under the name of the "Beethoven Concert Society," provided fifteen hundred sets of tickets shall be subscribed for previous to Oct. 20th.

The Orchestra will consist of at least Fifty Musicians, under the direction of CARL ZERRAHL.

Price of Tickets for the Series, to be used at pleasure, $3.

Single Tickets, $1.

Subscription Lists may be found at the Music Stores.

NATHAN RICHARDSON, Secretary,
Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

MUSICAL SOIRÉES.

OTTO DRESSEL

Proposes to give his FOURTH SERIES OF FOUR SOIRÉES,

At the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, during the months of December, January, February and March, on Saturday evenings to be hereafter specified.

Subscription for the Series, in packages of four tickets, $3. Subscription lists may be found at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, and at the music stores.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club,

Respectfully inform the musical public of Boston and vicinity that they will give their usual series of CHAMBER CONCERTS, to take place at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. Packages of eight tickets, to be used at pleasure, $5. Single tickets will be $1 each. Lists will be out in a few days.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

Mr. HUGO LEONHARD,
FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG, -
Gives instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

Mrs. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by MME. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents. Orders may also be addressed to
A. WILLIAMS & CO., 100 Washington St.

REMOVAL.

THE Subscribers respectfully beg to inform their friends and the Musical public, that they have removed from 19 South Ninth Street, to their new and elegant Store,

306 CHESTNUT STREET,

Three doors West of Eleventh, where they intend keeping, besides their complete stock of EUROPEAN MUSIC, a large assortment of AMERICAN Publications, PIANOS, VIOLINS, and Musical Merchandise in general.

They respectfully solicit the further support of Dealers, Professors, Seminars, Leaders of Bands, and other persons connected with music, to whom they can offer the advantage of selecting from a stock comprising the Publications of the leading Music Publishers of Europe and the United States.

☞ A Catalogue of our own Publications may be had on application; also Part I. of our complete Foreign Catalogue of Orchestra Music. The other parts will be ready in a short time.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

306 CHESTNUT STREET.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 1, 1856.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,

Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. OLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasias, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 84 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols... $6
" additional volume of smaller works..... $3
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols..... $6
Haydn's " " 2 vols..... $6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office.
ALEX' W. THAYER.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works:

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION, WITH AND WITHOUT ACCOMPANIMENTS,

Edited by CIPRIANI POTTER,
Principal Professor of Harmony and Composition in the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Vol. 1, Airs with Variations,.....	Bound in cloth, $4 88
" 2, Rondos, &c.....	Do do 2 18
" 3, Duets.....	Do do 4 25
" 4, Piano-Forte Sonatas.....	Do do 3 75
" 5, Do do.....	Do do 3 75
" 6, Sonatas for Piano and Violin...	Do do 4 25
" 7, Do do.....	Do do 4 25
" 8, Quartets and Quintets.....	Do do 3 75
" 9, Trios for Piano, Violin and Cello, Do	do 6 00

☞ Each piece in the above volumes is published separately.

The fact of the collection and republication of Mozart's Pianoforte works in the middle of the present century shows that time instead of diminishing, has stamped their excellence and value. They are, indeed, true works of art, as useful as they are beautiful. Out of this school came the memorable artists, Hummel, and J. B. Cramer—players whose fingers expressed the deep feeling of music with which their nature was imbued; and if we may still hope to find their successors among the young, it must be by a train of studies similarly conducted.

Novello's Catalogue No. 4, containing an analytical and thematic index to the above works, to be had gratis at 389 Broadway, or forwarded to address on receipt of one cent postage.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,

TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.

ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

Apr 29

27

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE.

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST PRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,

Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION

PIANO-FORTE,

Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
☞ PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

☞ Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Quatuors, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. ☞ Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 237.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 3.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
"GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
"CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
"C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
"MILLER & BEACHAM, 161 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

The Piano-Forte.

From the London and Westminster Review, 1839.

(Continued from page 11.)

But we are giving too much space to this "heartless school," and will pass to one of a very different character.

4. This is the school—"not of strict science; not of judiciously varied finger-music; not of melody, equable, genial and fascinating,—but of Genius, which shall avail itself of the results of the contrapuntist's labor, which shall employ the hand of the performer, and give melody a thousand various characters subserviently to the working out of its own distinct and original conceptions. Of this school no one can be rightly called a founder, inasmuch as its nature implies a distinctive originality and invention in all its disciples, which owe as much to the student's self as to his master. CLEMENTI, however, must be included in it, and, following chronological order, may be placed first.

"Few have done more for their art than he did—few have lived to see a progress so rapid and so extended. He may be said to have witnessed the infancy and growth of pianoforte-playing—not its decline, however, as some lovers of the old school have been pleased to imagine. * * * With a brain of his own, fertile enough, and a hand sufficiently patient to ensure him success as an inventor, whether as a melodist, or an executive artist; his position as a young man was eminently calculated to make him an artist in the best sense of the term. * * * Throughout the long range of Clementi's Sonatas, a remarkable variety is observable. In his allegros there is manifest a fire and a nerve, and an employment of the conceits of science and the vagaries of fancy, with equal freedom and judgment—in his slower movements a richness of harmony, an expressiveness of melody, and a mastery over all the embroidery of music, which is so delightful if not laid on with too gaudy a fancy. Clementi's works—a faithful reflection of his playing—have been too much cast into the shade in these latter days."

"Greater honors might justly have been paid to Clementi, in the shape of minuter remark and closer analysis, did not the next and noblest writer for the pianoforte, whom we must mention, demand a Benjamin's share of attention. And if whosoever would approach the music of BEETHOVEN, must be constrained by its unparalleled variety and suggestiveness to employ epithets and illustrations almost without the limits even of liberal-Art-criticism—the reviewer, in the present case, has a labor of more than ordinary love and extent, by reason of the new light recently thrown on his life and works, in the biographical notices standing at the head of this article. So much has been whispered, but so little known, about Beethoven, in England, that as much personal detail as can be possibly here compressed, besides being welcome, will also be found not irrelevant to the understanding of his genius and his works."

The work here referred to is entitled Biographische Notizen über Ludwig van Beethoven. Von Dr. F. G. Wegeler and Ferdinand Ries. Coblenz, 1838. Biographical Notices of Lewis van Beethoven. By Dr. F. G. Wegeler and Ferdinand Ries. The reviewer goes on.

"To authenticate these 'Notizen,' which do not pretend to any connection or completeness, it is enough to say that Dr. Wegeler, one of their authors, and himself the intimate friend of Beethoven, is the husband of that Eleonora von Breuning, in whose mother's house the wild and eccentric genius found a second home during the years of his boyhood, &c. Dr. Wegeler's share of the work includes many original letters of a deep and melancholy interest; for the Hermit of Vienna, though, as life advanced, his nature was gnarled, as it were, into an uncouth and threatening shape, by suffering and contracted circumstances and domestic trial,—never ceased to love his old friends, at Bonn, or wholly to drop correspondence with them, though he might write but once in ten years. The second half of the 'Notizen,' yet more valuable to the musician for the anecdotes it contains, was contributed by Ries, Beethoven's own pupil.

"He was strongly attached to his mother, and cherished her memory long after her decease:—when Ries presented himself as pupil before him, with a letter from Father Ries, Beethoven, who was then busy, and never very ceremonious, received him with "I cannot now answer your father, but tell him I have not forgotten when my mother died"—a period of trial at which Father Ries had assisted him with money. * * * It is beautiful to find him in his earlier days writing and speaking of his art as a service bringing its own reward, and only valuable as an engine of money-getting, inasmuch as it might enable him to assist the poor or to help an old friend. The strange craving for money which possessed him in his latter days, was but a malady superinduced by physical disease, and the unworthy treatment of coarse, rapacious relations. Never was any one less worldly than Beethoven as a boy—never any less disposed to stoop as a young man. Never was any one less of a courtier,—more stiff-neckedly resolute not to avail himself of the luxuries to which the patronage of his great friends might have introduced him.

"Characteristics so strongly marked, humors so far removed from common-place sympathies as those here presenting themselves, could not fail to tincture the musical career, as well as the personal life, of their possessor. Neither Wegeler nor

Ries throw much light upon his mode of study; the former indeed tells us that Beethoven was indebted for instruction to Pleiffer and Van der Eder of Bonn, and not (as other biographers have said) to Neefe, with whom he was merely appointed co-organist; that Haydn gave him few or no lessons; and that Salieri and Albrechtsberger found him a stubborn and not very industrious pupil; indisposed without question to subject himself to the straight-lacing of theoretical instruction; and showing, when but a youth, glimpses of that positive and self-relying spirit which made him, many, many years afterwards, defend two consecutive fifths which Ries had detected in one of his compositions, with a despotic "Well, then, I permit it." Lest others, fancying themselves geniuses no less eminent, should be led astray, we will not say that Beethoven's music was like Dogberry's reading and writing, "the gift of nature;" but it is certain that at an early age he manifested attainments of a height and a daring which pointed him out as already "first among the first."

We find this part of the Review which relates to Beethoven so interesting, that we shall present our readers with copious extracts. For example: "The following instance occurred very soon after his being appointed fellow organist with Neefe:—

'In this new position' (says Dr. Wegeler) 'Beethoven first gave to the orchestra an accidental proof of his talents in the following manner. In the Catholic church the lamentations of the Prophet Jeremiah are sung on three days in the Holy Week. These compositions consist, as every one knows, of short verses, which are chanted with a certain rhythm; the vocal part consists of four notes following each other, as for instance E D E F, on the third of which several words, or a whole phrase, are sung, till at the close a few notes bring back the singer to the cadence of the common chord. As the organ is not allowed to play on these three days, the performer is only supported by a slight pianoforte accompaniment. Upon one occasion, when it fell to our Beethoven to play this accompaniment, he asked that very correct singer, Heller, whether he would allow himself to be thrown out if Beethoven could do it. The rash consent of the singer was no sooner obtained, than Beethoven threw him so completely out by variations of the accompaniment, although with his little finger he struck the note which Heller was to hold all the time, that the latter lost the note so that he could not hit the proper cadence. Old Ries used to relate how astonished Lucchesi, the then Kapellmeister, was by Beethoven's playing. In the first burst of Heller's wrath he complained to the Elector, and though the occurrence pleased that young and clever prince, he ordered a simpler accompaniment in future.'—(pp. 14—15.)

"This was but the herald of a greater feat told us (p. 36), concerning the concerto in C major. At its first rehearsal, to accommodate himself with the pitch of the wind instruments, which was half a note higher than that of the pianoforte, Beethoven actually played this long and complicated work in C sharp!

"But the stubbornness implied in these anecdotes, which might have only qualified its owner to compose in one strain—as it were, for the miners in Fridolin's foundry, and not for the lady, or the knight, or the page, was tempered in Beethoven's hoben by that wonderful facility and power of adaptation by which genius, saved from doggedness and self-occupation, is qualified for its loftiest and most excursive flights."

"It is to be remarked, that if nothing could be much more unworldly and retired than Beethoven's life; nothing, also, could be more carefully, almost sullenly withheld from the market where patronage and fashion resort, than his executive talent. He would sit down among the Breunings and extemporize fantasias suitable to the characters of the company, unconsciously shadowing forth, as it were, that turn of invention which should make him one day select 'Napoleon' as the idea of that symphony which is now called the 'Eroica';—but he never loved to exhibit in public; and was incorrect, and uncertain as a player. But, for this, his mind wrought all the more incessantly, and a spirit of self-concentration was nourished to an unusual strength, in addition to the force of will, and the variety of fancy with which nature had gifted him so largely. And he had not long entered upon the career of invention—not long detached himself from those indulgent friends, whose constant society must have tended to soften and to humanize, when he was doomed to be driven yet deeper into the recesses of his own mind, by the most terrible calamity which could befall him. That deafness, which finally compelled him to a total seclusion from the world, began to manifest itself in the year 1800; and there are few more painful chapters in the history of genius than those, still to be added, which will contain the early letters on the subject addressed by Beethoven to Dr. Wegeler;—few more melancholy anecdotes than the one told by Ries, how the latter first became aware of his master's impaired hearing, by calling upon him, when they were walking together in the country, to listen to a shepherd's pipe; being no longer able to hear which, Beethoven stalked homeward by the side of his scholar, gloomy and saying nothing. The legend of the prisoner shut up in the iron chamber, day by day narrowing around him, but reflects what the feelings of the musician must have been: for his fate approached, though no less steadily, more slowly. At first, in his letters to Wegeler, who is a physician, we find him writing of his malady as a secret to be kept with jealous care;—then, in a sudden moment of anguish, exclaiming that self-destruction, his only cure, was forbidden him by divine laws. Nor was his condition ameliorated by his domestic relations. His brothers, in whose case he showed a forbearance as extraordinary as was his violence and suspicion in other instances, were worthless and rapacious. They would snatch from his table his compositions when half completed, and dispose of them without his consent to the highest bidder, careless of promises and engagements; and Ries gives us an illustrative anecdote of the master and his brother Caspar having actually fought in the street about the three pianoforte sonatas, op. 81, (the second, one of the most superb pieces of dramatic composition extant), which had been promised to a music-seller at Zurich, but which Caspar had disposed of elsewhere. Under these unfavorable circumstances, it was not wonderful that every excrescence of a nature strong, but prone to malformation, should become exaggerated, until at last they absorbed all life and force from its healthier parts—that a generous disregard of money should be exchanged for a self-tormenting and grasping avarice—that the same suspiciousness, which made him in Vienna choose an open place for his residence, to escape from the pilferings of meaner musicians, in particular, of one A. G. (Abbé Gelinek?) who used to settle themselves close in his neighborhood, for the purpose of stealing what they could from his improvisations—should at last drive him to an extreme of unreasonable harshness."

"One more anecdote of Beethoven's pianoforte-playing which can be drawn from these interesting 'Notizen,' may be placed here by way of relief:—

"When Steibelt came, with his great celebrity, from Paris to Vienna, several of Beethoven's friends were afraid that the reputation of the latter might be injured. Steibelt did not call upon him —they met, for the first time, at a party given by Count Fries, where Beethoven introduced his new trio in B flat, for pianoforte, clarinet, and violoncello (op. 11.) The performer has no peculiar opportunity for display in this piece. Steibelt listened to it with a sort of condescension, paid Beethoven a few compliments, and thought himself sure of his victory. He played a quintet of his own composition, extemporized, and produced much effect by his tremolando passages, which were then quite novel. Beethoven could not be induced to play any more. A week afterwards Count Fries gave another concert. On this occasion Steibelt played a quintet with great success, and a brilliant fantasia, which he had evidently got up—on the same theme (Pria ch' impegno) on which the variations in Beethoven's trio are written. This provoked the admirers of Beethoven and the master himself: they insisted on his sitting down to improvise. He went to the instrument in his usual, I may say, uncouth manner, as if he was pushed there, and, as he went by, took up the violoncello part of Steibelt's quintet, laid it (purposely?) upside down on the desk, and, with one finger, strummed a theme out of the first bars. As he went on he became so enraged and excited in his improvisation that Steibelt left the room before Beethoven had done—never would meet him again, and made it a condition that any one wishing for his company should not invite Beethoven."—pp. 81, 82.

"But enough of these illustrations; though with such a treasury of precious material before us, it is easier for us to speak of the peculiarities and faults of the man—of his lonely household, and his gloomy death-bed, haunted by spectres of poverty and ruin which his own distempered fancy had conjured up—than to attempt, however imperfectly, to characterize the works which have placed him above his contemporaries. But Beethoven's pianoforte compositions are above parallel, and even to their technical analysis must be brought something of the spirit in which they were composed. What this spirit was may partly be divined from his own confessions, as recorded in the charming but wild letters of Bettine Brentano to Goethe."

"When I open my eyes (said Beethoven) I cannot choose but sigh; for what I behold is at enmity with my faith, and I am forced to despise the world, which has no conception that music is a higher revelation than all their wisdom and philosophy; it is the wine which inspires new creations; and I am the Bacchus that crushes out this noble juice for mankind, and makes their spirits drunk; and when they are sobered again, then you see what a world of things they have fished up to bring back with them to dry land again. I have no friend: I must needs live alone with myself, but I well know that God is nearer me in my Art than others: I commune with him without fear: evermore have I acknowledged and understood him: and I am not fearful concerning my music—no evil fate can befall it: and he to whom it is become intelligible must become free from all the paltriness that the others drag about with them."

"Visionary as may this 'raptus' seem, it nevertheless contains the true philosophy of genius in its highest manifestation. Beethoven says of Mozart's Don Giovanni that the sacred Art ought never to be degraded to the foolery of so scandalous a subject; and he thoroughly acted up to this judgment in choosing the subject of his one opera, Fidelio.

"Beethoven's great thoughts are not in any wise dependent upon the great means employed in their utterance. The critic who, in speaking of Michael Angelo's sketch of 'Cleopatra,' begged especial attention to the style 'in which that twisted lock is wound about the shoulders,' adding, 'it is but a plait of woman's hair, yet lies with an immensity of coil which might beseech a serpent on the neck of the Medusa,' used a figure admirably suited to many of our poet's works—admirably illustrative of his whole style of handling. And it is the constant presence of this grasp and greatness, that has led some of Beethoven's eulogists to speak of him as merely stern, dark and gloomy—as if there were not some score of his scherzi laughing such an one-sided character in the face; as if he had not, in the finale to the second Razumouffsky quartet, given playfulness and joy an utterance, the ecstasy of which was never exceeded by Rossini or Auber himself;—as if the slow movement of the first of the three Zurich sonatas (about which their composer and his brother Caspar fought) did not remain as an evidence of utter mastery over the finest details of grace and ornament; and the finale to the already-cited Waldstein Sonata, and the whole Sonata pastorale (op. 28) did not exist to remind them that for such pictures also as are conveyed by a fresh and sunny and peaceful melody, their rugged and incomparable storm-painter has not left his peer behind him. Even in Beethoven's latest compositions, by some charged with a subtlety fatal to their excellences, (as if it followed that the labyrinth is impassable because the clue is not ready to every hand) there is always some outbreak of fancy, as felicitously simple, as startling by its originality, as familiar by its truth, as the happiest couplet in Shakspeare. With ourselves, the genuine success which has attended the recent performances of the Choral Symphony, so long considered in England a chaotic puzzle, reasonably encourages the anticipation of that time when even the elaborate Sonata, No. 106, with its tremendous fugued finale, will be as distinctly understood, if not as frequently played as the three first Sonatas (dedicated to Haydn) or the pastorale, or the Lichnowsky Sonata, already renowned for the exquisite clearness of their beauty."

(Conclusion next week.)

(From the New York Musical World.)

A Letter from Hector Berlioz.

[DEAR SIR:—Will you kindly publish Berlioz's last letter from Paris? As there have appeared a great many erroneous statements about his works in one of my articles written for your paper, I think that this will prove the best way to do justice to his great genius, and to furnish your readers with an interesting musical feuilleton. Your obedient servant,

GUSTAVE SATTER.

U. States Hotel, BOSTON, Sept. 20th, 1856.]

MY DEAR SATTER:—I was in Germany when Mr. Millard called on me and left your amiable letter. This was the reason why I could not see him. A thousand thanks for the music which you have sent me. One sees at your manner of treating the piano, that you are one of the great masters of the harpsichord. Your Morceau des Clochettes is charmingly original, but the Impromptu-Rondeau pleases me still more, on account of the dazzling grace with which the theme (which is very beautiful in itself,) has been treated. I would admire to send you my works in return, but unfortunately my editors are not extremely prodigal, and I have no more copies of my scores.

I regret it much more, as I see in the notice which you have been kind enough to publish in the New York Musical World many errors concerning the nature and worth of my compositions; errors which you have committed by believing badly informed papers. So the apotheosis is no cantata; it is the finale of my Grande Symphonie funèbre et triomphale for two orchestras and chorus. This symphony was never written and performed for the transferment of Napoleon's ashes to France, but for the inauguration of the Colonne de la Bastille in 1840, and for the transferment of the victims of the July-Revolution to this vast tomb.

Faust is no symphony either, but a Dramatic Legend—a concert-opera. I believe sincerely that you are mistaken about the worth of 'Benvenuto Cellini' and the 'Infancy of Christ.' This last score is the happiest of all that I have ever written, so far as success is concerned. The piano-score of Cellini will be published at Meyer's in Brunswick, and I certainly will not fail to send it to you on the first occasion.

The greatest piece that I have ever written is the Finale (Judex Credens) of my Te Deum. This score which you do not know, is published in Paris, at Brandus. There are many other works besides, which it would take too much space to write of in the letter. But I am glad that you remain faithful to my symphonies, which some silly fellows declare now-a-days to be youthful mistakes. A thousand thanks for your cordiality.

I have returned from Germany, where I have been engaged to lead a concert in Baden. My "Infancy of Christ," has been better performed there, especially the chorus, than in any other place. The success was very great. The 'Infancy of Christ' is no cantata, but an oratorio in three parts,—a sacred Trilogv.

The "Episode de la vie d'un Artiste," has never won the prize at the Paris Conservatoire: you mistake it for my cantata "Sardanapalus," which exists no more; I have burnt it.

Now I work hard at an immense composition,—an opera of five acts, for which I have written the Libretto, as I did for the 'Infancy of Christ.' Heaven knows when it will be done.

Good bye. Thousands and thousands of friendly wishes from your most devoted

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

PARIS, Sept. 3, 1856.

The Handel Statue at Halle.

The following spunky letter is addressed to the London Athenæum:

"You have already, in the Athenæum, announced the designs in progress at Halle, the birth-place of Handel, for holding a centenary festival there in 1859, with the purpose of erecting a statue to him in his native town. It was added, too, to the announcement that the leading English musicians and professors had been, or were to be, invited to contribute their simultaneous efforts to carry out the idea. Now, a higher object of musical interest than honor to Handel could not by any ingenuity be propounded to the lovers of the greatest music; for if there be such a thing as a settled fact in the Art, is it not that, with every musician's advancing experience, and by every fresh opportunity of comparison, Handel's glory rises, and brightens, and deepens, and spreads—that the variety, no less than the vastness of his genius becomes more and more admitted, better and better appreciated? Thus, any majestic celebration in memorial of such greatness as his should be responded to reverently, gratefully and cordially by the people of England. But ere plans are formed or committees convoked, permit a lover of Handel and debtor to the Germans to suggest some reason why, if English memorial there be, it should stand on English, not on German ground, should be raised in the place of our great fellow-citizen's labors and death, and not of his birth. Never was there a German musician who less belonged to Germany than Handel. Ere he had written a single one of the works which entitle him to statue and laurel crown, Handel's intercourse with his native country had ceased. It was during half a century's residence in England, betwixt the year 1710, when he came to the Haymarket Italian Opera to compose Rinaldo, and the Good Friday of 1759, when he died, that his great productions were written—in England and for England. Not one of them that could be named is with German words. They were produced to glorify our festivals—to suit our fashions—to meet our powers of appreciation as well as of execution. Nor is it asserting too much to say that in Germany, up to this day, the love of Handel has not penetrated Handel's countrymen as it has penetrated Handel's fellow-citizens; that his works are not so well known, not so frequently, and never so adequately, performed there as here. We English put all our enthusiasm into For unto us a child is born, the Hallelujah, The Horse and his rider; the Germans sing these choruses strictly, but without any unction of sympathy or tradition, or national preference. There is no reasoning about these differences, no explaining why the musical pilgrim must seek in one place for Palestrina, in another for Gluck, with a certainty that there he will have the real meaning drawn by the executants from the poet's work; but when we are raising an artistic monument, should accident (for such is birth) wholly define and decide the place?—should not the more important sequel of such accident be considered? Let Superstition raise its memorial pillar on the spot where the cradle stood, but let Hope and Faith build their shrines on the place where the Prophet lived and struggled, taught and triumphed. Another question raises itself on the occasion, less large and generous, still not to be wholly overlooked. How is it possible to forget former instances of musical commemoration in which Germany, having appealed to England for assistance, has failed in herself contributing much beyond such appeal? The Mendelssohn Scholarship is not the only case in which German reverence has said, 'Do let us dip into England's purse,' the while clasping her own strong box tight. This would matter nothing, were there any real feeling of confraternity in Art betwixt Germany and England. But that there is little on their side, all who know the land and its men must admit. They profit by us, they respect our probity, but they love us little and esteem our judgment less. This is no 'fire-brand flung about' in sport. Let us have truth all round, as the best courtesy or the most courteous animosity. If English artists and amateurs think it well to join Germany in erecting a statue to Handel in Halle, and not in Hanover Square or 'near the Abbey,' let them at least stipulate, like the 'nation of shopkeepers' we are still reputed to be, that no sum shall pass across the channel for any such purpose, unless a proportionate amount—say twice as much—shall have been raised in Germany by those suing for extraneous assistance.

H. F. C."

From the Canadian Mus. Review.

Musical Education at Schools.

We have had some little experience in Musical Education at Schools. Need we wonder at the present state of the Art in this country when we see, day after day, not only the abuse it is subjected to, but the carelessness and indifference displayed in imparting necessary instruction. Few of the uninitiated would be prepared to credit the absolute ignorance which exists among pupils in many of what are otherwise considered excellent institutions for teaching "the young idea." We have often come across the path of those who, having learned to play some fashionable polka or even the more aspiring fantasia, with some dash and show, fancy they know everything concerning the Art. But examine farther into their qualifications; endeavor to extract from them satisfactory demonstration of their sound and thorough inculcation into its mysteries and principles, and how quickly are we undeceived! How painful to find that far from understanding its depth, they have not even touched the surface; that they are not only deficient in knowledge of the principles but the very rudiments of the art! Every effect must be the product of some cause; and if we endeavor to probe for the cause of this ill effect, we fear we can trace it but too plainly.

Music is very properly considered one of the most refined means of elevating our minds, and in its social aspect, of creating and cementing that bond of affection which it is so desirable should find existence in the family circle. Many parents being conscious of this—if they are not themselves even more susceptible to the charms of sound—are naturally led, from an anxiety for their children's happiness, to encourage their taste for it, and finally to seek for them such instruction as will ensure them its practical enjoyment. So far their desires are most praiseworthy. A family so educated, practising and delighting in their favorite art for the sake of the internal pleasure which it yields, to our mind must be one of the most pleasing of earthly communities. In it we cannot imagine any of those evils to be fostered which so often mar our happiness, blight our hopes, and doom to misery and wretchedness our present existence. On the contrary, there we see in the brightest colors all that is virtuous, beautiful and lovely. This is no fancy sketch; it has an existence, in fact, and many such happy examples may be found. Yet we fear here begins the grand error which parents so unfortunately commit, viz., an impatience to realize the pleasure they anticipate from their children's performance, and also, we are led to believe, a not very commendable spirit which desires them to outrival others in mere technical ability and outward show, overthrowing at one stroke that beautifully symmetrical architecture they at first so commendably undertook to rear. Nothing can be more injurious to the child, the professor or the art. In the first place, a wish for these early precocious displays not only comes in the way of a thorough, systematic training, but induces the teacher to pass over much that is both valuable and indeed indispensable to the satisfactory progress of his pupil, and oftentimes encouraging a listlessness thereto which in any other study would be considered highly reprehensible. In the pupils also its ill effects are displayed in the trivial taste, incorrect and spiritless feelings they evoke in their performances. How much better would it rather be for parents to exercise more patience and judgment in this matter, and see their children's talents drawn forth and encouraged in the right direction by a trustworthy and able master! How much real talent would not this course save to us and to the world. Yet by this worse than childish impatience we are deluged with would-be artists the most contemptible, amateurs the most plebeian.

The periodical displays usual in some schools we cannot but consider as detrimental to the true end of musical education. If such exhibitions mean anything, they are intended to certify the progress of the pupil; and it would be proper in judging of their performances not only to attend to the mere correct reading and certainty of touch they may evince, but also to the spirit, feeling and pathos with which they imbue the compositions they may interpret, for there indeed is displayed their true progress—whether they are musicians in mind as well as finger. Let our superintendents of schools say how this is to be effected within the mystifying influence of twelve pianos, and an organ, &c., hammered upon all at once (!), or the performance of a piece which has cost the pupil six months' hard study. How such strange frolics can be said to indicate the progress of each individual pupil in anything but a wicked display of power, we are at a loss to estimate. If music has anything commendable appertaining to it more than for the practice of mere childish freaks, let the pupils learn to appreciate it at once, so that its beauties may be duly impressed upon their minds, and they may learn to look upon it with different feelings than those which attach themselves to the mere outward blandishments and frivolities of the world.

ROBERT THE DEVIL IN ITALY.—They have got to playing "Robert the Devil" on the Italian stage; but the strict censorship established in Naples and the other Italian States has taken very strange, but not unexpected, liberties with Scribe's rather anti-church notion libretto.

The censor has effected the following changes in the opera: the Genius of Evil, Bertram, is transformed into a magician; Sicily is metamorphosed into Scotland; Normandy becomes Picardy; the convent is a castle; the ghostly nuns are simply ghosts; the chapel is a charitable institution; the cross is crossed out, and Alice has to throw herself at the foot of a fir-tree instead. The Roman censor thinks the Devil is as much afraid of a Scottish fir-tree as he is, or ought to be, of the holy cross.

The connection is so close and logical between Meyerbeer's music and every minute phase and point in the libretto, that these odd alterations in the latter must make the music appear exceedingly ludicrous, especially to many Italians who are familiar with the opera as it is legitimately played.

The "North Star."

The new opera is exceedingly novel and entertaining. Its pictures of life have a wild and barbaric interest, and are new to the American public. The war with Russia has produced an undercurrent of romantic interest in this people, which serves as a new basis on which to found modern stage-romance. It is a relief to see new figures in our scenic landscape. The cossack looks well on the stage. The invasion of this northern horde, in the first act, is fresh and picturesque to a remarkable degree. Like northern boars and bears they huddle fiercely in, wild with passion and greed, to be subdued by a fair young girl, who appeals to their superstition:—for even nature in the rough, and at the roughest, has somewhere a helm which it blindly obeys—can one but get his hand upon it.

Like all the works of Meyerbeer, this is a carefully-written opera. No one probably ever took more care, or gave himself more time, to hit the nail of effect precisely on the head, than this writer. Mozart was impulsive. He wrote with no idea of immortality. He finished his overture to Don Giovanni, twixt sleep and awake, the night before the first performance; and the ink was not dry on the paper that the orchestra played from at the rehearsal the next morning. Meyerbeer would take more time than that, to decide whether the first chord of an overture should be minor or major. He seems to write always in full and alarmed consciousness, as to a possible immortality, and a receding or progressing in the public estimate of his powers. Pope was determined to be a poet and coolly made up his mind to be one beforehand; and the same seems to be true of Meyerbeer as a composer. But Mozart and Beethoven were composers because they could not help it and in spite of themselves. In the one case, the men were possessed of their genius—in the other, they possessed themselves of it, apparently, by main force.

But despite all this careful elaboration and forecast, this calculation of musical and scenic effect, this bringing-to-bear of all that can dazzle the eye in scenery and costume, and this patient waiting of years for the opera to grow mellow, and to throw off its redundancies, despite all this—or rather by reason of all this,—what a clear and symmetrical work is presented at the last!

Great is the merit and great the recompenses of industry! Life is short, but it is ever long enough judiciously to wait—and we think the life of Meyerbeer teaches this lesson. His early failures, too, in Germany, which were signal, and repeated and complete—the discouraging contemporaneous successes of C. M. von Weber, his fellow pupil with the Abbe Vogler; his wise changing of the scene to Italy and his study and coming out afresh there—what capital Art-lessons, and life-lessons, are contained in all this!

We advise our friends who hear this opera (should not the unexpected close of the season prevent their soon hearing it again) to listen well to the instrumentation. It will reward them. Meyerbeer has the immense advantage over the modern Italian composers, that "his early education was not neglected." His melody is not the foam that tops the sluggishly-rolling wave beneath—but the wave, itself, rolls to deep melody. For, in the dark waters of his accompaniment there disport gold-fish, that flash in the sunshine of his bright fancy and illumine the depths below. Meyerbeer is no surface-composer.

Mme. de La Grange makes a very captivating young gentleman. We do not wonder that the vivandieres wanted (illusively) to kiss her. Adequately to praise her singing in this opera, would compel our ascent into the superlatives. The public, we are glad to see, are beginning to rub their eyes, preparatorily to opening them, quite, to the merits of this great singer.

Mme. Bertucca Maretzek has an agreeable way of surprising people, now and then, with brilliant little feats of vocalism, for which they are unprepared. We found ourselves silently comparing her with the impresario. The world seems to go well with both of them—they certainly never looked in such excellent condition.

The other signori and signorini, are quite adequate to the demands of the opera, with the exception of the unfortunate Arnoldi (we think that is his name) whose very scared and lunatic look,—contrasting strangely with a certain ambitiousness of performance,—renders him the least welcome apparition of the stage.

N. Y. Musical World.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From the Country.

NATICK, Oct. 15, 1856.

Dear Dwight—I have been detained here the last two or three weeks by a business which has occupied far more of my time during the last three years than I could wish—indeed, for more than I can make out to be for my advantage—viz., convalescing. A pretty good sign that my present job of the kind is drawing to a close is the strength of the impulse which urges me to write to you once more. Not that I have anything special to say, nor indeed anything properly adapted to the columns of a Journal of Music; but the impulse is here, and I give way.

On the whole this is no bad place for a convalescent. I have a nice little room fronting directly south, and within five minutes' walk of all the public offices. There are the railroad station and the post-office, and the building that used to be the principal grog-shop—where the man was stabbed a few years since—sundry groceries, dry goods shops, tailors, milliners, and all the usual et ceteras, with a barber's shop and an oyster cellar. Lawyer Bacon's office is in plain view, and that of lawyer Ham is only hidden by an intervening building or two. Then there are the four meeting houses of four different denominations, and facing the four cardinal points exactly. Whether it was accident, or that there is a little gentle sarcasm in the matter, I am not informed; but the fact is, that while our good old Puritanic, Orthodox, Trinitarian Church of the straightest sect fronts exactly south, our Universalist meeting house faces directly towards the north star, as if it had another road to heaven; while the Methodist and Baptist houses, as a sort of "twixt and 'tweenities," look respectively the one to the rising, the other to the setting sun. I am not sure that either of our spiritual advisers lives within the five minute limits, but Dr. Russell is my next neighbor, and just now he is of more importance to me than the gentlemen who have the "cure of souls." I should mention that the offices of our town clerk and the deputy sheriff are hard by, and also the sky parlor in which the new brass band meets hebdomadally for the practice of cacophony, and in which on Sundays the seven wise men, especially one from the East, meet with divers adherents and followers to explore the mysteries of the other world through the intervention of tables and rappings. I propose that they fill their noses with rappee snuff and test the language of sternutation. As to the band, I slept one night in a house just back of said sky-parlor; their windows were open and so were mine; and I must confess my admiration at the resolute perseverance and strength of ear with which popular melodies were put through their paces, no two brazen nerve-destroyers being within about a quarter of a tone of the same pitch. However, people say that they have just begun and are making excellent progress. Suppose they conquer at last; whether the game will prove worth the powder and shot? I trow not.

On the other side of the street, a little to the right, my front windows overlook the open space which is to be our common. It possesses just now the following elements of beauty: some twenty feet of old picket fence, four or five wooden posts where a fence once was, an ash, an elm, four apple trees, a few straggling peach trees on the site of a former garden, half a dozen excavations with low mounds about them, where as many buildings once stood, and a very fine growth of weeds. This piece of ground is to be levelled off and made into something of which we shall be proud; but when? Some say immediately; others, at that future epoch when so many things are to be done—such as the erection of a decent new station house in such a place that every train which stops need not stand directly across our main street; the removal of decayed humanity from the old burying ground, which, but for the obstinacy of a few individuals, would have ceased to disgrace the village long ago; the elevation of the town clock; the building of the new town house; the removal of the engine house and horse sheds, which now cut off the view of our handsomest church from all such as come up the street from the East or sit at my side window; and the construction of the new road in the almost straight line laid out by nature, with her own cuttings through the ledges, down to South Natick.

Directly in front of my windows, at the end of a short street, is our big school house, three stories high. This building is a great subject of speculation to me, architecturally. The north side, that upon which I look, has a deep projection, containing the entrances and stairways; but as the doors are in the sides of this projection, I cannot get over the feeling, that I look upon the back of the edifice, and that its front must face the back yard.

A little to my left, across the street, is a wooden building occupied chiefly by dispensers of ready-made clothing, millinery goods, and groceries, but in which also is printed that mirror of the passing age, the Natick Observer! You must not suppose, because Natick is renowned in New England history as the great Indian town, that our paper, like the Cherokee Phoenix in those days, when slavery had not yet driven the Cherokees from their homes and stolen their cultivated lands, is printed half in English and half in Indian. I assure you, solemnly that is not the case!

Between the school house and this last named building, the two structures being my picture frame, I have a little view, which has been, during my imprisonment, a source of great delight. You must know that the land which spreads away south of my street is for about half a mile so level that we do not compare it to a pancake, but give our idea of the flatness of that palatable viand by saying they are as flat as it. It has been declared to be as flat as one of Cass's speeches; but I cannot say as to that.

Now, beyond this plain rises abruptly the Deacon's Hill—not the lofty elevation I thought it in boyhood, (it has diminished in some such measure as has the value of the dollar, which I then thought wealth) but a pleasant little pile of rocks and earth, thrown up some 140 or 150 feet, directly from the meadow. The curve that its upper outline makes, falling gently away to the left into a low ridge, until it is lost behind the printing office, is precisely that of Hogarth's line of beauty and grace. The whole is covered completely with dense forest. And here the Great Painter has been at work.

The first time I sat at my window he had just begun to lay new colors upon his ground of green.

The point of deepest color was, and still is, a little clump of pines just at the apex of the height, near the huge flat rock where the mountain cranberry and the bearberry grow; and from that spot I could trace the gradual shades of lighter and lighter green into a yellowish green, a greenish yellow, and so on to a confirmed straw color. The next morning a new coat had been given my picture. The yellows had deepened; and so it went on day after day—an inaudible symphony, in which the theme was working out in delicious harmonies, until my picture was a masterpiece of brilliant, harmonious coloring. The pines retained their dark depths of green; the hickories became golden; a maple here and there added liveliness to the picture, resplendent in a dress that vied with the purple brocades of Copley's pictures; sturdy oaks were more deliberate in changing their costume, trying mixtures of green and red, but settling finally upon a rich dark brown velvet. Down by the meadows, like pretty maidens, stood a long line of graceful birches, and having their roots in the wet earth, they retained still their delicate pale green robes.

Somewhere in your Journal a long time ago I compared the orchestral music of Mendelssohn to this kind of work from the Great Painter's hand. I do not withdraw the simile. If the melody in the one case and the clearly defined design in the other be wanting, yet how deliciously beautiful, how soothing, or how exhilarating the harmony!

Dr. Russell takes me out with him to ride when he visits his distant patients. During some of these rides I have seen bits of colored landscape which seem to me beyond anything previously within my experience. Are the woods more brilliant this fall than usual? Or after a three years' interregnum, do they strike me more than ever? On our way to Sherborn is a bit of swamp. The young maples, and now some oaks which grow there, have had a color, than which, with the sun shining on and through them, as I have repeatedly seen it, nothing in Church's picture is more brilliant and dazzling nor higher in color. I did hope to be able to ramble along Charles river, or about our numerous ponds in search of such a scene as that of the picture referred to, but the leaves are falling, and I have not had the strength. But I have seen enough within the last few weeks to enable me to feel that picture possible. Would not our European friends laugh, though, at such a piece of coloring! Laugh away, friends; you say we have no spring. I assure you, you have no autumn—you have no conception of it as we enjoy it. A. W. T.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 18, 1856.

Fétis versus Wagner.

The second edition, revised and enlarged, of M. FÉTIS's Biographie Universelle des Musiciens, is soon to appear in Paris, from the press of MM. Firmin Didot brothers. The Revue et Gazette Musicale publishes the learned author's Preface in advance, which we may deem it worth while at some convenient time to give to our readers in full. We have read enough to see that M. Fétis is as firmly set as ever against the music and the theories of RICHARD WAGNER. That he fully appreciates his music or fully understands his theories, is by no means clear to us. Yet that he is not tilting merely against windmills, but against false tendencies, which are too common, however much they may serve to blind the critic to whatever truer and greater elements there may be in Wagner, must be admitted. We translate a few paragraphs. He says:

"One of the greatest obstacles to correct judgment of the worth of musical works is found in the doctrine of progress applied to the Arts. I have long had to struggle against it, and to support ardent polemics, when I maintained that music undergoes transformation, but does not progress, except in its material elements. To-day, in view of the condition of Art throughout all Europe, no one longer dares to oppose me with the term progress; a prudent silence is observed upon the subject. Perhaps I should not find now many adversaries, should I say, according to my conviction, that certain things, considered as a progress, are in reality a decadence. For example, the development of the thought of a work, within certain limits, is undoubtedly a condition of beauty; but if one overreach the mark, the result is diffuseness, and the effect of the first thought is weakened. Carried to the pitch that it is to-day, the mania for development produces only fatigue and distaste: this is decadence. The character of grandeur excites our admiration; we find it raised to its highest power in the works of Handel, of Gluck, and of the second epoch of Beethoven; but the gigantesque, the disproportionate, which men have sought more recently to realize in certain productions, are monstrosities which indicate an erratic epoch. Elegant and unexpected modulation, when not too profusely lavished, is one of the riches born of our modern tonality; Mozart, that model of perfection, whom we always have to cite, has derived admirable effects from it; but multiplied to excess, employed at every instant to disguise the poverty of the melodic thought, according to the method of certain composers, modulation is equivalent to monotony and becomes an indication of the decay of Art. Finally, instrumental coloring is one of the most beautiful acquisitions of the modern music; its developments have been the fruits of the progressive improvement of instruments and of the invention of several new elements of sonority. There cannot be too many means for the artist who uses them with taste for the adornment of a thought beautiful with inspiration and originality, and who, in the multitude of possible effects, knows how to choose and find at once the secret of the right nuance and of variety; but the excess of instrumentation, the fatigue it causes by the incessant combination of all its elements; the noise the constantly increasing racket of its exaggerated forces, by which the ear is deafened in our days, is decadence, nothing but decadence, instead of being progress.

"We say it with confidence: the doctrine of progress, good and true for the sciences as for industry, has nothing to do with the arts of imagination, and less with music than with any other. It cannot furnish any valid rule for the appreciation of the works and talent of an artist. It is in the object of these works, in the thought and in the sentiment which have dictated them, that we must seek their value. With very limited developments, simple and rare modulations, in short, with an instrumentation reduced to the elements of a quartet, Alessandro Scarlatti has merited the name of a great artist from the latter years of the seventeenth century. Reinhardt Keiser, who lived at the same period, has not been surpassed by any one in originality of thought. Finally, Mozart, who wrote Don Juan seventy years before the moment in which I trace these lines, has remained the greatest of modern musicians, because he had what does not progress, to-wit, genius the most rich, the most fruitful, the most delicate, and the most passionate, united with the purest taste.

"Yet a party has been formed within a few years, which has the audacity to proclaim itself as the creator of the only veritable and complete Art, for which all that has preceded has been mere preparation. What is wanting to the coryphæuses of this party, is precisely the imaginative faculties. For them, party opinions are ideas, and obscurity of thought profundity. The disdain which they affect for form proceeds from the difficulty of constraining themselves to it without betraying poverty of matter. Disorder, phrases merely sketched and without connection, are more to their liking, because nothing is more irksome than the logic of ideas for sterile or indolent imaginations. The adherents of the party preach up this disorder to the good-natured public, as the result of free, original inspiration. In Germany, they have possessed themselves of journals to ensure the triumph of their revolutionary attempt. A silence as of death reigns in these same writings about the productions of artists who follow other ways. Some serious men have endeavored to enlighten opinion by a rational criticism of this shameful socialism; but they have not been able to make their voice heard; all approaches to the press have been interdicted to them. It would take too long to tell the means employed by the brethren and friends for the glorification of their chief (Wagner); their manœuvres to get possession of theatres; their falsehoods to smother truth when she tries to make herself heard; their concerted plans to blacken and calumniate whoever is not with them.

"All the time, in spite of their efforts, or rather by these very efforts, they show that they have no faith, some in what they produce, others in what they exalt. The great men whose works and names are revered in the musical world, have never had recourse to these charlatan methods. Simple men, ignorant of the advantages of the claque and of association, they have lived isolated, producing from the internal necessity of production, by virtue of the inspirations of their genius, and abandoning their works to the free judgment of their contemporaries and of posterity. In fact there is no need of anything else to the artist who is gifted by nature, and whose happy faculties have been perfected by serious and well-made studies. If sometimes the bold flights of his inspiration are not immediately comprehended, because they open paths to orders of ideas and facts unknown before, time never fails to make their beauties manifest; the admiration which is due to them is only retarded.

"While neglecting no means to reap the advantages of the present, the chief of the party of which I speak appeals to the future for the understanding of his work. This affected confidence in the judgment of future generations has produced the effect which he anticipated; for it has awakened curiosity for extravagances which had inspired nothing but disgust and ennui. The future, in which he seems to place his trust, will be for him mere nothingness; for the political interests which now group adherents round him will then have given place to others. If the future remembers these things, it will be to ridicule them. But for the honor of the present, the future ought to know that wherever taste and good sense still reigned, wherever the sentiment of pure Art was preserved, there these negations of ideal music have found only reprobation. In the interest of the actual generation, to guarantee public opinion against the deviations into which some seek to drag it, to protect young talents against the illusions with which the successes of a coterie might inspire them, it is the duty of an enlightened criticism to lift up its voice, to recall indefatigably what constitutes the domain of the beautiful, to honor the memory of artists who have remained faithful to it, and to combat the aberrations which tend to make us lose sight of it. This duty the author of the Biographie Universelle des Musiciens believes that he has not failed to perform."

CONCERTS.

THE PARODI-STRAKOSCH COMPANY gave their sixth and last concert in the Music Hall on Saturday evening last. All the audiences had been large, but this was the largest. We heard but a small portion of the programme, and particularly regretted to miss Beethoven's song, Adelaide, sung by Signor TIBERINI, who has done himself honor by the selection each evening of one piece of so high a character, by masters like Mozart and Beethoven. PAUL JULIEN won encores as usual by his masterly violin-playing, in which mechanical perfection seems really animated by an inward sense and feeling of beauty. But master Paul we fear is resting too contented with his laurels and does not take the pains to add much to his stock of ideas; he repeats himself too much, and "improvises" after every encore the same set of phrases as uniformly as Sig. Tiberini answers with the La donna é mobile (which by the way was meant to run in a livelier vein than his). What did PARODI sing? We have forgotten, and no matter; it was nothing new or noticeable apart from previous notices. And what did STRAKOSCH play? What pretty strains did he coax out of the splendid piano? All who have heard him once can easily imagine. Sig. BERNARDI still sustains himself as a baritone of rich and telling voice, and a singer who gives pleasure and commands respect by a chaste, natural, finished manner.

MME. CORA DE WILHORST.—This lady, whose successful debut in New York has been mentioned in our Chit-Chat, and who is a native born American vocalist, surprised our town by the announcement of a concert in the Music Hall on Wednesday evening. A romantic story introduces her, which, as we have not copied it before, we now give, following the version of the Evening Gazette:

A daughter of Reuben Withers, the well-known Banker in New York, from her earliest childhood she was singularly fond of music and has long, ere she made her appearance in the Concert-Room, been one of the charms of the select circle of which she was one of the most brilliant ornaments. Singularly enough, love—that commencement of all human joys and troubles—is the cause which has led her at present to appeal to the vocalist. Cora Withers fell in love with a young German nobleman (German nobleman means more specifically German gentleman according to American and English notions of the term) and also this young German nobleman fell in love with her. Not being a good parti, naturally enough the parental Withers disliked the probability of their being linked together. This dislike of course confirmed Cora Withers' liking, which soon ripened into love. M. De Wilhorst—the young German—made her a delicate proposition. She listened and finally acceded to his request. They ran away and were married. This happened somewhere in Switzerland, as we have been told, and has at all events been productive of happiness to themselves. How it happened we do not pretend to know, but a short time after this matters were again apparently reconciled and they were living with Mr. Withers in New York. But M. De Wilhorst, not being contented to sit at the table of his wealthy father-in-law, wished to find some calling opened to him, little doubting that this very natural desire would be promptly acceded to. On mentioning it however, he met with a decided refusal and found that, through Mr. Withers's strange decision, every chance of mercantile success would in all probability be closed upon him. Singularly enough the delicate Cora Wilhorst—a child reared in the lap of opulence and luxury—one who had hitherto practised music as a rare pleasure because she could only display it to a few of her friends—that mignonne edition of fashionable life, suggested to him that she might make sufficient to maintain themselves were she to sing in public. For a long time he contended with this wish, but at length he acceded and her first appearance was announced to take place at Newport, R. I., in August last. Of course all our readers will remember what this announcement induced—an attack upon her husband by one of her brothers, who could not see that the profession of a vocalist is as good and as honorable per se as that of a Banker or a merchant. Jenny Lind may be placed as an honorable contrast in juxtaposition with the Fauntleroy and Schuylers, and we believe that but few of our readers are there who, should Cora De Wilhorst meet with continuous success in her new vocation, would not rank her name above that of her respectable parent (of whom we confess that we have heard nothing but good) even although he be a Banker.

Mme. De Wilhorst called her entertainment, "Opera in the Drawing-Room," the programme consisting almost entirely of extracts from Il Trovatore. But there was "sandwiched" between the two parts of that a double slice of "miscellaneous," at the commencement of which it was our lot to enter the hall. Out-of-door attractions, torchlight processions, and so forth, had left her but a very moderate audience, yet respectable in numbers and in character. They wore the look of having been pleased. First came Mr. SATTER, who performed on a Chickering piano a Grand Galop Fantastique of his own, a piece of thundering force; and on being recalled, a dashing transcription with variations upon La donna é mobile. Then the lady appeared, decidedly prepossessing in appearance, petite, handsome, with a bright, intelligent face, dressed in fine taste, and with an air of self-possessed energy and confidence. One would scarce suppose her such a novice in the concert room. She sang the Brindisi from Verdi's "Macbeth," and sang it with a voice and manner that were quite captivating. Her voice though not large, is a soprano of remarkably pure, telling quality, brilliant indeed in the higher notes, with which she trills and warbles like a bird; true as a bell in intonation, filling the place perfectly. The tones impinge upon the sense with a certain hard but smooth solidity of attack, which is never offensive, but on the contrary decidedly pleasing. Her singing was very spirited and natural; her execution free and brilliant, in many parts highly finished; and she sang as if she loved it, as if nature had done more for her than art, though art had done not a little. Yet was there a coldness withal in those polished hard tones; the beauty of the thing was its fresh life and spirit, and not any peculiarly sympathetic touch of feeling.

This was more evident in her pieces from Il Trovatore, which followed: in D'amor sul ali rosee, in the duet with baritone: Qual voce, and particularly in the Miserere with tenor. The lower and middle tones, though pure and sweet, had not the largeness and dramatic strength of passion. But the pieces were all charmingly and effectively sung, leaving room enough, however, for study with a good master in cultivating the vocal faculty to a more ideal refinement. It was the brilliancy, the purity, the naturalness, the freshness of the exhibition which won her the decided favor of the audience. Altogether we may call her a bright, bird-like little person. We only hope, that besides this genuine impulse and power to revel and sparkle in the sunshine of the voice, there is also in her, conscious or latent, the something that shall prompt her to seek expression in a more soul-full and inspired kind of music. A whole evening of melodies from the Trovatore is meagre and not over-wholesome fare.

Mme. Wilhorst was assisted by our old friend the tenor, Sig. GUIDI, whose voice seems to have gained strength in retirement, and whose style was always elegant, and by a French baritone (his debut in America), M. ACHILLE RIVARDI, who has style and method, but a dry, feeble voice. Some of the music suffered in the piano-forte accompaniments, which of course were not by Mr. SATTER.

This evening Mme. DE WILHORST gives a second concert, to be made up mainly of selections from L'Etoile du Nord.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The prospect for Orchestral Concerts, we are sorry to learn, does not look very bright. The time allowed for filling up the required subscription of fifteen hundred sets of tickets will expire on Monday, and so far the list shows not the half of that number. The opportunity has been offered; if our music-lovers do not want good orchestral music enough to engage to support it at a very trifling cost—not more for the whole season than the same persons often throw away upon confectionary or oysters in a single evening—why then they must not complain should the season offer no good music when they wake up to the discovery that they still want it. We hope and pray that the day or two of grace left may bring people to their senses; for without good orchestral concerts the whole musical cause goes backwards, the standard of taste in the community is lowered. If we fail now, it will be the first time for twenty years and more, the first time since the old C minor first inspired us, that a Boston winter has been unwarmed by a Symphony of Beethoven! . . . In answer to the frequent inquiries about Opera, English or Italian, we have to say that we are quite uninformed. Whatever there is or is to be of it, goes on obscurely—hides its light under a bushel; whether this be from consciousness of inferiority, or from the modesty of merit, we cannot say. . . . We hear of changes in the relations of the music-publishing fraternity in our city. Mr. GEO. P. REED, who has so long occupied a foremost position in the trade, retires from business; Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON unites with the junior partner of G. P. Reed & Co., Mr. RUSSELL, in buying out Mr. Reed's interest and "annexing" the same to his already extensive and flourishing Musical Exchange. The union of these two forces must make a powerful establishment, and will require enlarged accommodations.

We have already spoken of the fine display of piano-fortes and reed instruments at the late Exhibition of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association. A list of premiums awarded to competitors in the various departments is at length published, filling over five closely printed columns of the Transcript. For Grand Pianos the gold medal has been awarded to the Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS; and a silver medal to TIMOTHY GILBERT & Co., who put in their first Grand on this occasion. For Semi-Grands, a silver medal to Messrs. HALLET, DAVIS & Co. For Square Pianos, the first silver medal to Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS, and the second to JAMES W. VOSE, makers of quite recent standing, whose instruments have done them great credit.—Messrs. BROWN & ALLEN, GEORGE HEWS, JACOB CHICKERING, and WILLIAM P. EMERSON receive Diplomas for Square Pianos. Bronze medals or diplomas were awarded to various makers for the cases, considered separately, of their instruments. MASON & HAMLIN receive the gold medal for their Organ Harmonium, and a silver medal for their Melodeons. Diplomas are given to A. G. CORLISS for the "Swell Mute Attachment" exhibited by Chickering & Sons; to NICHOLS & GERRISH for Melodeons, and to L. LOUIS for his Tremolo attachment to reed organs. The judges, through their chairman, Gen. H. K. OLIVER, of Lawrence, will we presume ere long report at length; when we hope to lay the report before our readers. We cannot doubt that the awards were as nearly just as it was possible to make them. They confirm our own impressions, from such casual examination of the instruments as we were able to make, in every instance.

THALBERG's first concert in New York is postponed until after the Presidential election; and Mme. ANGRI, the contralto, now upon her way from Europe, will it is said appear on that occasion.... Mr. J. NICHOLS CROUCH—he seems to have dropped the "Professor," having discovered that Professors are too common—has left Philadelphia, and now hails from Washington, D. C., where he announces himself in connection with W. H. PALMER, (the resurrection name of the late ROBERT HELLER, the pianist, necromancer, &c.) as Vocal Director of an Academy of Music. They give private musical soirées by invitation; the following is one of the programmes:

PART I.

Grand Quintet—Piano-forte, two Violins, Viola, Cello and Bass,.....Kalkbrenner.
Scene—"Friend of the Brave,".....Dr. Calcott.
Concertante Duo—Piano-forte and Violin: "Styrien Airs,".....Leonard.
Ballad—"Kathleen Mavourneen,"...By the Author.
Improvise—Piano-forte, "Crown Diamonds," Palmer.

PART II.

Grand Trio—Violin, cello and Piano-forte, Beethoven.
German Song—"The Wanderer,".....Schubert.
Cantabile—Violin,.....Mendelssohn.
Irish Ballad—"Kathleen Dear,".....By the Author.
Brilliant Selections—Piano-forte,.....Palmer.

Messrs. Crouch and Palmer (late Heller) also hold the positions respectively of maestro di capella and organist at St. Matthew's Church, where there is a fine choir, and where, with the aid of an orchestra, including some of the old Germanians, (their old leader, LENSCHOW, directing,) a musical service was recently held for the consecration of a new altar. The programme included a march by Mendelssohn; a Mass by Haydn (No. 5), with 25 in the chorus and 25 in the band; the Amen chorus by Handel; selections from Rossini's Mosè and Stabat Mater, Hymns, &c.

Handel's "Messiah" was performed last week in Philadelphia. The Bulletin says:—"There was a full orchestra, a fine organ and a strong chorus. The organ was well played, and the orchestra did tolerably, but the chorus wanted training and made sad work of the difficult choruses which constitute the chief beauty of this and all Handel's oratorios. The leading soprano part was very well sustained by Mrs. Leach, of New York. The other solo singers were Mrs. Weiss, (soprano,) Miss Kemp, (contralto,) Mr. Frazer, (tenor,) and Mr. Rohr, (baritone). Each did very well."....The Mozart Society in Worcester, Ms., have commenced rehearsals, under the leadership of Mr. EDWARD HAMILTON. Four concerts will be given during the season, the first early in November.

Mme. ERARD presented CLARA SCHUMANN, while in England, with a superb Erard piano. When shall we hear her in America—the queen of pianists, and in the true and not the mere display sphere of Art!....STAUDIGL, the great German basso, died recently in an insane asylum.

Prof. BECKER, of the Leipzig Conservatoire, the distinguished organist, has presented his entire musical library to the library of the city. This rich collection, on which he has bestowed all his care for thirty years, contains: 144 works, written in all the languages of Europe, on the acoustics, history, æsthetics and theory of music; 552 collections of Chorals of every confession, classed in chronological order from 1450 to 1852; 227 rare works, printed or in manuscript, of the 16th and 17th centuries, by masters of every school; 1250 copies of works by old masters, &c. In making this magnificent donation, Herr Becker has made this sole condition, that it shall be managed in the same way with the principal library, and be entered in the catalogue as the Becker Library.

Mme. LAGRANGE and GOTTSCHALK gave a concert last week in Philadelphia. The great cantatrice sang from "Sicilian Vespers," the "North Star," and the "Stabat Mater;" also "any piece selected by the audience out of a list of 600"; and a "Grande Valse Poétique Concertante," for piano and voice, with variations, composed for her by Gottschalk. The latter played his own compositions, an Etude by Chopin, a waltz by Wollenhaupt, and "any piece the audience might call for."....At a performance of the "Messiah" in Philadelphia, on Thursday evening, the trombone players of the Moravian Church at Bethlehem, Pa., assisted.... We have received the second number of the Deutsche Musik-Zeitung (German Musical Journal for the United States) published in Philadelphia. (No. 1 has failed to reach us). It is published every month by PHILIPP ROHR, and edited by P. M. WOLSEFFER. It is in the German language, handsome type and paper, and contains good editorials on the Gesang-vereine, on musical instruction, on the new Philadelphia opera house, on the science of harmony, &c.; also correspondence and musical news, advertisements, and three pages of new light music. It promises well.

ORGAN HARMONIUM.—The Traveller contains the following notice of these instruments, for which a gold medal was awarded by the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association:

"We have before now called attention to the instruments manufactured by Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN, Cambridge street, corner of Charles, and will do so again to note the fact that they have been awarded the two first premiums, a gold and silver medal, as the best reed instruments, by the Committee of Examination at the Mechanics' Charitable Association, whose eighth exhibition was recently held in this city.

The Organ-Harmonium furnished by Mason & Hamlin, and which drew the gold medal, was a new style, just completed, and differs from the common style, in that it is blown by another person, and has two octaves of pedals, with separate set of pedal reeds, and also a coupler to connect with the manuals, making in fact a complete organ in effect. While in the Exhibition, this instrument was examined and thoroughly tested by many of our best musicians, and the result just now announced was anticipated by all who saw it. As a substitute for the organ in organ practice, and for churches, halls and lecture rooms, where considerable force is required, without the means to procure a large organ, this instrument is a desideratum which has long been needed. The first prize (silver medal) was also awarded these gentlemen for the best Melodeons."

JENNY LIND.—Letters from Stockholm state that Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, whose relations reside in Sweden, has realized no less a sum than £45,000 by her sojourn in England; and, that having amply provided for her family, she intends to settle at Dresden, and to abstain from singing in public, unless for exclusive charitable purposes; or unless her husband, who has the ambition to compose an opera, should succeed in his effort.

Advertisements.

BEETHOVEN CONCERT SOCIETY.

IT is proposed by the Committee who managed the Orchestral Concerts of the last season to give a series of EIGHT CONCERTS at the Boston Music Hall, during the coming winter, under the name of the "Beethoven Concert Society," provided fifteen hundred sets of tickets shall be subscribed for previous to Oct. 20th.

The Orchestra will consist of at least Fifty Musicians, under the direction of CARL ZERBAHN.

Price of Tickets for the Series, to be used at pleasure, $3.

Single Tickets, $1.

Subscription Lists may be found at the Music Stores.

NATHAN RICHARDSON, Secretary,
Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

MUSICAL SOIRÉES.

OTTO DRESEL

Proposes to give his FOURTH SERIES OF FOUR SOIRÉES, At the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, during the months of December, January, February and March, on Saturday evenings to be hereafter specified.

Subscription for the Series, in packages of four tickets, $3. Subscription lists may be found at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, and at the music stores.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club,

Respectfully inform the musical public of Boston and vicinity that they will give their usual series of EIGHT CONCERTS, to take place at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. Packages of eight tickets, to be used at pleasure, $3. Single tickets will be $1 each. Lists will be out in a few days.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by Mme. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

Orders may also be addressed to

A. WILLIAMS & CO., 100 Washington St.

NEW MUSICAL WORKS,
NEARLY READY:

I.
BACH'S 48 PRELUDES AND FUGUES.
By J. SEBASTIAN BACH.

In Numbers. Complete in two vols. quarto, $5.

II.
OPERA OF IL TROVATORE.—PIANO SOLO.
Uniform in style with the previous volumes of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas." 1 vol. quarto, $2.

III.
KREUTZER'S 40 STUDIES FOR THE VIOLIN.
One volume quarto, $1.50.

IV.
THE PSALMS OF LIFE:
A Compilation of Psalms, Hymns, Chants, &c., embodying the Spiritual, Progressive and Reformatory Sentiment of the present age. By JOHN B. ADAMS.
One volume 12mo. 280 pages. Cloth, 75 cts. Leather, $1.

V.
BORDOGNI'S 36 VOCALISÉS,
FOR SOPRANO OR TENOR VOICES. (Books II. & III.)

VI.
THE MEMORARE:
A Collection of Catholic Music. By A. WERNER.

VII.
HOHMAN'S PRACTICAL COURSE OF VOCAL STUDY, ON SCHOOL PRINCIPLES.
By C. H. HOHMAN. Translated from the 5th German Revised Edition. By J. C. D. PARKER.

All of the above are in press, and will be issued at an early date.

Oliver Ditson, Publisher, 115 Washington St.

CLASSICAL PIANO MUSIC.
CHEAP, ELEGANT AND UNIFORM EDITIONS,
PRINTED FROM ENGRAVED PLATES.
With Portraits of Authors, and Thematic Catalogues, and Chromo-Lithograph Titles.

BACH, SEB. Works, including the Wohl-temper.
Clavier, 5 vols.	$5 00
BEETHOVEN'S 32 Sonatas.	8 75
27 do., (without the five last).	5 00
Miscellaneous Works, including five four-hand
Duets.	3 25
Piano Trios and Quintets, (score and parts).	9 00
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts).	7 50
Symphonies, arr. as Duets for four hands, 2 vols.	7 50
Symphonies, arr. for piano solo, by Kalkbrenner.	6 00
CLEMENTI, M. 24 Sonatas, 4 vols.	7 00
HAYDN, J. 32 Sonatas, 2 vols.	5 00
MOZART, W. A. Sonatas.	5 00
20 Miscellaneous Works, (including the Duets
for four hands.)	3 50
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts).	8 00
Piano Trios, do.	5 50
Quartets and Quintets, do.	8 75
Symphonies, (two performers.)	4 00

Also imported the Solo Works of Mendelssohn, Haydn's Piano Trios, and Sonatas for Piano and Violin, at very low prices, and in new, uniform editions.

G. ANDRÉ & CO., 306 Chestnut St.
Philadelphia, October, 1856.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,
FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
Gives instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasias, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 34 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols.	$6
additional volume of smaller works.	$3
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols.	$6
Haydn's " " 2 vols.	$6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office.

ALEX' W. THAYER.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works:

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION, WITH
AND WITHOUT ACCOMPANIMENTS,

Edited by CIPRIANI POTTER,

Principal Professor of Harmony and Composition in the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Vol. 1. Airs with Variations.	Bound in cloth, $4 88
" 2. Rondos, &c.	Do do 2 13
" 3. Duets.	Do do 4 25
" 4. Piano-Forte Sonatas.	Do do 3 75
" 5. Do do	Do do 3 75
" 6. Sonatas for Piano and Violin.	Do do 4 25
" 7. Do do	Do do 4 25
" 8. Quartets and Quintets.	Do do 8 75
" 9. Trios for Piano, Violin and 'Cello.	Do do 6 00

Each piece in the above volumes is published separately.

The fact of the collection and republication of Mozart's Pianoforte works in the middle of the present century shows that time instead of diminishing, has stamped their excellence and value. They are, indeed, true works of art, as useful as they are beautiful. Out of this school came the memorable artists, Hummel, and J. B. Cramer—players whose fingers expressed the deep feeling of music with which their nature was imbued; and if we may still hope to find their successors among the young, it must be by a train of studies similarly conducted.

Novello's Catalogue No. 4, containing an analytical and thematic index to the above works, to be had gratis at 389 Broadway, or forwarded to address on receipt of one cent postage.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pineknay Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late of St. Paul's Church.)
ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.
RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL
Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,
Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 SCHOOL ST. BOSTON.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.
First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 238.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 4.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

The Music of Hungary.

From the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," Leipzig, 1852.

The Hungarian music bears so original a character, and is so essentially distinct from the music of all other European nations, that it must interest the musician and the amateur of every grade to learn something more authentic and precise about it from the pen of one who knows. The writer of these lines, while completing his musical studies with Sechter in Vienna, in the years 1849—51, made several excursions into Hungary, principally to Pesth; but the remoter regions on the Theiss were not unvisited.

His thoughts about the Hungarian music (so far as he was able to pursue the subject with his moderate allowance of time and money) here follow. Let us understand first of all what we mean by Hungarian music.

It is well known that, of the sixteen millions who inhabit Hungary, at the most the fourth part are Magyars, that is, descendants of the Asiatic hordes who came into Europe in the ninth century, pushed through the iron gate into what is now Hungary, and here selected for their dwelling-places the broad plains either side of the Theiss and the region of the Danube up as far as Comorn. But the greatest part of the inhabitants of Hungary are Slaves; a not insignificant part consists of Germans and Wallachians, and a smaller part of Jews and Gipsies. In this great intermingling of races one may well ask, to which of these stocks does what we call in a specific sense "Hungarian music," owe its origin? Is Hungarian music synonymous with the Magyar, or with the music of the Slaves, Germans, Wallachians, Jews or Gipsies, who inhabit Hungary? The last two nations are excluded in the outset from the question of originality, for Jews and Gipsies can indeed avail themselves of what they find existing, and can make fine contributions to its development; but never in any branch of Art or industry can they impress a national stamp upon the land in which they live a scattered life as a tolerated minority; and that this is true also of Hungary the following leaves will show.

Since the character of the Hungarian music, as we have before remarked, differs essentially from every other European music, it can neither be of Slavie nor of German origin; for neither the Music of the Germans nor that of the Slavie races, Poles, Russians, Bohemians, &c., has any resemblance with the Hungarian national music. And so it stands to reason that the Hungarian music is of purely Magyar origin; without denying, of course, that the physical peculiarities of the country, as well as the non-Magyar races themselves, who inhabit Hungary, have exercised more or less influence on the development of this music.

What is it now that places the Hungarian popular music in so strange a relation to all other European music? It is, above all, its Rhythm—the rhythm both in the parts of the measure and in the combination of measures. Thus, while all the other Western music in the even kinds of measure (2-4, 4-4 measure, &c.) lets the accent fall, as a general rule, upon the strong divisions of the measure, one and three, exactly the contrary is the case in the Hungarian music. Our weak parts of the measure are with them the strong ones, and if we place the accent upon one and three, the Hungarian in most cases accents two and four. This rhythm gives the Hungarian music its heroic, proud, defiant character, while at the same time it expresses the yet rude, unbroken temper of this warlike and chivalric nation. Moreover, we find in a whole series of Magyar popular melodies alternate even and odd numbers of measures, and rhythms of seven bars are of very frequent occurrence. As the Hungarian People's Music (and of this I speak first of all) knows merely the even measures, and knows nothing of a 3-4, 3-8, or even 6-8 measure, we may regard the occurrence in Hungarian popular airs of the three, five, and seven-bar rhythms as a compensation for the entire want of the uneven measures in this music. These uneven rhythms (of several bars or measures) are not, to be sure, universally the law in the Hungarian popular music; on the contrary, so far as dance music is concerned, the four-bar rhythm is equally prevalent. I may cite here as an example one of the most beautiful and heart-felt of the Hungarian melodies, in which this remarkable phenomenon occurs. It sounds in this way:

And this occurs in a multitude of popular dances; so that the good Nügeli is mistaken when he maintains, in his ingenious lectures upon music, that "all dances of all nations consist of not more and not less than four times four measures."

But the Hungarian music is distinguished from that of the rest of Europe not merely by its Rhythm, but also by its Melody; not merely extensively, but also intensively. First, it is the predominant tendency to the Minor Mood, by which this music betrays its oriental character in general; then again it is especially the way and manner in which the Magyar Apollo moves in this mournful costume. The superfluous second plays an important part in the Hungarian minor tunes. If we try to reduce the melodic character of the latter, independently of its particular application, to the general criterion of the scale, we find the following scheme of the Hungarian minor mood:

So we find it, for instance, in the famous Rákoczy March:

And an equally genuine Magyar nota (Hungarian popular tune) begins thus:

Hers the superfluous second is used even in the ascending direction. The superfluous second, of which they are so fond in a melodic regard, makes itself available also in the harmony of the Hungarian music in a chord to which the minor airs of this nation are everywhere partial. This is the superfluous Quint-Sext Chord, or the chord with a pure fifth and superfluous sixth, as found for the most part toward the end of their melodies, but also earlier, in a great many Hungarian minor airs, especially in their Lassus (Adagios); for instance, continuing the minor tune already begun a few bars further, we hear:

As a farther peculiarity of the Hungarian minor airs, we may remark, that they generally close in the major chord with the major third; at least the Hungarian gipsies, of whose proficiency in this music more will be said hereafter, constantly make this close; and the Hungarian musician recognizes it as at least adequate to the spirit of his national music, if he does not always observe this himself. We may show this by the characteristic closing cadence which recurs in every genuine Magyar nota (Hungarian air):

Apart from the less essential, although characteristic phenomenon of a minor melody ending with a major harmony, (which, to be sure, frequently occurs also in German composers, as Sebastian Bach and others, only not as a popular practice, as it does in the Hungarian music,) we have here observed at the same time the rhythmical peculiarity, that the conclusion of the melodic accent falls upon a weak part of the measure; and this is throughout the case in the Hungarian music. The formula above given is rhythmically, melodically and harmonically the genuine concluding formula of every Magyar nota, even of that major melody before cited with a rhythm of three and seven bars. The uneven rhythm of several measures is most striking, where the melody itself, according to our feeling, seems to struggle against it. Thus, for example, an altogether elegant csárdás (pronounced tschaardaasch, the name of the Hungarian people's dance and of the corresponding dance music), in its second part sounds thus:

Who of my readers would not expect it to go on after the fifth measure in this way:

With whom, if unaccustomed to this rhythm, does it not call forth a painfully unsatisfied feeling? This is but a little episode regarding rhythm, and now to our remarks about the harmony of the Hungarian popular melodies.

[To be continued.]

The Piano-Forte.

From the London and Westminster Review, 1839.
(Continued from page 18.)

"The first of those who followed in Beethoven's train was FERDINAND RIES, something of whose nature as a man and pretensions as an artist, may have already been indicated by the passages just quoted from the 'Notizen.' Every musician is familiar with the anecdote of his having forced praise from Beethoven by the execution of an enormously difficult cadence, introduced by him into one of his master's concertos, which the latter almost forbade him to attempt in public:—and the older race of English professional instrumentalists still recollect the surprise excited by the announcement of his first appearance in London to perform his own Concerto in C sharp minor,—a signature within the intricate circle of which few dared venture! These two artistic feats were types of the man's intrepidity. It was in traveling through Russia—always a hospitable country to pianoforte players—that the success, denied until he entertained thoughts of quitting the profession, began to follow Ries. He ensured it by gathering and setting the melancholy and quaint airs of the north in a rich frame-work of scientific form and ornamental execution. In many of his earlier works, the principal melodies are Danish, Russian, or Norwegian. The powers of Ries as a pianist, which declined after his taking up his residence in England, in proportion as he submitted closely to the drudgery of lesson giving, were then remarkable, and worthy of Beethoven's only pupil. In one requisite, namely—that utter independence which enables the right and left hand each to work its own will, however different be the time,—he was almost unequalled, and hence his more showy compositions are full of examples of that tour de force. Indeed, to execute the C sharp minor Concerto aforesaid, steadily, but with the unstudied expression which it demands, is almost as difficult an undertaking as the young aspirant can propose to his fingers: moreover, for its thorough execution, he must possess something of fantasy as well as of feeling. For Ries, though following closely in his master's track—nay, at times even servilely imitating the very letter of his music—is essentially more fantastic than Beethoven—less loftily sustained—using a larger proportion of abrupt modulations, and fierce fragmentary phrases, and closes suspended without reason. These features are caricatured in his weakest works; in his best, Ries displays a vein of melody at once graceful and original. He has also left us, a more decided specimen of picture music in his 'Dream' Fantasia than had been hitherto attempted on the pianoforte, unless those ancient enormities, the 'Battle of Prague,' and the 'Surrender of Toulon,' were allowed to pass as classical. Beethoven, indeed, had given emotions in his Adieu, Absence, et Retour,—suggested a tone of coloring in his pastorale Sonata—but in the 'Dream' a more distinct outline is attempted, and the shapes which haunt the pillow of the sleeper—now tender, now warlike, now portentous—are portrayed with a happy boldness and contrast. As specimens of two manners of working completely different, the student of the picturesque cannot do better than compare this with the 'Dream' by Moscheles, the last but one of the latter's 'Characteristic Studies.' The fault of Ries lay in his fertility, and in the absence of such scrupulousness as makes an artist question rather than accept those ideas which catch his notice by their simplicity; but his works have not deserved the neglect into which they have fallen in England. One in every ten is eminently worthy of revival and careful study. And the justice here desired for him ought to be paid with all the greater good will, inasmuch as he adorned the intellectual school of instrumental music by those moral excellences which, if not indispensable to its existence, contribute largely to its maintenance."

"That the theory which would connect what is true and genuine and intellectual in Art with what is beautiful and sound in character, may not want further examples, the name of CARL MARIA VON WEBER may next be mentioned. His devoted life and his melancholy death are too well known to require being once again cited for the illustration of his works. Weber was far more romantic than Ries—but far more scrupulously original, and far more constantly master of the power of exhibiting his ideas to the best advantage. After Beethoven's pianoforte Sonatas, there exist none more highly toned, bolder in their invention, fresher in their melodies, than his four grand works of the same class—the first movement of the one in A flat, for the expression of romantic melancholy, stands almost alone in music, while the opening allegro of that in D minor has a startling and colossal boldness. Weber, too, loved to develop those rhythmical forms, such as give their character to the dance and the national melody, but 'with a difference.' He had his own way of giving its crowning impishness to the scherzo. He had his own peculiar passages. There is one brilliant spray-shower of notes which, whether in the 'Victoria Chorus' of Der Freischütz, or in the joyous finale to the first act of Euryanthe, or in the working up of the Aufforderung zum Tanze, or in the stretto to the Concert Stück—that first and best of all concertos alla fantasia—as inevitably indicates its master as a white horse does a picture by Wouvermans; of the ripe lip and luscious eye of a Spanish peasant, the most devotional group by Murillo. Other original and characteristic forms are to be traced in Weber's music, though its chief merit lies not in form. The student will there discover early examples of melody and accompaniment given to the same hand;—the mechanist will perceive that constant disposition to stretch beyond the octave, recently exaggerated so frightfully. Some excellent specimens of popular composition, too, will be found, to the surprise of those critics who still write of Weber as if he could produce no other such music than that which had traveled from the Harz Mountain in the private satchel of Zaniel or Mephistopheles. Any one comparing his variations upon the melody from Mehul's 'Joseph' with those of Herz upon the same theme, must admit that in variety, grace, and that poorest requisite for producing effect, difficulty to be overcome,—to say nothing of such trifles as science, expression, and character,—the transcendental German could beat the most piquant writer of the gew-gaw school on his own debatable ground. It is to be regretted, that Weber's early death, and the dramatic course taken by his talents, make his contribution to the stores of orchestral or chamber music for the pianoforte comparatively limited."

The following analysis of the talents and compositions of MOSCHELES is very just, and cannot fail to interest our readers. The reviewer places him in the school of genius, though he came forward while the mere executionists had the field.

"Before this heartless school had reached its fullest glory a young artist appeared, who promised on his outset largely to contribute to the wonders of the pianoforte, and played so, to quote the Goethe and Zelter correspondence, 'that one was obliged to taste of the waters of Lethe, and forget all one had ever heard before. The fellow has hands,' continues the writer, 'which he turns in and out like a garment, and even with the nails he does not play badly.' This was Moscheles, whose 'Fall of Paris,' on its tour of triumph throughout Europe, eclipsed all the most marvelous of its predecessors. But even in those variations, professedly written to strike and to enchant, no musician, though he might be as adverse to 'French foam' as Zelter himself, could fail to detect a nervousness of structure—a disposition to travel out of the beaten track of harmony, which showed that a new mind was at work. That mind belonged to one who is now our first thinker for his instrument. Whether in the performance or the compositions of Moscheles, it is impossible not to perceive how remarkably great mechanical powers and consummate scientific experience have been placed wholly at the disposal of a clear and fine intellect. What was said of a deceased authoress applies to him, 'Some are led to thought through poetry,' but he has been 'led to poetry through thought.'"

"Few artists have tested themselves so severely in their intercourse with the public, as Moscheles has done; no one within the circle of our experience stood the test with such uniform success. For there is no style of music, from the fugues of Bach to the follies of Herz, which he has not performed; and there is none in which he has failed. For force and clearness of finger, in all sprightly, petulant passages, he is unrivaled. The place of Moscheles, among the musicians of Europe, will become higher and more influential every year, for the mellowing process progressively discernible in his compositions and in his performance, is far from having reached its climax."

We come last of all, to FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY, with whom the reviewer closes the account of the school of genius.

"One more artist is yet to be mentioned, before closing the record of the legitimate German school of modern pianoforte music—one more confirmation to be deduced of our theory that high mental and moral endowments, are the strongest pillars on which the temple of Art rests. This is Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Young as he is, he has conquered almost every form of composition. He might be made the subject of an article for his organ-playing, if his pianoforte compositions did not demand our attention; and his oratorio of 'St. Paul' in its stately simplicity comes so near to the massive works of Handel, that it is not chimerical to expect that the opera upon which he is known to be at present engaged for the English stage, may introduce into our lyric drama effects scarcely less grand—scarcely less severely natural than those which make Gluck's 'Orfeo' and 'Iphigenia' model works. Though Mendelssohn's earliest pianoforte works, the quartets, show that he, too, possesses that splendor of execution to which the most ceaseless chain of difficulties is no more than a string of common notes,—their author had scarcely reached the full use of his powers when he began at once to take the loftiest ground by writing for a full orchestra, and to throw into his compositions on that grand scale a picturesqueness of fancy which some had feared had left the world with Weber. His early love for the organ, and his initiative studies under Zelter, had already led him back beyond the imaginative present to the grave and severe past, and familiarized him with the gigantic works of Sebastian Bach. Such natural gifts—such a course of study, have stamped his music with a character at once picturesque and solid.

"His melodies, it must be noted, have introduced a novelty to the pianist, and have brought him yet closer to the vocal performer than he had hitherto been brought, by calling upon him for that distinctness and appropriateness of expression hitherto supposed the exclusive property of the singer. The further that Mendelssohn has advanced in his career, the more scrupulously and systematically has he separated himself from the finger-musicians. But where their artifices may come legitimately into use he wields them with a hand strong as it is careless."

We shall conclude our extracts from the above periodical, by some notices of a few of the most distinguished pianists of the fifth or marvelous school.

"There remain still to be mentioned the most recent pianists who form what may be called the marvellous school. For, whereas those just dismissed thought it good to regard the capabilities and physical structure of the hand, and thus have written music within the power of any one gifted with the common complement of fingers,—these innovators have begun by defying the inequalities and feebleness of nature, and have thus produced works which are but little likely to penetrate from the studio or concert saloon of the professional artist into the chamber of the amateur. There is an amusing anecdote told of a Parisian woman of fashion, who, in a conference with her modiste, being hindered in the execution of some subtle invention by a most unwelcome increase of corpulence, exclaimed, with all the despotism of waning beauty, 'I won't have all this here! You must put it somewhere else!' With a like resolution to be stronger than nature, do MM. HENSELT and CHOPIN appear to have trained themselves, and (though to a less extent) the most astonishing pianist who has hitherto visited England,—we mean, of course, THALBERG. The average span of the hand comprehends little more than an octave;—but their music constantly demands tenths, elevenths, twelfths, from the player. The third and fourth fingers are naturally the weakest and the most intimately connected together;—but, totally callous to this feebleness and brotherly union, Chopin (vide his Ninth Study, book second) calls upon them constantly to execute the interval of a fifth, under circumstances peculiarly harassing; while Henselt, in his 'Midnight Meeting of Ghosts,' (see his 'Etudes de Salon,') insists upon the octave being struck by the first and fourth fingers, that the thumb may be free for a flight some notes further! So also has the position and the office of the said thumb been remorselessly revolutionized. From being the pivot of the hand it has been made to do the work of an independent hand itself, while the fingers it once supported now play round it as accompanying satellites and subsidiaries. Flesh and blood will not bear this 'movement' should be carried much further: but it must be noted, that these modern reformers have much greater excuse for their proceedings than the mechanists of the brilliant school. For their extreme measures are intended to encourage a style of composition in which,—however complicated, or strange, or rapid, be the ornamental passage,—the predominance of a broad flowing melody is still to be asserted, and the progression of harmonic changes to receive its last attainable enrichment.

"As a pianist, M. HENSELT is perhaps the most marvellous. He has stretched and tormented his fingers—till the desideratum of the Parisian belle seems to have been attained—and they have been rendered capable of working his pleasure in defiance of nature and probability. Herr Rellstab, in one of a series of critical and personal notices, published not long since, in the 'Berliner Conversations-Blatt,' speaks of him as the admitted equal of Thalberg, Liszt and Chopin.—The first said to Moscheles, 'I can play all that Henselt can;—but, adds Rellstab, 'if Henselt made the same remark with respect to Thalberg, he might add, 'and more besides.'—For Henselt has power over music of every style and school; and in weighing the two, into his balance must be put all such merit and experience as belong to a composer—Thalberg's music being good for little, save when Thalberg plays it; whereas Henselt's is full of idea and melody as well of tours de force. Henselt is further described by Herr Rellstab as a very genius: in his manners untutored—wholly devoted to his art—and therefore not likely perhaps, to gain that universal popularity as a chamber musician, for the acquisition whereof, tact, suavity of address, and knowledge of the world are required. He is so nervous, moreover, as to lose a part of his wonderful powers when he enters the orchestra.

"By this allusion to the newest of the new school of pianists, we have been led away from him to whom precedence, according to chronological order, should have been given. But the peculiarities of THALBERG's manner as a performer—his soundness and richness of touch, wheroby, and by a most judicious employment of the pedal, tone is diffused of a consistence, and to an extent, never attained by any previous player—the deliberate and expressive delivery of his melodies, in which his performance, though less dramatic and passionate than Pasta's singing, possesses the same incomparable features of breadth and dignity—the amazing brilliancy of his execution, never broken by an angular or an incomplete note—have been too recently heard in English ears to require a deliberate recapitulation. And Thalberg's characteristics, be it remembered, are as yet principally those of an executive artist. We agree with Herr Rellstab's judgment. With the exception of a few graceful Nocturni, three Caprices, and a few studies peculiar rather than interesting, Thalberg has given to the world nothing but grand Fantasias upon operatic themes, and these possessing too few original features to warrant much augury being ventured for their composer's career. Moreover, in his choice for performance of the works of other artists, Thalberg appears to avoid grappling with the highest efforts of thought and fancy. He will be always heard with wonder and delight; there is something, too, most engaging in his youthful and gracious presence—in the total absence of every thing like stage effect and quackery in his intercourse with the public—in his leaving all airs and graces to meaner and older men. But it must be confessed that there exists a wonder yet rarer, and a delight yet more exalted—those, namely, which owe themselves to the master-mind—than any that have been hitherto awakened even by his fascinating performances.

"As a composer, one of the most remarkable artists of the marvellous school is FREDERIC CHOPIN. With him we enter the circle of instrumental art as it exists at present in Paris; for though born near Warsaw in the year 1810, he has for the last seven years wholly resided in the French metropolis, and there gained his reputation as a chamber-player—his touch being too delicate, and his physical power too far behind the warmth of his conceptions, to make him eminent in an orchestra.

"This delicacy and exquisite finish have led to the rumor of his being one of Field's pupils. It was not so, however. Chopin, whose talents fit him for any profession, was not brought up to his art. He was educated at the college of Warsaw, and the course of his studies only changed in consequence of bad health. 'Chopin never improvises,' writes a friend, and one well able to appreciate him, 'as a matter of course, or unless he feels himself thoroughly inspired; but if you have the good fortune of meeting him on one of these happy days—if you follow the play of his animated countenance and the wonderful agility of his fingers, which appear as if they were dislocated—if you hear the anguish (pleurissement) of the strings, which still vibrate in your ear after he has ceased,—you waken as if from a dream, and ask if the pale and fragile man you see before you can be the same as he who has so completely subdued you.' It must be borne in mind that this character is a translated one. But there is much in Chopin's works to bear out his enthusiastic admirer. Those who approach them will be at first repelled by their desperate difficulty. His very alphabet, as has been already hinted, appears to contain a double number of letters. His chords require a hand strained according to the new fashion—his passages appear to be written with a perverse disposition not to flow as the ears and fingers expect. Moreover, there is an indescribable ton de musette running throughout the whole—difficult in the first instance to relish. When, however, the peculiar humor of Chopin is understood, much that is excellent and original develops itself—a spontaneous wildness of melody—an elegance which, to quote a phrase of Landor's, never 'drips into languors'—a passion which carries along the performer to attempt passages impossible to him in less poetical works.

"There is still to be added to the above catalogue the name of LISZT: a name hitherto only familiar to the few in England. And yet, some fifteen years ago, when a young English prodigy, George Aspull, was going the round of our musical circles, the young Hungarian (for Liszt is a native of Hungary and of peasant origin) was also performing his impossibilities on the piano in London in the presence of George the fourth. He was then for a time forgotten: till some half-dozen years since, when the tales of Paganini's long hair and slight figure were at their height, a companion marvel was naturally wanted for the piano—yet more eccentric—yet more a genius—with locks yet more profuse, and a countenance yet more desolate,—and the world began to hear again of Liszt! To speak seriously, the power, caprices, the inequalities, the wonderful genius, and the wonderful impertinences of his pianoforte playing, reached England in report—and with them Dantan's caricature of the enthusiast sprawling against his instrument—before it became also understood that these were but the excrescences of husk, as it were, and that a sound kernel, and one full of life, was thereby concealed. As, therefore, a strong personal interest and curiosity has been excited among the musical public in England with respect to Liszt, a few fragments may not be inopportunistically given from the MS. journal of a fervent lover of Art, who passed the winters of 1835 and 36 in Paris, and fell into the midst of the musical virtuosi, at the house of Ferdinand Hiller, who 'if he had not deserved a foremost place among his gifted friends as a musician, must always be remembered as a most amiable host.'

"Here," says he, "would come Cherubini, and Onslow, and Baillot, the violinist. The two former never performed themselves, and I remember that one evening that Liszt and Hiller had played a duet on the pianoforte with excessive brilliancy, Onslow, half applauding the splendor of the execution, half displeased with the fioriture they had scattered over the composition, very innocently asked who had composed the piece. He was informed—and he had not suspected it—that it was his own!

"I once heard the greatest living French poet observe that there were then but two people of GENIUS in the world—Malibran and Liszt. Certainly, out of a thousand first-rate men, anybody would in ten minutes select Liszt as one of the foremost of them all. One night in particular he gave a public concert in Paris at the Salle St. Jean. When the last duet began I chanced to be sitting at the end of Liszt's instrument. As it proceeded I felt such a storm of energy in his performance, that the boards on which we were placed seemed to spring with life. It was a crash of notes—a passion so intense, so vehement, so violent, that it rose to a strong hysteric, and the artist, after one tremendous sweeping chord, fell back in the arms of his friends."

"With the name of Liszt the labor in hand closes; for being bound to omit all such professors of the art as have brought few additions to its resources, many admirable mechanists must necessarily be passed over."

"From what has been said, it will be readily deduced that our views of the prospects of pianoforte music are full of hope. It has been shown how that which is great and true in the elder masters of the art has not only stood its ground, but is increasingly made a rallying-point, while, even in that which is difficult and mechanical, whether in London, or Paris, or Vienna, there appears such a recognition of thought and purpose on the part of rising composers, as encourages us to expect that new styles may yet be invented, new works yet produced, based on sound foundations—and, therefore, of a permanent beauty and elevation. The chamber-musician, for whose pleasure and guidance the foregoing pages have been written, cannot for an instant mistake the line of study which we would recommend to him—nor be unaware that, in such recommendation, we have had a regard for the intellectual and moral developments of his sense of the Beautiful: as distinguished from the aimless and wasteful adoption of a pursuit as merely adding one to the pleasures of sense. H. F. C."

The Cologne Saenger-Fest.

(From Letters on Music in Germany, by the Musical Critic of the London Morning Post.)

Amongst the most interesting of recent musical events in Germany was the grand "Cologne Sönger-fest," given in aid of the fund for completing the cathedral. There was such a coming and going through the narrow streets of this far more ancient than commodious city—such hurrying to and fro in hot haste—such excitement amongst the rubicund, tight-laced, military officials—bewilderment of foreigners (especially Englishmen, who were present, of course, en masse) as one never sees in England, even at our greatest music meetings. It was really a sight to be remembered. The curious old gothic saints who stand, as you know, in equally curious little niches at quaint corners of still quainter streets, or lean in cleverly-balanced holiness and ingeniously-poised benevolence over shop or house doors, all seemed to have been dusted and furnished up for the occasion, and certainly looked, with their queer little eyes and sharp mediæval features, as if they took a keen interest in the festival and its receipts.

On the first morning, when I sallied forth in search of music and sights, everybody appeared to be running everywhere and arriving nowhere. Vainly did drums beat and trumpets sound—vainly did large bills in excessively bad type, placed upon inaccessible heights, with a glaring sun full upon them, offer their official information; for we could neither understand these (doubtless perfectly eloquent) military signals, nor the very high German of the placards. No programme could I procure for the moment, and so rushed about, like many others, consoling myself with the reflection—"Cologne, after all, is not very large, and by going everywhere I must eventually get to the right spot, and that probably before nightfall."

At length, however, fortune threw in my way a gentleman, who, judging from his extraordinary corpulence, numerous decorations, and the almost incredible tightness of his stock and coat, I at once set down for an official of great importance, and to him I thought of addressing myself. The huge cheeks, heavily bubbling over the military neck fetter, the twinkling good-natured grey eyes, beside other favorable physical inclinations, inspired me with the belief that he would prove a kind and useful guide, quand même, and so having made up my mind to address him, I lost not an instant in doing so; for, to speak candidly, I had serious apprehensions of his earthly career being abruptly terminated before I could get the necessary information. He positively looked as if he might burst at any moment. Well, now I found out that the burgomaster and corporation, the patrons of the festival, Count Fürstenberg, Baron von Möller, General von Gansauge (Anglicé Goose-eye), and the members of the building committee were parading about to receive the various deputations of singers at the railway and steamboat stations. This was about 8 a.m. After wondrous cheering, "willkommens" and "lebe-hochs," military band performances, vigorous pushing, squabbling, flag-waving, &c., the singers, four hundred in number, were marched in triumph, under flying banners, through gaily decorated streets to the "Hof von Brabant," where they were again, and more formally, welcomed by the patrons, &c. Here a sumptuous entertainment was provided, and the ceremony of drinking the "Ehren-wein" performed. The "Ehren-wein" is the "wine of honor" offered to a distinguished guest; and rarely has there been heard such a chinking and tinkling of glasses as the "anstoßen" of these many-hundred drinkers produced. After some complimentary and appropriate remarks from General von Goose-eye, and other patrons and members of the committee, came the distribution of cards of admission and programmes, which was effected in a becomingly methodical and pompous manner. Then, about 11 a.m. (they had been "at it" three hours already), we had the solemn procession of all concerned in the festival, amounting to nearly six hundred, which was really a very brilliant and grand thing of its kind. The white-faced houses, with their pretty green jalousies, their door-posts wreathed with flowers, their windows crowded with spectators, and decorated from top to bottom with flaunting flags and gay devices, seemed to smile on the passing pageant as it moved over the Alten-markt, the Heu-markt, the Malhias-Follen, and Rheinaustrasse, amid the crash of military music and the shouts of the populace. At 3 o'clock p.m. was the café-visite in the Königs' Halle, and at 4 a grand concert by the 400 singers, including "prize singing" between the representatives of the various choral societies, no less than 20 of which had sent deputations to do honor to the occasion. At eight p.m. there was a grand ball in the Vaudeville Theatre, in the course of which the names of the victors in the prize singing were officially proclaimed amid acclamations. The first day's festival, that lasted from eight a.m. till about midnight—16 hours of promenading, shouting, staring, speechifying, singing, playing, eating, drinking, smoking, and dancing! Talk of the Englishman's capacity for enduring long entertainments after this!

I told you yesterday how the good people of Cologne celebrated the first day of their grand "Sönger-fest" with unflagging zeal during sixteen hours, and have now to record the exhibition of similar powers of endurance on their part throughout the second day. On this occasion, however, there was less parading and fuss, but more music. The grand concert in the Königs-hallé was indeed the chief attraction. The programme included, among other things, Weber's Jubilee overture; selections from Richard Wagner's Lohengrin and Tannhäuser, with the overture to the latter; the Carnival of Venice, with variations for a full orchestra, by one Hamm;

Mendelssohn's overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and the "Wedding March," from the same, with the chorus of priests from Mozart's Die Zauberflöte. Some of the "prize singing" at the first concert, of which I have already spoken, was perfect in every respect. In England we have doubtless excellent choristers. Our sopranos are generally better than those of Germany, whilst the Teutonic basses, for the most part, surpass ours. In physical means, then, the two nations are (musically speaking) about on an equality; but it is by careful training, patient preparation, and more intelligent direction, that the Germans frequently realize a result which we rarely attain. The same thing may be said with respect to their orchestral performances. Even where the individual talent is smaller, the ensemble, owing to the above causes, is generally more satisfactory. English executants will not take sufficient trouble; they appear to have a national antipathy to rehearsals, and their directors, especially the chorus-master, are not always quite as enlightened and pains-taking as they might be. The eternal "Oh, it's all right!" and "It will 'go' at night," of the English orchestral players, are but too familiar to those unhappy composers who have even staked their reputation upon some new and important work, composed for our dear public, which criticizes, after all, more severely than any other. It is also no unusual thing to see choristers walk in at a last rehearsal, and even on that marvellous "night" of performance, when everything is sure to "go," with music in their hands which they never saw before. There is no question that the English orchestral players are wonderful readers and extraordinarily quick at catching the spirit of a new composition—Spohr, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Berlioz, and other unquestionable authorities, have borne honorable testimony to this fact; but they abuse their powers, and the consequence is, that they rarely play with that perfect ensemble and delicate observance of the nuances of expression which we find in many continental bands, even in those of smaller pretensions.

The local choral societies engaged in this amicable strife were those of the Concordia, Harmonie, and Handwerker-gesang-verein, whilst those of no less than twenty neighboring towns, some of which are scarcely more than villages, each sent in their contingent. Of course no invidious distinctions should be made, no condemnatory criticisms published, with respect to the performances of amateurs and artists, all of whom came forward to do their best in a good cause; but it may be stated, nevertheless, that although the separate executancy of some of the choirs was not always irreproachable, the general effect was highly honorable to all concerned. Certain pieces, indeed, in which the combined forces of the 400 were employed, were rendered with a precision, justness of intonation, and chiaro-oscuro which left nothing to wish for.

The ball in the evening, at the Vaudeville Theatre, was one of those frank, jolly, gemüthlich affairs, which one meets with only in Germany.

The concert of the following day served to display the powers of the band, numbering sixty performers, to considerable advantage. It certainly was not the best of the best; such as we may hear, for instance, in London or the great cities of the continent; but there was no lack, nevertheless, of that spirit of ensemble, observance of the accents, points of expression, and lights and shade, without which the efforts of the most dexterous players remain imperfect. We had more than enough of the "artiste of the future," Richard Wagner, whose confused, noisy, frantic, and almost impossible (!) overture to Tannhäuser taxed the powers of the band to the utmost, and must have absorbed for its rehearsal a very large portion of time and attention, which might have been much more profitably employed. The present ascendancy of this clever sophist over the musical mind of Germany, formerly so remarkable for the purity, soundness, and echtheit of its taste, is really extraordinary. It is quite delightful, after all this impotent raving—this "sound and fury signifying nothing"—to turn to the simply grand and beautiful chorus of Mozart, the exquisitely poetical Midsummer Night's Dream overture, and the clear, magnificently bright, and nobly joyous "Wedding March," by Mendelssohn, to all of which great justice was done by the band. The choristers again on this occasion distinguished themselves most honorably. The judges of the "prize-singing" were the cathedral kapellmeister, Leibl, Professor Breitenstein, the royal music-director, Töpler, Rheinthal, (favorably known to the London public through an oratorio of his composition performed last season at St. Martin's Hall), Schallmeyer, W. Herr, and ten others selected from the various choral societies. The prizes consisted solely of gold and silver medals and goblets, bearing appropriate inscriptions.

I am unable at present to tell you to what extent the building fund has been benefited by this admirable festival; but, judging from the very large attendance on each day, I am inclined to believe that a considerable sum must have been realized. It were unfair to close this notice without stating that the principal artists of the Cologne Opera, and the excellent band of the 33rd regiment of the line, also gave their assistance on the occasion, and contributed largely to the general attractions of the meeting. On the day following the festival, the first general assemblage of the "Christian Art Union of Germany" took place in Cologne. The meeting was inaugurated by the performance of High Mass in the cathedral, when Palestrina's celebrated "Missa Solennis" was given with perfectly sublime effect. Of this, however, and other things, I shall have more to tell you in my next despatch.

P. S. I re-open the parcel to inform you that His Majesty the King of Prussia has just sent the Red Order of the Eagle, fourth class, to M. Panzeron of Paris, whom Berlioz has immortalized as the physician for Les Melodies Secrètes. This news will greatly astonish the musical world of London and Paris, I assure you.

(From the New York Musical World.)

The New York Philharmonic Society.

From the annual report of this flourishing institution we make the following extracts, which will interest our readers:

"A season of unprecedented prosperity has proved to us that the interest enlisted in our performances is commensurate with our increased efforts to deserve it. In saying this, we would, however, not be understood as arrogating to ourselves absolute perfection. If we may be permitted to compare our concerts with those of our sister societies, for instance, the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts, the Old and New Philharmonic Societies of London, and those of the Conservatoire of Paris, it will be found that, whatever superiority is reasonably claimed for them does not consist so much in the greater capabilities of the orchestra, individually considered, as in the perfection of its ensemble, attainable only after many years practising together. Ours, being comparatively a young society, is constantly gathering new strength by adding now only members of undoubted talent; many older members, who formed the nucleus of our society, having, in consideration of not constantly practising their respective instruments, with commendable self-denial relinquished their places in the orchestra, and by their outside influence and maturer council at our meetings, show that conscious pride of having been instrumental in forming (may we be allowed to say it?) the noblest institution of the kind in America.

"In referring once more to our trans-Atlantic brethren, we would state one more reason why the concerts of the Conservatoire are superior to ours, nay, as it is maintained, to all others, in the execution of Beethoven's and Mozart's symphonies; the fact is, they seldom play any other. Granting the unsurpassed beauties and grandeur of those immortal masters, it must doubtless appear strange to any one being used to such varied programmes as we present to our audiences, to learn that the no less admirable creations of Mendelssohn, Spohr, Schubert, Gade, Robert Schumann and others of more recent date, are scarcely known there. That the constant repetition of the same pieces, and the consequent familiarity of every musician with every note of them, there being so little change in the performance and the performers, must greatly contribute to a very perfect rendering of the same, cannot be wondered at, but to us it seems a doubtful policy, to say the least of it, nor would we have touched upon the subject if it were not for the purpose of answering those who, notwithstanding the variety of compositions brought before our audiences, complain of occasional repetitions of favorite pieces.

"Others more conservative, but doubtless as well meaning, would prefer to hear the compositions of the older masters oftener, find fault with us for introducing newer works. Under these circumstances, it will readily be admitted that it is not an easy task, if possible at all, to please every one. We have endeavored to do our best in this regard by pursuing a middle course, so as to satisfy the different predilections of our hearers. The programmes of our concerts will show that we generally have had one, if not two, new orchestral pieces in every concert. It is hoped that this explanation will prove satisfactory to our patrons, and we would be glad if we could dispose as easily of another complaint more serious, because more just.

"It is the insufficient accommodations of our associate members and subscribers at our concerts and rehearsals. The only apology we have to offer is, that unprepared as we were for so great an increase of our associate members, and being obliged to engage the rooms for concerts and rehearsals in advance and for the whole season, we could not go to a larger place, and therefore could do no more than stop the sale of extra tickets at rehearsals. This we did reluctantly, not on account of the pecuniary loss to us, but because we were violating the very condition on which the rehearsal tickets were bought, namely, that the same conferred the privilege of buying extra tickets at 50 cents each. At concerts the money has been returned in many instances, where complaint was made that no proper accommodation could be found. It is, however, confidently hoped that the new Board of Directors will exert themselves to the utmost to obliterate the remembrance of these grievances by more circumspect arrangements. In conclusion, we would urge upon actual members a continuance of that strict attention to their duties, and thank them for their co-operation in carrying out the principal object of our association, 'The improvement of instrumental music.'

The following condensed statement of the treasurer's report will show how the money comes and how it goes:

Balance on hand from last season.....	$ 140 38
Received by Scharfenberg & Luis.....	4,570 00
" " L. Spier.....	4,520 50
Total receipts.....	$9,230 88
PAID OUT.
Amount of Dividends.....	$5,077 25
Rent—Niblo's Concert Room and Garden, and Mercer House.....	1,483 90
Professional Aid.....	374 00
Salaries—Secretary, Librarian and Messenger.....	342 75
Doorkeeper and collecting.....	110 40
Music, purchased, copied and arranged.....	101 91
Advertising.....	128 10
Printing.....	252 00
Sinking Fund, amount drawn therefrom and refunded with interest.....	155 00
" " amount of Fines.....	183 75
Donation to Mrs. Sauer.....	68 50
Sundries (fully explained in Secretary's Report).....	320 12
Total expenditures.....	$8,596 78
RECAPITULATION.
Amounts received.....	$9,230 88
" " paid out.....	8,596 78
Balance on hand, $634 10

From the more minute financial report, we learn that members have been fined, during the year, to the extent of $188 75; that lawyer-fees have been paid in $30 00; that Mr. Bergmann received for his services $150 00, and the Brothers Mollenhauer $50 00.

That the system of the society is a rigorous one we learn from the fact that ten members (whose names are mentioned) have lost their membership in consequence of non-payment of taxes according to the constitution. The names of three associate members are also printed in full who have not paid their dues.

The orchestra comprises 28 violins, 10 violas, (led last year by Theo. Eisfeld) 8 violoncellos, 8 double basses, 3 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 2 trumpets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 1 drum. Total 73.

Among 21 non-performing members of the orchestra, we find one of the editors of the N. Y. Musical World, Dr. Edward Hodges, organ, Wm. Scharfenberg, violin and piano-forte, H. C. Timm, trombone and piano-forte; we believe Mr. Timm also executes upon the big drum and cymbals when necessity require.

The honorary members of the society are as follows:

HONORARY MEMBERS.

M. Henri Vieuxtemps.....	1843
Herr Ole Bull.....	1843
M. Leopold de Meyer.....	1845
Mr. Joseph Burke.....	1846
Dr. Louis Spohr.....	1846
*Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.....	1846
M. Henri Herz.....	1846
Sig. Camillo Sivori.....	1846
Sig. Giovanni Bottesini.....	1850
Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt.....	1850
Mr. Jules Benedict.....	1850
Mad. Henrietta Sontag.....	1852
Mad. Marietta Albani.....	1852
Herr Carl Eckert.....	1852
Master Paul Julien.....	1853
Mr. Wm. Vincent Wallace.....	1853
*Dr. Friedrich Schneider.....	1853
Mr. Richard Hoffmann.....	1855
Mr. Louis M. Gottschalk.....	1855
Sig. Cesare Badiali.....	1856
Total 20.

Among the associate members we find the names of many distinguished persons in the community, such as Dr. Adams, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Dr. Berrian, George Bancroft, George W. Curtis, and many others beyond the mere B's in the alphabet, whose names we have not time to cull out. Whole families, we observe, subscribe yearly to the Philharmonic—families of four, five and six persons; and we doubt if any catalogue of names could be shown comprising so much of the solid respectability, the wealth, and even the fashion of this metropolis, as that of the Philharmonic.

The professional members of the society number 166. The subscribing members, 59.

The whole number of members, associate, professional and subscribing, is 1316.

On the whole, the New York Philharmonic Society is decidedly an institution, an honor to the community, and a musically-educating power in this city of inestimable value. Now that they have expanded beyond Niblo's, and are obliged to occupy the Academy of Music for the rehearsals as well as the performances, their star seems more than ever in the ascendant.

In the early history of the Philharmonic, it was patronized by mere fashionables, and as a matter of mere fashion. This of course could not last long, there being no real taste for orchestral music of an elevated quality. But the society, though languishing, still kept on, until it had fairly educated a musical public for itself. This public is largely increasing every year. It has reached the very best classes; the gayer part of the community, even, are beginning to fall in again, and the future success of the society seems beyond peradventure; and all this from an honest and persevering effort persistently to give good music and to educate people up to it.

REWARDING DRAMATIC GENIUS.—The management of one of the Paris theatres offered a prize for the best operetta, suitable for that establishment, and the result was that seventy-eight composers sent in pieces to compete therefor. Auber, the composer of "Masaniello," and some other operas tolerably well known in the musical world, was at the head of the jury of examination who were appointed to award the prize. After five days' examination, the committee divided the candidates into three categories: the first comprising compositions of remarkable merit; the second, inferior works; and the third, those which were below an average. In the first were twenty-two works, in the second sixteen, and in the third forty. A further examination subsequently took place by the jury of examination, for the purpose of selecting the six candidates to whom is to be entrusted the manuscript on which the music of the operetta is to be written, and the following are the names, alphabetically arranged, of the persons definitively selected: MM. Bizet, second grand prize of Rome; Demersmann, Erlanger, Lecoq, Limagne, and Manquet.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 25, 1856.

Musical Instruments at the Fair.

The Transcript publishes a revised list of the awards at the late Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association. In the items which we gleaned from its first list, relating to Piano-fortes and Reed Organs, there are one or two corrections to be made. The Gold Medal, it appears, was awarded to CHICKERING & SONS, not only for their Grand Piano, but for the best Grand, Semi-grand, and Parlor Grand Pianos; and this was the only gold medal awarded for pianos. Silver medals were awarded to TIMOTHY GILBERT & Co. for Grand Piano-forte; to HALLETT, DAVIS & Co. for Semi-Grand do.; to CHICKERING & SONS for the best, and to JAMES W. VOSE for the second best Square do. Bronze Medals were awarded for Square Pianos to A. W. LADD & Co., TIMOTHY GILBERT & Co., and HALLETT, DAVIS & Co.; and Diplomas for Square Pianos to BROWN & ALLEN, GEORGE HEWES, JACOB CHICKERING, and WM. P. EMERSON; also to A. G. CORLISS for his "Swell Mute Attachment" to the piano, exhibited by Chickering & Sons.

So much for Piano-fortes proper, considered as musical instruments. But we may as well complete the chapter by gleaned from the list of awards all that relate in any direct way to music. Premiums were freely lavished upon piano-forte cases, the mere cabinet maker's side of the matter. Certainly the hall was full of splendid instruments as pieces of furniture. Taste in externals, elegance of form, are surely to be commended. But we must dissent, as most musicians we believe do, from one of the new fashions in this particular. We mean the showy pearl keys, and the whim of rounding or scolloping the ends of the keys, to which nearly every maker except the Chickering appears to have yielded. Plain ivory, with straight ends, has proved the most truly elegant, as well as the most convenient to the touch, which is the great point. The awards for cases were: Silver Medals to CHICKERING & SONS, HALLETT, DAVIS & Co., and WM. P. EMERSON; Bronze medals to JACOB CHICKERING, JAMES W. VOSE, TIMOTHY GILBERT & Co., A. T. HOLIAN (for imitation rosewood,) and A. W. LADD & Co. (for Grand Piano case); Diploma to A. NEWHALL & Co.

The show of Pianos, as we have before said, was a remarkably fine one, and illustrated the progress of the art in a manner highly flattering to this country. Perhaps we should say, to this city; for the one source of disappointment to us in this exhibition was the absence of all contributions from the manufacturers of other cities.

There were no specimens of Church Organs, for which our makers have a just fame, in the exhibition; but there were "any quantity" of those humbler substitutes for the Church Organ, the various sizes and modifications of reed organs, of the Melodeon family. The gold medal was carried off by the Organ Harmonium of Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN, noticed in our last; the silver medal, by the Melodeons of the same; the bronze medal, by the Melodeons of S. D. & H. W. SMITH; and Diplomas by the Melodeons of NICHOLS & GERRISH, and the "Tremolo Attachment" to the Melodeon, invented by L. LOUIS.

Various awards were made to other branches of the musical instrument family; to instruments sustaining a sort of second cousin relationship to the family; to methods of using instruments, and to materials employed in their manufacture. Under these various heads we find silver medals assigned to HENRY N. HOOPER & Co. for a chime of Twelve Bells, to THEODORE BERTELING for Flutes, and to NATHAN RICHARDSON for his "Modern School for the Piano-forte"; bronze medals, to E. G. WRIGHT for a Silver Bugle, to WHITE BROTHERS for Guitars and Violins, and to CHICKERING & SONS for Piano-forte Hardware; Diplomas to NATHAN RICHARDSON for Electrotpe Music Printing, to P. F. DODGE for Piano-forte Hardware, to ISAIAH H. AREY (Boscawen, N. H.) for Violins, and to GEO. CLISBEE (Marlboro', Mass.) for a "Musical Chair" (!), in which a person has only to sit down to make music. Verily a "Yankee notion"!

When the report of the judges in this department shall be printed (as we understand the reports of all the judges will be in a book form), we shall doubtless have an intelligent critical view of the present state of the arts of musical instrument making, as illustrated in this exhibition.

Henry Squires, the American Tenor.

This gentleman, who has been pursuing his studies for the last four years in Naples, and who has appeared with great success in several of the operas of the "divine Verdi," as the Italians call him, is engaged in London, and may be expected in New York this winter. A friend sends us some slips from Neapolitan newspapers, describing his appearance at a concert given in the summer by the flutist CARLO CARAVOGIA, some extracts from which may be interesting to our readers. We translate first from Il Giornale dei Giornali:

We feel compelled to spend some words upon the American tenor, Signor Enrico Squires, a young artist already known to us by other public proofs which he has given, but who never has presented himself in an accademia (concert) of so much importance as that of Caravoglia, in which Squires, so far from remaining much behind the artists of San Carlo, with whom he appeared in competition, was a worthy companion of them. The voice of Squires is of good compass, good intonation, flexible to the finest vanishing, and will not lack that energy of accent which is ever required in the songs of the divine Verdi, when he shall have acquired more confidence with the Italian public. Whatever slightest incorrectness of method may be remarked in the voice of Squires, we think is owing to his English pronunciation and not to his taste, which in many points showed itself exquisite and perfectly Italian.

This sympathetic artist sang excellently well the Romanza from Luisa Miller; and not only were many plaudits lavished upon him at the end, but he was several times in the midst of the execution interrupted by bene e bravo. But where Squires showed himself a true artist was in the duet from the "Sicilian Vespers," in which he accompanied the admirable VIOLA, with whom he finely interpreted all the graces of this most beautiful piece.

Our next extract is from the Giornale del Commercio, which says:

Next came the duet from I Vespri Siciliani. It cannot be told with how much art and how much soul Signora Viola and Signor Squires executed those magic notes of the great Italian maestro. . . . Afterwards Squires sang the Romanza from Luisa Miller, and he put into it so much sentiment as to search the most hidden fibres of the heart and bring tears into the eyes. . . .

Another paper, Il Palazzo di Cristallo, says:

Sign. Enrico Squires is the tenor whom Caravoglia united with the prima donna and the baritone of San Carlo, by whose side Squires has a right to be placed; for if as a novice he wants that freedom in singing which comes from long practice of the art, and that readiness of Italian pronunciation which only one born in Italy can possess, he is furnished nevertheless with a most beautiful voice, for which we have reason to augur for him a splendid career.

The N.Y. Times translates from La Rondinella, Aug. 28, a notice of another concert given at Sorrento by this same Caravoglia, in which Mr. Squires assisted:

"The clear liquid voice of Sig. SQUIRES, with his pure accent, touched all. The B flat, in the cadenza of his first song was so well given that it enchanted everybody. In the duet from 'Rigoletto,' sung by SQUIRES and GINEVRA TAVINI, the sympathetic tenor displayed all the beauties of his lovely voice. But the crowning effort of all was in the divine 'Romanza' from 'La Favorita,' which was interrupted by the applause from the other artists, who could not restrain themselves owing to the pathos of feeling which the singer threw into it. All present were completely astonished, and confessed to have never before heard the 'Romanza' sung so well as by SQUIRES. In the 'Tersetto' from 'I Lombardi,' he showed a great deal of intelligence and dramatic passion."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. I have been long absent, and returned to town only a few days ago. This may account for my remissness in correspondence. There has been, however, very little of importance going on in the musical world. The German opera has struggled on bravely, in spite of indifferent success at first, and seems to be gaining a firm footing. The orchestra and choruses, under Mr. BERGMANN'S direction, are unanimously praised; the solo singers as unanimously condemned. Some additions to their corps arrived in the last German steamer, and others are expected in the next. It is to be hoped that they are an improvement upon the present members. Lortzing's Undine, concerning the merits of which opinions differ, has met with great success, and been given several times. But greater things are in store for us, if report says true, in the shape of Fidelio, the Huguenots, Tannhäuser, La Dame Blanche, and several smaller operas.

Apropos of Fidelio, I must tell you of an amusing discovery I made this summer. In an old paper of 1839 or thereabouts, which happened to fall into my hands, I found the following:

PARK THEATRE.—MADAME TAGLIONI'S FAREWELL BENEFIT.

This Evening, Sept. 24, will be performed the farce of OUR MARY ANNE.

After which, the 2d act of the Grand Ballet of LA SYLPHIDE.
La Sylphide, Madame Taglioni
James Reuben, Mons. Taglioni

After which, the 3d Act of FIDELIO.
Don Pizarro, Mr. Gabriel
Don Florestano, Mr. Manvers
Rocco, Mr. Martyn
Jacquino, Mr. Edwin
Leonora, Mrs. Martyn
Marcelline, Miss Poole

After which, the Ballet of NATHALIE; or, La Laitière Suisse.
Nathalie.....Madame Taglion
Le Comète.....Mons. Taglion
 To conclude with the Farce of the MISER'S DAUGHTER.
Isaac Ivy.....Mr. Chippindale
Anna Ivy.....Mrs. Richardson

What say you to the company poor Beethoven has got into? I was not aware that Fidelio had ever been performed in this country, particularly in fragments, and hemmed in by farces and ballets.

For the many enjoyments which the summer has brought me, it has debarred me almost entirely from all musical advantages, and it was therefore with peculiar delight that, last Saturday, I listened once more to the wondrous harmonies of the great master, as set forth in the Fifth Symphony. The almost unanimous wish, too, of the subscribers was fulfilled by the rehearsals and concerts being advertised to take place in the Academy of Music—the only appropriate building for the object which the city contains. There was an unusually large attendance for the first rehearsal, and I think there were very many present who were very glad to see Mr. EISEL in the conductor's place once more. It is but due to him that it should be so. Nothing is said as yet about any Quartet Soirées from either of last winter's two sources. The entrepreneurs probably, with Mr. Thalberg, think it more prudent to postpone operations until after the election.

STRAKOSCH and PARODI and their party advertised a concert for Wednesday evening.

I conclude with an anecdote, which I give on good authority. A well known professor of music in our city was one day called upon by an individual from a small Western town, who introduced himself as a fellow musician and teacher. He stated that, having six weeks vacation, he had come on to New York to perfect himself in the different branches of his profession, and wished to take lessons on the piano, violin, harp and flute, and in singing, harmony, and composition. He devoted his whole time to the pursuit of knowledge under these forms; but at the end of the six weeks the professor, who had superintended his efforts upon the piano and violin, had found it utterly impossible to instill into him any acquaintance with the latter, and on the former had written for him a piece suited to his capacities, which were below any but the very easiest compositions. This piece, a Swiss air, with variations, the pupil, whom we will call John Smith, had mastered, at least to his own satisfaction. He took his departure, and nothing more was heard of him for some time. At last, one fine day, the professor received a paper from his pupil's place of residence, which contained the announcement of a "Grand Concert by Professor John Smith, assisted by his pupils." The programme consisted of a long array of polkas, waltzes, quicksteps, songs, etc., but the chief attraction was the "Grand Finale," which was this: "Swiss Air with Variations, composed expressly for and dedicated to Professor J. S. by the celebrated Signor ———, conductor of the ——— concerts in New York, etc., arranged by Prof. J. S. for thirty-two hands on sixteen pianos." (!!!) It is hardly necessary to suggest the probability of the "arrangements" being in unison, and there being more "variations" in the execution of the different performers than in the composition.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Thus far sixteen performances have been given by the German company at Niblo's, in New York, including five operas, Robert, Stradella, Masaniello, Freischütz and Undine. New singers are arriving. Mlle. JOHANNSEN, from the Frankfurt Theatre, has come, and was to appear in the Freischütz as Agatha on Thursday evening. She will also take the principal part in Fidelio. As soon as the expected baritone, Herr BECKER, comes, the Nachtlager von Granada (Encampment at Granada), by Kreutzer, will be produced.... Sig. BERNARDI, the baritone who gave so much pleasure here in the PARODI and STRAKOSCH concerts, will not continue with them, we understand. His appearance in public is only occasional, he being well established for some two years past as a teacher in Brooklyn, N. Y.... Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS gave a concert on the 1st of this month at Albany, assisted by Mr. WILLIAM MASON and Mr. C. R. ADAMS, the tenor singer. It gave unbounded satisfaction. Miss Phillips also made a very fine impression this week in the part of Azucena in the Italian Opera here in Boston.

THALBERG, it appears, has composed two operas, Florinda, and Christine of Sweden. Thalberg married the daughter of Lablache. He visited Rio Janeiro last year, and he waits until after the 4th of November, to see "the Union saved," before he begins his concerts in North America, reversing the Napoleonic saying, thus: After the deluge, me, Thalberg! Just before his departure from Europe, Thalberg played in a concert (the first time for many years) given by the Philharmonic Society at Boulogne. The room was crammed, and the great pianist performed three of his grand piano solos, viz: his Barcarole and Fantasias on Masaniello and L'Elisir d'Amore; also a piece from the Puritani on the Orgue d'Alexandre, or Organ Harmonium, which excited unbounded enthusiasm. It was his first public performance on this instrument, and Messrs. Berlioz and Fiorentino went from Paris to be present.

Miss MARIA MUELLER, a cousin of JENNY LIND, has been engaged as contralto for the French opera at New Orleans.... LORINI, the tenor, and Madame WHITING LORINI have been singing at Dublin. The Post says:—"Mme. LORINI is an American lady, of Irish origin, according to the statements in the newspaper; she is young, attractive, and talented, and sings with energy and effect. She was much applauded, and was especially effective in the concerted pieces.... CARL CZERNY, the indefatigable composer, has now reached opus eight hundred and fifty-three of original works, which embraces no less than two thousand two hundred and eighty-three separate numbers. Besides this, however, he has, of unpublished larger works, numerous masses, symphonies, etc.

Of Mme. ANGRI, who comes with her sister (soprano), and her husband (a conductor of repute), the New Yorker says: "She has a superb voice, and is a finished artiste; she was one of the mainstays of the Royal Italian Opera, London, during its early struggle with Her Majesty's Theatre, and completely electrified the dilettanti by her singing. She has a 'noble presence,' completely eclipsing the 'magnificent' Vestrali in person; combining all the latter's dash and brilliancy—whilst as a vocal artiste, she is infinitely her superior."

Advertisements.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

Has the honor to announce that she will open three new classes for the instruction of Young Ladies on the PIANO-FORTE, on

Monday Forenoon, Nov. 3d,
for very far advanced young ladies.

Tuesday Afternoon, Nov. 4th,
for young misses who have already begun.

Wednesday, November 5th,
for young misses, beginners.

Applications to be made at No. 55 Hancock Street.

MUSICAL SOIRÉES.

OTTO DRESEL

Proposes to give his FOURTH SERIES OF FOUR SOIRÉES, At the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, during the months of December, January, February and March, on Saturday evenings to be hereafter specified. Subscription for the Series, in packages of four tickets, $8. Subscription lists may be found at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, and at the music stores.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1856. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1856. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland: all held during the month of September, 1856:—making Six First Premiums in one month!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIRST PRIZES over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal bass. The one with pedal bass contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $80 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address

MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

DISSOLUTION NOTICE.

THE Copartnership heretofore existing under the firm of Geo. P. Reed & Co., Music Publishers and Dealers in Musical Merchandise, at No. 13 Tremont Street, is this day dissolved by mutual consent.

Geo. P. REED.
Geo. D. RUSSELL.

Boston, October 15th, 1856.

COPARTNERSHIP.

NOTICE is hereby given that GEO. D. RUSSELL, of the late firm of Geo. P. Reed & Co., Music Dealers, 13 Tremont Street, and NATHAN RICHARDSON, Music Dealer, 282 Washington Street, have this day formed a Copartnership under the name and firm of RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, successors to Geo. P. Reed & Co. and Nathan Richardson. They will continue the Music Business in all its branches, and trust, by a strict attention to all orders with which they may be intrusted, to merit a continuance of the favors which have been so liberally bestowed upon them heretofore.

RUSSELL & RICHARDSON,
(Successors to Geo. P. Reed & Co. and Nathan Richardson.)

A CARD.

THE subscriber, having disposed of his entire interest in the late firm of Geo. P. Reed & Co. to Messrs. Russell & Richardson, takes this opportunity to thank his friends and patrons for their past liberal patronage, and to solicit a continuance of the same to his worthy successors, whose knowledge of the business in its various departments, and extensive facilities, are a sufficient guaranty that all orders will receive the most prompt attention.

Geo. P. REED.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasias, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 34 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols...$6
 " additional volume of smaller works.....$3
 Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols.....$6
 Haydn's " " 2 vols.....$6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office.

ALEX' W. THAYER.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

JOBB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.The Mendelssohn Quintette Club,

Respectfully inform the musical public of Boston and vicinity that they will give their usual series of EIGHT CONCERTS, to take place at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. Packages of eight tickets, to be used at pleasure, $5. Single tickets will be $1 each. Lists will be out in a few days.

CLASSICAL PIANO MUSIC.

CHEAP, ELEGANT AND UNIFORM EDITIONS,
PRINTED FROM ENGRAVED PLATES.

With Portraits of Authors, and Thematic Catalogues, and Chromo-Lithograph Titles.

BACH, SEB. Works, including the Wohl-temper.
Clavier, 5 vols.	$5 00
BEETHOVEN'S 32 Sonatas.	6 75
27 do., (without the five last).	5 00
Miscellaneous Works, including five four-hand
Duets.	3 25
Piano Trios and Quintets, (score and parts.)	9 00
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts.)	7 50
Symphonies, arr. as Duets for four hands, 2 vols.	7 50
Symphonies, arr. for piano solo, by Kalkbrenner, 6 vols.	7 00
OLEBENTZ, M. 24 Sonatas, 4 vols.	8 00
HAYDN, J. 32 Sonatas, 2 vols.	8 00
MOZART, W. A. Sonatas.	5 00
20 Miscellaneous Works, (including the Duets
for four hands.)	3 50
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts.)	6 00
Piano Trios, do.	5 50
Quartets and Quintets, do.	8 75
Symphonies, (two performers.)	4 00

Also imported the Solo Works of Mendelssohn, Haydn's Piano Trios, and Sonatas for Piano and Violin, at very low prices, and in new, uniform editions.

G. ANDRÉ & CO., 306 Chestnut St.

Philadelphia, October, 1856.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,

FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
Gives instruction on the Piano. Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

NEW MUSICAL WORKS,
NEARLY READY:

I.
BACH'S 48 PRELUDES AND FUGUES.

By J. SEBASTIAN BACH.

In Numbers. Complete in two vols. quarto, $5.

II.
OPERA OF IL TROVATORE.—PIANO SOLO.
Uniform in style with the previous volumes of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas." 1 vol. quarto, $2.

III.
KREUTZER'S 40 STUDIES FOR THE VIOLIN.
One volume quarto, $1.50.

IV.
THE PSALMS OF LIFE:
A Compilation of Psalms, Hymns, Chants, &c., embodying the Spiritual, Progressive and Reformatory Sentiment of the present age. By JOHN S. ADAMS.
One volume 12mo. 280 pages. Cloth, 75 cts. Leather, $1.

V.
BORDOGNI'S 36 VOCALISÉS,
FOR SOPRANO OR TENOR VOICES. (Books II. & III.)

VI.
THE MEMORARE:
A Collection of Catholic Music. By A. WERNER.

VII.
HOHMAN'S PRACTICAL COURSE OF VOCAL
STUDY, ON SCHOOL PRINCIPLES.
By C. H. HOHMAN. Translated from the 5th German Revised Edition. By J. C. D. PARKER.

All of the above are in press, and will be issued at an early date.

Oliver Ditson, Publisher, 115 Washington St.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works:

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION, WITH
AND WITHOUT ACCOMPANIMENTS,

Edited by CIPRIANI POTTER,
Principal Professor of Harmony and Composition in the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Vol. 1, Airs with Variations.	Bound in cloth, $4 88
" 2, Rondos, &c.	Do do 2 13
" 3, Duets.	Do do 4 25
" 4, Piano-Forte Sonatas.	Do do 3 75
" 5, Do do	Do do 8 75
" 6, Sonatas for Piano and Violin.	Do do 4 25
" 7, Do do	Do do 4 25
" 8, Quartets and Quintets.	Do do 3 75
" 9, Trios for Piano, Violin and 'Cello.	Do do 6 00

Each piece in the above volumes is published separately.

The fact of the collection and republication of Mozart's Piano-forte works in the middle of the present century shows that time instead of diminishing, has stamped their excellence and value. They are, indeed, true works of art, as useful as they are beautiful. Out of this school came the memorable artists, Hummel, and J. B. Cramer—players whose fingers expressed the deep feeling of music with which their nature was imbued; and if we may still hope to find their successors among the young, it must be by a train of studies similarly conducted.

Novello's Catalogue No. 4, containing an analytical and thematic index to the above works, to be had gratis at 389 Broadway, or forwarded to address on receipt of one cent postage.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,
389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Is now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late of St. Paul's Church.)
ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.
RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL
Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,
Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature.
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.
First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion $12.00
do do each subsequent $8.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 239.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 5.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

The Music of Hungary.

From the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," Leipzig, 1852.

(Continued from page 26.)

We have already said that the Hungarian music inclines peculiarly to the Minor. It loves best to pour out its sorrow into the lap of the minor mood; nay, even where it throws itself into the fresh Major, it gladly returns, as if homesick, to its forsaken love. I cannot refrain from offering my readers here a short and altogether attractive example. After the Magyar nota has proceeded some measures in a gloomy, brooding, caravan-like slow movement, it falls into the arms of the major mood. This dualism of feeling appears in the following brief passage:

Slow.

Lively.

And how much nobler and more glorified is a complaint which bears its grief manfully in the major! What a sadness is expressed in the Irish and Swabian popular songs, in spite of the fact that they all move in the major! But of this we will say more hereafter, when we have occasion to speak more fully of the spirit of the Hungarian popular music in its relation to the people's melodies of other nations; and now a few words about the harmonic accompaniment which the Hungarian tunes require. In the first place, all the arts of counterpoint, by which consecutive octaves are forbidden, are to be excluded, if not only the melody, but also its harmonic groundwork, are to be genuine Magyar. Whoever would apply to a genuine Hungarian melody the square and compass of his school-learning, or the system of our modern German music, would destroy it entirely. There may indeed be cases where the contrary movement, for instance, cannot well be avoided; but in very many cases it is the motus rectus or direct movement, which, with the exception of pure, consecutive fifths, gives in the economy of parts of a Magyar nota the only genuine accompaniment, in perfect correspondence with the spirit of the given tune, no matter how many consecutive octaves it may lead to. Unfortunately one part of Hungary itself, which has been educated in the system of our artificial music, has lost its balance by the means, sees the melodies of its nation through the spectacles of the acquired system, and ruins where it tries to make good. Thus I have found the above cited passage of the Rákoczy march, in nearly all the printed Hungarian arrangements, except that by Franz Liszt, spoiled and perverted not only in its harmony, but partly also in its melody; in the melody, instead of D sharp, a D; in the harmony, instead of the motus rectus in octaves and sixths, the artificial motus contrarius, which is here entirely out of place. Thus, instead of:

we come to read:

and whatever more such heresies there may be against the genius of the Hungarian muse. This thing has been carried to the most absurd length by Erkel, the present kapellmeister of the Hungarian National Theatre in Pesth, who in his arrangement of the Rákoczy indulo, dares to offer to the musical world an actual monster of bad taste and perversion of the genuine. Accordingly I warn all amateurs against the same, and beg them not to be deceived by the pompous dedication to Liszt, whose half portrait is made to serve as a shield for Erkel's perversions. It surely is no honor to the kapellmeister of the Hungarian National Theatre in Pesth, that a foreigner, who has not passed in all more than three months in Hungary, should have to tell him what Hungarian music is!

It has always been a wonder that, in the great mixture of nationalities, the Hungarian music has still preserved itself in whole families and countries in its original purity. Of the Magyars I may name here the prominent appearance of an Emile von Kabinyi, by birth and spirit one of the first women of her nation. Magyar in body and soul, she is so also in that part of the national life which suns itself in the beams of musical art. I had in Pesth the great good fortune to make the acquaintance of this lady, and to her masterly performance of Hungarian airs on the piano, to which I often was allowed to listen, I am indebted for the most instructive conclusions on the nature of the Hungarian music. And here I have reached the point where I must say a word about the national music of Hungary in the concrete. We cannot speak of Hungarian song without glancing for a moment at the language and literature which go hand in hand with it.

The Hungarian language has the closest connection with the tones, which make up with it an articulate song. Only through the pliancy and softness of the Hungarian language is so abrupt and singular a rhythm possible, as reigns in the Hungarian vocal music. This language which, with the exception of certain natural words, like father, mother, &c., stands in no connection with any other European language, dead or living; and this music, which meets us as a no less strange phenomenon, form, when united in song, a picture so original that it is a matter of the greatest difficulty to set a German (or English) text to a Hungarian melody. Try, for example, to sing German (or English) words, no matter what, to that first cited Magyar nota in G major, with its three and seven-bar rhythm, and you will be convinced of the almost impossibility of transplanting this song upon German soil; it were to rob it of its rhythmical bloom, so that it would stand there like a tree stripped of its leaves.

If the outward form of the Hungarian songs, apart from the music, bears in and for itself, through the originality of the language, an exceedingly peculiar stamp, still more is this the case as it regards the intrinsic matter of these songs. It is a true flower-language, which is conveyed in the Hungarian people's poetry. One cannot address his beloved more tenderly than this poetry does in the words: galambam, my little dove; rózsdám, my rose; bimbom, my rosebud; indeed, there are places in the Hungarian popular airs, where the Hungarian showers all these epithets at once upon his sweetheart, as for example, at the close of a strain already quoted:

p Ró-za bím-bom ga-lám-bom!

Music and text in these two measures convey the inmost, tenderest language of love. Here belongs a word, which, on account of its untranslatableness as well as of its truly musical sound, I cannot deny myself the pleasure of quoting. It is the word gyöngörű, which expresses every excellence that can be conceived of. . . . Among the songs which have seemed to me best fitted to translate, is one whose text is distinguished by a truly deep poetic thought, and which I here add as a type of the Hungarian popular song. Both melody and text are contained in the first volume of my forthcoming collection of Hungarian popular songs with German text. (Here follows the German text, which we translate as closely as we can, preserving the accent.)

I.

Tree and root are rent asunder !
I and darling (rose) torn apart !
As the leaf in Autumn falleth,
Part I forever-
More from thy arms !
Forever !

II.

Down in the rushes
Houseth the wild duck ;
On the cornfield
Grows the fruit ;
But where groweth
Maiden's troth now ?
Ah ! such a spot I
Never may witness, Never !

III.

If thou knew'st that
Thou didst not love me,
Why hast enticed me so ?
Hadst thou in peace but left me,
Then another
Might have loved me,
Yes, have loved !

IV.

Open thy window,
O my rosebud !
From the village
Now I go !
Ah, one only
Look from thee now !
No more, ah ! no more
Meet we hereafter !
No more !

. . . The rhythm of the melody to these words is that of twice five measures. These songs consist mostly of complaints of the inconstancy of maidens; and it is this everlasting complaint which gives them something monotonous in spite of their originality.

If the Hungarian language and music are well suited to each other, still better is this music in its unbroken and wild rhythm suited to be played on instruments; and we may in fact maintain that the Hungarian popular music has eminently chosen the instrumental for the organ of its revelations; accordingly that it is more instrumental than it is vocal music. This is a further point of peculiarity in this music; for generally it is the human voice through which a nation loves to give expression to its musical ideas. The "Marseillaise," "God save the King," the Austrian Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser, the Russian hymn, &c., these heroes of national song, are all born for song and came out at one cast with their text. The hero of the Hungarian national music, on the contrary, is an instrumental march, fit for anything but singing. I mean the famous, truly national Rákoczy indulo, which is so closely interwoven with the popular life of Hungary. And yet perhaps there is no nation with which the music stands in so intimate a relation with the whole character and occupation of the people, as the Hungarian. This march operates like an electric shock upon the spirit of the Magyar ember; he finds in it everything that can move him—his pain, his joy, his hope, his sorrow. Under the influence of its sounds hundreds of Honveds have rushed to battle and to death; and no music speaks so intelligibly to the Hungarian heart as this pattern of a national music. Later times, to be sure, have more Hungarian marches to point to. The most famous are the "Kossuth March," the Werbungs-marsch, the "Klapka March," &c. But none of them has the genuine national stamp of the Rákoczy indulo; and beautiful and actually inspiring as they all are, they are too little characteristic representations of the Hungarian national music to receive a more minute appreciation here, where we would have to do only with the genuine. Least of all does the Hunyadi March betray the Hungarian spirit; nearly all traces of genuine Hungarian music are wholly lost in it.

We now come to ask: What are the principal organs of the Hungarian instrumental music? Who practices it the most? And how is it performed in contra-distinction from the People's Song? What kinds of instrumental music has the Hungarian nation?

I have already mentioned a race of people known to us all by their scattered and nomadic life, by their mysterious origin, by good and bad peculiarities; I mean the Gipsies. Scattered over the whole of Europe, they exist in the greatest numbers in Hungary, where for centuries they have become so domesticated that they have almost come to have settled dwelling-places, and many of them, by marriage and so forth, have become quite Magyarized. They like to be called "New Hungary," and love Hungary as their native land. Could there in fact be a land which could better please such a wandering family for its abode, than a land with this climate, with these immeasurable fruitful plains, carrying the eye off into the infinite, about the Theiss and Marosch—a land whose vegetation, by its extraordinary luxuriance, by its rich growth of plants and so forth, reminds one of far more Southern, non-European countries, out of which these dark brown birds of passage emanate? Here was the only part of Europe where they could in some sort find a compensation for their lost home; here, therefore, a great part of them made halt in their wanderings, and thought: "It is good to be here, let us build huts." The propensity to uncleanness also, so deep rooted in the Gipsies, could find plentiful nourishment in the vast morasses on the Theiss.

If every people are a growth of the soil upon which they are born, the same is true of all the branches of their spiritual life. The Hungarian music is in part so very much the expression of the physical characteristics of the land, that one feels tempted to say, that no one can have but a partial understanding of it unless he is acquainted with Hungary itself. Hence it is so extremely difficult for a foreigner to enter into the spirit of this music, so that the Magyar shall say to his delivery of it: "That is Hungarian." Thus, for example, amongst all the piano virtuosos who have visited Hungary from abroad, not a single one has played in genuine Hungarian style. What has commonly been done by a Thalberg, a Droyschok, a Wilmers, has been to take a favorite Hungarian popular air, trick it out with brilliant, but exceedingly fade and soulless variations, and in this garb bring it before the ears of the Pesth public, who, because they have detected their familiar theme concealed under these monstrous runs and leaps, and because their taste has got perverted and corrupted by the hearing of all sorts of music, have shouted out their eljen (hurra) to these gentlemen, and, without knowing it, have mocked themselves. The music of a nation is like other nobler growths, which spring out of the domestic soil; hence every foreigner, of whatever nation he may be, so soon as he has been established in a country for some time, acquires the habit of the people among whom he lives, not merely through the social intercourse, but also because he breathes the same air, drinks the same wines, and so forth. I remark this merely to explain a phenomenon which I have now to communicate. The Magyars themselves confess it, not without shame, that the Gipsy musicians, who have grown up in their country, are the best players of the Hungarian national music; observe, I say merely players; the invention remains with the Hungarians. These remarkable popular musicians have an extraordinary talent for instrumental playing; they have less talent for invention, and least of all for song. The Hungarian Gipsy merely plays Hungarian; he sings little or not at all; and what is his principal instrument, and at the same time the principal instrument of the Hungarian popular music? It is the Dulcimer or Cimbaló. This instrument, consisting of a triangular wooden frame, with a bottom and sounding board, over which wires by twos or threes are stretched upon bridges, which are struck with two wooden hammers, covered on the upper part with cloth or leather, is peculiarly fitted to infuse into the little Gipsy orchestra that palpitating, feverish, tremulous essence, by which the performance of a Magyar nota gains so much. With this are associated the String Quartet, together with the Contrabasso and also quite willingly the Clarinet. On the contrary all other instruments, as Oböes, Flutes, Fagotti, Horns, Trumpets, &c., are entirely excluded from a Hungarian Gipsy orchestra.

What does the Gipsy produce with these instruments? Is his music, is the popular instrumental music any mere dance music? Essentially perhaps; but ere the dancing mood begins, ere joy and appetite for pleasure hurry the Magyar ember into dance and play, and make him forget himself, he must first, in the slow, sustained tones of a Lassú (Adagio), in the Minor, pour out his complainings, roll away the sighs which hold his soul imprisoned in a melancholy gloom. Not suddenly can his soul plunge into the fresh major tones of his national dances; nay, he often clings to the dear minor mood after his sadness is supposed to have given place to idle joy and pleasure. The kind of music which we would here indicate is called in general Csárdás. This signifies both the dance itself and the dance music; and as every Hungarian dance is preceded by an introductory Lassú, this also is included in the term. The Lassú, soaring beyond the possibility of being represented as a dance, is usually followed by a Frisded, or Allegretto, of a quicker movement, but usually kept also in the minor, yet shaped already to the dance, but only for the solo dance of men. If the Magyar ember allows himself to be drawn away from his sombre mood into a dance, it is at first only a solo dance; self-satisfied, he spins round in a circle and as yet covets not an object for his love; only when the third part in this psychological economy of the dance, with its quick, strong strokes, has hurried him completely out of himself, does he begin to know no moderation and no goal. His eye sparkles, his feet stamp, like those of an untamed horse. To think: It is good that a man do not remain alone, and to grasp at a maiden, are one act, and he begins with her that wild, unbridled dance, which is called Csárdás in the narrower sense of the word, or by way of distinction, Friss (i. e., Allegro, Presto). Already in the Lassú the dull brooding, in which the soul of the Magyar ember swims, is crossed by some occasional gleams of enthusiasm; but in the Friss the dark clouds of sadness begin first to break away, and the Friss tears away entirely the thin veil which yet lay on his soul and left him in a self-contented solitude; now no repose is longer to be thought of; from melancholy it becomes impetuous passion; from pain unbounded pleasure; in short, his Me, delivered from itself, riots and storms away until his feet refuse their service.

I have had here before my eyes, out of several Csárdás, the Deberczini Csárdás especially, whose Lassú furnishes the music to the above-mentioned people's song. Now it is the Lassú in which the Hungarian Gipsy shows his instrumental talent in the most brilliant manner. So far from playing the Magyar melody as it is sung, he suddenly conceives it instrumentally; at the moment that he transfers it to his instrument, the violin or dulcimer, these instruments in their whole compass stand before his eyes, and so he transforms the vocal melody into an instrumental piece, in which the given tune serves as a canto fermo, about which he lets his instrumental figures, runs, mordenti, and all the possible embellishments of symphonic figuration, play and flicker.

[To be continued.]

The Musical Festival at Darmstadt,

ON THE 31ST AUGUST AND THE 1ST SEPTEMBER.

(From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.)*

Although my limited leisure, while travelling, does not permit me to write a very full account, especially when, on account of the fabulous influx of persons in Darmstadt and Frankfort, I lost in the former place more than three hours, before it came to my turn to get a seat, and, in the latter, was obliged, after a hundred fruitless inquiries at all sorts of lodgings, not excepting the principal guard-house, to pass the night in the street—all of which is literally true—I will yet at least partly fulfil my promise, if only by a few rhapsodical remarks.

When I begin by informing you that, on the two festival days, Darmstadt was thronged by from forty to fifty thousand persons, mostly visitors, I do not at all exaggerate, but rather somewhat understate the actual number, which was thus extraordinarily favorable for the baptism of this youngest child of the Rhenish Festivals, and the Mittelrheinischer Musik-Verband of the Gesang-Vereine of Darmstadt, Mainz, Mannheim, and Wiesbaden, may congratulate itself on the event, and accept it as a good omen for the future.

If you now ask me whether it was worth while to throw all the directors of our various means of transport into such a state of alarm, that many of them no longer knew which way to turn, and would have been in danger of harnessing the horses behind the coaches, had not the place of those animals long been supplied by machines, which can shove as well as drag, I must answer, "Most certainly." Taken as a whole, this first Mittelrheinischer Musikfest was a very splendid one, and justified its name, since it was marked by quite as much (and, perhaps, more) fest (festival) as music. There was no want of judicious arrangements for everything and everybody; of friendly and hearty welcome of all persons concerned without distinction, whether they gave their services as amateurs, or for a stipulated sum; of obliging care for their accommodation, or of measures for their protection against any fleecing propensities on the parts of hosts and their colleagues. All these things, we must confess with a due regard for truth, were better managed than they have been in the Niederrheinische Musical Festivals for years. To this we must add the vivacity and sympathetic liveliness of the inhabitants of the district of the Middle Rhine. They have something about them of the South German character, and are, perhaps, not so solid; but, on that very account, not so formal, tight-laced, stiff-collared and glacé-gloved as we North Germans, and, therefore, they pay a more natural homage to jollity and pleasure, and do not, on every occasion, first beg the gracious permission of etiquette to amuse themselves.

* The translation is from the Lond. Musical World.

Thus the festive processions and social meetings—which, in the case of the festivals of the Lower Rhine, very often exist only in the programme, and are so rarely to be found in reality—that, as is well known, we frequently come to the solemnly announced place of rendezvous without finding a solitary individual, to say nothing of a member of the committee—were, here in Darmstadt, the most brilliant points of the festival. The Wood-festival, which took place on the morning of Tuesday, the 2nd September, on the Ludwigshöhe, was not only amusing and elevating, from the charms of this beautiful spot, and the magnificent view over the valley of the Rhine, but was distinguished by the highly liberal hospitality of all the persons acting in the name of the Festival committee. Really brilliant and imposing, also, were the grand processions, which, on the afternoon of the same day, moved through the principal streets of the town to the grand circus, on the Drilling-ground, where the grand Duke and his court awaited them. The rehearsal and concert tickets admitted the persons connected with the festival in the circus.

These processions were eleven in number, and represented:—1. The three provinces of Hesse, and all their national costumes.

2. The old Katten and Cherusker, after the Hermannschlacht, with the Roman spoils.

3. The old German heroes, from the sagas of the Nibelungen.

4. The Middle Ages, the Confederated Rhenish Cities, the Hessian Knightly Confederation, and the Tournament held at Darmstadt in the year 1403.

5. The old guilds (among the printers, Gutenberg, Faust, and Schaffer).

6. The Frankenstein Eselslehen, at Bossungen and Darmstadt. Immediately after this came—

7. The foundation of the Giessen University (1607) and of the Darmstadt Gymnasium.

8. A stag-hunt, on foot and horseback, in the reign of Louis VIII.

9. The Pirmasenser guard.

10. Arts and sciences, industry, trade and agriculture.

11. The eleven guilds, arranged in the order of the workmen.

Everything connected with these processions—the idea and execution—the men and horses—the costumes and equipments—the order and bearing—was admirable. There is no doubt that the munificent assistance afforded by the artistic Grand-Duke, who, according to the report, placed the entire rich wardrobe of the Grand Ducal theatre, consisting of some four hundred dresses, at the disposal of the committee, had a very large share in this.

His Royal Highness had also given the use of the Arsenal for the musical performances, and this brings one to the music, which I will by no means place in the back ground. I must preface my remarks, however, by saying that we must not be so strict in our requirements from its representatives, who take part in such a Verein for the first time, or from their leaders, as we are justified in being when we have to do with performers who have enjoyed the practice and experience of a long series of years.

The crowd of singers and instrumentalists was very great. As it may interest you to know the vocal strength of the district, exclusive of that of Frankfort-on-the-Main, I forward you the following summary of the vocal part from the printed book:

	Sopr.	Alt.	Ten.	Bass.	Tot.
1. Darmstadt a. Musik-verein	66	52	39	53	210
b. Mozartverein	—	—	23	32	55
c. Harmon. Sängerkranz	—	—	23	15	38
d. Counter-tenors from the Grand Ducal Gymnasium,	—	37	—	—	37
2. Mainz Liedertafel and Damen-gesang-verein,	28	18	42	64	152
3. Mannheim Musik-Verein,	19	12	7	14	52
4. Weisbaden Cäcilien-Verein and Männer-gesang Verein,	30	15	26	29	100
5. Giessen Akademischer Gesang-Verein,	25	11	16	30	82
6. Offenbach Gesang-Verein,	17	11	15	13	56
Alzei,	2	—	1	—	3
	187	156	192	250	785

To these add 64 violins, 21 violas, 20 violoncellos, 15 bass-violons, making with the rest altogether 155 in the orchestra, and you have a musical body of 950 members, or, with all drawbacks, at least more than 800, worthy of all respect. But the quality, also, was good in every instance, the voices were round and fresh, and the skill of the instrumentalists excellent. Most of the choruses in the Messiah, produced under the direction of Herr C. A. Mangold, Grand Ducal Musical Director, on the first day of the festival, went very well, while some (the "Hallelujah" for instance) admirably. Others were deficient in spirit, and were not distinguished by that classical and always calm power over the subject with regard to certainty of form and treatment. This was, also, evident in Mendelssohn's Lorelei. On the second day, the chorus, which was, on the whole, magnificent, had, unfortunately, far too little to do, and, indeed, the second part of the programme on the second day was not quite calculated for the importance and dignity of a Musical Festival. It is a matter for consideration whether the arrangement by which the principal performances were not fixed for the evening, but for half-past three in the afternoon, is one to be imitated. A great deal is to be said in its favor, still, during the warm season, the temperature is against it.

The solos were entrusted to Madame Leisinger, of Stuttgart (soprano, a beautiful woman with a beautiful and agreeable voice; her style of singing was especially suited to the part of Lorelei, in which she greatly distinguished herself); to Mlle. Diehl, of Frankfort (who possesses a soft, pleasing voice); to Herr Grill, of the Darmstadt Grand Ducal Theatre (an especially fine tenor, with a nobleness of style which is, now-a-days, really a rarity), and to Herr Stephen (Bass) of the Mannheim Theatre, whose services are the more deserving of recognition, as he took the part without the slightest preparation, in consequence of Herr Stockhausen, for whom it was intended, being attacked with hoarseness at rehearsal, and obliged to give up the part. However admirable Stockhausen may be as a Lieder singer, experience has proved that it was a mistake on the part of the committee to engage him for the airs in the Messiah, for which he has not power. He will as a rule, be found deficient in this point whenever he has to sing in the areas required by the colossal performances of musical festivals. Every time that he forces his small voice, in order to satisfy the exigencies of the case, the same thing that happens here will be sure to recur. But on the second day, also, when he was set down in the programme for a French air, and one or two German songs, he did not appear—a fact which was certainly to be regretted, and produced a very unfavorable effect upon a large portion of the audience.

The second concert was directed by Herr L. Schindelmeyer, Hof Capellmeister. The programme of the first part was good: Beethoven's Eroica, and Mendelssohn's Lorelei. The execution of the symphony did not, it is true, attain that degree of precision and expression, nor that inspiring force and energy which it requires, and the festival orchestras of the Lower Rhine are superior in all these particulars. As I could not attend the rehearsals, I cannot positively say whether many a defect in the performance, which, however, was on the whole an imposing one, was the fault of the orchestra or the conductor. I must, however, protest against the quickened time of the fugue movement in the funeral march, as if the horsemen were then advancing in a trot; it is precisely here that breadth and weight, in time, tone, and expression are appropriate and absolutely necessary. It is true that the time of the entire movement must not drag too much.

In the second part, which contained something of everything (with regard to which we must, in justice, remember that this second part was meant to fill the place, as it were, of the so-called Artists' Concerts, on the third day at the festivals of the Lower Rhine), Vieuxtemps' performance was, naturally, the most brilliant and most worthy of mention. The performance of an otherwise very excellent pianist and thorough musician, Herr Pauer, must, in comparison, be placed in the background. Herr Pauer played a rondo, by Weber, and a "Cascade," of his own composition—certainly not an appropriate selection for a musical festival. Solos for the pianoforte, without orchestral accompaniments, are in no way adapted for such an occasion, any more than mere songs (sung by Mad. Leisinger and Mad. Diehl), although Schubert's "Erlkönig" is a magnificent composition. In this the first-named lady, who, in other respects, is an excellent artist, did not satisfy us as in Lorelei, in which she was really admirable.

There was no scarcity among the audience of artists and conductors from other parts of Germany, although there was not so large a gathering of them as at Düsseldorf, in the spring. From Berlin there was Emil Naumann; from Weimar, J. Joachim Raff, whose opera either was, or is to be, given at Wiesbaden; from Strasburg, Liebe, etc. Your part of the country sent Herr Turanyi, from Aix-la-Chapelle; Tansch, from Düsseldorf; Weinbrenner, from Elberfeld, etc. Hilfer was present only on the second day, and then but for a short time.

A LYRIC.

BY W. R. CASSELS.

Love took me softly by the hand,
Love led me all the country o'er,
And show'd me beauty in the land,
That I had never dreamt before—
Never before, O Love, sweet Love!

There was a glory in the morn,
There was a calmness in the night,
A mildness by the south wind borne,
That I had never felt aright—
Never aright, O Love, sweet Love!

But now it cannot pass away,
I see it whereso'er I go,
And in my heart by night and day
Its gladness waveth to and fro—
By night and day, O Love, sweet Love!

(From Fitzgerald's City Item, Philadelphia.)

Psalm Books.

One day we observed in a friend's bookcase a shelf filled by a row of variously bound volumes, so tempting in their appearance that we could not avoid taking two or three down to examine. To our surprise, we found them all alike inside; they were copies of the same book in different bindings. The book itself was a flimsy, trashy affair at best, scarcely worth reading, and certainly not meriting a place in a library. We could not forbear asking an explanation, which was kindly accorded us in these words: "Ah, my dear fellow, that is a whim of mine to take in my friends. I had a vacant shelf, that looked bare and ugly amidst its well-filled companions. I went to a sale and bought up two or three dozen copies of this book. I had them nicely bound as you see, and my library looks well. When I want room for a really good work, one of those affairs has to go overboard, as they are not of the least value."

This little incident always occurs to us when we are called upon to inspect one of those entertaining musical works—a "Yankee" Psalm-book. No matter how different the outside of these remarkable productions—no matter how various the promises held out by title or preface—no matter how dissimilar the general appearance of the volumes; we have always discovered the contents of the pages to be very much of the same nature as our friend's books—the same thing in a different form. Indeed, the parallel can be further drawn, for the contents of both are equally flimsy and unworthy of criticism.

It seems to be the belief of those who compile modern books of psalmody, that if they avoid the gross errors of harmony, occasionally found in tunes of inferior description, their works are safe from the critics; that if they have corrected all glaring mistakes, and removed the evidence of perfect ignorance of all rules, they may defy those fault-finders, who are always searching for consecutive fifths and hidden octaves. In our humble opinion such persons are woefully mistaken. The harmony of a tune may be perfectly correct, and yet the tune itself may be so utterly bad as to be of no use to any choir in the world. To write a strain of sixteen bars without a mistake is not to compose a good tune; but to all appearance this seems to be the impression of the gentlemen who spend their leisure time in getting up books of Church Music. It requires a musical idea of some sort to set the words of a psalm or hymn usefully. It is not essential that the idea should be perfectly new or original; it may be pardoned for bearing a strong resemblance to some other melody; but it must have character, and suit the verse selected. It is no illustration or setting of a stanza to see-saw from tonic to dominant, with a half cadence at the end of the second line, and a full one at the close of the fourth; this is not composing a tune or writing music; it is a foolish, profitless waste of ink and paper, productive of no use to a book when done, and of no credit to the person who wasted his time over it. We have often heard pseudo musicians say, that "it is nothing to write a psalm tune," but we beg to differ from them; it requires skill, ability, and a great deal of natural talent to compose a good tune. It is easy enough to manufacture them in the style of the Yankees, and we have really a collection of fifty tunes, of which the words were all written out, the bars ruled, and the various keys selected, before a single note was thought of, for a single melody out of the whole number. If any one calls this methodical piece of business "composing music," we have no more to say.

Theodore Döhler.

(From the Florence "Armonia.")

THEODORE DÖHLER first saw the light at Naples, on the 20th April, 1814. His parents were Germans, his father being a native of Berlin, and his mother of Stuttgart. Pecuniary losses had compelled his father to quit Prussia. He went to Naples, where his acquirements and talent quickly obtained for him remunerative employment and influential patrons. But he was destined to find the greatest consolation in his son Theodore, who even in his very earliest childhood, manifested a marvellous natural disposition for music. In his seventh year, the power of genius burst through all bounds, although the boy was bodily so weak and delicate that his father was obliged to forbid his too assiduous application. He was soon, however, obliged to acknowledge the undeniable vocation of his son, and, moved by his entreaties, provided him with a master. Under the latter, Theodore made such astonishingly rapid progress, that it became necessary to transfer him to a better teacher. Such a one was found in Julius Benedict, a pupil of Carl Maria Von Weber, and then conductor in Naples.

The boy profited so well by the lessons of his excellent instructor, that the latter allowed him to appear when only ten years old at the Teatro del Fondo. The result exceeded all expectation, and Döhler's future career was decided. Not only his playing, but his composition as well, created a sensation, on account of the little composer's age. At this period, between the age of ten and twelve, he published variations for the piano on Righini's song, "Ich lebe froh und sorgenlos;" variations on a theme of Mozart's, a fantasia on a theme of Pacini's, and a duettino for two sopranos to words by Metastasio.

All the theatres and drawing-rooms vied with each other for the possession of the wonderful child. Nor was the court behind hand. King Ferdinand encouraged him, in the most friendly manner, to proceed in his artistic career. Beside studying music, he devoted himself especially to modern languages, for the acquisition of which he displayed a great facility, nor was he deficient in talent for declamatory and theatrical performances, in Italian and French, in which, as in everything else that he attempted, he gave proofs of no ordinary endowments.

In the year 1827, Charles Louis de Bourbon, Duke of Lucca, visited Naples. He became acquainted with young Döhler and his father, for both of whom he evinced such a partiality that he took them to Lucca, where he appointed the father master to the crown prince, and furnished the son with everything necessary for developing his talent. But for this Lucca was not long the fitting place, and the duke's intention could be fully carried out in Vienna alone, where the best pianoforte players were then to be found. The whole family set out, therefore, in December, 1829, with the approbation of the Duke, for Vienna.

Theodore now took lessons of Czerny on the piano, and of Sechter in thorough bass. In a short time he was equal to the other artists in the city. The Vienna public, who were then difficult to please, received him with enthusiasm. The reports of his successes were a source of real pleasure to his munificent patron, who rewarded Döhler's progress by appointing him his chamber-virtuoso. This distinction in no way caused Döhler to repose upon his laurels. On the contrary, he worked day and night with such perseverance that, in order to divert him, Czerny often purposely took him in his walks and excursions in the neighborhood of Vienna. It was then that the friendly relations between Döhler and Thalberg were first contracted. The two rivals became friends, and their feelings did not even subsequently, when they stood opposite each other in the lists of fame, suffer any change. It is even said that one evening, when they had played in the Salle Ventadour, at Paris, and Döhler had been greeted with enthusiastic applause, Thalberg hastened up to his friend and congratulated him heartily.

In the year 1834, Döhler quitted Vienna, and visited his native town, Naples, where he gave a series of brilliant concerts. In the year 1837 he visited, with like success, Berlin, Dresden, &c., returning in 1838 to Vienna. Thence he proceeded to Paris and London, where he remained two years. In Paris he played at a concert of the Conservatory with immense success. It was especially his fantasia on a theme from Anna Bolena, the introduction to which was written for the left hand alone, that excited astonishment and admiration. According to the notices published at the period in the Parisian newspapers, it seems doubtful whether it was he or Thalberg who first introduced the plan afterwards carried to excess, of playing the melody with the thumb and the fingers of the right and left hand alternately, while the others are employed in brilliant passages.

After this, he travelled through Holland, Denmark, and the north of Germany—where, especially in Berlin, in the year 1844, his talent was again fully appreciated—and then went to Hungary and Poland, proceeding in 1845 to Russia. He found in St. Petersburg and Moscow the reception to which he was accustomed. In St. Petersburg he wrote his celebrated notturmo, and the variations on the Sonnambula. The success which these productions obtained, and, also, external influences, made him determine to compose an opera, Tancredi, on a subject taken from Silvio Pellico. His stay in Moscow exercised, however, a far more decisive influence on his life; there he found the faithful wife whom heaven had destined to be the companion who was to console him in the heavy sufferings fate had in store for him. The Emperor Nicolas was at first opposed to the marriage, and forbade the union of a scion of the house of Scheremetiew with an artist of plebeian extraction. Döhler quitted Moscow in despair, and proceeded to St. Petersburg, for the purpose of embarking at Cronstadt for Germany. The imperial court was stopping at Peterhof. The empress heard that Döhler was on the point of leaving Russia. She wished to hear him once more, and a courier carried him an invitation to St. Petersburg. Döhler excused himself by saying that his place was taken, and that the steamer left the port at midnight. Meanwhile the emperor, who had become acquainted with the wish of the empress, sent an order to the captain of the steamer to postpone his departure, and Döhler was conveyed in an imperial carriage to St. Petersburg. The whole court was delighted with the artist, who was, perhaps, inspired by the thought of his love, and the persons before whom he played. The emperor then had him rowed in his own boat, by twelve sailors, to the steamer, and Döhler's heart was buoyed up with fresh hope.

He went to Italy, and after remaining some time at Bologna with the maestro Rossini, returned to Lucca, to his royal patron, the only person, perhaps, who could now help him. The duke listened with sympathy to his interesting romance, and—ennobled his favorite. The Baron von Döhler hastened back to Russia, the emperor was moved by his entreaties, and, on the 11th May, 1846, the marriage was solemnized at St. Petersburg.

The happy pair set off for Moscow, where Döhler put the finishing touch to his opera Tancredi. He would not, however, bring it out in Russia, but only in Italy. Towards the end of the year 1846, he arrived in Paris, where the first symptoms of the malady which was to carry him off after nine years of severe suffering, first manifested themselves.

Although he had, properly speaking, given up playing in public, his friends and the whole artistic world of Paris would not allow him to rest until he determined on appearing a few more times on extraordinary occasions. He played seven or eight times more for the benefit of necessitous musicians, or of the poor of the city, and thus exhausted the little strength he had left. Directly he touched the keys with his fingers, his whole soul was wrapped up in his task, and the more he gave way to the excitement and inspiration which seized on him, the more did he shorten his life.

In the following year, he went to Genoa. He there played his opera over to the celebrated singer Frezzolini, who was so taken with it that she determined on using all her influence to get it produced in Venice. Döhler was delighted, and, in the course of a few days, wrote out the whole score himself (for a copyist would have been able to decipher it but slowly, and in some places would have found the task altogether impossible), but he had to pay for the exertion by excessive weakness and languor. Unfortunately, too, he had taken this trouble for nothing. In Florence, to which city he had subsequently removed in preference to Genoa, he received from Mad. Frezzolini a letter in which she informed him she was on the eve of setting out for Russia. With this intelligence vanished the hope of seeing his opera performed, and, until the present day, it has never been produced.

From the year 1852, he took up his permanent residence in Florence. He composed a few more notturmi and Lieder ohne worte, the dying song of the swan, the last fruit of a magnificent tree, that dies before its time of an abundance of sap and productivity. Like so many other precocious geniuses, he was doomed to wither in the bloom of his life. The long sufferings of an incurable disease were supported by him with an exemplary submission to the will of Heaven; his noble wife tended him, up to his last moment, with truly sublime self-abnegation and devotion. He died on the 21st February, of the present year, at six o'clock in the morning; his last glance rested upon her who had sweetened for him, poor martyr, the bitter cup of suffering.

The last of his compositions bears the number 75.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 1, 1856.

Hints to Choral Societies.

We often wonder that our various choral or even smaller singing societies, in their search for something at once classical, practicable and attractive for matter for practice, have not turned their attention more to the fine Masses of Mozart and Haydn. Portions of the best of these, and often the finest portions, are not too difficult for many of our societies in town or country; they have substantial worth as music, and tend to elevate the taste, and they are sure to interest and fascinate those who learn to sing them, after a little near acquaintance. We are again reminded of this thought by seeing it stated that a class of singers in Exeter, N. H. and vicinity are preparing Mozart's "Short Requiem Mass," under the direction of Mr. W. F. Lawrence, of Epping. This is not the famous Requiem, but one of the shortest and easiest of all the Masses, and yet singularly impressive. It seems to us, therefore, a remarkably good choice for a beginning; and we hope other choirs will follow the example. It is to be given with an accompaniment of two pianos and eight or ten other instruments, which, we believe, is about all that the original instrumentation requires. But choirs may get much good out of it with a mere piano-forte or organ accompaniment.

This is one hint. Another is a renewal of a suggestion which we made some weeks since, and which is renewed in our own mind by receiving the first number of the then promised series of Twelve of the old GERMAN CHORALS, as harmonized in four parts by SEBASTIAN BACH, published by Oliver Ditson. Each number is to contain two or more chorals, according to their length, most of them not exceeding twice the length of an ordinary psalm tune. The twelve now selected are engraved. We trust they will be so well received by the singing public, that Mr. Ditson may be induced to issue a book-full of them in cheaper form—say at least a hundred out of the three hundred and odd which have appeared in Germany. It should be a great fundamental text-book with all societies of singers of truly sacred music. They may be sung by choirs of any number of voices, from a simple quartet to an oratorio chorus of hundreds. With the former method, with only a voice or two to a part, one cannot but be struck and charmed by the wonderful skill and beauty, as well as the purity and spirituality, the profound tenderness and seriousness of the harmony, with which no one but old Bach could have so well clothed and illustrated those simple, inspired tunes which came out of the hearts of the Reformers. Short and unpretending as they seem, they are an infinite study in respect to their perfection as true Art, while they warm and edify the soul, and grow sweeter and deeper and richer with every repetition, in a way that proves them true religious music. Even as we merely play over the harmony on the piano, we experience the deepest kind of musical satisfaction; but when sung by a great chorus, when this choice harmony, so sweet and clarified from all sensual clap-trap, is rolled forth in great vocal masses, then is the effect sublime. We have also felt something of it in listening to Mendelssohn's similar treatment of a couple of these same old chorals in his oratorio "St. Paul."

We repeat, therefore: What can our Handel and Haydn Society, our Mendelssohn Choral Society, our Musical Education Society—what can similar societies in New York and Philadelphia, their "Harmonias," &c., do that would be better than to practice some of these Bach chorals, until they can sing them with the nicest precision and clearness, and with a perfect balance of the four masses of voices, and interperse, or perhaps begin and end, each of their public performances with two or three of them. The effect would be refreshing and inspiring on an audience, like that of all simple and sublime things, like that of mountains, the seashore, the starry heavens at night. And not the least advantage flowing from it would be the standard of true taste which it would set in this vexed and abused matter of religious music. It would rebuke psalm tune quackery, as the mountains rebuke silly man's presumption, or as the sun rebukes artificial fireworks. In the course of time it might infuse some better influence into our churches, and make Cecilia a live saint once more. It might prompt to better notions and desires in the matter of church music, and drive away much vanity and nonsense, much foolish mistaking of mere dulness for solemnity, mere chloroform composure for the live peace of real worship. We do not say that these old German chorals are suited to our hymn books; by far the most of them we know are not. But if our singers get familiar with them, they will surely learn to know what is genuine from what is false and empty in the so-called Sacred Music; and they will as surely learn to love it and demand it.

Here, then, we have suggested two very opposite kinds of music to our singing societies: the one highly colored, in the spirit of the Roman cultus, which appeals so much to the senses, and tending more or less to the dramatic; the other severe with an almost elemental grandeur, and simplicity born of the times of Luther. Either or both were how much better than so much upon which choirs and singing societies spend their time, to the questionable improvement of their taste!

Letter from the Diarist.

NATICK, Oct. 28, 1856.

DEAR DWIGHT—I think that somewhere in the Journal is a notice of a new biography of HANDEL, in preparation by a gentleman of Mecklenburg Schwerin, Dr. CHRYSANDER. I had the pleasure last winter of working at the same table with him day after day in the Royal Library at Berlin; he upon the old music of Keiser, Bach and other predecessors and contemporaries of Handel, and I upon the MS. relics of Beethoven. I can therefore testify to the extraordinary care and diligence of Dr.

C. and the accuracy of his results. Among my recently received letters is one from him, in which I find some interesting musical news.

One item explains to me the great labor bestowed by him last year upon the BACH MSS. in the Library, which I could not account for as connected in any way with his Handelian studies, and the particular pains taken by the librarian, DEHN, one of the first Bachists living, to assist him in getting the true readings of many hitherto misprinted passages in the published editions of Bach's works. It seems he has been at work preparing the copy for some volumes of Bach's piano-forte music, to be published uniformly with the stereotype edition of Beethoven's Sonatas. From a little circular I draw the following information as to the objects and contents of this new edition.

To musicians and such persons as wish for a complete collection of all the piano-forte music by Bach or attributed to him, the 50 thalers, which is the price of the beautiful edition published by Peters at Leipzig, would be no object; the design, therefore, of this edition is to give, in some four or five volumes, such a selection of this music, carefully collated with the original manuscripts, as shall contain all the best works, and come at a price within the means of every one. The first volume, now ready, contains a number of works written by Bach as a sort of introduction or gradus to his more difficult and famous compositions—a Capriccio upon the departure of a friend—12 easy Preludes—the 15 Inventions and Symphonies. The second volume contains the piano-forte studies, which Bach numbered as his Opus I. These studies are in four parts, but as all of Part 3 is for the organ, save four Duets, the organ pieces are to be printed separately.

Vol. III., "Well-tempered Klavier."

Vol. IV. The English "Suites," and a collection of his best fugues.

What the price of the volumes is to be is not definitely fixed, but they will apparently be even less than the Beethoven Sonatas.

Another item. JULIUS KNORR is editing for the same publisher a corrected edition, with fingering, of MUZIO CLEMENTI's piano-forte Sonatas, for two and four hands.

Dr. Chrysander writes farther:

"Now comes something which will delight you, about a 'Handel Society,' which has been organized this summer. Probably a prospectus will soon be issued, from which you can learn the particulars. Gervinus, Dehn, Hauptmann, Breitkopf & Härtel, and myself form the Board of Directors. We are intending to publish a correct edition of the entire works of Handel. My biography is to appear next year."

No one among us has any idea of the manner in which Handel is murdered in Germany, both at public performances and by publishers. For instance, I saw a notice last season of a new edition of "Samson," published by Simrock of Bonn, for some fifty cents of our money. It is sufficient to say of this edition that the Menuetto of the overture is omitted, as well as the entire part of Harapha, with nearly all that belongs to it! As to "Judas Maccabæus," and even the "Messiah," the German editions are beneath criticism. Dr. Chrysander is not only able, but enthusiastically desirous of correcting this, and his studies of Handel's life and works for years past fit him most eminently for his mission.

Is it not a little droll that after some fifteen years trial of the Wagnerish school of music, the public taste should exhibit such a demand for Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Clementi, as to warrant the republication of their works in elegant and correct editions at the price of a cent and a half a page? And now a new society is formed to publish Handel entire! I am suited, however.

A. W. T.

Musical Intelligence.

New York.

THE GERMAN OPERA.—On Thursday evening one of the long-promised additions to the corps in the shape of a new and much required prima donna, solicited the suffrages of the audience. The new comer is Mlle. JOHANNSEN, who is designated as coming from the Frankfort opera house. She has a pretty, intelligent face, a good figure, and is thoroughly au fait to the business of the stage. Her voice is a soprano of excellent quality, considerable flexibility, fair compass, and sympathetic in tone, and she manages it with great artistic skill; in fact, she is an accomplished singer, wearing the appearance of an old singer, accustomed to operatic business and applause, and free from that gaucherie which the rest of the company have manifested.

Her interpretation of the famous test scena of the opera, was truly admirable. She gave it with refined taste and feeling, and elicited an enthusiastic burst of applause—in a word, her success was full and complete. Agathe, in her hands, becomes a character of the greatest interest; for she not only sings the music delightfully, but acts the parts to perfection; and, with such a prima donna at command, there is now some hope of better success for the German opera speculation.

Madame BERKEL filled the rôle of Annchen (vice the inefficient Mlle. PICKER), and in this line of business she becomes acceptable. She never had any pretensions to the position of a leading artiste, and finds her proper level in that of seconda donna. Mr. WEINLICH improved considerably on his last interpretation of Caspar, and sang the drinking song with far more fire and effect; but as to the tenor, we have nothing to add to our former notice—his singing was as mediocre and unsatisfactory as usual. The choruses were weak and inefficient—the charming bridal chorus especially so, while we have heard the famous Huntsman's chorus far better sung in a "lager bier halle." Mr. BERGMANN deserves great credit for his skill in directing a diminished orchestra. The accompaniments to Mlle. Johannsen's grand scena were given with truly admirable delicacy and tact.

A new scale of prices were adopted for the first time. The upper tier was crowded at twenty-five cents, the next tier equally so at fifty cents, whilst the parquette and circle (all reserved) were respectively attended at a dollar. Our German citizens like to have everything, amusements included, on cheap terms, and although the high-class merchants may patronize the aristocratic portion of the house, the paying masses of Faderland will inevitably decline paying the advanced price. We consider the alteration an unwise move of manager Berkel's.

We understand that in consequence of Mlle. Johannsen's success, several new subscribers have come forward to support the speculation, and that there is now a prospect of German opera being given some twenty nights longer.—New Yorker.

(From the Tribune, 30th.)—Flotow's graceful little opera of "Stradella" was given on Tuesday evening, when three candidates for public favor appeared for the first time. Mlle. Kronfeld possesses a smooth, agreeable voice, but somewhat thin in quality, particularly in the upper register. The lady, however, is very young, we should say not more than 18, and her voice has not yet attained full development. She at once prepossessed the audience in her favor by her quiet, unpretending style. Mr. Giudi has a pleasant tenor voice, without being remarkable for much power; he was very well received, and will be an acquisition to the company. The part of Barbarino was undertaken by Mr. Neufeld, by no means an improvement on that of Mr. Beutler.

This (Thursday) evening, Flotow's ever-popular opera of "Martha" will be performed—Mlle. Johannsen in the principal rôle. Owing to the continued indisposition of Mme. v. Berkel, the part of Nancy will be filled by Miss D'ormy.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Harmonia Sacred Music Society gave its first concert for the season last Monday evening in Concert Hall. Mr. L. MEIGNON conducted; Mr. MICHAEL H. CROSS presided at the organ. The following solo artists assisted: Mr. BERNER, tenor, from Europe (his first appearance in this country); Miss EMMA BROOKE, soprano; Mr. T. BISHOP, tenor; Mr. F. RUDOLPHSEN, baritone.

PART I.

1. Organ.—Introduction and Fugue, played by Michael H. Cross.
2. Grand Chorus—"Great is the Lord," Hummel
3. Tenor Solo.—Grand Recitative and Aria; Der Freischütz, sung by Mr. Berner.
4. Grand Chorus—"The Lord is Great," Von Weber
5. Trio—"Praise ye," from Artias. Miss Brooke, Mr. Bishop, and Mr. Rudolphsen.
6. Tenor Solo.—"Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," (by desire), sung by Mr. Bishop.

PART II.

1. Solo Baritone. Scena—"Eleanora," sung by Mr. Rudolphsen.
2. Tenor Solo. Polonaise, from the Opera of Jossoda, sung by Mr. Berner.
3. Concerted piece. Finale to the second act of La Sonnambula.—Miss Brooke, Mr. Bishop and Chorus, Bellini

PART III.

1. Organ Operatic Selections, played by Michael H. Cross.
2. Chorus. Lützow's Wild Huntsman.
3. Soprano. Swiss Air with variations, sung by Miss Emma Brooke.
4. Tenor Solo. Adelaide, sung by Mr. Berner.
5. Chorus—"Come unto these Yellow Sands," Stevenson

ALBANY, N. Y. A friend writes us: "GOTTSCALK gave a concert here last Thursday with Mrs. BOSTWICK. He never played so finely at an Albany concert. The next morning he delighted us with Bach's fugues, Beethoven, Chopin, &c.; and as Thalberg was much talked of, he gave us his Don Juan fantasia (and is it not his best?); also some of his original studies. I do believe you could hear Gottschalk play for a year, every day in the year, and then not know the extent of his wonderful repertoire."

WORCESTER, Ms.—(From the Palladium).—A private musical soirée was given on Friday evening at Allen's music rooms, by Mr. B. D. ALLEN, to whom our musical public have been for some time indebted for many such occasions of interest and enjoyment. First upon the programme came Mozart's Variations in G, which were played by Mr. Allen and Miss Bacon with marked expression and excellent taste. A cavatina from La Gazza Ladra was substituted for a romance from "William Tell," in consequence of the absence of Miss Fiske. It was well sung by the soprano singer of one of our best quartet choirs; a lady who is possessed of a voice of singular richness and beauty, joined to a style which many vocalists of greater pretensions might adopt to advantage. She also sang three of the Franz songs. "The blue-eyed lassie," "Mutter, O sing mich zur Ruh," and "Imsonst,"—choice gems which are just flashing their light upon us of the western world—and sweetly and feelingly she gave them. In addition to these, she sang a canzone of Mr. Allen's composition—"When day has smil'd"—a winning melody with beautiful, bell-like accompaniment. Mr. Stocking's singing of the Jenny Lind ballad, "Love smiles no more," was warmly received. This was also a substitution—for a terzetto from Don Giovanni. Of the instrumental pieces performed we have not the space, if we had the ability, to give the notice they deserve. Miss Bacon played the Beethoven sonata, op. 26, with her accustomed taste and skill. The theme and marcia funebre are very familiar reminiscences of the great master, every lover of music ever realizing the tender beauty of the former and the solemn grandeur of the latter. The entire work was finely played. Mr. Allen's performance of the Schaeffer fantasia and variations was masterly in every respect; and the Polonaise by Chopin, op. 26, No. 1, received from him a most exquisite rendering. Truly, the fascination of this latter composer grows even upon those who at first acknowledge his genius! Schubert's March in B minor, a characteristic work of much grandeur, satisfactorily ended the evening's real, unqualified "entertainment."

Foreign.

SALZBURG.—THE MOZART FESTIVAL.—(Cor. London Post, Sept. 9.)—On Sept. 6, as I have already informed you, took place the formal entry of the various choral societies from nearly all parts of Germany, through triumphal arches, over which waved the national flags of Austria, Bavaria, Salzburg, the Tyrol, &c. The gates of the town were also gaily decorated, as was the Salzach-bridge. Great part of the morning was employed in rehearsing, and in the evening the procession of Liedertafeln moved from the Mirabellaplatz, over the Salzach-bridge to the Mozartplatz, where, around the colossal statue of the great composer, the Festival Cantata, for male voices and wind instruments, composed expressly for the occasion by Herr Franz Lachner, conductor of the Royal Opera-house, Munich, and supreme director of the present Mozart Festival, was to be executed. The procession was accompanied by more than 200 torch-bearers, and during the performance of Herr Lachner's cantata, the Mozartplatz was illuminated by Bengal fire. Outside the Mozart-gate, too, the Gaisberggalpe and Bengelstein was similarly honored.

On the following day, September 7, took place the first grand concert in the Aula Academica, which was simply and tastefully fitted up for the occasion. A large golden M, with sun-rays, on gorgeous purple drapery, formed the background of the orchestra, whilst between the windows on either side of the salle were tablets bearing the titles and thematic index of Mozart's compositions. The vast salle was quite full, and the Imperial box was occupied by the Empress-Mother of Austria, King Max of Bavaria, and King Otho of Greece. Herr Franz Lachner directed the orchestra, and the programme included the so-called "Jupiter" symphony, the overture to Die Zauberflöte, a "Concertante Symphony," the air in B flat, with clarinet obbligato, from La Clemenza di Tito, by Madame Behrend Brandt and Herr Bärmann, a trio from Idomeneo (one of Mozart's greatest operas), never yet heard in England, nor perhaps likely to be, the air "Dies Bildnis" ("Cara immagine"), sung by Dr. Härtinger, and the concerto in D, played by the Viennese pianist, Herr Willmers, upon a Viennese piano by Seibert, one of the most celebrated Austrian manufacturers. The solo vocalists, besides Madame Behrend Brandt and Dr. Härtinger, already mentioned, were Mesdames Dietz, Mangstl, and Herr Kindermann.

Before the concert, an appropriate prologue, by Herr Prechler, was delivered by Mlle. Blondine Jéna, of Vienna, setting forth the value of the "ideal" to the world, and exhorting us to compensate to Mozart's spirit for the sufferings he underwent "in the flesh," by adopting his creed of love and beauty, and disseminating it amongst mankind. The concert, a critical description of which I cannot attempt to give at this moment, lasted about four hours. No artiste was "received," as it is termed, by the public; but there was no lack of applause during the performance, and nearly all the artistes were recalled on more than one occasion. At the conclusion (long before which many of the "Mozart-loving" audience had departed in search of "bif-teck mit Kartoffeln"), Herr Franz Lachner was loudly called for and cheered from all parts of the room.

The following morning, September 9, we had high mass in the cathedral, when the mass in C, André's Catalogue, 19, 1776, was performed, under the direction of Herr Taux. The soprano and alto were inefficient amateurs—the band and chorus thin, and wanting in ensemble. In fact, the secular concerts appear to absorb all the attention of the managing committee. The Liedertafeln-fest, which should have taken place to-day on the Mönchsberg, was spoiled by the rain, and the singers were consequently obliged to give their entertainment under shelter in the Aula. The procession of all the societies took place, nevertheless. The ceremonies were commenced by a herald dressed in red and white, and followed by halberdiers, banner-bearers, &c., belonging to the archbishop, all in the costume of the middle ages. Then came the singers in masses, accompanied by various military bands. The Empress-Mother, King Max, and King Otho were also present on this occasion. Amongst other artistic notabilities now in Salzburg are Ferdinand Hiller, from Cologne; Otto Prechler, author of the prologue; Dr. Hauslick, music-director from Vienna; Herren Mosewits (Breslau), and Netzer (Grätz). But the greatest living object of interest here is an old silver-haired man, called Karl Mozart, son of the immortal composer, and last of the name. He has come all the way from Milan to enjoy the fête, and, although things are not cheap, there is not the slightest danger of his lacking a dinner of champagne, although his father might have wanted both. The only fear is that the poor old fellow will be killed with kindness.

PARIS.—Sig. Verdi, who was to have left for Italy before this, remains here. It is reported that his Traviata, translated into French, under the title of Le Trovère, has just been put into rehearsal at the Imperial Opera House, and will be produced the second week in December. The principal characters will be supported by Mesdames Medori and Borghini-Mamo, Messrs. Guémard, Bonneheé, and Derivis.

Jean de Paris will shortly be revived at the Opera Comique. Mlle. Lheritier, of the Conservatory, will make her first appearance in the character of the Page, "created" by Mad. Gavaudin, and M. Stockhausen, the baritone, in that of the Seneschal, "created" by Martin. A musical trifle, entitled, Les Trois Dragons, has been favorably received at the theatre of Les Folies Nouvelles.—On hearing of Rossini's return to Paris on Thursday week, Musard, with his entire orchestra, gave a serenade, at eleven o'clock in the evening, under the maestro's windows. The pieces performed, from memory, by Musard's seventy musicians, were "La Pastorella delle Alpi," and the overture to La Gazza Ladra.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, it will be seen, give a grand Sacred Concert to-morrow evening, in the Music Hall, assisted by Mesdames LA GRANGE and BERTUCCA MARETZKE, our own ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, Signors CERESA, AMODIO, and the other stars of MARETZKE's Italian Opera, and a grand orchestra; the whole under the direction of Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD, the new conductor of the Society, who will make his first public appearance in this capacity. The programme begins well with the overture to "St. Paul," and the first part gives us an opportunity to hear Miss Phillipps again in one of her best contralto songs, "He was despised." It contains also a goodly selection of choruses, and the more serious airs from operas. The second part is of course, Rossini's Stabat Mater; for every Italian opera company has to be brought out in this, apparently the only sacred music with which they are familiar; and the Stabat Mater seems to have been providentially created as a means of drawing off a little of the golden tide of opera into the dry channels of our unremunerated oratorio societies. But there is good music in it, it is popular, and affords fine scope for the artistic powers of Lagrange and the rest. . . Verily we are growing hard-hearted; we expose ourselves to piteous complaints; this, for instance, from the City Item of Philadelphia:

"Not a word regarding the Italian Opera at the Boston Theatre is to be found in Dwight's Journal of Music. We expected to meet with some sound criticisms upon the merits of the performers, intending to transfer them for the benefit of our readers, but we were disappointed. His silence is a real loss to the lovers of music. What is the matter?"

How does our friend Fitzgerald know that there is Italian opera in Boston? Does he go beyond the musical papers, and search the advertising columns of the political dailies? But patience; if our opinion is good for anything, it will keep, and perhaps a review of the whole when past will be fairer, better proportioned and less partial, than hasty bulletins in the midst of the smoke of the battle.

The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger says THALBERG, the great pianist, is none of your thin, intellectual, sentimental looking geniuses, but a burly-faced, wholesome, farmer-looking fellow, more like one of your Western Pennsylvania corn growers than a prodigy of art. He speaks English as good as an Englishman, and has a much better acquaintance with American affairs than the most intelligent foreigners usually have.

A Russian prince, who is a fanatical admirer of an instrument which has fallen into general disfavor of late years—the guitar—has summoned all the guitarists of Europe to a public trial of their skill next month at Brussels, and has promised a gold medal to the best player, and a silver one to the second. This, if he does not die of a surfeit of sweet sounds, may work his cure. Verily it will be a sort of World's Fair of all the sweetest sugar confectionary of music! . . . Lovers of BEETHOVEN, who can play the piano or command a player, should be interested in the announcement by Messrs. Ewer & Co., London, of "Beethoven's Overtures, complete, newly arranged for the Piano-forte, by ERNST PAUER." The list contains the overtures to Prometheus, Coriolan, the three to Leonora and the one to Fidelio, the Egmont, Ruins of Athens, Namensfeier, King Stephen, and Die Weihe des Hauses (Op. 124), complete in one volume, price 18 shillings. The editor states that he has availed himself of the modern improvements of the piano, to give a fuller and truer representation of the orchestral combinations, than are to be found in any of the old arrangements.

The Chicago Congregational Herald relates the following:

A few Sabbaths since we attended divine service in our city, to hear a person who was announced to preach, from New York. We will not name the denomination, but can say, with reference to the discourse, we were amply repaid for our attendance. Unexpectedly, however, after the sermon, the minister announced that he would sing a soul-inspiring—original—Christian war-song! We felt like trembling, and looked around with amazement. Says he, Brethren, all unite in the chorus, namely: "I'm bound for the kingdom, I'm bound for the kingdom, I'm bound for the kingdom, We'll soon be at home!" He proceeded with his solo; and, thought we, what a ridiculous melody to accompany one heavenward! The air struck us as something we had often heard played on the street-organs, until, by careful reflection, as the song continued to ring upon our ears, we distinctly recognized the Ethiopian melody, "Wait for de Wagon." The result was, that all previous benefit of both sermon and devotional exercises, was thus made null and void; and we left the place of worship with a feeling akin to contempt, nay disgust.

One of our exchanges relates the following facts regarding the mysteries of the manufacturers of fame by profession: "Madame RISTORI, the celebrated Italian tragedienne, relates quite openly that she received in Paris a bill of six hundred francs

(one hundred and twenty dollars) from the chief of the claque. She refused to pay; but considering that she had to come again before the public she yielded and paid. When, in 1844, a certain AUGUSTE, chief of this establishment, died, his book of receipts proved that he received from NOURRIT, annually, two thousand francs; from Mlle. TAGLIONI, monthly, three hundred francs; from FANNY ELSLER, for the first performance, five hundred francs; for the second, three hundred francs; and for each of the following performances, one hundred francs."

Advertisements.

GRAND SACRED CONCERT.

THE MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY have the honor of announcing a performance at the Music Hall, on SUNDAY EVENING, Nov. 2d, assisted by the following distinguished Artists:—Mme. ANNA DE LA GRANGE, Mme. BERTUCCA MARETZKE, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, Signori CERESA, BRIGNOLI, AMODIO, COLLETTI, and a GRAND ORCHESTRA, under the direction of L. H. SOUTHARD.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

- 1—Overture: St. Paul, Mendelssohn
- 2—Chorus: "Lord, thou alone art God," "
- 3—Aria: "Ah mio figlio," Meyerbeer
- 4—Aria: "He was despised," (Messiah), Handel
- 5—Aria: Prayer from I Lombardi, Verdi
- 6—Chorus: "The God of Israel," Rossini
- 7—Prayer from Mosé in Egitto, "

PART II.

ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER.

Tickets with secured seats at One Dollar, and also at Fifty Cents, may be obtained at the Music Store of E. H. WADE, and on Sunday at the principal Hotels and at the Hall Office.

Doors open at 8: Concert to commence at 7 o'clock.

WILLIAM STUTSON, JR., SECRETARY.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRE & CO. Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices. THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Kimball, a few copies. Just received, a small invoice of MAYER FLUTES. Also, a genuine LUPOR VIOLIN.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

Has the honor to announce that she will open three new classes for the instruction of Young Ladies on the PIANO-FORTE, on

Monday Forenoon, Nov. 3d,

for very far advanced young ladies.

Tuesday Afternoon, Nov. 4th,

for young misses who have already begun.

Wednesday, November 5th,

for young misses, beginners.

Applications to be made at No. 55 Hancock Street.

MUSICAL SOIRÉES.

OTTO DRESEL

Proposes to give his FOURTH SERIES of FOUR SOIREEs, At the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, during the months of December, January, February and March, on Saturday evenings to be hereafter specified. Subscription for the Series, in packages of four tickets, $3. Subscription lists may be found at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, and at the music stores.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1866. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1866. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland: all held during the month of September, 1866:—making Six First Premiums in one month!!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIRST PRIZE over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal base. The one with pedal base contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $60 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address

MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

JOH PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club,

Respectfully inform the musical public of Boston and vicinity that they will give their usual series of EIGHT CONCERTS, to take place at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. Packages of eight tickets, to be used at pleasure, $5. Single tickets will be $1 each. Lists will be out in a few days.

CLASSICAL PIANO MUSIC.

CHEAP, ELEGANT AND UNIFORM EDITIONS,
PRINTED FROM ENGRAVED PLATES.

With Portraits of Authors, and Thematic Catalogues, and Chromo-Lithograph Titles.

BAOH, SEB. Works, including the Wohl-temper.
Clavier, 5 vols.	$5 00
BEETHOVEN'S 32 Sonatas.	8 75
27 do., (without the five last.)	5 00
Miscellaneous Works, including five four-hand
Duets.	3 25
Piano Trios and Quintet, (score and parts.)	9 00
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts.)	7 50
Symphonies, arr. as Duets for four hands, 2 vols.	7 50
Symphonies, arr. for piano solo, by Kalkbrenner, 6 00
CLEMENTI, M. 24 Sonatas, 4 vols.	7 00
HAYDN, J. 32 Sonatas, 2 vols.	5 00
MOZART, W. A. Sonatas.	5 00
20 Miscellaneous Works, (including the Duets
for four hands.)	3 50
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts.)	8 00
Piano Trios, do.	5 50
Quartets and Quintets, do.	8 75
Symphonies, (two performers.)	4 00

Also imported the Solo Works of Mendelssohn, Haydn's Piano Trios, and Sonatas for Piano and Violin, at very low prices, and in new, uniform editions.

G. ANDRÉ & CO., 306 Chestnut St.

Philadelphia, October, 1856.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,

FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
Gives instruction on the Piano. Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

NEW MUSICAL WORKS,
NEARLY READY:

I.
BACH'S 48 PRELUDES AND FUGUES.
By J. SEBASTIAN BACH.
In Numbers. Complete in two vols. quarto, $5.

II.
OPERA OF IL TROVATORE.—PIANO SOLO.
Uniform in style with the previous volumes of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas." 1 vol. quarto, $2.

III.
KREUTZER'S 40 STUDIES FOR THE VIOLIN.
One volume quarto, $1.50.

IV.
THE PSALMS OF LIFE:
A Compilation of Psalms, Hymns, Chants, &c., embodying the Spiritual, Progressive and Reformatory Sentiment of the present age. By JOHN S. ADAMS.
One volume 12mo. 260 pages. Cloth, 75 cts. Leather, $1.

V.
BORDOGNI'S 36 VOCALISÉS,
FOR SOPRANO OR TENOR VOICES. (Books II. & III.)

VI.
THE MEMORARE:
A Collection of Catholic Music. By A. WERNER.

VII.
HOHMAN'S PRACTICAL COURSE OF VOCAL
STUDY, ON SCHOOL PRINCIPLES.
By C. H. HOHMAN. Translated from the 5th German Revised Edition. By J. C. D. PARKER.

All of the above are in press, and will be issued at an early date.

Oliver Ditson, Publisher, 115 Washington St.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

To Choral Societies and Choirs.

NOVELLO'S Catalogue, No. 3, contains a list of Music for the use of Choral Societies, Church Choirs, and Singing Classes, printed in separate Vocal and Orchestral Parts. Containing Oratorios, Odes, Cantatas, Festival Hymns and Anthems; Operatic Music, Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets and Choruses; Overtures, Symphonies and Marches; Madrigals and Glee; Music with Latin words; Masses, Motets, &c., &c., sent postage free for one cent.

The Vocal Parts are printed in full music size at the rate of three cents per page.

Novello's Octavo Editions of Oratorios,

Of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., in Vocal Score, with Piano-forte accompaniment. Handel's Messiah, $1 68; Judas Maccabaeus, $1 68; Haydn's Creation, $1 25. All the Oratorios of these great masters have been published in this series at similarly low prices.

NOVELLO'S OCTAVO CHORUSES.

All the Choruses in the octavo editions of the Oratorios may be had distinct in Vocal Score with organ and Piano-forte accompaniment, at 3, 6, 9, or 12 cents each.

NOVELLO'S CHORAL HAND-BOOK.

A collection of music in separate vocal parts. In this work are published the whole of the chorus parts of the following Oratorios:

Handel's "Messiah," price 88 cents each part.

Handel's "Judas Maccabaeus," price 88 cents each part.

Handel's "Samson," price 88 cents each part.

These parts are printed in the octavo size with the Alto and Tenor parts in the Treble Clef.

COLLECTION OF GLEES.

Novello's Glee Hive, Part Song Book, and the Musical Times and Singing Class Circular. For particulars see Catalogue, No. 5, sent postage free for one cent.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,

APR 29 BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-forte, Organ & Harmonium,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST PRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,

Teacher of Singing and Piano-forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line. 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line. 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion. . . . $12.00
Do do each subsequent. . . . $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 240.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 6.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
"GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
"CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I. "
"C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
"MILLER & BRACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

The Music of Hungary.

From the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," Leipzig, 1852.

(Concluded from p. 35.)

Such always is the relation of the Gipsy to the music of the nation where he happens to dwell; it is a reproductive, not a productive relation; but what he is not materially, he becomes in form. The way in which he conceives the given nota instrumentally is so true to the indwelling spirit of these melodies, that he is to be considered as the peculiar creator of a Hungarian instrumental music. Now what do we understand by instrumental music? A music essentially distinct from musical song. The human voice is, to be sure, the most beautiful organ of musical inventions, the centre of all tone movements; but when we consider that this voice in its normal state commands not more than twelve or fourteen manageable tones, we find what bounds and limits are assigned it in the immeasurable realm of tones. In the second place it lacks the flexibility of instrumental music, such as we find especially in stringed instruments. Whatever more the long years of practice and the consequent virtuosity of a Catalani and such throat-machines may extract from the human voice, is all forced and unnatural, and cannot enter into the account in speaking of the character of the human voice in its natural condition. The violin, on the contrary, affords a great compass of tones, which the instrument as such may require every player to traverse; and here is just the point where we may regard the Gipsy at once as a natural musician and an artist. When he has heard a Hungarian melody sung, and when he tries to play it over on his instrument, whether it be violin or dulcimer, a true artistic feeling, a musical instinct as it were, leads him to reproduce the nota he has heard in the instrumental manner. The cimbalo has for its task, in the Lassús (Adagios), in which long holds are introduced, to fill them out by a tremulous and rapid iteration of the same tones, while the violins hold out the note, or the player makes a harmonic embellishment, as for example:

The dulcimer embraces over three octaves, and admits of the execution of harmonic figures and tremolos with the greatest rapidity. The clarinet mingles a Csiko element in the Gipsy orchestra; it moves wildly to and fro, and hops with piping cry about the string quartet. In the violin, on the contrary, the gnawing pain and melancholy of the Hungarian engraves itself. An inexpressible sadness, a moaning complaint, quivers from the hot strokes, with which the gipsy presses down the strings of his violin. The impassioned character of his playing, the paroxysm into which he works himself, is strongly expressed. A hot glow flushes the cheeks of the players; they make convulsive movements with the head and hands, and they have scarcely played through when they sink back exhausted on their seat.

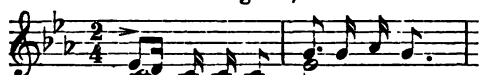

The gift of transforming every melody at once into an instrumental piece is possessed in a high degree on the piano by the lady already mentioned, Emilie von Kabinyi. She plays, too, like the gipsies, everything by heart, and shows therein an extraordinary memory, having at her command more than a hundred Hungarian tunes, as Czárdás, Csikos, Inház melodies, &c. When I asked her once whether she did not also sing Hungarian, she replied that she had never sung in her life—a new proof of my assertion that the Hungarian is more playing than singing music. At the same time, what the gipsies do not understand, this lady knows the notes well and plays also classical music admirably by note. Among the composers for the piano she is partial to Chopin. With this rare musical talent a high intellectual culture, a noble enthusiasm for her country's cause, for freedom and for right, a Hungarian hospitality and largeness of heart, beauty and amiability, unite to make this lady one of the most remarkable phenomena of her sex in our day.

Of individual gipsy musicians in former times, Bihari and Cisari were especially distinguished. Bihari, who used to play with his band at a café in Pesth, and who in gathering up the money would leave out all the bank notes which were not hundreds, and throw them to the waiters, died at last in a Pesth hospital. The first gipsy band in Pesth at present is that of Sárkösi, among whose members is a son of the famous Bihari. The cafés in which the gipsy bands of Pesth are most heard are the King of Hungary, (here the most frequently) the Jägerhorn, the Tiger and the Hopfengarten; in the last and in the Hôtel d'Europe, they play mostly in the evening, and here too in the most national manner.

Since the unhappy issue of the revolutionary war, a strong pressure has weighed upon the Hungarian music on the part of the Austrian government. Not only are the Rákoczy, Kosuth, Werbungs, Klapka and other revolutionary marches entirely excluded by a strict prohibition, but not much Hungarian playing is allowed; and if the Gipsies play more than three pieces in Hungarian style, and do not give at least an equal quantity of foreign music, it is regarded as "a demonstration," and (horribile dictu) can be re-sented. This is partly the reason why several of the Gipsy bands have become entirely modernized; they have to play a great many Françaises, waltzes, polkas, &c., so that the nationality of their music is lost. Since not only the Gipsy manner of playing, but also many of the older Hungarian pieces are preserved merely traditionally by these popular musicians, being handed down from father to son, from one band to another; and since they are unable to read notes and to fix down musical ideas in writing, there is great danger from this political prohibition that not only the genuine style of playing, but also that the older, truly national pieces will gradually (as we already begin to see) die out entirely in the consciousness of the nation. Among these is one of the oldest monuments of Hungarian national music, whose origin is to be assigned to the end of the 17th century, and which is now extremely seldom heard in Hungary, and is only preserved by tradition: this is the Rákoczy nota, not to be confounded with the Rákoczy indulo or march, which grew out of the former afterwards. Of the whole Gipsy band of Sárkösi, only the above mentioned son of the famous Bihari knew it; on the other hand it lived still fresh in the piano playing of the baroness Emilie von Kabinyi; and to the ready zeal with which she helped me fix this music down in writing I owe it that I now possess this treasure not merely in my fingers, but in written notes. The delivery of this instrumental piece of four divisions, and remarkable for its national originality as much as for its age, requires an intimate acquaintance with the peculiarities of the Hungarian music. For this music, like many such Hungarian Gipsy pieces, cannot possibly, on account of the fantastic and free delivery which it requires, be written down precisely as it ought to sound; and as I was never able to hear it played by Gipsies, I have been indebted solely to the frequent playing and the verbal instructions of the aforementioned lady, for the means of rendering the same in all its genuineness upon the piano. Of course the piano, with its quickly vanishing tone-material, can but poorly reproduce this and other instrumental pieces of the sort; yet I have more than once had experience that it can be played so as to give a lively idea of its delivery with full instrumentation. It is wonderful that such embellishments, mordenti, runs, &c., which as applied to our Western melodies so often show the worst taste, are with the Hungarian airs an almost necessary accompaniment; without them they would lose much of their national type. In a word, the embellishments with which the Gipsy musicians, and, as we shall soon see, also the Magyar natives of the Csikós, Inhaz, &c., invest their melodies, are the national costume of this music. As the national dress of the Hungarians is motley and variegated, so too is the instrumental clothing of their popular melodies. A few bars of instrumental embellishments of one of the most beautiful Hungarian airs may serve here as an example. The first five measures of the simple melody, of which the whole is sung to the nine-line stanzas before given, are as follows:

Tree and root are rent asunder,

I and darling torn a-part!

This the Gipsy plays, apart from its peculiar harmony, in something like this fashion:

Remark in this delivery the short cutting off of the concluding note. In their modulations the Gipsies are very fond of frequent transitions by chords of the seventh; for instance, they harmonize the concluding measures of the Makoi Csárdás in F minor thus:

A multitude of Csárdás, which have been published in Pesth by Wagner and Treichlinger, are harmonized in an entirely ungentle and false manner; those who would study the Hungarian music in such printed sumptuous editions, are hereby warned against them. Not once is the chord of the superfluous sixth, of which we spoke above, and of which the Hungarian ear is so fond, regarded by the editors in their mechanical zeal; to say nothing of other fine points of melody and harmony which the Gipsy observes. The recently deceased Cyressi Beni was the best of the makers of such written arrangements. Of all the forms of ornament, none is so foreign to the Hungarian Gipsy as the trill, which he utterly despises. At least, I have never heard trills from a Gipsy band; only the clarinet makes here and there a trill-like connection between the tones; but as a means of modulation melodiously strengthening the harmony, I have never heard trills.

From the Gipsies we come to the native tribes of pure Magyar origin—the Csikós or horse-drovers, and the Inhaz or shepherds. Which of my readers has not heard during the last years of the revolution of the Csikós and their terrible weapon? This is not the place to speak of their extraordinary skill in riding, of their dexterity in handling their whip, which spreads terror among men and beasts; but I need only remind my readers of what they already know, to excite their curiosity, when I tell them that these men have also a peculiar music. From their willow pipes one hears screaming over the broad plain their wild tunes, in which not an elegiac complaint, as in the Lassús of the Hungarian Gipsies, but a rude natural cry finds utterance. * * Various Hungarian melodies have appeared in Pesth under the title Csikós, but, with a single exception, they are none of them genuine. In the Csiko tunes the mode of living of these native tribes is mirrored on its musical side; their melodies may be compared to their unbridled horses, feeding on those vast steppes.

Quite different is the music of another Magyar tribe. I mean the Inház or shepherds. From their bone pipes stream the melancholy tones of a tender elegy, holding notes, long sustained and dying away in pianissimo, indefinite runs up and down the Hungarian scale (described above), which wander as embellishments about a distinct tune. All this makes their playing seem a dreamy, fantastical, mysterious, fascinating web of tones, and one involuntarily thinks, as he listens, of the words of the poet:

Vorüber ihr Schaaf, vorüber,
Dem Schäfer ist gar so weh!

Like spirit voices these tones, steeped in sadness, ring by night over the immeasurable plain, and an inexpressible presentiment of our eternal existence gets possession of the soul while listening to these sounds. Thus the milder habit of the Inház shows itself also in their music; the sight and care of gentle sheep awakens in the Inház very different feelings from those excited in the Csiko by his familiarity with the impetuous horse: one dreams, the other storms; one loves, the other burns; one laments, the other cries aloud; one is patient as a lamb, the other rears up like a wild horse. The two poles of the life of feeling meet in the music of these two Magyar tribes.

If we return to the general divisions of the Hungarian music, we have so far two, the song and the Csárdás, which belongs to the instrumental world. As regards the Friss (or quick movement) of the Csárdás, its proper delivery requires a very peculiar gradation of the tempo. You must not suddenly observe the tempo marks in the execution of the Friss; only gradually must the player throw himself into a quick time, continually accelerating until the conclusion of a strain. For example, the following pretty czárdás passage is played thus:

And only on the repetition is it taken from the beginning fast, and uniformly fast until the end. There is something exceedingly impassioned, unrestrained, fantastical in this style of delivery, and the spirit of the tune itself so perfectly accords with such delivery, that one who deeply enters into this music can never play a tune like the above in any other manner than the one here indicated.

Beside the Csárdás, there is a higher kind of dance music, called the Kös. Both the music and the dance, as compared with the Csárdás, are distinguished by a fineness, an ornate elegance, a grace and grandeur, which are not peculiar to the Csárdás. Moreover the Kös moves only in the higher circles of the Hungarian nation; it is not by far so old as the Csárdás, and the music, in spite of the recent excellent achievements of Travnyik and Bózsavölgyi, has not the real national stamp by which the Csárdás stands off in such striking contrast from the dance music of all other nations. A piece of Kös music bears about the same relation to a genuine old Csárdás, that the modern revolutionary marches do to the old Rakoczy indulo.

Among those who deserve mention for original efforts at the composition of Hungarian national melodies, the name of Thern, a piano-forte maestro at Pesth, must not be passed over in silence. He is the author of a now very popular air, called Fői dal. (Dal means song.) In the conversations which I had with him about the Hungarian music, he showed great interest in it, and also was not without theoretic insight, which for a Hungarian musician is saying much. Of those who have done active service for the music of their nation as good singers of the Hungarian popular melodies, the names of Fűredy, Mikály, and Vorrá are most prominent.

I might proceed to speak of the Hungarian Opera, or of the national music of Hungary, as elevated to dramatic Art. But here my pen stops. The Hungarians to this date have no national opera. If, for example, the new opera by ERKEL, Hunyadi di László, is to be called a Hungarian opera, we may just as well call any one of Verdi's operas Hungarian. The opera Hunyadi, if we except perhaps some passages in the well-known beautiful Hunyadi march, betrays no trace of the spirit of Hungarian music. It is an arbitrary patchwork of reminiscences from the Italian operatic school; and what has given this extremely weak and insignificant opera in every respect, whether of counterpoint or melody, so much value for some time with the Pesth public, is in the first place the historical national subject of its libretto; in the next place, the fact that its performance was forbidden for some time after the revolution on account of its subject; furthermore the limited musical taste of the miscellaneous Pesth public; and finally the bravura execution of the singer, Madame LAGRANGE. I cannot, with the best will, with the exception of the pretty motives which are brought together in the Hunyadi March, find in this whole opera a single new idea, or even a half ordinary carrying out of an idea. I have a right to judge of it, since I have not only seen and heard it performed in the national theatre at Pesth, but I have also had opportunity to examine the original score attentively.

A far more genial creation is an opera by a certain DOPPLER, first flutist at the national theatre in Pesth; but this too, although far superior to Hunyadi in design and execution, is a half-way affair. The opera to which I refer is called Ilka, or the "Hussar's Bride," and contains a truly masterly overture, which alone says enough for the uncommon talent of its young composer. In the opera itself too, as well as in the overture, you hear splendid, genuine Hungarian national sounds, which, however, often give way very soon to jingling common-place.

Of the general state of music, as exhibited at Pesth and Ofen in the theatre, the church, in private circles and in families, and of its leading personal representatives, I shall write in a special article, and for the present close. Were I to describe the Hungarian music in general in a few words, I should say: In the Hungarian music there is more passion than good nature, more fire than heartiness, more softness than tenderness, more sadness than earnestness, more complaining than enduring sorrow, more wildness than efficient energy, more bravura than depth, more piquancy than beauty, more of the grotesque than of the romantic, and so on. Grief over the loss of a great past, the political condition of the country, these, O unhappy, noble nation of the Magyars, are depicted in thy music! Thanks for the hospitality which thou hast let the stranger find at thy hearth, for so many a cordial pressure of the hand from thy brave sons, for thy precious wines, for thy glorious music, which my soul drank with rapture, for all the beauty which I could enjoy at thy breast! Much that is good and noble, which still sleeps unrecognized in thee, in after times shall ripen, and the yet closed buds of culture in a better future open to the light of day. Thy hour also shall strike, thou deeply bowed daughter of Magyar, and what thou hast a forefeeling of in tones, shall yet on some great morning prove reality; thy grief shall be transformed to joy, thy complaint to jubilation, thy tears into sweet wine!

DR. GUSTAV PRESSEL.

Stuttgart, May, 1852.

Sufferings of a Grand Piano.

What hard lives are led, now-a-days, by piano-fortes! what miserable times they have! and how much they have to undergo! and how shamefully they are abused! Every one must be aware of these facts, for pianos cannot, by any strain of veracity, be classed among the silent sufferers; they cry out, and with a very loud noise, poor things; now shrieking chromatically in their upper octaves, now groaning dismally in the bass, and sobbing in the tenor. Buffeted, pounded, thrashed, galloped over, hit as hard as possible, by muscular fingers, in all parts, in an instant of time,—really a piano is as badly off as an omnibus horse. We propose the formation of a Humane Society for the protection and Relief of Suffering Piano-fortes; no concert performers allowed in the Board of Directors, they being the most inhuman oppressors of the unhappy instruments. We know of nothing that would tempt us to exchange our editorial condition with that of the finest grand piano in the world: we are not weak, but we could not stand under such treatment as it receives, not even if we had three stout legs and an iron frame. Imagine it; for the moment, we are a grand piano.

We are engaged by the distinguished pianist, Herr Klapperklau, Knight Commander of the Polar Star, Grand Cross of the Golden Fleece, &c., &c., for his grand concert; he tries us, he approves of us, he patronizes our maker upon consideration and orders us round to the hall. We are hauled there in a cart swathed in rag carpet, and held up by savoury porters, upon whose lusty shoulders we are conveyed up the stair at a funeral pace. Our legs are screwed on, and we are at length placed on the platform. A tuner appears, we are opened, and all our nerves, (i. e. strings,) are drawn up to their utmost tension. This done, we are shut up, and have a little peace and quiet, just to prepare ourselves for the order of the approaching evening. The gas is lit, the audience gathers, our time draws near. Already we are wheeled into an admirable position, so that when the man opens our mouth we grin, with our row of ivories, in the faces of two thirds of of the assembled auditory. Our lid is removed, we look very new, very shiny, very nice, but we are conscious of a certain string,—an unhappy F,—that has yielded, just a trifle, and will be a little out of tune; it worries us on our maker's account, for we have a high regard for him; but, in all probability, there are not ten persons among the two thousand present, who will be able to detect the flatness of that solitary note, or an harmonic G, in the bass, that has a most delectable burr, and of whose existence we are also perfectly aware, though unable to rectify the defect.

Herr Klapperklau comes out of the retiring room, attired in scrupulous black, relieved by a few rags of ribbon to make the audience believe he is as great a man as can be. He returns the applause of the audience with a polite bow and a seraphic smile; what condescension! He seats himself before us, and while employed in the operation of removing his gloves, he annihilates several young ladies,—otherwise boarding school girls,—by his ribbons, diamond rings, ambrosial locks, and a few more of the before mentioned seraphic smiles. At length the gloves are off, and we expect him to commence upon us. But no! he is off his seat, and is displaying his entire absence of the nonsensical affectations of pianists, by pushing us so as to show our teeth to more of the audience. We are heavy, but he moves us after an effort, and is rewarded for playing porter badly, by a round of applause. Once more he is seated. Now for it. No, there is another young lady to be annihilated; he does it by a little more of the seraphic business, and by cracking all his finger joints in the most rapt and fascinating manner. Now he is certainly ready. Not yet, he has to brush our teeth with his linen cambric handkerchief, and to wipe his hands afterwards.

Our turn has come at last; Herr Klapperklau is all arranged; to use a vulgarism, he is prepared to "pitch into us," the which he does. A grand thumping in our lower regions. Bless the man! he has found that horrid harmonic G already! with both hands he dashes at our teeth like a savage dentist, committing all kinds of aggravated assaults and batteries upon poor, inoffensive us. We tremble beneath his prodigious blows, roar out at the force of his fists. Suddenly he detects our flattened F. Let that alone, most noble commander of the Golden Fleece, you are playing in public, and cannot stop. But it seems he has not been playing upon us yet; he has only been pre-luding extempore. He stops. He singles out our unhappy F, and favors it with several private hits, as if he expected to force it up to the pitch, by exposing it to the public, and bringing it to a sense of its improper situation. His endeavors have not the desired effect; our poor F gets flatter, the more it is pounded, but the ignorant people in the audience are in raptures at the acute ears the Herr possesses under that hyperion mop of black hair.

Having put the F out of countenance and tune the Polar Star again cracks his joints and commences his slow piece, composed, of course, by that prince of pianists Herr Klapperklau. Then we suffer. We are ill used without mercy; he beats us frightfully; he scratches the music out of us; he runs over us prodigiously fast and with prodigiously heavy fingers. We feel as if beaten to a jelly. We begin to form some conception of that ingenious contrivance, a threshing machine. He goes on for ten minutes in this way, and winds up at last with half a dozen terrific thumps; rising and leaving us quivering, vibrating, stunned, speechless. He retires amidst the plaudits of the enraptured auditors, who measure his abilities by the noise he has brought out of us. We fear the fools will have him out again; we dread his appearance. They clap on, they clap him out, they clap him up to us, he plays another composition by the same distinguished individual. He does not beat us long, this time, for he is almost as exhausted as we are.

We have a rest now, while the other performers are singing or tooting on the miserable flute, and then we are Klapperklau-ed again. Again he moves us, although we are just as he left us; again he gives the F a few dabs, to assure himself of its being wrong, and then he is at us again. Four times he is on the programme; four times he is encored; consequently eight times we are obliged passively to sustain our part in a boxing match with the redoubtable pianist.

Oh! who would be a grand piano forte and suffer eight such assaults in one evening, with no police to interfere in one's behalf, and no redress to be hoped for in any shape!

Fitzgerald's City Item.

(From the Massachusetts Teacher.)

The use of the Beautiful in Education.

AN ADDRESS TO THE PUPILS OF A GYMNASIUM.

[From the German of HERDER.]

[We give here a translation of a discourse by one of the noblest, purest, and most religious-minded of Germany's great thinkers. It will serve to show the elevated tone in which the subject is treated in the only country where as yet Teaching has really taken its rank as one of the liberal arts. We think that no teacher, however humble his sphere of duty, can read it without profit and improvement.—A.]

Youth is the age of beauty in human life, the period when we love and practise nothing so willingly as what seems beautiful. The element of beauty in literature, science, and art, is the sweet allurements which attracts us, the Hesperides fruit which enchants us. The most useful and valuable teaching needs only to seem hard, or to wear an earnest and melancholy countenance, and youth flies from it as the talk of dry old age; what is most useless needs only to put on a light and pleasing mien, and it is sought for, loved, and revered.

How then? Is this impulse of our nature, this attraction and inclination for all that is pleasing and beautiful, to be condemned? Did Nature commit a sin when she implanted this tendency in our hearts, and adorned with it the years of our first awakening into life? Did she commit a sin when she clothed so many forms about us with loveliness, and made the first years of life the spring-time also of human feeling? Is it forbidden to prefer the beautiful to the ugly? forbidden, too, in learning and the arts? In these, the ornaments of human nature, why should we not seek the ornament of the ornament, the essence of the attraction?

Nature never errs, and she would least of all be a deceiver where she shows herself friendly, and in what of loveliness she lays in the path of our lives. She acted as a wise and benevolent mother when she surrounded the true and the good in her works with beauty, and made the first years of our life a garden of pleasant delight. The very novelty of the first objects of our knowledge and activity delights us; the lightness with which our blood flows and our heart beats and our thoughts and desires arise within us, softly allures us up the hard heights of human life, and charms us into its bonds. We learn with pleasure, unconsciously, and as it were in sport, what we hereafter must practise in sadder and more earnest years, and harder and more troublesome relations; an inviting spring leads us on to the summer, the autumn, and the winter of our days. The Apostle not only says, "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are pure," but also, "whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." The sciences of the beautiful then belong to the age of beauty in human life, and the Creator has ordained that they should be united in bonds of mutual love.

But what are sciences of the beautiful, and how must we love and practise them, that our practise may be beautiful also? These questions seem to me, on account of their importance and even necessity in our times, to be the best possible introduction to a public examination such as this, that we may secure a noble rivalry between the arts themselves and those who are pursuing them.

The word "beautiful" is commonly made synonymous with "easy," for light and thoughtless youth shun nothing so much as trouble and labor; what recommends itself at first sight, what is comprehended at the first glance, is preferred; what requires thought, zeal, and exercise, though it be of the utmost value, is neglected. Nothing is read but the dear mother-tongue, especially when what is read was lightly written, and is only sugar-plums in the mouth. Perhaps we add the French, partly because it is so easy to learn, and partly because it contains so many sugar-plums. There is the gingerbread of pretty romances, pretty poems, pretty stories, comedies, and plays; the cut of the language is of the latest fashion, its style is easy and to catch the eye; by all means, therefore, be it learned, say they. But the true fountains, the everlasting monuments of the science of the beautiful, the Greeks, and Romans, are passed by, because the knowledge of them costs labor, because the entrance to these shrines is through the fore-court of a learned tongue. Ask many a youth whether ideas of beauty and of intellectual pleasure are associated in his mind with his Virgil, his Horace, Cicero, Homer, Theocritus, and perhaps he will tell you Yes, with an easy-reading translation of them; but in the Greek and Latin, they are Classics, and with most youths the Classics and intellectual pleasure are widely separated notions. Just the very form which contributes so much of their beauty is that which makes them hateful and troublesome to the lazy pupil. The monkey would gladly have the sweet kernel, but he will not crack the hard nut; it breaks his pretty teeth.

Is not the Greek a beautiful language? do not its writers deserve to be learned, if only for the rules and examples of the beautiful they afford?—The present examination will be your answer. Perhaps we shall find as many lovers of the most beautiful of all beautiful languages as once there were reckoned Muses, nine! Perhaps we shall find not nearly so many.

O, it is an idle and a wanton age when that only is called beautiful which is easy, and nothing pleases us but what flies into our very mouths! "I went by the field of the slothful," says Solomon, "and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; and lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down. Then I saw and considered it well: I looked upon it and received instruction. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep; so shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man."

Thine easy knowledge will bring thee neither honor nor bread; not rightly has thou learned; thou hast put to sleep thy spirit, wasted thy best time, the first young power of thy soul. By forever trifling thou hast lost the habit of earnestness; by giving thyself up to sport, labor, without which no work can be accomplished, no glory, no aim of life attained, becomes unsupportable and impossible. Thou hast eaten sweets till they have ruined thy digestion. Soon the beautiful will be no longer beautiful, but wearisome and disgusting, because thou hast enjoyed it to excess, and thou wilt languish like a sick man, at the very fountains of health. O hear, who has ears to hear; for what I say is terrible truth. Pleasure and Beauty when thus pursued become hateful in the end,—Sirens which allure and mislead you, Circes which transform you. You will be a cuckoo to prate miserable verse, a crow to write reviews, or a peacock or a goose in guise of a bombastic or a pleasant-cackling preacher.

Every art and science whether called "fine" or ugly, requires labor, industry, practice; poets and orators, whose works are commonly the only part of literature which is reckoned among the Fine Arts, never become great without industry and labor. The reviver of German poetic art, Opitz, wrote Latin elegantly, was well acquainted with ancient literature, and made as good Latin as he did German verses; the modern reviver of it, Haller, was certainly as great* as a scholar, philosopher, physician, naturalist, and botanist, as he was as a poet. The elder Schlegel translated Sophocles at school, and studied his art in ancient models. In what branch of learning has not Lessing distinguished himself? His poetry and his style are perhaps the least of his excellences. Among the English, Milton was as great a scholar and statesman as he was poet; and who does not reverence the great names of Grotius and Erasmus? Grotius was Theologian, Jurist, Statesman, Historian, Scholar, and Philosopher, to as great an extent as he was Poet, and even national poet. Every one knows the epigram of Lessing.

That you a poet are, good sir, that gives me special joy;
That you no more than poet are, that doth me much annoy.

Every art and science has in it an element of Beauty, but this beauty is only to be enjoyed by the exercise of unconquerable industry. All individuals who have by nature a strongly developed gift for the pursuit of any one of them, illustrate this. What study seems to the common understanding dryer than Mathematics, and yet what great mathematician does not find in them the greatest delight? Galileo in his prison consoled himself with his discoveries as the noblest doctrines of the beautiful, and Kepler declared he would not exchange one of his for a Dukedom. We see with what love a jurist, a statesman, a physician, a naturalist, a historian, a student of mechanics, yes, even a diplomatist, or a student of heraldry, live in their science, provided they are formed for it by nature, have studied it thoroughly, and are in a position to practise it successfully. Every labor accomplished is sweet, every difficulty and obscurity stimulates their zeal; every fortunate discovery—never made without previous labor—is their dearest reward; verily, all these do something besides plucking fading flowers and sucking indigestible sugar-plums. The bees do not get their honey without labor; it is the drones who steal what was gathered by others and does not belong to them.

It is not therefore lazy and superficial facility that creates beauty in the sciences and the arts; what does create it? The ancients called such sciences artes quæ ad humanitatem pertinent, ad humanitatem informant, sciences which form us into men, and perhaps we might best name them formative sciences. What forms the powers of our souls is beautiful; what does not, does not deserve the name, though it be covered all over with tinsel. I know we have in these modern times lost this idea. We oppose the sciences of the Beautiful to the higher, more earnest, more fundamental ones, as though the latter could deserve the name, and yet could be trifling, or low, or flat, or dry, or superficial, or unmanly. Allow me, then, a little space to show the falsity of this distinction, and to recommend to you the true conception of the beautiful, that is, the formative element in all sciences.

*A good deal greater, we fancy. Herder himself is a better example of the union of scholar and poet than any of those he adduces.—Ta.

† *Ich freuet mich, mein Herr, dass Ihr ein Dichter seyd;
Doch seyd Ihr sonst nicht mehr, mein Herr, das ist mir leid.*

I say, then, that the sciences of the Beautiful cannot be separated from, and set in opposition to the fundamental sciences, for that to which beauty belongs must be fundamental or else it is a false and deceitful beauty. The sciences of the beautiful and the sciences of the true cannot be opposed to one another, for the former are no court jesters: they too have earnest aims, and can only be furthered by strict rules and the earnest use of means. And finally, the sciences of the beautiful and the higher sciences do not stand opposed to one another as though the former were trifling and of lower rank; both have ideals, each after its kind; both require high and richly endowed souls. All these distinctions rest on misunderstanding and misuse of the classification of those barbarous scholastic times whose relics linger in so many places. The first was heard of the so-called seven free arts.

*Gram. loquitur, Dia. verba docet, Rhe. verba ministrat, Mus. canit, Ar. numerat, Ge. ponderat, Ast. colit astrâ.

Even here we see those most prosaic of studies, grammar, logic, even mathematics and astronomy enumerated among them. Afterwards separate spheres were assigned to grammar, philosophy, and mathematics; what remained became a distinct province of the Fine Arts, and to them was left nothing but the noble art of verse-making, and a bit of rhetoric or the fine art of spinning sentences. The truly fine arts, those namely which inform the soul, which create thought, which give taste and judgment,—in short, all the strength and substance of the spirit were taken away, and now one might indeed distinguish them from the useful, the fundamental, the earnest, the noble—sciences which are, as I view them, the sciences of Beauty themselves—for as the others were left, they were ugly enough. Will any one tell me how we can have a beautiful form where there is no substance—how one can speak beautifully who has no thoughts, or where true, earnest, and serious aim, where true passion and the inspiration of a real purpose ever failed to make one speak well? Even the spider does not spin her web without a purpose; she means to catch flies; but we with most of our fine word-webs of empty rhetoric do not even do that.

What then are the sciences of the Beautiful? and why do we call them so? Either the word must mean that we learn in them what is beautiful, and why it is so; but this we never learn by rules alone, never without materials and examples;—or they are the sciences which supply a beautiful form to these materials, and here the idea of the beautiful is identical with that of the formative. No science can be called a science of the Beautiful when it merely racks our memories, gives us words without thoughts, dogmas and assertions without light or proof or exercise of practical judgment; in short, when it does not form the powers of our soul. As soon as it does this it becomes agreeable; and the more it does this, the more it occupies our fancy and inventive faculty, our wit and taste, our judgment, and particularly our practical masculine judgment; the more powers of the soul it occupies at once, the more elements of culture it has, and every one says the more beautiful it is. Take, for instance, philosophy, which is usually excluded from what are called Belles-lettres. But truth lies at the foundation of all beauty, and all that is beautiful can only lead to the true and the good. I lay it down as a principle, then, that truth, so far as it relates to man, is beautiful; for beauty is only the outward form of truth. Dry ontology, cosmology, psychology, theology, logic, ethics, politics, please no one: but make the truths of all these sciences living; place in clear light their origin, their connection, their use, and application; bring them so near to the soul of the reader that it discovers with the discoverer, observes with the observer, judges with the philosopher, and applies and exercises the truth with the good man,—and what more beautiful sciences can there be than these? It is a great attraction to see the connection of truths, a high satisfaction to survey the chart of human knowledge in any province, with its lights and shadows, and to sharpen one's wit, one's inventive faculty and judgment at every step by the truth which one discovered and the error which another encountered. Is there a greater picture in the world than the world itself, as cosmology, natural history, and physical astronomy reveal it? a finer or a more interesting drama than the human soul itself reveals, whether in a wide or a narrow sphere of activity, with its faculties and powers, its duties and relations, passions and impulses? If one cannot speak here, by a true and complete representation of these things, with a living power to the understanding, and effectually to the heart, where can he? This whole newly-discovered and barbarous science aesthetics, is nothing but a part of logic; what we call taste is nothing but a lively, quick judgment, which does not exclude truth and profoundness, but rather pre-supposes and requires them. All didactic poems are nothing but philosophy in sensible form, fable nothing but the representations of a general truth present and in action. From whence did Cicero take the most beautiful, the most striking materials for his eloquence, but from philosophy, from the analysis of things themselves, of the human heart, and the human understanding? Philosophy therefore is not only one of the sciences that pertain to beauty, but is the mother of the beautiful. Rhetoric and poetry owe to it all that they have that is truly informing; useful, or agreeable. Next to it is history, so far as it includes the knowledge of countries, men, their governments and states, their manners and religions, their virtues and vices. If these subjects are pursued as we often with astonishment and aversion see them pursued, they are surely nothing but the rubbish of science; pursued as they might be and ought to be, so as to impart interesting, clear, and valuable knowledge, such as informs the student's mind with wisdom, can there be sciences more beautiful than those of geography and history? Who does not willingly read and hear history? What cultivated man does not receive the greater part of his culture through history of others, and experience, which is the history of himself? And are the epic poem and the drama anything more than history, true or fabulous, adorned with the attractions of language, outward representation, and imagination?—and is not many a history truly related and described with beauty more attractive than an exaggerated epic or the false representations of romance? It only depends then on choice, method, and diction, that the teacher make interesting all that he brings forward, offer it in a form to attract the understanding, move the heart, and excite all the powers of his hearer's soul, to turn history into the truest rhetoric and the truest poetry. In the histories of the ancients, history and oratory are united; the finest speeches are incorporated into their histories, and cannot be understood or appreciated without them. The good narrator must follow the same rules as the poet; and if the orator or the poet would not merely give pleasure, but improve, inform, and excite to sympathetic action the minds of those he addresses, he has the same aim as the historian or the philosopher. In short, truth, beauty, and virtue are the three graces of human knowledge, three inseparable sisters. He who would have beauty without truth, grasps at the wind; he who studies for truth and beauty without virtue, which is their use and practical application, pursues a shadow. Beautiful form can only be made visible and living in beautiful substance; the truest, richest, most useful, most informing sciences are ever the most beautiful.

* Barbarous mnemonic verses, enumerating the chief studies pursued in the schools of the middle ages—The famous Trivium and Quadrivium, or course of three, and course of four studies, which together formed the mediæval notion of a liberal education. Dia. stands for Dialectica or Logic; the rest are obvious.—Ta.

Time would fail me to show how all the rules of beauty are nothing except so far as they serve truth and goodness; how all the flowers of eloquence are nothing, except so far as they favor truth and goodness; how the best part is wanting to all sciences if one robs them of beauty; how every science, each in its own way, can have it and should have it; how no science need be rude or repulsive, and even the abstractest knowledge has its attraction and its beauty, if only it is pursued in a way to inform and be instructive. Enough for to-day: to-morrow, I trust, will prove that every science here pursued is a science of beauty, because it is made agreeable and interesting, because it is learned with pleasure and love, because it is taught in a natural and attractive manner.

And you, pupils, now passing out of youth and becoming men, cast aside the puppets of childhood, the empty grass and flower garlands which fade so soon and then are so disgusting; love what is worthy of love in every form, but ever in relation to truth, goodness, and usefulness. Love and study the ancient languages; they are the sources and patterns of all that is noble, good, and beautiful. Love philosophy, theology, and history; they nourish the heart, and fill the mind with thought, and thus furnish the material of all that is capable of receiving or worthy of a beautiful form. Shun not labor and toil; as soon as you enter into the spirit of your work, toil will disappear, changed into beauty and enjoyment.

And thou, First Cause and Author of all truth, goodness, and beauty, accept the consecration of this school and the exercises of these days to the pursuit of true loveliness and beauty, which is the true culture of human souls.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 8, 1856.

Italian Opera.

Thanks to the indomitable conductor and impresario MARETZEK, and to his difference with the proprietors of the New York Academy of Music, three weeks of Italian Opera have been vouchsafed to us at the very beginning of the season, instead of coming, as in past years, at the latter end of Spring, after a whole winter's round of concerts and more dissipating and fatiguing pleasures. The series opened, under the disadvantage of a most exciting political struggle to absorb men's minds, (and in this case the minds of women quite as much), yet with a goodly and gay show of numbers, in the Boston Theatre, on Monday evening, Oct. 20th. The piece of course was Verdi's Trovatore; for the fashionable world of music, those who are only or chiefly smitten with the love of music on that side that turns to the hot sun of Italian Opera, will know of no work of genius greater than the Trovatore. The pieces which have followed on alternate evenings and two Saturday afternoons, have been: I Puritani, Ernani, Lucia di Lammermoor, L'Etoile du Nord, Ernani again, Lucrezia Borgia, L'Etoile du Nord again, La Sonnambula, Norma, Il Trovatore again (for Miss Phillipps's benefit), and parts of the "North Star" and Masaniello for the benefit of Marezek—in all seven operas, of which only one was new, and all the others of the most worn and familiar order, unless we except the Puritani, which had scarcely been heard here before the advent of GRISI and MARIO.

Of the Trovatore we can say at least that we never had heard it nearly so well performed, as a whole, as on that opening night. To the music, plot, and whole spirit of the piece our readers know we are not partial, and we doubt not we never shall be. It enjoyed two rare advantages that evening; the inimitable singing and acting of Madame LAGRANGE, and the accompaniment of the fullest, most euphonious and best drilled operatic orchestra which we remember in any of our previous opera seasons. There was far less braying of the brass than we are used to in the works of Verdi, and a good deal of richness of instrumentation was brought out agreeably in the sweet, well-blended sounds of the reeds and horns, and the good body and precision of the string quartet. But LAGRANGE in Leonora made even a whole evening of the Trovatore enjoyable. So consummate an artist is she in whatever rôle she undertakes, so graceful and ladylike in movement and in bearing, so faithful and felicitous in her impersonations, so attentive to every least or greatest demand of every moment of the drama, and withal so exquisite a vocalist, that any part grows interesting in her treatment. If it have a best side, she will surely find and show it; put her whole soul and talent into it. Mme. Lagrange looks better than when she was here before; she has gained flesh, as well as beauty and freshness of countenance; and with her nice taste in dress and graceful ease of movement, she feasts the eye as pleasantly as any prima donna we have had upon our stage; we will not say as magnificently as GRISI in her peculiar characters. After RACHEL, and GRISI in some parts, her dramatic powers impress us more than those of any other. We find her far more satisfying than SONTAG—a more fresh and genuine nature, we should say. Yet we suspect a higher kind of genius dwelt in Boston, which it would seem is now apparent, in a more developed form, to all the musical world of Europe.

Mme. Lagrange's voice, although not naturally a large one, or possessing a great deal of substance, has a singularly musical quality, which is proved by the fact that the charm wears so well. All of power it has is essentially musical; and it is trained to rare effectiveness, in passages of strength as well as passages of elegance or sweetness. Her middle tones are expressive, and have a rich flavor of humanity; her contralto tones are artificial and somewhat dry, yet of a telling strength in her impassioned and denunciatory bursts; but it is in the pure sunshine of the upper octave, in exquisitely finished birdlike ornaments, in soft staccato passages, where each note shines with the soft pure lustre of a pearl, that she delights to revel with a wondrous freedom and perfection of grace. Her great forte certainly is as a bravura singer, but in the least exceptionable sense of the term, since she makes her rare facility of ornament always, or almost always, subserve the dramatic end and character of what she is singing. Strange that nearly all the European reports we read of her before she came here, made her a mere bravura singer, a mere throat-machine of marvellous execution, when here we find her so much more and higher! One fault she has, however, in her singing, in common with too many singers of the day, and in so remarkable a degree, that only all her excellencies and various fascinations make it tolerable; and that is the trick of an incessant tremolo,—what our "Diast" has quaintly called the "wobble" of the voice. We cannot believe that it is altogether or mainly the effect of weakness, although it were wonderful if such continued and over-tasking exercise as this unrelenting singer has kept up, (never, that we have heard, while in this country missing an engagement,) should not leave her in some degree the worse for wear.

Signor AMODIO and Signor BRIGNOLI shared the honors of the same opera. The big, round baritone voice of the former, corresponding with his person, is very sure to fill the ear in all parts of a theatre, and to be heard in spite of orchestra and chorus, and for that reason alone it has guaranteed to it the applause of a large number of all opera-goers. We cannot find its quality so musical and sympathetic, as it is solid, smooth and telling. His style of singing is quite cultivated and superior, and he does all earnestly and well, without apparently a spark of genius. His chief fault (as with so many singers) is that which comes of singing in the modern effect school of music, particularly that of Verdi, and consists in the habit of relying upon the quite too strong a blow always in the last notes of a strain, accompanied with rhetorical gesture and throwing up of hands, as if to prepare the crowd to be amazed and to applaud tremendously; and the reaction of such applause on the exciting cause, as always witnessed in the trebled intensity of the same trick on the repetition in answer to an encore. We do not say that Amodio is worse in this respect, or so bad as most of the male singers of the Italian stage; but it is the more striking with his ponderous voice and seeming lack of really internal enthusiasm or fire of sentiment. BADIALI, even, indulged in it, sometimes to great excess, but he had more to balance it. Yet on the whole, if we leave out BADIALI and MORELLI, we do not know when we have had a better baritone than Sig. AMODIO. It is perhaps our misfortune that we saw and heard him first and have ever since associated him with that ugly character in Trovatore. The beauty of BRIGNOLI's tenor voice has grown upon us greatly; it has the through and through golden ore and substance of a tenor in each tone; and in recitative something of the crisp, distinct, ringing utterance of BENEDETTI, than whom he is a much more finished singer, though with less native manly force and genius, less magnetism over an audience by the direct, truthful earnestness of his impersonations. He is awkward, listless, vain and handsome; but so far as singing goes, he has done good justice to this and all his parts. We like him best in recitative and when he sings most simply. He can ring out a few defiant or denunciatory tones with great effect, or sing a cantabile melody with much feeling beauty, until he comes to the climactic point, where singers usually make effect, and there he forces out a note with penetrating force and then prolongs and lets it die away, with an excessive sentimental sweetness until all manliness and truth of eloquence are lost, and you are half ashamed of listening, since in such cases to listen at all should be to sympathize.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS was the Azucena—her first appearance in full operatic character in this her native city; and we must pronounce it on the whole a great success. She did not assume the swarthy gipsy complexion, and scarcely disguised her own genial, bright face under the expressions of revenge or terror which the part demanded; yet was her action good, intelligent and free, if not intense. We preferred in fact to hear Adelaide Phillips sing and see her like herself, than to be too closely haunted by the disagreeable conception of that Verdi gipsy, who is a sort of walking, singing auto da fe. Her voice was rich and beautiful throughout, quietly filling and pervading the place with an intrinsic music, but never storming the ear with that explosive force so common with the Italians. At the outset there was a very slight swerving from true pitch, which might have been caused by a sense of strangeness and not at first fully trusting the atmosphere around her. But this disappeared, and in the simple, honest, but yet highly finished delivery of that warm, fresh voice, true always to the music, we found almost unalloyed satisfaction. Certainly her Azucena, vocally at least, was a much more pleasing, true, artistic effort, than VESTVALI's. The Trovatore (not her own choice, she preferred Semiramide) was repeated for the benefit of Miss Philipps upon Thursday of this week, when we understand her part was marked by more intensity of action. She has appeared in but one other opera, Lucrezia Borgia; and it is enough to say that her Maffeo Orsini was one of the best that we have witnessed. She was rapturously recalled in the drinking song, which she tossed off with a fine free gusto, executing a long trill with rare artistic evenness and purity.

I Puritani and La Sonnambula we have always liked the best among the operas of Bellini, and in both Mme. Lagrange's powers found fine sphere for their best display. I Puritani was to Bostonians the freshest, and made truly a delightful entertainment for one evening. It is in Bellini's truest vein, sweet, mellifluous melody of love and tenderness for the most part, with a touch of the martial heroic, as the liberty duet, Suoni la tromba, which was roared out as usual to the delight of the many from the stentorian lungs of Signors AMODIO and COLETTI. This is the one hacknied piece of mere effect, which disturbs the otherwise simple, quiet charm and unity of the whole piece. Mme. Lagrange held all in breathless admiration by her consummate vocalization, always touched by feeling, in the florid polacca: Son virgine vezzosa, and alike in the tender melody and rapturous sequel of Qui la voce. The choruses and concerted pieces sounded finely. The quartet: A te, O cara, especially, where BRIGNOLI's voice and style, although by no means that of another MARIO, told to good advantage. In the romanza also in the last scene, the chivalrous passage with the Queen Henrietta, &c., he did finely. AMODIO, COLETTI and GASPARDONI filled the three bass parts satisfactorily.

Ernani was brilliantly performed, renewing not a little of its first effect as introduced here for the first time by the old Havana troupe. No prima donna has sung the difficult music of Elvira so well, or thrown so much genuine pathos into the part here as LAGRANGE. For the rest the interest of the hour was concentrated upon the tenor, Sig. CERESA, who confirmed the fine impression which he made here in the same character last summer. He has a high, pure tenor, of great compass, force, and penetrating quality, and he throws himself into the straining passages of Verdi with such fire and abandon as to make him cheered through a continual series of triumphs. The wonder was, that exerting his voice to the utmost, its power flagged not to the end; yet this cannot continue always; he who always spends must lose at last,—to say nothing of the artistic beauty of a certain masterly reserve of force; and we learn that on the second night Sig. Ceresa was not able to go through. As to action, what he wants in quiet, solid strength he strives most faithfully to make up for by real Verdi-ish intensity.

Lucia and Sonnambula we did not witness; LAGRANGE of course entered into the parts with the same truthful individuality, true at once to whatsoever character and to the high bred lady, and sang till appetite increased by what it fed upon. Lucrezia Borgia was a capital performance. We have already mentioned the Orsini. LAGRANGE was wonderfully true to all the terror and the tenderness of her part. It was a masterpiece of lyrical impersonation. BRIGNOLI warmed into more life than usual as Gennaro, and sang delightfully. AMODIO rendered the music of the Duke grandly. The Trio scene was scarcely ever more effective, and there was so much good singing in the secondary parts, and choruses, that the fine opening scene, the quaint "border-ruffian" choruses, &c., told to a charm.

Norma we did not hear. We are a-weary of the opera. All know that it is one of LAGRANGE's greatest parts, and that if she has not all the imposing grandeur of person and impassioned fire of GRISI, her rendering of the part must be quite as consistent and intelligent, while she can sing Casta Diva and the other difficult music far more artistically. GASPARDONI was of course a good Oroveso, as he is good in all parts.

All these operas are too familiar to require much detailed notice. The only new piece has been the famous "North Star," by Meyerbeer, and this, having already used up our space, we must defer until next week.

MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY.—The Sacred Concert given last Sunday evening by this society, in combination with the orchestra and leading singers of the Opera, drew a large audience to the Music Hall and gave much satisfaction. Orchestra and singers, however, did not always draw well together, owing partly no doubt to the want of more rehearsal under a conductor new to most of them. The Opera people are commonly ill at home under any but their own conductor, yet this concert went far better than has been usual with such combinations, and on the whole did much credit to the musicianship and talent of the young conductor Mr. SOUTHARD. The choruses, by members of the Society, who had enjoyed the advantage of his drill, were remarkable for their precision, spirit, clear, telling quality and balance of voices. The overture to "St. Paul" was tolerably well played by the orchestra; it would surely improve on acquaintance. The opening chorus from the same told with a refreshing vigor. Mme. LAGRANGE's first air, Ah mio figlio, was well nigh spoiled by the discordant prelude of the orchestra (owing we are told to blunders in copying, which of course implies lack of rehearsal); but she sang it with great beauty, force and pathos. We need not assure our readers that Miss PHILLIPPS sang Handel's "He was despised," in a voice and style that charmed the ear, and spoke to every heart; it was a beautiful performance. The Prayer from I Lombardi was in the main well executed by Mme. BERTUCCA MARETZKE, whose voice at times is rather worn and shrill and sometimes out of tune. Two choruses by Rossini: "The God of Israel," from Semiramide, and the Prayer from "Moses," ended the first part.

In the Stabat Mater the opening Quartet and Chorus were quite imposing. BRIGNOLI's voice was beautiful in Cujus animam, when not completely covered up by the orchestral fortissimo; of this one always has to complain; it is true, the fault lies in the composer's directions, but we should think a conductor ought to take the liberty to suit the case to circumstances. The duet: Quis est homo, would have sounded better if Lagrange had sung it with Miss Philipps. Bertucca's voice stood out in too sharp contrast with the mellow contralto. AMODIO made the great hit with the multitude by his sonorous, clear delivery of Pro peccatis, and verily he sang it well. The Solo and Chorus: Eia mater, is a most effective piece, and had good justice from COLETTI and the Choral members. The best thing of all, the Quartet, Quando corpus, was omitted; but the Fac ut portem by Miss Philipps, and above all the Inflammatus, by Lagrange, were rich treats indeed.

When will the Mendelssohnians give us "St. Paul," as a whole?

Musical Intelligence.

WORCESTER, MASS.—"Stella" writes in the Palladium:

A pleasant concert was given at Brinley Hall on Tuesday evening of last week by Madame Isidora Clark, assisted by Signor Clementi, Henri Appy, and Wm. Dressler. Madame Clark sang "Ernani! Involami!" "La Serenade," and several English ballads, &c, with very good taste, and in a manner that did great credit to her musical acquirements. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of pleasing quality, cultivated apparently in the Italian school. Signor Clementi showed a baritone voice of much richness, in his singing of a romance from Maria di Rudenz, a song of Wallace's, and a duet, (with Madame Clark,) from La Favorita. His rendering of La Marseillaise was quite spirited and warmly encored. Henri Appy proved himself a violinist of almost unrivalled power of execution, and produced such a sensation as very few violinists have ever done here before. Mr. Dressler, proved himself throughout, a good accompanist, and played the popular "Zampa" overture, as well as Gottschalk's Banjo Sketch, with much skill.

The Mozart Society will probably give the first of a series of four concerts on the eighteenth of this month. Romberg's ode, "The Transient and the Eternal;" a number of choruses from the "Messiah;" the Inflammatus chorus; with solos, &c., will make up the programme.

NEW YORK.—The Academy of Music will be opened with Italian Opera, under the management of Baron de STANKOVITCH (the husband of Madame LAGRANGE) on Monday evening next. MARETZKY will resume his post as Conductor; and there is every prospect of a brilliant and prosperous season. From the 10th of November until the Holidays, the Opera should be liberally supported. The Herald gives the following sketch of the heroic impresario;—M. the Baron de Stankovitch has done the State some service, and has fought under the Russian flag in several severely contested battles, on the shores of the Caspian, in the mountain passes of Circassia, the Steppes of Tartary and on the confines of the Black Sea. He is fit to lead armies; and no doubt competent to assume the baton of Field Marshal of the Italian Opera in America. The Times says that the stock-holders of the Academy have generously come to the aid of the Baron by doubling the rent, and clinging to their own right in the best seats for nothing; so that he has to pay about $2,000 rent per week, and must average that sum each night to meet expenses!

The German Opera does not draw so well with the altered prices. Plotow's "Stradella" was revived one evening to present a new prima donna, Mlle. KRONFELD. She did not succeed. Manager Von Berkel seems to have made an unfortunate selection of vocalists; nearly all have failed to please. Signor GUIDI appeared as Stradella, in place of Herr Pickanesser, and was warmly received. "Martha" was sung on Thursday with Mlle. D'ORMY as Nancy, instead of Madame Von Berkel. Last evening (Tuesday) Mr. SCHERRER made his first appearance in Lortzing's comic Opera of "The Czar and the Carpenter." THALBERG's first concert is announced to take place at Niblo's Saloon next Monday evening; his vocal assistants are to be Madame CORA DE WILHELM and Signor MORINI.

ALBANY, N. Y.—The following piece of jolly good-natured criticism of a Parodi concert appears in the Albany Times:

We issue an extra to say that this Concert drew a really bona fide

FULL HOUSE!

It being a wonderful thing, we cannot let the occasion pass without saying (and we say it boldly) what a wonderful thing we think it. Yes, and it gives us fresh hope, and may we say a fond hope, for the future, and maybe "Othello's occupation" is not quite gone yet! Strange as it may read, it was with difficulty that we got a seat, and some very excellent persons had to stand up; and to think all this should have happened the week before election! Indeed (as we before remarked) it is quite wonderful. Now for the programme. Well, after the audience had sufficiently admired Boardman & Gray's magnificent new Grande, and had got over their surprise at the full house, it was eight o'clock, and then the gas was turned on, and then on came Strakosch (looking as smiling and amiable as ever) and with him Signor Morani, who sang Largo al factotum very excellently, which was owing to his having a very good voice, some humor, and then you know the composition is just the thing to please the audience, in case a good voice sings it well. After Signor Baritone had acknowledged (with a very nice bow) the demanded encore, Paul Jullien (who is most decidedly an Albany favorite) came dashing on the stage, and so very much grown that he was not recognized by all his friends until he had got half way into his fantasia. He plays with all his own charming expression, but we fancy he does not practice as assiduously as he used to when we first knew him in his velvet coat and ruffles. But a few years more and he will be a thinking man, and then he can and will be the violinist of the age. Paul's playing made a great and deserved sensation, and nothing but encores for him.

Then the PARODI herself came forward and gracefully acknowledged the warm reception of her friends in the most splendid concert toilette of the season. A superb dress it was, (with a train,) point lace trimmings, (now we're in for it,) feathers and diamonds for head dress, and everything comme il faut. Parodi's appearance is fine and commanding, and her voice is in character, large, sonorous, firm, ringing and powerful, better suited to the tragic, yet she has much archness, which she used with excellent advantage in Meyerbeer's "Gipsy Song" and Malibran's "Rataplan." La Marseillaise brought down the house, and they would not let the cantatrice off with the usual obeisance this time, so we had the "Star Spangled Banner," which even pleased better than the other, and oh! didn't the people make a racket, for it is near election, and the country must be saved, and patriotic songs help. But don't let us forget the Signor Tiberini, the Roman tenore, whose reputation led very much to be expected of him, and his roman-tic history, etc., made him quite an object of interest, (especially to the ladies.) So when the prelude of divine "Spirito gentil" began, we got ourselves up into a seventh "you know what," and we mused of Salvi! Mario! and even Harry Squires, but when the voice also commenced we came right down and were disappointed, even if it was Tiberini; and the way he took upper do did not suit us a bit, and we thought he was sick or had something on his mind; and yet we suppose we ought to call it "extreme expression." In the pretty aria from "Rigoletto" he sung finely, displaying a beautiful voice and excellent taste and its encore "Come e gentil" was also well rendered; but we are particularizing too much and must hurry up. Strakosch gave us his "Tempest in a teapot," with plenty of "sugar and milk," which was quite agreeable, and for an encore his Grande Sonata in A flat, otherwise called "variations on Lilly Dale." Paul Jullien also played (for the sake of variety, we presume,) the "Carnival of Venice," and we are happy to say that Strakosch got through the difficult accompaniment with his usual ease. The two concerted pieces were effectively done, and the last was very funny with its hearty ho hos! and ha has! in which the voice of Parodi was particularly jovial, and it was a jolly "good night," as a cheerful finale to a concert, which pleased all, and it must have been as profitable to the enterprising manager as it was surprising to SEVEN OCTAVE.

PHILADELPHIA.—There is but little musical intelligence stirring this week. The first of Mr. BAYLEY's Orchestral Concerts took place last Saturday, but, although, we understand, good in programme and performance, failed to attract. Our talented young townsman GEO. FELIX BENKERT, having returned from a five years residence in Europe, contemplates giving a concert of his compositions, (as we learn from an advertisement in one of the papers) with the aid of Mademoiselle D'Ormy, the Contralto and the orchestra of the Musical Fund Society. We fear Mr. Benkert has committed an error in placing his tickets at a dollar a-piece. Mr. B. is an admirable pianist, and his ability as a composer cannot be well questioned after the success with which his works are reported to have met in Vienna. We have but few American composers, and shall be glad to add his name to the short list.—The Musical Union will give its first concert on December 1st, at Concert Hall; "Moses in Egypt" is an attraction that will crowd the room.—The Handel & Haydn Society is preparing a miscellaneous programme for the inauguration of its new hall and organ. This young association has already a large number of subscribers among the inhabitants of Spring Garden, to whom it particularly addresses itself, being located in the midst of it, and composed mainly of vocalists residing in that section of our city.—The Musical Fund Society does not seem to be in any great haste to commence its series of concerts; it is old, stately, and reserved, and moves slowly. We believe there are subscription lists out.—The Second Concert of the Harmonia Sacred Music Society will be given very shortly, upon which occasion the great oratorio of "Creation" will be produced in a manner far superior to last season's performance, in every respect; with new soloists, a large chorus, a full orchestra and the organ.—City Item.

Foreign.

GRAN.—The Neue Berliner Musikzeitung gives the following, we fear rather extravagant, notice of the new Mass by LISZT:

Liszt's Festival Mass was performed on the 21st August, on which day the Basilica was consecrated. Although, from the celebrity of Liszt's name, and the respect which, as a man, he universally enjoys, an undeniable amount of interest naturally predominated here beforehand for the musical Corypheus, who appeared among us as the composer of high church music, we will proceed with the utmost impartiality to the consideration of his greatest work, at the rehearsals of which, as well as at the performance, on the 31st August and 4th September, we were present, perfectly free from any preconceived opinion, favorable or unfavorable. The whole paper, for several numbers, would be completely taken up, if, instituting a comparison with other eminent works of the same description, we resolved to prove that, for fertility, originality, and profundity, Liszt stands completely alone—aye, as a priest who has received the inspiration of true devotion, which he breathes forth again in his creations. The "Credo" bears the stamp of the highest mental power, but if we wanted to point out the most brilliant portion in any part of the work, we should, after long consideration, be able to come to no decision. In the "Gloria," the commencement of which mirrors, in tune, the flight of the spirits joyfully rising upwards to the wonderfully imagined and inimitably instrumented "Agnus Dei," we found it a difficult matter to designate any one portion as absolutely the most successful, but it may be especially regarded as a confirmation of Liszt's genius, that both the clergy and those musicians who understand such things, and are competent to deliver an opinion, cannot sufficiently admire the musical characteristic truthfulness manifested in every passage of his peculiar conception of the text. The passage "he shall come to judge both the quick and the dead," produces a most powerful and striking effect, from the power of the thought, the profoundness of which in the spirited instrumentation, also, must exert a spell upon every mind, just as the melancholy in the words "Et homo factus est" appears as a touching point, full of deep feeling in the magnificent work. But if we were to go into details, we should be led beyond the limits of the small space accorded to us, and if the expression used for characterizing persons of genius: He is a light of the church (Kirchenlicht), is not completely erased from the lexicon of German sayings, Liszt, by the present estimable mass, so original in truthfulness of character, and depth of thought, has a full right to the title, since his Festival Mass is distinguished by clear conception, and fiery devotion combined with warm and deep religious feeling—a magnificent trio. To day, the work was executed, in an exemplary manner, before an immense concourse of people, in the Stadtpfarrkirche, and Liszt saluted with loud elens (hurrahs), by the crowd around him. His presence infuses new life in our musical and social circles. The enthusiasm for him is displayed whenever he makes his appearance in the box at the Nationaltheater and other public places. Every evening there is a fresh Liszt solemnity, in one drawing room or the other.

Advertisements.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's FIRST CONCERT

Will take place on TUESDAY, Nov. 18th, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms. Tickets for the Series of Eight Concerts, $5. Single tickets will be $1 each. Lists and tickets may be found at the music stores. The Club during the season will be assisted by the best available talent. Mr. HUGO LEONHARD, Pianist, will make his debut at the first concert.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER

Will give a SOIREE at the Rooms of the Messrs CHICKERING, (Masonic Temple,) on SATURDAY EVENING, Nov. 15th, in which he will be kindly assisted by Mrs. J. H. LONG and the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. Tickets to be had at the principal Music stores.

MUSICAL SOIRÉES.

OTTO DRESEL

Proposes to give his FOURTH SERIES OF FOUR SOIRÉES, At the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, during the months of December, January, February and March, on Saturday evenings to be hereafter specified. Subscription for the series, in packages of four tickets, $8. Subscription lists may be found at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, and at the music stores.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO. Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices. THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbault, a few copies. Just received, a small invoice of METZ FLUTES. Also, a genuine LÉOPOL VIOLIN.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1856. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1856. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland; all held during the month of September, 1856:—making Six First Premiums in one month!!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIFTH PRIZE over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal bass. The one with pedal bass contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $60 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address

MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

CLASSICAL PIANO MUSIC.

CHEAP, ELEGANT AND UNIFORM EDITIONS,
PRINTED FROM ENGRAVED PLATES.

With Portraits of Authors, and Thematic Catalogues, and Chromo-Lithograph Titles.

BAOH, SEB. Works, including the Wohl-temper.
Clavier, 5 vols.	$5 00
BEETHOVEN'S 32 Sonatas, 6 75
27 do., (without the five last,) 5 00
Miscellaneous Works, including five four-hand Duets, 3 25
Piano Trios and Quintets, (score and parts,) 9 00
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts,) 7 50
Symphonies, arr. as Duets for four hands, 2 vols. 7 50
Symphonies, arr. for piano solo, by Kalkbrenner, 6 00
CLEMENTI, M. 24 Sonatas, 4 vols. 7 00
HAYDN, J. 32 Sonatas, 2 vols. 5 00
MOZART, W. A. Sonatas, 5 00
20 Miscellaneous Works, (including the Duets for four hands,) 3 50
Sonatas, Piano and Violin, (score and parts,) 6 00
Piano Trios, do. 5 50
Quartets and Quintets, do. 8 75
Symphonies, (two performers,) 4 00

Also imported the Solo Works of Mendelssohn, Haydn's Piano Trios, and Sonatas for Piano and Violin, at very low prices, and in new, uniform editions.

G. ANDRÉ & CO., 306 Chestnut St.
Philadelphia, October, 1856.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,

FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
Gives Instruction on the Piano. Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

To Choral Societies and Choirs.

NOVELLO'S Catalogue, No. 3, contains a list of Music for the use of Choral Societies, Church Choirs, and Singing Classes, printed in separate Vocal and Orchestral Parts. Containing Oratorios, Odes, Cantatas, Festival Hymns and Anthems; Operatic Music, Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets and Choruses; Overtures, Symphonies and Marches; Madrigals and Glee; Music with Latin words; Masses, Motets, &c., &c., sent postage free for one cent. The Vocal Parts are printed in full music size at the rate of three cents per page.

Novello's Octavo Editions of Oratorios, Of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., in Vocal Score, with Piano-forte accompaniment. Handel's Messiah, $1 68; Judas Maccabæus, $1 68; Haydn's Creation, $1 25. All the Oratorios of these great masters have been published in this series at similarly low prices.

NOVELLO'S OCTAVO CHORUSES.

All the Choruses in the octavo editions of the Oratorios may be had distinct in Vocal Score with organ and Piano-forte accompaniment, at 8, 6, 8, or 18 cents each.

NOVELLO'S CHORAL HAND-BOOK.

A collection of music in separate vocal parts. In this work are published the whole of the chorus parts of the following Oratorios:

Handel's "Messiah," price 88 cents each part.
Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," price 88 cents each part.

Handel's "Samson," price 88 cents each part.
These parts are printed in the octavo size with the Alto and Tenor parts in the Treble Clef.

COLLECTION OF GLEES.

Novello's Glee Hive, Part Song Book, and the Musical Times and Singing Class Circular. For particulars see Catalogue, No 5, sent postage free for one cent.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 8th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late at St. Paul's Church,) ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

J. M. MOZART,

BASSO.
RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.
MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,
Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 789 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts. Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion $12.00
Do do each subsequent $6.00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

1856.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 241.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 47.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I. "
" C. RHEISING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
" W. D. ZOGRAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

Translated for this Journal.

Heinrich Heine upon Meyerbeer.

Upon the waves of the ROSSINI music float most comfortably man's individual joys and sorrows; love and hatred, tenderness and longing, jealousy and sullenness, all is here the isolated feeling of an individual. Hence we find characteristic in the music of ROSSINI the predominance of melody, which is always the immediate expression of an isolated feeling. With MEYERBEER on the contrary, we find harmony paramount; in the stream of his harmonic waves the melodies are drowned, just as the special feelings of the individual man are lost in the collective feeling of a whole people; and into this harmonious current our soul loves to plunge, when it is seized by the joys and sorrows of the whole human race and takes sides on the great questions of society. Meyerbeer's music is more social than individual; the grateful present, which recognizes in his music its own inward and outward conflicts, its division of opinions and of will, its trials and its hope, is celebrating its own passion and own inspiration, while it applauds the great maestro. ROSSINI's music was more suited to the time of the Restoration, when men had grown blasé after great conflicts and disillusion, and their sense of their great collective interests had to retreat into the background, and the feeling of their individual self-hood could enter once more upon its legitimate rights. ROSSINI never would have acquired his great popularity during the revolution and the empire. Robespierre would have accused him perhaps of anti-patriotic, Moderatist melodies, and Napoleon certainly would not have appointed him chapel-master to the grand army, where he wanted a collective inspiration. . . Poor Swan of Pesaro! The Gallic cock and the imperial eagle would perhaps have torn thee in pieces; better for thee than the battle fields of civic virtue and of glory was a tranquil lake, upon whose bank the gentle lilies nodded to thee peacefully, and where thou couldst row up and down in quiet, beauty and loveliness in every motion! The Restoration was ROSSINI's time of triumph, and indeed the heavenly planets, which just then held holiday and troubled themselves no more about the fate of nations, listened to his strains with rapture. Meanwhile the revolution of July has produced a great commotion in the heavens and on the earth; planets and men, angels and kings, nay, the dear God himself, are torn from their state of peace, have plenty of business again, have got to set ja order a new era, have neither leisure nor repose of mind for entertainment with the melodies of private feeling, and only when the grand choruses of Robert le Diable or the Huguenots rage in harmony, shout in harmony, sob in harmony, do their hearts listen and sob and shout and rage in inspired unison.

This perhaps lies at the bottom of that unparalleled, colossal applause, at which the two great operas of Meyerbeer enjoy throughout the world. He is the man of his age; and the age, which always knows how to choose its men, has borne him up tumultuously upon its shield, and proclaims his dominion, and makes its joyous triumphal entrée with him. It is indeed no comfortable position to be thus borne in triumph; by the awkward misstep of a single shield-bearer one may be considerably jolted, if not seriously hurt; the flower wreaths, which fly at one's head, may sometimes wound more than they refresh, if they do not even soil one, when they come from dirty hands; and the heavy burden of laurels may press much sweat of anguish from one's brow. ROSSINI, when he meets such an ovation, smiles all round ironically with his fine Italian lips, and then complains of his bad stomach, which grows daily worse, so that he can no longer eat.

That is hard, for ROSSINI always was one of the greatest gourmands. Meyerbeer is just the opposite; as in his outward appearance, so too in his enjoyments he is frugality itself. Only when he has invited friends, does one find a good table with him. One day when I went to take "pot-luck" with him, I found him over a miserable dish of stock-fish, which made out his whole dinner; of course I precluded that I had already dined.

Many have asserted that he was avaricious. This is not the fact. He is only parsimonious in expenses which concern his person. For others he is munificence itself, and his unfortunate countrymen have enjoyed it to abuse it. Benevolence is a family virtue with the Meyerbeers, especially the mother, to whom I send all that are in need of help, and never in vain. But this lady is the happiest mother in this world. Wherever she goes the splendor of her son is ringing; everywhere some snatches of his music float about her ears; everywhere his bright glory meets her; and in the opera, where a whole public expresses its enthusiasm for Giacomo with the most thundering applause, her maternal heart beats quick with raptures of which we scarcely can conceive. I know in the whole history of the world but one mother who may be compared to her, and that is the mother of St. Boromaeus, who in her life time saw her son canonized, and in the church, amid thousands of the faithful, could kneel before him and pray to him.

Meyerbeer is now writing a new opera, to which I look forward with great curiosity. The unfolding of this genius is for me a most remarkable spectacle. With interest I follow the phases of his musical as well as of his personal life, and observe the mutual influences between him and his European public. It is now ten years since I first met him in Berlin, between the university building and the watch-tower, between science and the drum, and he seemed to me in this position to feel very much confined. I recollect I met him in the company of Dr. MARX, who at that time belonged to a certain musical regency, who, during the minority of a certain young genius whom they considered the legitimate successor to the throne of Mozart, continually worshipped JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. The enthusiasm for Sebastian Bach, however, was not merely to fill up that interregnum, but was also to annihilate the reputation of ROSSINI, whom the regency most feared and hated. Meyerbeer at that time passed for an imitator of ROSSINI, and the said Dr. Marx treated him with a certain condescension, with a courteous air of superiority, which I now laugh heartily to think of. ROSSINI-ism was then the great sin of Meyerbeer; he was as yet far from the honor of being attacked on his own account. He prudently refrained from making any claims, and when I told him with what enthusiasm I had recently seen his Crociato performed in Italy, he smiled with moody melancholy and said: "You compromise yourself, if you praise me, a poor Italian, here in Berlin, in the capital city of Sebastian Bach."

Meyerbeer had at that time in fact become altogether an imitator of the Italians. Aversion to the cold, intellectual, colorless Berlinism had at an early time produced a natural reaction in him; he sprang away to Italy, enjoyed life merrily, gave himself up entirely to his private feelings, and composed there those precious operas, in which ROSSINI-ism is carried to the sweetest excess; here gold is gilded over, and the flower is

MUSIC

Proposes to give

At the a life could not long satisfy a German certain homesickness for the earnest- March, on Sa- fatherland was awakened in him; Subscription reclined among Italian myrtles, there Rooms, and r him a remembrance of the mysterious

TREM of the German oak forests; while ca-

WHEN by Southern zephyrs, he thought of the THERE chorales of the North wind; it was with perhaps as with Madame de Sevigné, who, when she lived near an orangery, amid the continual fragrance of mere orange blossoms, began at last to long for the bad smell of a wholesome dung cart. . . . In short, a new reaction took place; Signor Giacomo suddenly became a German again and attached himself to Germany; not to the old, mouldy, obsolete Germany of narrow-minded old fogysm, but to the young, magnanimous, world-free Germany of a new generation, which had made all the problems of humanity its own, and which bears the great questions of humanity inscribed, if not upon its banner, yet all the more indelibly upon its heart.

Soon after the July revolution, Meyerbeer came before the public with a work which sprang from his mind during the commotion of that revolution; namely, with Robert le Diable, the hero, who does not know precisely his own will, who is continually in conflict with himself, a true type of the moral wavering of that time, a time which vacillated betwixt vice and virtue with such torment and unrest, which galled itself in strivings and in hindrances, and never possessed strength enough to withstand the assaults of Satan! By no means do I love this opera, this masterpiece of timidity; I say of timidity, not merely in respect of matter, but also of execution, since the composer does not as yet trust his genius, does not dare to give himself up to its entire will, and tremblingly serves the multitude, instead of commanding it terrified. At that time Meyerbeer was justly called a anxious genius; he lacked victorious faith in himself; he showed a fear of the public opinion; the slightest expression of blame terrified him; he flattered all the humors of the public, and shook hands right and left most zealously, as if in music too he recognized the popular sovereignty and based his rule on the majority, in opposition to Rossini, who reigned absolute king, by the grace of God, in the realm of musical Art. This anxious disposition has never yet left him; he is always concerned about the opinion of the public; but the success of Robert le Diable had the fortunate effect, that that concern no longer weighs upon him when he works, that he composes with more confidence, that he lets the great will of his soul come out in its creations. And with this enlarged mental freedom he wrote the Huguenots, in which all doubts have vanished, the internal strife has ceased and the external conflict has begun whose colossal shape astounds us. By this work Meyerbeer first won his immortal right of citizenship in the eternal city of the soul, the heavenly Jerusalem of Art. In the Huguenots at length Meyerbeer reveals himself without shrinking; with unterrified lines he drew here his whole thought, and all that stirred his breast he dared to utter in unbridled tones.

What most especially distinguishes this work, is the balance that we find in it between enthusiasm and artistic completeness, or to express myself better, the equal height which Art and passion have attained in it; the man and the artist have here emulated one another, and if the former pulls the alarm bell of the wildest passions, the latter knows how to transfigure these rude tones of nature into the sweetest awe-inspiring euphony. While the great multitude is seized by the intrinsic energy, the passion of the Huguenots, the Art-connoisseur admires the mastery displayed in forms. This work is a Gothic cathedral, whose heavenward reaching rows of pillars and colossal cupola seem to have been planted by the bold hand of a giant, while the countless, elegantly fine festoons, rosettes and arabesques, spread over all like a stone veil of lace, give evidence of a dwarf's exhaustless patience. A giant in the conception and shaping of the whole, a dwarf in the elaborate execution of the details, the architect of the Huguenots is as incomprehensible to us as the composers of the old cathedrals. Standing one day with a friend before the cathedral at Amiens, my friend surveyed this monument of rock-towering giant strength and indefatigably carving dwarf-like patience with sympathy and awe, and asked me finally, how it happened that we to-day bring no such architectural works to pass? I answered him: "Dear Alphonso, men in those old times had convictions; we moderns have only opinions; and it requires something more than a mere opinion to rear a Gothic cathedral such as this."

That is it. Meyerbeer is a man of conviction. I do not refer particularly to the social questions of the day, although in this respect the views of Meyerbeer are more firmly grounded, than we find with other artists. Meyerbeer, whom the princes of this earth load with all possible marks of honor, and who is also so susceptible to these distinctions, carries in his breast a heart, which glows for the holiest interests of humanity, and he unequivocally confesses his worship for the heroes of the revolution. It is fortunate for him, that many northern hordes have no understanding of music, else they would see in the Huguenots something more than a mere party-strife between Protestants and Catholics. Yet his convictions are not peculiarly of a political, and still less of a religious order. The peculiar religion of Meyerbeer is the religion of Mozart, Gluck and Beethoven; it is Music; in this alone does he believe; only in this faith he finds his happiness and lives with a conviction, which is like the convictions of the earlier centuries in depth, in passion, and endurance. Nay, I might say, he is the apostle of this religion. As with an apostolic zeal and earnestness he treats all that concerns his music. While other artists are content if they have produced something beautiful, nay, not infrequently lose all interest in their work, as soon as it is finished, with Meyerbeer upon the contrary the severest travail begins after the delivery; then he is not satisfied until the creation of his mind is shinningly revealed to other people also, until the whole public is edified by his music, until his opera has poured into all hearts the feelings he would preach to the whole world, until he has communed with all mankind. As the Apostle thinks neither of toils nor sufferings to save a single lost soul, so Meyerbeer, when he learns that any one denies his music, will expound it to him indefatigably, until he has converted him; and then the single saved lamb, were it only the most insignificant soul of a feuilletonist, is to him more dear than the whole flock of believers, who have always worshipped him with orthodox fidelity.

Music is the conviction of Meyerbeer, and that is perhaps the reason of all those anxieties and troubles which the great master shows so often, and which not seldom make us smile. One should see him when he is rehearsing a new opera; at such times he is the tormenting spirit of all singers and musicians, whom he tortures with incessant trials. He never can be entirely satisfied; a single false note in the orchestra is a dagger thrust to him, of which he fancies he will die. This unrest persecutes him a long time after the opera has been actually brought out and received with tumults of applause. Still he continues to worry himself, and I believe he never is contented until some thousand hearers and admirers of his opera are dead and buried; with these at least he need fear no backsliding; these souls are secure to him. On the days when his opera is given, the good God can never please him; if it is cold and rainy, he is afraid that Mlle. Falcon will get a sore throat; if on the contrary the evening is clear and warm, he fears lest the fine weather should entice the people into the open air and let the theatre go empty. Nothing is comparable to the painful care with which Meyerbeer oversees the proof-reading; this inexhaustible passion for correction has become a by-word among Parisian artists. But one must consider that to him music is dear above anything, dearer surely than his life. When the cholera began to rage in Paris, I conjured Meyerbeer to go away as quickly as possible; but he had still business for some days, which he could not leave; he had to arrange with an Italian the Italian libretto for Robert le Diable.

Far more than Robert le Diable is the Huguenots a work of conviction, both as regards the substance and the form. As I have already remarked, while the great multitude are carried away by the substance, the idea, the quieter observer wonders at the immense progress of Art, the new forms, which here come to prominence. According to the most competent judges, all musicians who would now write for the opera, must first study the Huguenots. Meyerbeer has carried it to the greatest length in instrumentation. Never before heard of is his treatment of the choruses, which here speak out like individuals and have divested themselves of all operatic tradition. Since Don Juan, surely, there has been no greater apparition in the realm of musical art, than that fourth act of the Huguenots, where upon the top of the dread, thrilling scene of the consecration of swords, and the invocation of a blessing on the thirst for blood, there is still a Duo added, which even surpasses the first effect; a colossal venture, which one could hardly credit in so anxious a genius, but whose success so much the more excites our rapture, as our wonder. For my part, I believe that Meyerbeer has not solved this problem by artistic, but by natural means, inasmuch as that famous Duo expresses a succession of feelings, which never perhaps, or never with such truth, appeared in an opera, and for which nevertheless there burn the wildest sympathies in the minds of the present. For my part, I confess that never at any music did my heart beat so stormily, as at the fourth act of the Huguenots; and yet I gladly turn from this act and its commotions and dwell with far greater satisfaction on the second act. This is an idyl, which in loveliness and grace resembles the romantic comedies of Shakspeare, or perhaps still more the Aminta of Tasso. In fact, under the roses of joy there lurks here a gentle melancholy, which reminds one of the unhappy court poet of Ferrara. It is more the longing after cheerfulness, than it is cheerfulness itself; it is no hearty laughter, but a smile of the heart, a heart which pines in secret and can only dream of health. How comes it that an artist, from whom all the blood-sucker cares of life were shuffled off from the very cradle, who, born in the lap of wealth, cosseted by the whole family, which willingly, enthusiastically humored all his inclinations, had far more right to happiness than any mortal artist,—how comes it, that this man has nevertheless experienced those enormous sufferings, which sigh and sob to us out of his music? For the musician cannot express so thrillingly that which he does not feel himself. It is strange that the artist, whose material wants are satisfied, should be so much the more intolerably visited by moral trials! But that is a good fortune for the public, which must thank the sorrows of the artist for its most ideal joys. The artist is that child, told of in the popular legend, whose tears are pure pearls. Ah! the cross stepmother, the world, beats the poor child all the more unmercifully, that it may weep right many pearls!

The Huguenots has been accused, even more than Robert le Diable, of a lack of melodies. This objection rests upon an error. "One cannot see the trees for sheer forest." The melody is here subordinated to the harmony, and already, on comparison with the music of Rossini, in which the contrary is the case, I have pointed out that it is this predominance of harmony which characterizes the music of Meyerbeer as a humanitarian, modern societary music. It is not really wanting in melodies; only these melodies must not stand out with a disturbing forwardness, I might say egotism; they must simply serve the whole; they are disciplined, whereas with the Italians the isolated melodies assert themselves, I might almost say, in a spirit of outlawry, somewhat like their famous bandits. It is not much observed; but many a common soldier fights in a great battle quite as well as the Calabrian, the isolated robber hero, whose personal prowess would surprise us less if he fought among regular troops, in rank and file. I will not deny the merit of a preponderance of melody, but I must remark, that as a consequence thereof we see in Italy that indifference to the ensemble of an opera, to the opera as a complete and rounded work of Art, which expresses itself so naively, that people in the boxes, during the intervals while no bravura parts are sung, receive visitors and gossip freely, if they do not even play cards.

The predominance of harmony in Meyerbeer's creations is perhaps a necessary consequence of his broad culture, which comprehends the realm of thought and of appearances. Treasures were lavished on his education, and his mind was susceptible; he was early initiated into all the sciences, and herein distinguished himself from most musicians, whose glaring ignorance is somewhat excusable, since they have commonly lacked time and means to acquire great knowledge outside of their own profession. What he learned became a second nature with him, and the school of the world gave him the highest development; he belongs to that small number of Germans whom even France must recognize as models of urbanity. Such height of culture was perhaps necessary for one who would collect and shape with sure design the material which belonged to the creation of the Huguenots. But whether what was gained in breadth of conception and clearness of oversight, were not lost in other peculiarities, remains a question. Culture annihilates in the artist that sharp accentuation, that bold coloring, that originality of thought, that directness of feeling, which we so admire in rude, uncultivated natures.

Culture is always dearly bought, and little Blanka is right about it. This little eight years old daughter of Meyerbeer envies the leisure of the little boys and girls, whom she sees playing in the street, and expressed herself lately after the following manner: "What a misfortune that I have refined parents! I have from morning to evening to learn all sorts of things by heart, and to sit still and be proper, while the uncultivated children down there can run about so happy and amuse themselves the whole day long!"

Songs of the Blacks.

The only musical population of this country are the negroes of the South. Here at the North we have teachers in great numbers, who try to graft the love of music upon the tastes of our colder race. But their success is only limited. A few good singers are produced, and some fine instrumental performers, but the thing never becomes general. Music may perchance be the fashion for a winter. But it does not grow to a popular enthusiasm. It never becomes a passion or habit of the people. We are still dependent on foreigners for our music. Italian singers fill our concert rooms, and German bands parade our streets.

Throughout the country the same holds true. Singing masters itinerate from village to village, to give instruction in the tuneful art, but the most they can muster is a score or two of men and maidens to sing in church on Sunday. Brother Jonathan is awkward at the business, and sings only on set occasions. Let him be enrolled in the ranks of the choir, and placed in the front of the gallery, and he will stand up like a grenadier, and roll out lustily the strains of a psalm. But all his singing is done in public. He makes little music at home, or at most only on the Sabbath day. During the week his melodies are unheard. He does not go to his labor singing to himself along the road. No song of home or country, of love or war, escapes his lips as he works in his shop or follows the plough. Our people work in silence, like convicts in a Penitentiary. They go to their tasks, not with a free and joyous spirit that bursts into song, but with a stern, resolute, determined air, as if they had a battle to fight, or great difficulties to overcome.

Even the gentler sex, who ought to have most of poetry and music, seem strangely indifferent to it. Young ladies who have spent years in learning to play on the piano, and sing Italian airs, drop both as soon as they are married. Enter their houses a few months later, and they tell you that they are out of practice; they have forgotten their music, their pianos are unopened, and their harps are unstrung.

Compared with our taciturn race, the African nature is full of poetry and song. The Negro is a natural musician. He will learn to play on an instrument more quickly than a white man. They have magnificent voices and sing without instruction. They may not know one note from another, yet their ears catch the strains of any floating air, and they repeat it by imitation. The native melody of their voices falls without art into the channel of song. They go singing to their daily labors. The maid sings about the house, and the laborer sings in the field.

Besides their splendid organs of can nature is full of poetry. Inferior race in reason and intellect, their imagination, more lively feelings and a more poetic manner. In this they resemble the nations of Europe. Their joy and grief are pent up in the heart, but find instant expression in their eyes and voice. With their "tar," they clothe in rude poetry the incidents of their lowly life, and set them to simple tunes. Thus they sing their humble loves in strains of tenderness. We at the North hear these novelty, only as burlesqued by our Negro Minstrel toile du faces blackened with charcoal. Yet even the most uneducated feel that they have rare sweetness and melody.

Mingled with these love songs are plaintive ones which seem to have caught a tone of sadness and pathos from the hardships and frequent separation of their slave life. They are the Songs of their Captivity, and are sung with a touching effect. No song of a concert room ever thrilled us like one of these simple African airs, heard afar off in the stillness of a summer night. Sailing down the Mississippi, the voyager on the deck of the steamer may often hear these strains, wild, sad and tender, floating from the shore.

But it is in religion that the African pours out his whole voice and soul. A child in intellect, he is a child in faith. All the revelations of the Bible have to him a startling vividness, and he will sing of the judgment and the resurrection with a terror or a triumph which cannot be concealed. In religion he finds also an element of freedom which he does not find in his hard life, and in these wild bursts of melody he seems to be giving utterance to that exultant liberty of soul which no chains can bind, and no oppression subdue. As hundreds assemble at a camp meeting in the woods, and join in the chorus of such a hymn as "When I can read my title clear,

To mansions in the skies,"

the unimpassioned hearer is almost lifted from his feet by the volume and majesty of the sound.

No voices of well trained choir in church or cathedral, no pealing organ, nor mighty anthem, ever moved us like these voices of a multitude going up to God under the open canopy of heaven. Blessed power of music! that can raise the poor and despised above their care and poverty. It is a beautiful gift of God to this oppressed race to lighten their sorrows in the house of their bondage.

Might not our countrymen all learn a lesson from these simple children of Africa? We are a silent and reserved people. Foreigners think us taciturn and gloomy. So we are, compared with the European nations. The Germans sing along the banks of the Rhine. The Swiss shepherd sings on the highest passes of the Alps, and the peasant of Tyrol fills his vallies with strains wild as the peaks and the torrents around him. But Americans, though surrounded with everything to make a people happy, do not show outward signs of uncommon cheerfulness and content. We are an anxious, careworn race. Our brows are sad and gloomy. Songless and joyless, the laborer goes to his task. This dumb silence is ungrateful in those who have such cause for thankfulness. Americans are the most favored people on earth, and yet they are the least expressive of their joy. So that we almost deserve the severe comment of a foreigner, who on seeing the great outward prosperity, and yet the anxious look of the people, said that "in America there was less misery, and less happiness, than in any other country on earth."

Let us not be ashamed to learn the art of happiness from the poor bondman at the South. If slaves can pour out their hearts in melody, how ought freemen to sing! If that love of music which is inborn in them, could be inbred in us, it would do much to lighten the anxiety and care which brood on every face and weigh on every heart. The spirit of music would beguile the toilsome hours, and make us cheerful and happy in our labor.

Nor would this light and joyous heart make us too gay, and so lead to folly and frivolity. On the contrary, it would prove a friend to virtue he sour and morose spirit, when its oppressive gloom, is apt to MUSIC worst excesses. The absence of buoyancy is one of the causes which Q to vice and sin. If every family

 Proposes to gather at early morn, that lingering
 At should render their spirits more elastic.
 during the children's voices in his ear, the hard-March, on Sepan would go more cheerfully to his Subscription those melodies would make his spirit
 Booms, and joyous through the day.

Common domestic joys, home, health and TREEM love, can thus fill the heart with happi-
 and cause it to break forth into singing;
 W When that heart is bounding with immortal
 The, it may rise to the highest strains of exultation and of ecstasy.

"Let those refuse to sing
 Who never knew our God,
 But children of the heavenly King
 May speak their joys abroad."

Evangelist.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE PREACHING OF THE TREES.

[From the German of GAUSE.]

At midnight hour, when silence reigns
 Through all the woodland spaces,
 Begin the bushes and the trees
 To wave and whisper in the breeze,
 All talking in their places.

The Rosebush flames with look of joy,
 And perfume breathes in glowing;
 "A Rose's life is quickly past!
 Then let me, while my time shall last,
 Be richly, gaily blowing!"

The Aspen whispers: "Sunken day!
 Not me thy glare deceiveth!
 Thy sunbeam is a deadly dart,
 That quivers in the Rose's heart—
 My shuddering soul it grieveth!"

The slender Poplar speaks, and seems
 To stretch its green arms higher:
 "Up yonder life's pure river flows,
 So sweetly murmurs, brightly glows,
 To that I still aspire!"

The Willow looks to earth and speaks:
 "My arm to enfold thee yearneth;
 I let my hair float down to thee;
 Entwined therein my flowers for me,
 As mother her child adorneth!"

And next the wealthy Plum-tree sighs:
 "Alas! my treasures crush me!
 This load with which my shoulders groan,
 Take off—it is not mine alone;
 By robbing, you refresh me!"

The Fir-tree speaks in cheerful mood:
 "A blossom bore I never;
 But steadfastness is all my store;
 In summer's heat, in winter's roar,
 I keep my green forever!"

The proud and lofty Oak-tree speaks:
 "God's thunderbolts confound me!
 And yet no storm can bow me down,
 Strength is my stem and strength my crown;
 Ye weak ones, gather round me!"

The Ivy-vine kept close to him,
 Her tendrils round him flinging:
 "He who no strength has of his own,
 Or loves not well to stand alone,
 May to a friend be clinging."

Much else, now half forgot, they said;
 And still came creeping
 Low whispered words upon the air,
 While by the grave alone stood there
 The Cypress mutely weeping.

O might they reach one human heart,
 These tender accents creeping!
 What wonder if they do not reach?
 The trees by starlight only preach,
 When we must needs be sleeping.

C. T. B.

Thalberg.

The notice of the great pianist's first New York concert in the Tribune of Tuesday, is chiefly a general appreciation of what he has done for the piano, and of what he is as an artist. It is in Fry's best vein, and we must give our readers the substantial parts of it, as follows:

* * * Rightly to appreciate him, we must look at his antecedents, and the antecedents of piano-forte writing when he first came before the European world some twenty years ago.

The piano-forte is no longer considered a luxury to the great run of dwellings, large and small, but a necessity. The improvements on it have been so great, and especially the rapid and brilliant advances made in the manufacture of square pianos in this country, or of that kind whose moderate cost puts it within the means of families in ordinary, that the development of the resources of this instrument constitutes matter of more interest, greatly more, than that of any other musical instrument. The manufacture of pianos in this country is a prodigious branch of artistico-mechanical industry; and, according to an estimate we made two years ago, it amounted to nearly about one fourth of the value of the entire cotton crop—that crop which is considered the pivot of international resources and courtesies, and which goes so far toward making Presidents. The piano being so improved and diffused, it is of the last importance that the genius should be found to develop to the fullest extent its resources, and the want was supplied when the youthful Thalberg, twenty years ago, rose like a star of harmony, and delighted all Europe.

To understand, likewise, adequately Mr. Thalberg's position, it is necessary to look into the nature of musical ideas, as distinct from the peculiarities, or the ism, so to speak, of the piano-forte. The origin of musical ideas, may safely be attributed to the singing voice, in its alliance with poetical metre. The regular measure of the poetry shapes the musical phrases, gives them symmetry and renders them memorable. Take away the real or quasi division of musical phrases according to poetical metres, and the music becomes illogical, or at best incapable of impressing the memory. Metrically speaking, there is generally no difference between the music of the dance and that for the voice—the dance requiring divisions of eight measures, and the voice eight, or regular fractions of eight; that is, four or two. This metrical arrangement permeates, likewise, the longest compositions—the opposite to it forming the exception to the rule. In regard to what may be called a musical statement—in the same way we would apply the word statement to oratory—the humanities and the limits of the voice seem to underlie all instrumental music. The largest musical statement can be made within the limits of the musical voice, which is two octaves, and generally within ten or twelve notes. A statement with the speaking voice generally ranges within four or five notes, sometimes rising to an octave. Intensities of declamation, the draughts made on a speaker in addressing muster meetings, may cause him to exceed the octave, but it is still an excess and not a rule. Now as regards this power of musical statement pure and simple, the piano had illustrious champions, Mozart, Clementi, Kalkbrenner, Herz, Weber, Beethoven, Ries, Steibelt, Hummel, Himmel and others, varying in degrees of mind and originality. Their works abound in passages which are clearly vocal, and can be sung within the range of an ordinary voice. We find it recorded, too, that Beethoven declared, after he had heard Dragonetti play on the double bass, that he knew for the first time the vocal resources of the bass, and his bases accordingly, whether in his stringed quartets, his symphonies, or his piano-forte works, have much of this new quality of vocality—this individualism of statement, viewed apart from the inherent old-fashioned mode of treating the bass, as a foundation upon which rests the melody of a part above. Beside this vocality in the higher parts, and afterward in the bass itself, we find very markedly in the piano works of C. M. von Weber, the large arpeggio-reaching. Ideas, too, passionate, transcendent, mysterious, dramatic, there were for the piano. But still something was wanting. The resources of the instrument were not fully brought out. Orchestrally viewed, its relations between treble and bass were frequently so wide apart that the effect was beggarly. As regards combination, there was a want of association between primary ideas, or statements as we have ventured to call them, and the musical intercalations, the addenda, the outpourings, the spray of which the strong fibre of a clearly-defined vocal melody is capable. If we look at the works of the masters up to the time of Thalberg, whatever leanings we may discover toward the new school, we find no realization of the problem, that with certain ingenuities of fingering two hands may be made to do almost the work of four on the piano-forte, and that the sonorosity of the instrument may be doubled over the older masters, and its délire, its passion, its impetuosity, its eloquence, its grandeur, increased in even a greater ratio. There is certainly something mightily akin to the whole vast looming of the age—to the new telescopic drag-net used for the skyey depths bringing out the "gems of purest ray serene" which have slept there for billions of years—to the locomotive engine, burning to ashes all old journey measurements and crushing miles in moments—to the electric telegraph, which turns into dazzling, immortal fact the wildest poetry or prophecy of the Arabian Nights—there is something mightily akin to all these in this wide world of new octaves, these fresh continents of sounds, and the master grasp which can hurl them together in genial contrast. This has been achieved by Thalberg. Twenty years ago he made a Columbus voyage of discovery into new regions of piano-forte possibilities. He bridged over the separated lands of the piano. He created a school.

Taking the ideas given in Rossini's opera of "Moses," he arranged them as musical statements had never been arranged before. He left out the lumber of scales which play so large a part in the sonatas of the great old masters, and keeping the personalism of the vocalist—the declaimed melody—ever uppermost, he wove around it the boldest heroics of arpeggios, or rapid addenda of notes dealing in intervals of thirds, etc.; the most manly of thick-heaving reduplications of chorals at various octaves; the most intrepid of adventurous leaps and iterations. We consider the ism engendered by M. Thalberg the last resource of the piano. Since he composed his Mose piece we have not discovered anything of value added to the resources of the instrument; and in making this assertion we do not include a discussion of the genius contained in the ideas of Chopin and Doehler, and some of the best works of Herz, but merely treat of the matters of increased executive grasp and increased largeness and sonority of tone and effect contained therein.

The means by which M. Thalberg arrived at his new school came chiefly of the use of the thumb as an expressive member of the finger-singing school. This being inveigled into feats hitherto unattempted, the remaining fingers of the hand are left free and easy to do "things unattempted" in musical verse.

Happily for M. Thalberg, nature consigned to him the hand to execute what his head designed. He is equal to his works. His playing is impeccable. He never misses a note. He performs with ease worthy the creator of a new school. He delineates a melody like a dramatic artist, and darts his arpeggio-spray like Apollo.

Musical Correspondence.

ALBANY, N. Y. Nov. 10.—According to my promise, made some time since, I will endeavor to give you some idea of the musical condition of this city—not that it will be at all interesting to your readers, for Albany is rather an unmusical place. Yet those of our citizens who do love Art, love it hugely, and so I accept your invitation without further hem-ing.

In the way of materials for music, we are doing exceedingly well, for we have a large number of Piano Forte Manufactories (for the size of the place); and to have a Piano and then a "Bertini" is the groundwork of all American musical education, in most people's minds. Some very excellent Pianos are made in Albany, and Boardman & Gray, the leading builders, are even making Grands, which is a good sign for the future. Barhydt & Morange, Reed & Co., and Marshall, James & Traver, also produce some really fine instruments; and the old firm of Meacham & Co., (so well known in old times) still make good pianos and in the same quiet way and on the same premises that they did thirty years ago. As an evidence of our good taste, very many Chickering Pianos have been and are sold by the agent, Mr. J. Collier, who is a hard working man, and a very successful salesman. He is also a musician and knows what a piano should be, and therefore customers have confidence in his selections, and in no instance have they been disappointed. In addition to the regular sale of Squares, Mr. Collier has already sold ten of those charming Parlor Grands (we call them Cecilians) and three full grands, all of which have found their way to appreciative parlors, and a square piano is not now considered the instrument par excellence it used to be, and that's a good thing.

We have some very good Organs in our city, and some of them are very well played. The largest Organ was built by Erben for the Cathedral, which is one of the finest churches in the country. This organ is a first class instrument in size, power and quality, and Mr. Carmody, the musical director, illustrates its variety and many beauties in a most capital manner. His choir (a large chorus, mostly Germans) sing quite effectively some of the best Masses in use, and they are now busily preparing for a grand Sacred Concert, to take place the end of the month.

The next organ in size is in Dr. Sprague's Church, and is one of Hook's best. It is large in variety, and possesses great sweetness of tone, but not much true power. There are three or four more Hook organs and some of Appleton's, but not remarkable enough to be noticed at this time. Wm. A. Johnson, of Westfield, who is fast winning his place in the first rank of builders, is making a very large instrument for the only Congregational Church in the city, and judged by his other organs, a superb affair may be expected. Mr. Johnson's abilities are not at all known in Boston; but I can assure you, from my own hearing, that he is bound to be known, and his organs will now compare favorably with those of any American builder.

The Episcopal churches have the smallest and oldest organs in the city, and it is a shame, when their beautiful service is so much enhanced by proper musical effect. Yet the singing in some of these churches has been much better than the ordinary style of choir performances. At St. Paul's for many years the music has been a leading feature, and for the last year service has been sung antiphonally by an excellent quartet at one side of the organist, and a choir of twelve boys at the other. Quite a number of singers, of a great deal more than ordinary ability, have been engaged at St. Paul's. Mrs. Lucy Eastcott (who is now an acknowledged European prima donna) was their soprano for two years, and Mr. Henry Squires, now a leading tenore in London, was in the same choir at the same time. Their soprano of last season, Miss Isabella Hinkley, has a voice of remarkable beauty, and her talent is to be further cultivated and perfected by a thorough musical education in Italy, for she goes to Florence next May. But choir matters have been through a constant series of changes this season. George William Warren, for eight years director at St. Paul's, resigned and accepted at Dr. Sprague's; Albert Wood resigned at St. Peter's and accepted at St.

Paul's. The choirs of these and some other churches also changed and exchanged, and it would hardly be fair to report the degree of excellence in either at present; but be assured, a deep interest is felt to have good church music, and excellent salaries are paid to our best organists and singers, and it will not be the fault of our people if the good is not attained. I would also state (as the missionaries say) that the price of piano and voice teaching is much improved.

As we are but a few hours ride from New York, our musically minded citizens all attend the opera there, and the ever popular Trovatore is almost as well known and whistled here as if we had the regular article on the spot. We did have a very shocking attack of German Opera here about three years ago, and the Pyne and Harrison Troupe occasionally call on us; but as one aside, let us say that the whole of that troupe (vocally) consists of Miss Pyne, who is a charming singer; but excuse us from the troupe!

Albany is ashamed of its concert rooms, the best of which is very small and inconvenient; and I do believe if we had a smaller edition of the "Boston Music Hall," good concerts would receive better attention here.

Twelve years (or more) ago Joseph Burke, the talented violinist (then a resident of Albany) was the conductor of a fine Amateur Orchestral Society, named the "Concordia," which unfortunately only lived while Burke was with us. In old times we had fine vocal societies; and I can remember hearing the "Messiah" and "Creation" as well done as could be desired, with good soloists, powerful chorus, and a fine orchestra under Burke, who was a great favorite with us. Since that time many and many other vocal associations have sprung into existence, but six months (or less) always finished them, which I attribute to the extra quantity of legislation which had to take place at every rehearsal. Every meeting must be called to order by the president, a la Congress even, and it was all talk, until too late in the evening to do anything for divine St. Cecilia. At present, then, there is no regular "Philharmonic," or anything of like style in Albany; but sundry choir leaders have sundry gatherings, which are no doubt named up strong enough, but I do not know any particulars of them.

The Albany music store is Hidley's. A Mr. Scovel has just opened what he calls a "Temple of Music," which name is ahead of any establishment devoted to "sweet sounds" yet heard from. Mr. Hidley is building up a large business, and has already published quite a quantity of sheet music, such as it is, good, bad and indifferent.

Concerts generally go a begging in Albany, and those who have lately suffered while honoring us were Miss Pyne, Adelaide Philipps (with Wm. Mason and Mr. Adams), and Gottschalk. Madame Isadore Clark is threatening a concert, but we hope she will not be so reckless as to make the attempt. Yet Parodi and Strakosch make money here, and Ole Bull used to. Charity concerts are exceptions, and several hundred people were unable to attend George Warren's last "concert for the poor," which was a "perfect jam."

So much for general musical matters in a city which is certainly large enough to do much good for the "divine art"; and there is a hope that that good will yet be done, for we are decidedly improving (as an instance, they are beginning to subscribe for the "Journal of Music"). If your readers are willing, I will write again and speak of the "Pride of Albany," our great sculptor, E. D. Palmer, who has just accepted a most flattering invitation to exhibit some of his beautiful "marble poems" for the first time in New York. Also the superb pianism of Gottschalk and the singing of Miss Philipps, and many other things will, with your permission, be excellent food for a more able pen than that of your

DUTCH FRIEND.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 15, 1856.

Italian Opera—"The North Star."

In our review of the brief spell of opera at the Boston Theatre, which closed last Saturday, we deferred what we had to say of the only novelty, the comic opera by MEYERBEER, L'Etoile du Nord. This drew a full house for a single evening, and a house more than half full on a Saturday afternoon. It should have been played oftener to be appreciated, for it was a work of Meyerbeer, and of course crowded full of matter as an egg of meat, whether of the inspired kind or not. Our general impression was, that it was over-ingenious music, a great labor to the writer, and a labor to the listener who sits it through. And yet full of curious, pretty, sometimes beautiful conceits; of cunningly elaborated brilliancies and Meyerbeerish quaintnesses, not to say grotesquenesses; of interesting and inspiring combinations, well studied dramatic or melo-dramatic effects and contrasts; striking individuality in its little scraps of melody which run into the concerted harmony, but tame lack of individuality in the more prominent, developed melodies; all manner of original and curious arts of instrumentation, &c., &c. On the whole a very talented and scientific French work of effect, almost inseparable from the Grand Opera, and depending equally on scenic spectacle, the pretty platoons of girl soldiers, uncouth Cossacks, &c., as on the music for success. But here it depended chiefly and most successfully on Mme. DE LAGRANGE, whose exquisite acting and ringing of the principal part quite filled the mind and made one uncritical to all the rest.

We propose to look into this opera a little—not very profoundly or minutely, but just enough to do our duty to a new work. Plot and spectacle and music are inseparable, so we will trace them along together. First we have an overture, opening with a military movement, which is worked up into a good deal of activity and noise, and then passes or melts by means of a prolonged trill on the dominant of the coming key into a minor dance melody, which is exceedingly piquant and pretty, with its broad rhythm, and is lusciously instrumented. The march returns, and then, through a gauzy veil of harp accompaniments, appears a leading cantabile melody, which we shall meet more than once in the course of the opera, it forming one of the three or four motives which mechanize and give unity to the whole. A common-place, Balse-like sort of melody we must consider it, for one made so important. Fragments of the march again, and then for a close some trumpet touches of a livelier cavalry air, resembling one sung in the second act. On the whole a brilliant and effective overture, of whose rich instrumentation we could form a tolerable idea from MARETZKE's fine orchestra, although it required half a dozen harps instead of one, and all things in proportion.

The curtain rises on a gay scene, a village on the Gulf of Finland, water in the background, a chapel on the right, the rustic house of Catarina and her brother George on the left. Workmen (carpenters, for it is a new version of the story of Peter in the ship-yards of Zandaam), are resting from their labors, while their wives and daughters bring refreshments; Peter alone (AMODIO) is busy at his bench pushing the jack-plane. We shall see what keeps him. A tenor coryphæus (our veteran friend, in all the operas, who sings always flat) leads off with a couple of bars, to which the chorus answers in a minor strain of innocent gayety, quaint and fresh, and justifying what HEINE says of the individuality of Meyerbeer's choruses. Next comes the tenor air of Danilowitz, the pastry cook (BRIGNOLI), who makes much ado about his hot pies, and appeals most wooingly to the young maidens, singing that his cakes are as warm as his own heart, whereat the damsels jeer and laugh in comical mocking strains. There is nice fitting of tone-figures to sentiment and situation in all this. In scraps of recitative, expressively instrumented, inquiries are made for Catarina, who has not appeared; hints are thrown out that Peter is in love with her and waiting for her; and then master Peter develops himself, surly, passionate fellow that he is, in a muttered, growling strain of bass, which occurs afterwards often enough to pass for a type of himself, expressing the surly fellow and no more, while musically his part has little interest. A drinking chorus follows, charmingly wild and Northern, and also in the minor, the orchestra after each strain dashing down a precipice of chromatic triplets, with a recklessness that contrasts with the touch of sentiment there is in the tune. It changes to the major, as they drink to Charles XII. of Sweden, and then, as they all kneel, it passes into a prayer. This strain, like the whole first scene indeed, suggests analogies with the first scene of "William Tell," like situations and materials being employed for a great ensemble. With Rossini there is more of the freshness of nature, and more spontaneous naïveté, with all his art; while Meyerbeer achieves a less complete success by ingenious calculation of effects. We find this whole first act, however, full of interest, and of invention at least, if not of inspiration.

They challenge Danilowitz to drink the toast. He drinks only to the Czar, the enemy of Sweden! They resent it as an insult; carpenter Peter (who is the Czar) defends him, and a promising fight is only interrupted by the bell calling them off to work (an awfully harsh bell, by the way), and lets its steam off musically instead of fistically.

Now comes a bit of melodrama. Peter lingers behind, watching for Catharine. A flute strain from the house! 'Tis George, his "professor of the flute," and he takes up a flute and answers. This flute business is another of the little motives which pin the whole opera together—a hint here of what is completed in the last act. They drink together. Catharine has gone, it seems, to ask the hand of the inn-keeper's daughter for George in marriage; and now trips in LAGRANGE in jaunty cantiniere costume, and sings about the most comic piece of music in the opera, her account of her interview with the old inn-keeper, the music being somewhat descriptive of that important, burly, gruff-voiced, smoking individual. Madame does it to a charm, extorts praises for her ambassadorship, and goes off with a slight of high soaring triplets, in which her voice revels as exquisitely as few but Lagrange can. Catharine is wise; she lectures her lover, whom she has caught drinking, and surly Peter mutters out that angry strain again. She recalls her dying mother's prophecy about her star, the North Star; and here come in the harp figures and a part of the cantabile (noticed in the overture) which is the typical air of Catharine, another recurring motive of the piece.

As Peter is about to go, smarting with wounded pride under the moral lecture of his lady love, in rushes Prascovia (Mme. MAREZKE), the betrothed of George, in great alarm, announcing the approach of the Calmucks and Cossacks. Peter is very brave, but Catharine, true to her star, is wise and ready for emergencies. Leave it to her. They retire, and in creep a grotesque band of shaggy warriors, headed by Gritzenko (COLLETTI), a dandy ruffian, who makes the buffoon of the play, and figures afterwards as corporal and what not under Peter. They shout out their song of blood and pillage, and proceed to charge upon the house, when they are met upon the steps by Catharine, clad as a gipsy, with a starry robe and a tambourine, who with imperious gesture bids them back, appealing to the superstition of their race, of whom her mother was one. She tells their fortunes, and then sings the spirited gipsy rondo of JENNY LIND memory, the Cossacks lifting their feet the while in uncouth accompaniment. Without the vigor of Jenny's voice, Mme. Lagrange executed it with almost the same perfection, as she does all such bravura pieces. The savages are gone, good riddance! and Catharine has risen to the third heavens in her Peter's admiration. One of the most charming, ingenious, naïve, expressive passages in the whole opera is the dialogue which follows between the lovers, in which Catharine asks the seeming carpenter's history, divines his destiny, and kindles anew the prouder aspirations in his breast. The music is in the happiest vein of Meyerbeer; in Catharine's part it has here and elsewhere a wise, wholesome, encouraging sound, revealing a fresh, generous, affectionate nature, witty withal and self-possessed. There is really an individuality in the music of Catharine throughout—least of it in the bravura pieces which most captivate the crowd; whereas Peter's music is but tamely characteristic, or only characteristic of an ordinary, self-willed and irritable person. There is a touch of tenderness, however, in a strain here which he sings aside, as he thinks of "her noble voice, noble and proud." The duet ends of course with a strain of martial and heroic resolution and self-dedication.

Now comes a very odd duet between Prascovia and Catharine. Poor Prascovia! worse trouble than before! Her George, her lover, just as they were to be married, is enrolled a conscript by the Cossacks. Catharine comforts her; another moral inspiration; she shall be married; a substitute shall be provided, one who looks just like George—(the heroic girl will don the uniform herself). So there are alternate showers and sunshine, smiles and tears for the simple-hearted maiden. All this is expressed in an imitative duet, full of sobbings and cooings on the one part, and high, cackling laughter on the other, which reminds one of a concert of hens and chickens in a barnyard. Yet it is exquisitely ingenious and funny, and the glad strain in which the voices join at the end is extremely pretty, flute-like and florid, taxing the flexibility and compass of both voices quite severely. Mme. Maretzek ably seconded Lagrange in this, her voice telling clearest in the highest notes, but betraying some pinched and nasal tones in the middle region. This droll conceit was vociferously encored. This duet might pass for a burlesque on the one in Freyschütz, also between a sad and a merry maiden. But that has soul in it.

And now for the finale of this first Act, a wedding scene in the foreground, with soldiers in the background marching off the conscripts. A band of rustic musicians appear, and the orchestra is made to imitate the tuning of their instruments, striking hard fifths, winding off with a rude trumpet flourish;—farcical enough. The pretty chorus of young girls and workmen; the rapturous couplets of Prascovia the bride, accompanied by the la, la, in octave intervals of the girls swinging hands girl-like; the smart quickstep chorus of the soldiers; the bacchanalian glou, glou, and zon, zon of the men, mingled with the heart-beating tic tac of the lovers, &c., make an ensemble full of variety and zest, in which of course the orchestra plays an important part. A few bars of religious music as they all kneel before the chapel, while Catarina appears at the top of the steps, disguised as a recruit, and sings her farewell prayer of blessing on the marriage. This prayer, with harp accompaniment, is nothing but the full development of that sentimental Balse-like melody, which we have met twice before. Interpolate it into the "Bohemian Girl," and we fancy few would suspect the difference of authorship, so far as essential melody is concerned. Musically, Catharine's strong parts are her weakest. The real music of her part is in those incidental, dialogue scraps of melody, of which we have spoken. She ends with a florid barcarole, as she is rowed off in the boat, whose echoes die away among the rocks with the most silvery purity and sweetness of Lagrange. Her singing of the prayer too was full of pathos, and better than the melody deserved.

So much for the first, which is the longest, and it seems to us by far the best act of the three. The conclusion of our sketch must give way for this week to other matters.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The article on the first page by HEINE, on MEYERBEER, we translate, not because we think its opinions true, but as a matter of curiosity, now that attention is called to the subject by the "North Star," as indicating the strange enthusiasm which this acute satirist shared with all Germany for Meyerbeer, about the time of the first success of Les Huguenots, (1836—40). Heine had sharp things enough to say of Meyerbeer in some of his later writings.

At length we are to have a beginning of classical music. Our mouths water, and we have waited long. Our young townsman, Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, who has the true tone and culture of an artist, is to lead off this evening in a nice little Soirée at Chickering's saloon. He has made a careful study of some of Beethoven's earlier piano works, wisely and modestly reasoning that he must do a good service, while things more formidable and brilliant are so common, by keeping us familiar with these. He will play to-night the second of the three Sonatas dedicated to Haydn, and (with aid from the Mendelssohn Quintette Club) the Trio No. 1, in E flat; also smaller pieces by Bach, Chopin and Mendelssohn.

The Club will play with him the famous Schumann Quintet; Mr. Ryan's clarinet will discourse that sweet Andante Pastorale by Crusell; and Mrs. Long will sing an air from Mozart and Mr. Parker's music to Tennyson's "Come into the garden, Maud." Who will resist so choice a feast? . . . And then, to follow up the supply of chamber music, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club will commence their eighth annual series next Tuesday evening. Mr. AUGUST FRIES has happily recovered, and they will begin strong, with two new pieces for the first part, viz: Mozart's Fifth Quartet, in A, and Beethoven's Piano Trio, Op. 70, No. 2, in E flat. Part second will include an Adagio from a Clarinet Concerto by Spohr, a Polonaise by Chopin, and Mendelssohn's third Quartet, in D. The pianist will be Mr. HUGO LEONHARD, a talented young artist, recently from Leipzig. . . . There is comfort in the fact that, if the great public is not ready to sustain Orchestral Concerts, there will be plenty of choice chamber music for the few! But we do not despair of symphonies under the statue of Beethoven yet. If it cannot be done in one way, it may be in another. Of the 1500 season tickets necessary to guaranty eight concerts, barely 700 were subscribed for. Now we throw out a hint: Who is there of the 700, who would not gladly be held for the same amount for say five concerts, with the privilege of attending one rehearsal to each (making it equivalent in fact to ten concerts for $3 00!), and with the understanding that the series shall be extended to eight, should they prove popular enough to warrant it?

Musical Intelligence.

NEW YORK.—The musical event of the week has been the concerts of THALBERG, of which he has already given three. In the absence of our expected correspondence, we extract from the Courier & Enquirer's notice of Tuesday evening:

Niblo's Saloon was filled to its utmost capacity last evening on the occasion of Mr. THALBERG's first Concert in America, by one of the most elegant audiences ever assembled in New York. The concert was quite a model in its arrangements: There was just enough of it:—a rare merit,—the 'not too much' appearing to be the most difficult lesson for public amusement to learn. . . . In every respect, then, Mr. Thalberg's first appearance was unexceptionable. He came before the American public without humbug of any kind, relying solely upon his established position as an artist of the highest rank, and merely saying: 'I have come to you; hear me if you will.' His success—we mean, of course, his American success, and a success commensurate with his great fame—was established beyond a doubt at the end of the first part of the concerts. He rose from his instrument confessed by every hearer the master of all the masters who had preceded him.

When he began to play, the first impression was that we had heard all this before, and heard it very much to our satisfaction; but after a while, even the dullest ear began to perceive that in addition to something that it had heard, there was something that it had not heard before; and this went on increasing until finally the new revelation eclipsed the old and familiar knowledge, and Mr. Thalberg was listened to as if he were beginning the revolution in piano-forte playing which he triumphantly completed in Europe several years ago. For Mr. Thalberg, young as he is, is the father of the present school of piano-forte playing. . . . Mr. Thalberg's compositions generally consist of what might be called variations upon an air; variations of an air they certainly are not; for his literal faithfulness to the simplest theme that he may take as his subject is no less remarkable than the crowd of brilliant, fantastic, musical thoughts with which he adorns and illustrates it. You hear this theme constantly; it goes steadily and inexorably on; its bold steady march distinctly audible amid the musical tumult of arpeggios, scale passages, octaves, and fanciful outbursts and freaks of sound, which his magic raises around it. This was particularly remarkable last evening in the Fantasias upon themes from La Sonnambula and in the grand variations on the air from L'Elisir d'Amore.

As to Mr. Thalberg's playing we omit as entirely superfluous, if not impertinent, all praises of its mechanical merits, and go not into particulars, or into raptures, about his wrist at once strong and flexible,—his touch at once firm and delicate, crisp and easy,—his thumbs all fingers instead of his fingers all thumbs, and his fingers all first and second—his having two right hands instead of one right and one left;—he is beyond all this sort of commendation. It became necessary for others to attain those things because he had them, and discovered how to use them: they were not much needed before; some of them, not at all. His execution seems absolutely perfect; and his style, remarkable for every excellence, is chiefly so for its brilliance, its elegance, and its precision. His accuracy is marvellous to the verge of the miraculous; and we do not wonder at the story told, that one of those used-up Englishmen who travel about in search of a sensation, having followed him in vain for three years in the hope of hearing a false note, blew out his brains in despair. Of this characteristic he gave a splendid example last evening in the Etude with repeated notes. He played this like a machine with a soul. There is nothing to be said after such a performance as that, especially by musicians; mute admiration and wonder are the tribute which it exacts, if we except outbursts of applause; but there is really very little to be said about absolute perfection. We have no space for further remark, however, at this time, and can only add that Mr. Thalberg's success with his audience—one of the most cultivated ever assembled in this city—was complete, triumphant. He was called vociferously after each performance; but complied with the demand for an encore but once.

Not the least attraction of the evening was the singing of Madame CORA DE WILHORST, who with Signor MORELLI assisted Mr. THALBERG. Madame DE WILHORST in voice and method ranks high among the best vocalists whom we have heard of late. Her voice is at once sympathetic, powerful and flexible; and her style and method are of the best Italian school, in which she has studied with a success which indicates unusual artistic capabilities. Her singing last evening of Dunque io son and of the Air from Il Trovatore was very charming; and after the latter, she was deservedly recalled with an enthusiasm hardly inferior to that elicited by the hero of the evening.

Signor MORELLI's noble and purely delivered voice we always listen to with great pleasure, and never with more than last evening. He is, with the exception perhaps of GRAZIANI, first among the baritones who have visited us.

The Academy of Music was opened under the management of Baron Stankovitch on Monday night with Il Trovatore, which has been followed by L'Etoile du Nord. A strange scene occurred the first night, of which we find the following account:

Quite a scene of confusion took place on Monday night, when Kreutzer, the new conductor, vice Maretzky, (excommunicated by the stockholders,) took his seat. A storm of hisses, shouts of "Maretzky! Maretzky!" &c. arose from all parts of the audience, and it was in vain that the orchestra endeavored to make it itself heard. Kreutzer turned to the audience, bowed and smiled, and received some applause, but the confusion did not cease until the unpopular conductor quitted his official seat, and handed Maretzky into it, amidst the acclamations of the revolutionists. Kreutzer took his usual place as first violin, and the performance went on. It was of course a preconcerted arrangement, in order to mortify the stockholders, who had stipulated in the arrangements with Mad. de Lagrange, that Maretzky should have nothing whatever to do in the Opera House. At the end of the third act the audience insisted upon Max making a speech, which he did in a very few words of very broken English. The revolution, speech and opera, went off in grand style, although Amodio had a cold; so that the opening was a complete success.

The Academy is rented for six weeks only, and at less than half the rent stated by the Times. A new tenor is expected from Europe, when Verdi's (toujours Verdi!) Traviata and Sicilian Vespers will be brought out. . . . The German Opera, we regret to learn, has failed. . . . The new contralto, Mme. ANGRI, arrived last Saturday.

Foreign.

MANCHESTER, ENG.—The Free-Trade Hall Choral Concerts were inaugurated Oct. 30th by a performance of the "Creation." The vocalists were Miss LOUISA VINNING, ("remembered as the Infant Sappho,") "Mr. HARRI MILLARD," and "Mr. HENRI DRAYTON," under which Frenchified style familiar American names may possibly be recognized. The Manchester Examiner says:

Mr. Millard, a young American tenor, made his first bow to a Manchester audience on this occasion. He has been singing with great success in London, during the past season; and in the highly descriptive air, "Now vanish," at once gave evidence that he possessed a voice of remarkable and beautiful quality. The lower notes of his register are, indeed, at present comparatively weak and wanting in resonance, but his style is masterly, and we have seldom had to chronicle a more favorable debut. Indeed, we never remember to have heard the beautiful air, "In native worth," sung with such a rare appreciation of its innumerable beauties, and with such chaste and judicious feeling. We regretted to notice, however, that he would not allow Haydn to speak always for himself; the more so, as an innovation was attempted in a recitative held sacred in the remembrances of all the lovers of oratorio singing.

Mr. Henri Drayton is not unknown to the amateurs of Manchester, though this, we believe, was his first appearance here in sacred music. His ponderous voice and dramatic style, more suited to the stage than the orchestra, nevertheless told well in the fine bass airs which form so prominent a portion of the oratorio. We were hardly prepared for the chaste style and deep feeling manifested in the duetto of the third part. "By thee with bliss," we have indeed seldom heard surpassed.

HANOVER.—The following extracts are from a letter to the London Musical World, Oct. 25:

The traveller in North Germany will do well to pass some time both at Hanover and Brunswick, on his way to the capital of Prussia. At Hanover he will find a spacious and beautiful theatre, devoted to alternate nights to drama and opera. Marschner, the composer, is music-director, and his latest opera, Hans Heiling, has maintained, if not raised, his fame as a dramatic composer. The performance of this work, which I heard recently, was remarkable in many respects, more so on the whole, however, for the ensemble than for any special excellence in the principal singers, who all sang in the ultra-German manner, and practiced exaggerations both of voice and gesture. The story of Hans Heiling is a little in the Der Freischütz-Vampyr style; and the music (although exhibiting the highest measure of cleverness) is little more than an ingenious compound of Spohr and Weber—or rather of Weber and Spohr, since Herr Marschner (who has no originality) finds it easier to counterfeit the wild peculiarities of the first than the gorgeous harmony and elaborately-finished orchestration of the last. The best parts of the opera are those in which the situations require the music to be comic. The diables, where the supernatural personages are directly concerned, is labored and feeble; but where their influence is merely suggested, a certain vein of the Hoffmannesque becomes apparent, which is uncommonly genial and attractive. Hans Heiling appears to be popular; and, although Herr Marschner is neither a genius nor a great master of instrumentation, his music is sensible, fluent, nearly always effective, and not seldom interesting. The band at Hanover is capital, and performs duty on the dramatic as well as on the operatic nights. Between the acts of Klytämnestra—a new tragedy parodied from the Agamemnon of Euripides, and recently imported from Berlin—I was much pleased with the admirable execution of several fine overtures, among others, Mozart's to La Clemenza di Tito and Spohr's rarely heard Macbeth. The theatre may be described as imbedded in gardens. It is built in the handsomest part of the city; and the exterior is more than worthy of the interior, presenting the appearance of a really magnificent public edifice. The charge of admission to what are esteemed the very best pieces is only one thaler eight groschen—less than four shillings; but I should recommend English visitors to repair to what is entitled the "parquet perron," where, for twenty groschen (about two shillings) they can be as genteely and comfortably accommodated as in the stalls at either of our London Italian operas. And then, too, how refreshing, how sensible, a performance which begins at seven and is over before ten! You get for your money only one piece, it is true—opera, play, or ballet—but upon that one piece the greatest care is bestowed, and neither the performers nor the audience are tired at the end. The Königliches Hof-Theatre was commenced by the late king, in 1845, and finished in 1852 by the reigning monarch of Hanover. It is large enough to hold nearly 2,000 people, and both as an edifice and as an institution it is worthy of a much larger empire than the petty region which, once a dependence of the English crown, is now governed (almost despotically) by the afflicted cousin of our gracious Queen.

The theatre, however, is not all that Hanover presents of interesting to the amateur or professor of music. Joseph Joachim resides here, for six months out of the year, in his capacity of concert-meister to His Majesty the King.

Joachim is playing more grandly than ever—of which I had recently an opportunity of judging, at his own apartments, where, in association with three members of the theatre-orchestra—Herrn Eyert (brothers, second violin and viola, and Lindner, violoncello—he performed the 11th quartet (in F minor), the C sharp minor (posthumous), and the extraordinary fugue, Op. 135, originally composed as finale to the B flat posthumous, but afterwards published alone. I believe that to read these works more deeply, or to execute them with more brilliant effect, would be impossible. The fugue, for the first time (to me at least) revealed an intelligible design and a logical form of development. Certainly the most daring, extravagant and original specimens of fugue the art can boast are the two which Beethoven composed in the key of B flat—the one immediately under notice, and the finale to his pianoforte sonata Op. 108. While paying the first tribute to Joseph Joachim, I must not omit to acknowledge the eminent talent displayed by Herrn Eyert and Lindner, who showed themselves worthy companions of their distinguished concert-meister.

Joachim has been composing a good deal—but still not enough. He has written, among other things less important, four orchestral overtures, only one of which (that to Hamlet) he has had the courage to produce at the concerts he directs. This is mistaken modesty. If Joachim does not take advantage of the position he has mainly won by the exercise of his own ability how is the musical world to know what he is doing? Besides it is of very little use composing for the orchestra unless he can gain experience by judging of the effects at which he aims, otherwise than upon paper. He has the opportunity, and should use it. There is in Joachim the element of originality—a great matter.

BERLIN.—The Royal Academy of Fine Arts celebrated the birthday of their patron, the King, on the 15th inst., in the large room of the Sing-Academie. The Festival-Cantata for the occasion was composed by Herr A. W. Bach, Musik-director, and member of the Senate of the Academy.—There is nothing new at the Royal Opera House, where Mlle. Johanna Wagner is still the great attraction. She has been playing Romeo, in I Montecchi e Capuletti.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER

Will give a SOIREE at the Rooms of the Messrs Chickering, (Masonic Temple,) on SATURDAY EVENING, Nov. 15th, in which he will be kindly assisted by Mrs. J. H. LONG and the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. Tickets to be had at the principal Music stores.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's FIRST CONCERT

Will take place on TUESDAY, Nov. 18th, at Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, assisted by Mr. HUGO LEONHARD, Pianist. Quartette by Mozart, in A. (first time).—Beethoven's Piano Trio in E flat, op. 70.—Adagio for Clarinet, by Spohr.—Polonaise by Chopin, played by Mr. Leonhard, and a Quartette in D, by Mendelssohn.

Tickets for the Series of Eight Concerts, $5. Single tickets will be $1 each. Lists and tickets may be found at the music stores. The Club during the season will be assisted by the best available talent.

MUSICAL SOIREE'S.

OTTO DRESEL

Proposes to give his Fourth Series of FOUR SOIREE'S, At the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, during the months of December, January, February and March, on Saturday evenings to be hereafter specified.

Subscription for the series, in packages of four tickets, $3. Subscription lists may be found at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, and at the music stores.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRE & CO. Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices. THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Kimball, a few copies. Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES. Also, a genuine LAPOT VIOLIN.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeon, exhibited at the Fair of 1866. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeon by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1866. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland; all held during the month of September, 1866;—making Six First Premiums in ONE MONTH!!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIRST PRIZES over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal bass. The one with pedal bass contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $60 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address

MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

Mr. HUGO LEONHARD,

FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,

Gives instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN, TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE, FLUTE AND SINGING.

Mrs. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK, Teacher of the Piano and Singing, U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y. To Choral Societies and Choirs.

NOVELLO'S Catalogue, No. 3, contains a list of Music for the use of Choral Societies, Church Choirs, and Singing Classes, printed in separate Vocal and Orchestral Parts. Containing Oratorios, Odes, Cantatas, Festival Hymns and Anthems; Operatic Music, Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets and Choruses; Overtures, Symphonies and Marches; Madrigals and Glee; Music with Latin words; Masses, Motets, &c., &c., sent postage free for one cent.

The Vocal Parts are printed in full music size at the rate of three cents per page.

Novello's Octavo Editions of Oratorios,

Of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., in Vocal Score, with Piano-forte accompaniment. Handel's Messiah, $1 68; Judas Maccabæus, $1 68; Haydn's Creation, $1 25. All the Oratorios of these great masters have been published in this series at similarly low prices.

NOVELLO'S OCTAVO CHORUSES.

All the Choruses in the octavo editions of the Oratorios may be had distinct in Vocal Score with organ and Piano-forte accompaniment, at 3, 6, 9, or 18 cents each.

NOVELLO'S CHORAL HAND-BOOK.

A collection of music in separate vocal parts. In this work are published the whole of the chorus parts of the following Oratorios:

Handel's "Messiah," price 38 cents each part.

Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," price 38 cents each part.

Handel's "Samson," price 38 cents each part.

These parts are printed in the octavo size with the Alto and Tenor parts in the Treble Clef.

COLLECTION OF GLEES.

Novello's Glee Hive, Part Song Book, and the Musical Times and Singing Class Circular. For particulars see Catalogue, No. 5, sent postage free for one cent.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE, 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI, TEACHER OF SINGING, 47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Is now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pineknay Street.

Sign. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 8th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN, (Late at St. Paul's Church.) ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH. ALBANY, N. Y.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO. RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON. Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS, MANUFACTURERS OF PATENT ACTION GRAND AND SQUARE PIANO-FORTES, OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES, MASONIC TEMPLE, TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER, Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony, 3 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN, Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte, RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF EDWARD L. BALCH, No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE, Manufactory, 379 Washington Street, BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and 45 Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC, HAVE REMOVED TO No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St. NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE, TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE. Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING, IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC, 701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos. CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY. Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, A Paper of Art and Literature, Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston. Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.
First insertion, per line.....30 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$8.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 242.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 8.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I. "
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
" G. ANDRE & CO., 806 Chestnut St. Philadelphia. "
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

The Works of Chopin.

[The following is the substance of a little pamphlet published in London some years since, without date or name of author, entitled "An Essay on the Works of Frederic Chopin." It is written in rather a high-flown and extravagant style of eulogy, although it is in the main appreciative. It is in fact an uncommonly clever music-seller's puff, issued by the London publishers of Chopin's music. Retrenching some of its most transcendental superfluities, we think it will not be uninteresting to those who are curious to know the extent and character of this poet-pianist's compositions.]

The prevailing tone of the most popular piano-forte music of the present day is unhealthy and vicious in the extreme. Morbid sentimentality has usurped the prerogatives of tenderness and of passion, while passages of mere finger dexterity preside over what was once the dwelling-place of pure melody and ingenious contrivance. The love of beautiful and unaffected harmony seems wholly dead in the bosoms of modern composers, who, influenced by the clever trickery developed in the music of M. M. and a host of others, think of nothing but new modes of showing how an idea, in itself absolutely phantasmal, shall be presented in new forms of clap-trap—shall be arpeggiated into fresh showers of triviality. With the exceptions of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, Henri Reber, Stephen Heller, Adolph Henselt, Charles Mayer, William Sterndale Bennett, and the subject of the present essay, there is scarcely an existing piano-forte composer who does not repeatedly mistake and substitute inflation for energy—maudlin mock sentiment for true feeling—rapid roulades, for natural brilliancy. * * *

To begin then with Frederic Chopin, an illustrious instance of pure and unworldly genius, of true and artistic intelligence—unbending to the polyhedric wand of motley fashion—devising the hollow popularity awarded by an ill-judging and unreflecting mob—laughing at the sneers of shallow critics, who, unable to comprehend "the subtle-souled psychologisms" of real genius, lay bare to the public their plenary ignorance, and, ill fitted to appreciate the unvitiated motives of exalted merit, expose the dullness of their feeble capacity to the contempt of the ill-natured, and the pity of the wise. On surveying the entire works of Frederic Chopin, we find their grand characteristic to be—a profoundly poetic feeling, which involves a large degree of the transcendental and mystic—is essentially and invariably of passionate tendency, of melancholy impression, and metaphysical coloring. Chopin does not carry off your feeling by storm, and leave you in a mingled maze of wonder and dismay; he lulls your senses in the most delicious repose, intoxicates them with bewitching and unceasing melody, clad in the richest and most exquisite harmony—a harmony which abounds in striking and original features, in new and unexpected combinations. The first works which Chopin presented to the world, though, of course, not endowed with the decisive and individual character of his now perfected style, clearly pronounced themselves the offspring of a vigorous intellect—of energetic origination genius, untrammelled by conventionalities, unfettered by pedantry. As he has progressed, his style has grown up and expanded like some goodly tree, which casts the shadow of exuberant foliage over a labyrinth of untrodden paths; a refuge for all beautiful and fantastic shapes—children of his ethereal fancy, of his plastic and glowing imagination. The extent and variety of his works, which are almost wholly devoted to the piano-forte, plainly indicate the unequalled fertility—the overflowing luxuriance of his invention—the endless diversity—the unprecedented abundance of his resources.

His CONCERTOS—only surpassed, if indeed they be surpassed, by those of the great Beethoven—are vast in their conception, bold in their outline, rich in their motives, minutely and dexterously finished in their details. The first, in E minor, Op. 11, (dedicated by Chopin to his friend and fellow-artist, Kalkbrenner, whose enthusiastic admiration of him and his works is as well known, as it is frequently and ardently expressed) combines all the passion and intense excitement of the great modern schools, with the distinct plan, and clear development, of the old masters; the learning of a Sebastian Bach is joined to the ideality of a Mendelssohn, the untiring melody of a Rossini, the mystic grandeur of a Weber, and the dreamy restlessness of a Sterndale-Bennett—the whole colored with the delicious peculiarities of Chopin's own piquant and charming manner, seasoned with the infinite and captivating graces which distinguish and place him apart from, and beyond the reach of all other modern composers. * * *

The second Concerto, in F minor, has, in addition to the above named enviable characteristics, an originality so marked, as to place it beyond the pale of all ordinary compositions of the kind. Its difficulties, though enormous, are amply compensated by the fascination of its melody, the richness of its harmonies, and the ingenious management of its orchestral accompaniments. * * * Next in importance to the Concertos, must be ranked those inimitable STUDIES, which have effected more for the rapid advancement of pianoforte playing to the uttermost limits of perfection, than any elementary works that are extant. The universal reception of these, at all the great musical schools throughout Europe, is an irrefutable argument in favor of their intrinsic excellence. They comprehend every modification of style necessary for the attainment of a thorough mastery over the piano-forte; from the grand to the playful—from the grave to the gay—from the elaborate to the simple—from the sublime to the beautiful—every shadow of sentiment is depicted—every mood of passion—every diversity of phrase—is not merely touched upon, but thoroughly and effectively accomplished. To obtain an entire command over these splendid studies, (which command involves an undoubted mastership over every difficulty that modern or ancient piano-forte music presents,) it is advisable to commence with a careful practice of the twenty-four PRELUDES, through all the keys, (Op. 28,) which are evidently intended by the composer as a preface to his more elaborate work. These charming sketches might be easily mistaken for some of the lighter effusions of Sebastian Bach, from the remarkable adherence to the severe diatonic school of progressions, (smacking so strongly of the manner of the old masters,) for which they are distinguished—suggesting one proof among a hundred, of the large range of Chopin's musical reading, which evidently has been directed to the works of every composer whose labors are worth knowing. One thing is certain, viz.—to play with the proper feeling and correct execution, the preludes and studies of Chopin, is to be, neither more nor less than a finished pianist—and, moreover—to comprehend them thoroughly, to give a life and a tongue to their infinite and most eloquent subtleties of expression—involves the necessity of being in no less degree a poet than a pianist—a philosophical thinker than a musician. Common-place is instinctively avoided in all the works of Chopin—a stale cadence, or a trite progression—a hum-drum subject, or a worn-out passage—a vulgar twist of the melody, or a hackneyed sequence—a meagre harmony, or an unskilful counterpoint—may in vain be looked for throughout the entire range of his compositions, the prevailing characteristics of which are, a feeling as uncommon as beautiful—a treatment as original as felicitous—a melody and a harmony as new, fresh, vigorous and striking as they are utterly unexpected and out of the ordinary track. In taking up one of the works of Chopin, you are entering, as it were, a fairy-land, untrodden by human footsteps—a path hitherto unfrequented but by the great composer himself; and a faith and a devotion, a desire to appreciate and a determination to understand, are absolutely necessary to do it anything like adequate justice. As Coleridge remarks, in reference to the inspired truths of Holy Writ, "There are more beautiful things that find us, rather than are found by us, more great ideas that come to us, rather than we go to them," in the compositions of Chopin, than in those of almost any other author existing or dead, if we except, perhaps, Bach, Beethoven and Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

Among the lesser compositions of Chopin, the "MAZURKAS," those "cabinet pictures," as Liszt has happily designated them—those green spots in the desert—those quaint snatches of melancholy song—those outpourings of an unworldly and trustful soul—those musical floods of tears and gushes of pure joyfulness—those exquisite embodiments of fugitive thoughts—those sweet complaints of unacknowledged genius—stand alone and unrivalled. These are wholly and individually creations of Chopin, which none have dared to imitate, (for who, indeed, could aspire to imitate that which is inimitable?) portraying in vivid colors the patriotism and home-feeling of the great Polish composer, (we need hardly remind our readers that Poland boasts the honor of having given birth to Chopin,) affording vent in passionate eloquence to the beautiful and secret thoughts of his guileless heart. Of these there are eight sets, all of the rarest loveliness, sparkling with genius, redolent with fragrant thought—very nosegays of sweet and balmy melody. If we have a preference, where all is beauty unsurpassed, it is for the first and sixth sets, which for quaint and happy melody, rich and delicious harmony, ingenious and novel treatment, are unrivalled since music was an art. How often have we turned our laughter into tears, our tears into laughter, by the aid of these delicate idealisms, these sweet glimpses of a world far from our own, "Where music, and moonlight, and beauty are one!"

these dear confessions of a bashful mind, retiring within the mantle of its own loveliness, from very modesty of its rare deserts! * * *

Another interesting feature among the miscellaneous works of Chopin, is comprised in the NOCTURNES, a species of composition which he has carried out to a greater degree of perfection than any other author. On these elegant sketches, all the finesse, all the coquetry, all the infinitesimal delicacies, all the minute and barely perceptible graces, which, conglomerated into a whole, form what is termed style, must be lavished, in order to interpret fairly their infinite meaning—to develop completely their manifold beauties. They are triumphant answers to the aspersers of Chopin, who, from inability to seize his intentions, by reason of their intense subtlety—who, from incapability of bringing out his phrases, owing to a lack of the legato quality in their playing, are bold enough to accuse him of a deficiency in melody, a requisite which, strange to say, he possesses in a more remarkable degree than any other living composer for the piano. To hear one of these eloquent streams of pure loveliness delivered by such pianists as J. Rosenhain, F. Liszt, E. Perkhert, Wm. Holmes, or H. Field, a pleasure we have frequently enjoyed, is the very transcendancy of musical delight. Every one of these is a perfect gem; we would not disparage the rest by giving a preference to any one of them; they are, without an exception, veritable chef d'œuvres of their kind, and would have placed Chopin in the first rank of modern composers had he indited nothing else. There are fourteen of them, all of which are as dear to us as close relationship can make them. * * *

In his POLONAISES too, of which he has written seven, of various lengths and forms, Chopin has marched many strides beyond the vulgar track of the generality of such things. These are remarkable for a boldness of phraseology, a decision of character, a masterly continuousness of purpose, and a sparkling brilliancy of passage, which are entirely out of the reach of second-rate thinkers, as is amply manifested by the failure of one and all the attempts to ape their peculiarities, which are daily issuing from the hands of the engravers, and die as soon as they are born, causing the shelves of the publishers to groan under excess of corruption and decay. Chopin, in his Polonaises, and in his Mazurkas, has aimed at those characteristics which distinguish the national music of his country so markedly from that of all others—that quaint idiosyncrasy—that identical wildness and fantasticality—that delicious mingling of the sad and the cheerful, which invariably and forcibly individualize the music of those northern countries, whose languages delight in combinations of consonants, novclif, hlzwrbms—wise, such as the Russian and Polish. As mere pieces of display, they are equal, if not superior, to those noted compositions of the same class which have proceeded from the inspired pen of Weber, and from the marked effect they always produce on a mixed auditory, are admirably calculated for drawing-room display. * * *

The WALTZES of Chopin are distinct from those of any other composer, by reason of their more fluent melody, their greater length, their superior elaboration, their ampler resources of harmony, and other characteristics of an elegant and cultivated mind. Of these there are five, all of extreme beauty and singular originality, and far superior to anything else of the class extant. If we may be allowed to entertain a preference, we should select that exquisitely plaintive morceau in A minor, (No. 2 of "Trois Grandes Valses," Op. 34) which from the first bar to the last is of most unspotted loveliness, or that animated torrent of exultation, "L'Invitation pour la danse," which, for continued and energetic brilliancy, for fresh and invigorating melody, has scarcely a parallel.

Besides these, there are the BALLADES (three of them), a species of songs without words, equal in their way to those of the celebrated Mendelssohn, though in no way whatever, be it understood, an imitation of them. They require an infinitude of varied expression in their performance, a delicacy of touch, a sureness in the execution of passages, and a singing tone, of which only intellectual pianists can boast, but which are stringently imperative in order to their entire appreciation. They will not endure a slovenly, scrambling, uncertain mode of playing; the performer must think as a poet, and possess the power of giving a reality to his impulses through the medium of remarkable manual dexterity. We have frequently met with instances of very remarkable musicians, who have been excluded from the comprehension of Chopin's music simply from inability to render it exactly according to the intentions of the composer, by reason of a want of those finger-requisites, which are at least half the battle in the formation of a perfect pianist; laboring under this deficiency, they have rashly denied Chopin that rare distinction with which the first authorities in Europe have endowed him, until, chance favoring them to the hearing of one of his compositions, correctly and thoroughly mastered by some pianist de la première force, they have immediately, and with the ready frankness and liberality only appertaining to real talent, owned the error of the impression under which they had been laboring, and ranked themselves thence-forward among the crowd of his most enthusiastic admirers. We mention this especially, because the BALLADES, more so almost than any others of the works of Chopin, absolutely insist upon a finish of performance, only attainable by severe study, and a strong desire to "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest." "He that hath ears to hear let him hear."—He who enters upon the study of Chopin's poetical music with the heartlessness of an infidel, or the indifference of a sceptic, will be at a discount for his trouble; let him cease his endeavors to attain, what, to him, FROM LACK OF FAITH, is unattainable; let him descend from the loftiest clouds of ideal sublimity, and grovel amid the mire of the mindless mummeries of the popular composers, and the unmythical in Art—Chopin is beyond him. He, on the other hand, who approaches him with a veneration, and a faith, and a love, pre-created by the coupling of anticipation and desire, will find, to his delight, his most extravagant preconceptions realized, and will at once declare, that Chopin is by far the most poetical, by many degrees the most purely intellectual of modern piano-forte writers.

Perhaps one of the most extraordinary of all the works of Chopin, both on account of its exceeding originality, and its strangely fantastic structure, is the grand SONATA, in the sullen and moody key in B flat minor. This wild and gloomy rhapsody is precisely fitted for a certain class of enthusiasts, who would absolutely revel in its phantasmagorical kaleidoscope. * * *

In his TRIO, for piano-forte, violin, and violoncello, Chopin has had to contend against the popularity of the lighter effusions of Reissiger, which are almost the life and soul of the great body of amateurs—and—a harder task still—against the gorgeous imagination of a Beethoven, the oriental elaboration of a Spohr, the mystic playfulness of a Kalliwoda, the graceful melody of a Dussek, the wild unearthliness of a Weber, the pure classicality of a Reber, the earnest intensity of a Mendelssohn, and the flowing facility of a Hummel;—yet, we feel bound to say, he has succeeded in producing a work which steers clear of the peculiarities of each of the schools—the flimsy, the poetical, the strictly classical, &c., as above eminently represented—a work of a mixed kind, that, were it more generally known, would be hailed with delight by the lovers of this most interesting and thoroughly domestic species of chamber music. Its superior attraction to the trios of Reissiger depends mainly on the higher beauty of the materials of which it is composed—since, as a matter of mere execution, it is perfectly within reach of the great mass of trio players. Its profound thoughtfulness will conduce to the elevation of the common feeling for music of the general amateur, and raise him in his own estimation, by the mere consciousness of his being able to feel and appreciate music of so grave and lofty a character—while, on the other hand, it will facilitate his powers of execution from the novelty of its forms of passage, and the freshness of its combinations, which place it wholly apart from any work of the kind hitherto produced. It is by no means so abstruse as the trios of Beethoven, (the great ones,) still less does it emulate the deeper intricacy of those of Mendelssohn, and further off than ever is it from the enormous complexities of the trio in E minor, of Spohr—the only work of the kind which has proceeded from the fertile pen of that great master. A tolerable pianist—a good second-rate violinist—and a moderately-skilful violoncellist—may easily master this trio, with satisfaction to themselves, and pleasure to the hearers; and its excessive beauty cannot fail of conducing to its extended popularity, when once it shall become known. * * *

We must next speak of the SCHERZOS, of which there are three, each deserving individual notice, both on account of rare merit and distinct character. The first, in B minor, known in England as "Le Banquet Infernal," has a wildness and a grotesquerie about it, which, in addition to its immense difficulties, will prevent its immediate appreciation by any but thorough musicians. A careful investigation, however, of the materials of which it is composed, cannot fail of inducing a comprehension of what, at first, might have appeared almost incomprehensible, and that once obtained, the path is open to the hearty admiration which must inevitably follow. With Chopin's music, the intellect must be satisfied ere the heart can be touched;—but once obtain the sanction of the intelligence—once render clear the artful labyrinth which the philosophical composer has imagined—one catch a sight of his design and encompass his meaning—and enthusiasm immediately usurps the place of frigid analysis—the heart sits on the throne but now occupied by the judgment. We know no better instance of what we have often asserted to our musical friends—viz.—that in Chopin's music, what frequently appears dryest and most uninviting on a first and superficial acquaintance, becomes, on a closer intimacy, matter of such evident and undeniable beauty, that you are astonished how you could ever have presumed to question its supremacy, or doubt of its transcendent excellence. And so, this Scherzo in B minor, which at first appears crude and obscure, in process of time comes out as clear as the noon, without a speck or flaw, without, in fact a single blemish of any kind; and we venture to predict, that those, who at first will hardly be persuaded to look into it, terrified by its seeming vagueness and complexity, will, in the end, make it a stock-piece for performance, either at home or abroad. The second Scherzo in D flat, though not a whit less mystical and abstruse, is infinitely less sombre than its predecessor, and is likely to encounter a larger number of admirers, both on a first acquaintance and after a longer intimacy. It is in the brilliant style, and for pure effect is equal to any of the most popular pieces of Thalberg, besides being immeasurably superior, in a musical point of view. The third Scherzo, in C sharp minor, is the most recherché of the three, and altogether one of the most extraordinary of the works of Chopin. For wild and unearthly grandeur, it may vie with the best movements of the same kind that have proceeded from the pen of Beethoven, and though extravagantly rhapsodical in its outline, and almost catachrestical in the strangeness and rude texture of its motives, it lacks none of the essentials of classical and fine music, being symmetrical in its wandering, appropriate in its oddity, (for it will be admitted that a grotesque subject must require grotesque handling—and here both subject and handling are grotesque,) continuous in its mysticism.

(Conclusion next week.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

SHELL AND KERNEL.

[From the German of GRUEN.]

A tavern, small and slight of build,
A withered wreath for sign!
Within, a matchless cellar, filled
With cool and golden wine!

A window full of broken pots—
With blooming roses crowned!
Within, grave pates, with happy thoughts,
The table sitting round!

A little church, half gone to dust,
The gate-way choked and low;
Within, devotion, hope and trust,
And music's heavenly flow!

A coachman blind, with horses lame,
And, dragging through the sand,
A rickety coach, and in the same
The fairest maid in the land!

A naked, hoary, rocky vale,—
Within, fresh fountains leaping!
Old ruins, desolate and pale,—
Within, green ivy creeping!

Ay, look at me, the traveller, here,
With wind and sunshine tanned,
My cap and coat this many a year
All gray with dust and sand!

Yet in my breast spring-breezes blow,
And wake life's morning-hours,
With blue of heaven, fresh green, and glow
Of music and of flowers!

Kernel and shell are two things, then—
This truth has travel taught!
Crack nuts or travel, gentlemen,
If you believe it not!

O. T. B.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From the Country.

NATICK, Nov. 15, 1856.

It snows. The weather is growing breezy and freezy, and making poor mortals wheezy and sneezy. Mr. Frost has been hard at work o' nights, and with the aid of Eurus, Notusque, and him whom one of my neighbors calls "Old Borax," has ruined the Great Painter's picture, of which I wrote you in my last. I did not think then that I should keep the world so long waiting for farther news from this metropolis. The delay may be attributed to pressure of business, or to preoccupation with the affairs of the nation, or to an alarming state of health, or to a failure on the part of the post-office; in short, to any cause but indolence and forgetfulness of duty.

Doubtless it will be gratifying to the public to learn that on the 15th ultimo, the morning after I sent you my letter, the labor upon our common began, and now all is reduced to its primitive flatness; the hillocks and mounds have been laid low, and all the rough places are smooth. Our bosoms are filled with hope that this event is but a precursor of all those improvements mentioned in my catalogue, and if so we shall never rest until the school-house has a bell, and the church has its stone and chain fence finished.

We have had exciting times. Politics have raged rampantly. Speeches have been made, and truths uttered, and arguments enforced; but alack! truth is now, as eighteen hundred years ago to the Jews, a stumbling block, and to our "Greeks" foolishness. But still we have had glorious moments. One evening a Demosthenes from Lowell addressed the "Greeks" in the school house—a realization of Raphael's cartoon, "The school at Athens"; and as by that time the new band had achieved a tune, sonorous metal blew us martial sounds. It was a great occasion!

This tune was one of the most neutral tunes I have heard. It was at all times ready—semper paratus—and spake in encouraging strains to every party in succession. It must not be inferred that our men of brass have not added to their list of pieces—that their repertory consists of but one tune all told; by no means; they practice like heroes, and what with their public performances and private rehearsals, I have grown anxious lest the sad fate overtake them of the man immortalized by Hood, who blew his face to a point! Upon consideration, however, I think Hood's man must have been a performer upon some reed instrument, and that the blowers of brass are rather bound to blow themselves away body and breeches, until nothing is left of our brass band but a row of heads with spherical cheeks, like so many cherubim from old tombstones, barring the wings. If this event occurs, I will send you word. Will not brass bands take this subject into serious consideration?

One of my neighbors informed me the other day that Natick is getting to be one of the most "popular" towns about. I thought of this election day, when more than eight hundred votes were cast, where I can remember thirty-five or forty at the most as the usual number. This is indicated too by the constant use of our school-house hall o' nights; one night a fair to assist a feeble religious society; another night a fair for the Methodist organ purchase; then a political meeting; then a lecture for some benevolent object; next a series of lectures on "Biology," with special reference to the ology of the pocket; and so might the list be quite indefinitely extended. Then again there are our weekly police reports, in which the names of my old schoolmates figure as justices and counsel. I went in to hear a trial the other day, and it seemed for all the world but another of the moot courts our old debating club used to hold, as I looked upon Justice Morse and the lawyers, until the anxious faces of the culprits showed me that it was not boys' play. Then I felt, "I am growing old, John," alas and alack-a-day! and that the children already sit in the seats of their fathers. Speaking of children, the little ones, whose name is legion, are a constant marvel to me. I know that in the order of nature, children, like offences, must needs come, and that there is no woe denounced against those by whom they come. But when they go trooping by in squads, and I inquire: "The fathers, where are they?" and learn that they for their pa and ma-ternity go back only to the boys and girls of my school days, here comes in the wonder. You remember the pious epitaph upon the infant:

"She sprang up as a hoppergrass,
And was cut down as a sparrowgrass!"

The multitude of little folks seems to me to have sprung up like the "hoppergrasses." Heaven forefend that they be cut down like the sparrowgrasses!

You know what exquisite weather we had on Wednesday. I used up the afternoon in a walk. We have beautiful walks here, if they are not yet known extensively. Our ponds and hills, if destitute of grandeur and sublimity, have as much quiet and rural beauty as you will often find. My walk was to the hill country. In the eastern part of the town we have four beautiful, smooth, rounded hills, in a perfect line from North to South—Pegan, Carver, Broad's, and a fourth, whose name is yet unknown to the historic muse. It was to the summit of Broad's that I made my way, and a delightful hour I had there. To the passenger on the railroad, which follows the depression dividing Broad's from the hill Nameless, the elevation is not at all mark-worthy; and yet when you are there, there is a wide extent of country in view, and a high degree of beauty to reward the ascent. To the northwest the eye overlooks the two or three hundred houses of our village, catching a glimpse of Cochituate Pond beyond, and wanders away over Framingham, until it rests upon the blue mass of Wachusett; and to the North a line of dim and misty points in the horizon, we recognize as the Monadnock and other hills of New Hampshire. Extensive tracts of woodland add a peculiar charm to the entire view to me, and it is a serious cause of regret that I had not strength to visit this spot when, not brown, but brilliant-hued Autumn was here in all her glory.

South-easterly I have the valley of the Charles spreading out, immediately after passing between Pegan and Carver, into a broad and beautiful vale, and giving me an uninterrupted view, away to the high hills of Milton. That part of the South village of our town which is spread out upon Eliot plain is in sight just far enough below and at just the right distance to be picturesque. The river, which is excessively winding, peeps out here and there from the woods along its shores, and from the brown remains of the foliage of deciduous trees rise glorious masses of the dark green pines. Perhaps the view down this vale is a little better when taken from Carver. When I was a child Carver was covered with a noble forest of chesnut, hickory and pine; and I can recall as distinctly as the events of yesterday, the strange and then inexplicable feelings with which, after filling my basket with nuts, I used to stand and gaze upon the villages, the winding river, the beautiful swell of Pegan, the dark woods, the farm houses away in the distance, silent as the abodes of death, and the heights of Milton clad in robes of deep blue, while the autumn winds whispered solemnly to the pines or chatted cheerfully with the other trees, and the sound of the rushing of the water at the milldam came up the hill, swelling or dying away with each change in the intensity of the breeze. Several times, after long periods, even years intervening, I have ascended the dear old hill, and making all due allowance for the influence of early association, I still find the view so beautiful, that I can understand now what I then but felt.

But we will go back to Broad's.

The spirit of speculation is now rife in our town. A has bought this farm, B that; C is laying out house lots here and D there; E stands ready to invest, and F is equally willing to sell, and so it goes. While on the hill I too began to speculate. Not in the same manner though; all the money speculations in which I engage take place when I am on the committee of ways and means, speculating how to settle my board bills. I began to speculate upon a point, which just now is creating great division in our "Natick Society of Antiquaries," which association, counting all the active, honorary and corresponding members, consists of two persons—Austin B. and a certain correspondent of Dwight's Journal of Music, who may as well not be named. Now this question upon which such opposite opinions have been advanced, to the great benefit of archaeological science and the manufacturers of ink, is, as to the route which the apostle Eliot, of blessed memory, that devout servant of God, was wont to take upon his Thursday visits to the Indian plantation, which then occupied the beautiful hills and valley of which I have been writing. You must know that "Ye Indian plantation" at Natick was originally a part of the town of Dedham, and I had always taken it for granted that Mr. Eliot's road hither was by way of that town and through a part of the present town of Dover, by which route he would first reach "ye street on ye south side of ye river Charles, so called by ye famous Captaine John Smithe, in honor of ye most high and mightie Prince Charles." My oppoment, however, at a meeting of our society, suggested that this was wrong, he being of opinion that the way from Roxbury led through what is now Newton, and crossed the river "att ye great fording place," now the Lower Falls, in the town aforesaid. Considering the great importance of the question at issue, I may affirm that its discussion has thus far been carried on with all due decorum, and that no very severe personalities have been uttered—at all events not in comparison with what we have become habituated to in discussing politics. Now, from the summit of Broad's the whole country concerned is before one, and I find, on the most careful examination, that it could make but very little difference in distance which course the reverend preacher adopted, and the other party has as much to favor his position a priori as I. But who ever heard of a member of an antiquarian society admitting such a thing to his opponent? No, sir! though convinced, I shall argue still. My long argument is well under weigh and will occupy half the next volume of the society's proceedings. [I mention this as literary intelligence from Natick.] I will not go into the matter now, as your Journal is not particularly devoted to such discussions, but leave you to read the entire controversy, when printed, or the review of it, which of course will appear in the North American, as you may choose. I assure you it is very clear to my mind that Mr. Eliot came the Dover route, or that he might have done so had he wished, which is sufficient ground for the argument. There may be a spice of vanity in the confession, but fancy sees in some future edition of "The Quarrels of Authors," a large space devoted to a history of the great controversy on Rev. John Eliot's road to Natick plantation!

A. W. T.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sacred Music at Nazareth, Pa.

Nazareth Hall has just completed its hundredth year, and as the celebration of this centenary epoch is signalized by sacred music, some particulars respecting it may not be devoid of interest to you.

The Hall, which now is, and has been for the greater part of the past century, a boarding school, was originally built for the purpose of accommodating Count Zinzendorf, who was expected to remain and occupy it on his second visit to America, an event which never took place. The Hall was subsequently used as a place of worship, and the upper apartments for school purposes. The whole building is now appropriated to the use of the school, and the religious services are performed in a new church of modern construction.

On the present occasion the interior of this edifice was tastefully decorated, and much labor had been bestowed in decking the altar with hemlock wreaths and various floral devices. On the sides of the altar were transparent inscriptions in German, being select and appropriate passages from Scripture. The whole appearance of these decorations, intimating to the observer, as he entered the chapel, that one hundred years had just elapsed, and that a second century was about being entered upon, was interesting and suggestive. This mode of adding the designs of art to the observances of the festival is one of the marked peculiarities of the Moravian cultus, and on every special occasion the boughs of the perennial hemlock, the evergreen laurel, and the trailing mosses are called into requisition to lend their aid to the sacred joys of the festival.

All that is poetical in religion is resorted to, to make the occasion truly festive in its character and an event of spiritual pleasure.

The early matutinal service was opened by the usual choral on trombones, which was then followed by a full orchestral anthem of old classic composition, a species of music of which the Moravians possess a large fund.

The well-known quartet of trombones upon nearly all occasions ushers in the solemnities of the festival, and as the old German choral, with its perfect harmony and divested of all superficial attire, falls upon the ear through those long-drawn wind notes, a feeling of pleasant and solemn composure invests the soul.

The services of the first day's celebration of this centenary, including the evening performances, were all blended with orchestral and choral song. In this last description of music the old German choral is that which is still chiefly in vogue amongst us. The tunes in use at various periods among the Moravians number more than five hundred, although those most generally sung do not exceed one hundred. These chorals having their origin during and before Luther's time, have been handed down, with various improvements in the arrangement of voices, to the present generation. Many of the chorals are of Moravian origin, having been composed by eminent organists of an earlier day, among whom were Jaeschke, Cröger, and others.

The choral in the opening of Mendelssohn's Paulus is also found in the depository of Moravian hymns, and is frequently sung in church services.

Respecting the pure tendency of this species of sacred music, there never appears to have been any difference of opinion. The Moravian choral, as sung by a whole congregation, with a good intermixture of bass and tenor voices, is altogether inimitable; and although it would seem necessary that the mind should be educated and led upwards into this kind of harmony, it is certain that when once there it will never depart from it. The merit of this sacred music is found in its undying nature; those who have been educated in it never forsake it, and the melody heard in youth grows sweeter in old age.

The organ is nearly always used in accompaniment, but there is a solemn beauty in the four-voice choral, without the organ, that almost gives it the preference. In all the open air performance, this effect in pure vocal harmony is sensibly observed.

In the memory of all the older Moravians, the trombone is an endeared instrument. Its harmonious tones, sent forth in the quiet evening from the belfry, tells you invariably of the departure of some earthly spirit, and the well-known chorals that are chosen for this occasion, become the recorded poetry of the heart.

The jubilee was extended to a second day, and closed in the usual manner of the higher Moravian festivals, with the Love Feast and Sacrament.

As regards the former ceremonial, I have to observe that it received its origin from the Agape of the early Christian church, and has been held in strict observance since the days of Count Zinzendorf. As to its import and the feeling this simple rite inspires, little can be said in the way of description. As an old institution of a people and a church, it stands far above criticism. The love feast is always rendered a joyous occasion by the usual good old classic music, performed in full chorus, with orchestral accompaniment, and by the singing of the time-honored choral. Without this adjunct, indeed, it (as well as all other festive solemnities) would seem uninspiring and cold, and though poetry and music are not religion, yet they prove in many instances the avenues to spirituality and the guide to heavenly hope.

The century just past has been the first of the existence of Nazareth Hall, although the Moravian history itself has already progressed far into the second century. The primitive institutions of its people are still in some measure retained, although, being of exclusively German origin, they are beginning to give way to and blend with American feeling and modes of thought.

The poetical ground work of such a cultus as that of the Moravians originates altogether among a different people from our own; and although it has been for more than a century transplanted and nurtured among us, the age we live in, with its false pretences, is making inroads upon its genuineness and threatens to destroy it.

To preserve intact the religious rituals of a regularly organized Christian life, such as the Moravian communities have exhibited, the smaller rural villages and towns are the most appropriate places. Here, where a moderate share of musical talent can easily be found, cultivated and preserved, and where the rites of a refined culture can be enjoyed without running into conflict with conventionality and the false glitter of society, a picture of the Zinzendorffian mode of life and worship is only really found.

Here every sacred occasion, every memorial day, is sanctified and enlivened by the choral and the anthem; the former being the music of the Bach and the old Moravian composition; the latter, in addition to many original pieces, consisting of selections from Haydn's "Creation," Handel's "Messiah," and sometimes Mozart and Beethoven.

When Christmas comes round with its evergreen decorations amid the snows, the sacred eve with its emblems, its rejoicings, its love feast and its dramatic and poetical portrayings of an event which renders the close of the year precious to the Christian world, you may hear from me again on the subject of a Nazareth and Bethlehem Christmas.

Yours, J. H.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 22, 1856.

Italian Opera—"The North Star."

We conclude our hasty sketch of this comic opera of Meyerbeer, having already despatched the best part of the music with the first act.

The second act is purely military—the parade and pleasures of the camp, the Russian camp. There is rebellion ripening here against the Czar, our old friend Peter, the irritable, drinking, and yet it would seem not good-for-nothing lover, here present in disguise, ready to declare himself in the right moment, shame the rebels back to loyalty, and lead on to victory. His Catharine, unbeknown to him, as he to her, is here also in the disguise of a simple soldier, the recruit in her brother George's place. But the history is a mere contrivance whereby to string together a series of military tableaux, full of pretty puppet-show effects on a large scale, with music corresponding. The curtain rises on a scene of tents and soldiers, some in line, some carelessly grouped, some dancing, while the orchestra plays a succession of quaint dance measures. Corporal Gritzenko, more of a dandy than ever, figures with grotesque importance in the foreground, drilling the young recruits, a pretty squad of young girl soldiers. Indeed half the army are women in warlike habiliments, which lends a French piquancy to the scene. A song in honor of the cavalry, a lusty bugle strain, is sung with painful fidelity by that knight of the rueful countenance, the tenor ARNOLDI, in the character of commander of the Cossacks. The corporal's pride is touched, and he must sing a glorification of the infantry, drilling the young recruits while the orchestra preludes. The song is accompanied by all the chorus bands with regularly recurring t-r-r-r-rums in imitation of the drum-roll, two jauntily dressed vivandieres leading off at the head of either regiment (Mme. SIEDENBURG and Miss PYNE.) It is a very ingenious piece of musical and puppet-show effect, sparkling and droll enough, and just the thing to take with an audience who want only to be amused. The next music is full of muttered thunder, as of coming storm, a chorus of conspirators; death to the tyrant Czar! &c.

The troops defile before their general and leave the stage, when a tent is set up, which enter Peter as simple captain, with Danilowitz, his faithful follower, as his lieutenant and boon companion. They are in for a jolly carouse. Catharine the while has been stationed sentinel outside the tent. Our two heroes drink and chant a bacchanalian stave, which has a certain charm of wildness, what with the instrumentation. The duo becomes a trio as the young sentinel's curiosity expresses itself about what is passing within. She peeps through the folds of the tent, and judge of her surprise when she sees her Peter, her old carpenter friend and lover, in epaulettes, and with him the pastry cook! Of course some fine bursts of roulades and cadenzas here for Mme. LAGRANGE. The two challenge each other still to drink; alas! the old sin of her Peter—she marks it too well. The two pretty vivandieres, who have caught Peter's eye, are marched in to grace their carouse. This introduces an elaborate Quintet and Sextuor, which includes first a Chant Bacchique by Peter, then some very piquant couplets by the vivandieres, about soldier life, in which voices and instruments keep up a prolonged imitation of the rattling of dice and other soldier-like accomplishments, the two men joining in the laugh. Both parts of this duet run high and are full of florid execution, to which the ladies were equal, save that the Siedenburg lacked power of voice. Poor Catharine must peep again. She has been revelling in melodious raptures over the presence and glory of her lover; but now what does she see? the faithless knight caressing those vivandieres! A change comes o'er the spirit of her dream and o'er—the orchestra, and her outraged feelings make out a quintet with the others; Peter and Danilowitz wooing, the vivandieres coquetishly struggling, Catharine alone in earnest, Mme. Lagrange gives great force here to a low declamatory monotone passage, in which every note trembles with rage: Dans ma haine profonde Qu'ici je les confonde! and then to the freer outburst of lightning-like soprano in Que le ciel seconde, while the charmant badinage of the others goes on. Corporal Gritzenko comes round to relieve guard, and detects our sentinel peeping; a quarrel follows and a smart slap on the corporal's face; the culprit is dragged before Captain Peter; but his brain is clouded with the fumes of wine; he recognizes nothing, will not be importuned, and commands that the offender be shot. In vain the pretty recruit calls upon her Peter; in vain the music of that sentimental air of her's (referred to several times before); she is hurried off and supposed shot. We should mention before this the sextuor occasioned by the entrance into the tent of Ismaeloff, the Cossack chief, with a letter of grave import, apparently, to which Peter is insensible. This sextuor is chiefly remarkable for the difficult unison passages of the three sopranos, in broken chords, continually modulated, and ranging to the upper C.

Peter recovers his senses and recalls the fatal order just too late. The rest of the music is all military. To the sound of the "Sacred March," (a common-place, noisy affair enough) the conspirator generals and armies take the oath to kill the Czar. He overhears all, warned by a letter found upon Catharine, who is supposed to have escaped the fusilade and plunged into the river and been drowned. (There is no lack of devices to make the story hang together.) Peter reveals himself, brings them all to their knees, and turns their arms against the foes, whose distant march is heard approaching to help them against him. Here we have a large, bewildering combination of all sorts of bands, from all sorts of regiments, playing all sorts of marches, fanfaras, pas redoublés, &c., the effect of all which is a showy, but decidedly heavy finale, more "stunning" than it is edifying.

Act III. is eked out with a transparent poverty of musical material. For the most part the old ideas rehearsed. After a symphony of some length, not very interesting, the curtain rises on a rich apartment in the palace of the Czar. Peter, in all his power and splendor, still pines for Catherine. The sentimental monarch has even sought relief in practising in an amateur way his old labors of the saw and plane. He commences with an audante strain of melancholy reminiscence, which gives AMODIO an opportunity, almost his only one in this opera, to do himself some justice. There is a buffo trio, where Gritzenko enters, trembling before majesty, claiming promotion for the—slap he got on duty in the tent scene; le soufflet, honorable, remarquable, favorable, inpayable! This is somewhat funny, but not so funny as it is long. Now enter the bridal couple, Prascovia and George, who sing naïvely enough of their long foot journey from Finland, made so light by love and happy union. The corporal recognizing the real recruit, frightens them with announcing that he must be shot, which makes another grotesque duo between Mme. MARETZK and Herr QUINT (called QUINTO).

We pass on to the entrance of Catharine, who has lost her senses. Of course one of those interesting mad scenes, a la Lucia, Sonnambula, Elvira, &c., &c., in which the music is full of reminiscences out of the first act. The Czar has contrived an outward machinery to meet her mind's spontaneous workings. He has even built a miniature Finland village, as in the first act, with the house and the chapel, and the carpenters at work, and so on, and has had her old associates imported into Russia for the purpose, all which is disclosed at the withdrawing of a curtain at the back of the stage. You hear the tenor coryphæus again lead off the opening chorus, and you hear the pastry cook's song, and the wedding chorus, her consciousness the while returning and expressing itself in florid and varied bits of fragmentary song, much of it with harp accompaniment. Allusions to the camp scene come back too in the music. And finally a florid prelude on a flute sounds from within; the old air which George and Peter played; she echoes it, two flutes come in, to which she sings the brilliant and arduous bravura piece, made so familiar by JENNY LIND, as a piece from the "Camp of Silesia." How exquisitely this was done by Mme. Lagrange, how her voice revelled in those flute-like passages, and what rich tenderness its middle tones had where contrasted with the flute, we will not undertake to describe. It ends with recognition and Peter making her his Empress,—the orchestra for finale repeating the opening military passage of the overture. We should mention also a cantabile tenor aria by Danilowitz, with pleasingly novel accompaniment of harp and flutes running through octaves in thirds,—a piece of which we find nothing in the piano score, and which, but for the quaint accompaniment, we should say was certainly an Italian interpolation,—but in which BRIGNOLI showed the sweetness of his voice and cultivated style to much advantage.

Such is the substance of L'Etoile du Nord. As a work of curious invention and contrivance in the art of imitative phrasing, in the first place, and still more in the art of brilliant and unique orchestral framing, it offers much to the critic who is mainly curious in such things. But as a lyrical drama, as a product of creative imagination, it does not appeal very strongly. The plot is absurd; its comedy, what there is of it, painfully labored. We can scarcely call it a comic opera, for there is no genuine spontaneous humor in the music. In point of humor and of spontaneity of any kind compare it for a moment with the operas of Mozart or the immortal "Barber" of Rossini! There is the natural play of genius, here the hard effort by will and skilful calculation to contrive things that shall seem funny. Plainly it is the comedy of a very sober man; it did not come out of a humorous nature. If it is not intended to be taken seriously, it is a very serious attempt to be playful. It is neither comedy nor tragedy, but rather melodrama, to which Robert Schumann might, were he here, apply the term "puppet-show music" with at least as much reason as he did to Donizetti's Favorita. What a relief is the naive, gushing melody of a Rossini after all these curious and in detail often captivating contrivances! The absurdity of the plot (by SCRIBE), however, is accounted for by the fact that it was necessary to work up fragments of earlier half-finished operas, "Vielka," the "Camp of Silesia," and what not—savings up of earlier ideas, meteor fragments of demolished planets—into the new "Star."

One proof that it falls below the standard of a true Art creation is the fact that the freshness of the music and the interest of the whole degenerate from act to act. In this respect, too, how it contrasts with the immortal masterpieces! In Don Juan, even supposing for the moment that its plot is equally absurd, how the inner meaning grows and grows, and comes out in the music, newer and richer and grander to the end! With all its wealth of matter, its curious variety of contents, its pretty, quaint conceits, its striking combinations and orchestral settings, the "North Star" betrays a painful lack of the imaginative fusing quality of genius. Nothing develops itself as it were spontaneously, by an inward necessity of nature, out of the rest, but all is there by will and make-shift calculation. It is, as we have said before, the music of effect and not of genius. It is over-ingenious and not inspired. How HEINE could ever characterize the author of such effect music as a man of "conviction," beyond all composers, is more than we can understand. There may be earnest, indefatigable will, without much deep conviction, which implies faith, of any kind. One who is so very earnest about the shows of things, rather betrays his lack of deep conviction of the unseen realities. And such being the case, it is not to be wondered that L'Etoile du Nord, by its very succession of interminable brilliancies, became fatiguing before it was half done, and left one with uninspired and jaded senses at the end. We could not but be reminded at last of an interminable torchlight procession.

The opera closed on Saturday afternoon with a mangled and indifferent performance of Masaniello and some of the "gems" of L'Etoile for the benefit of conductor MARETZKE. The parts of Mme. MARETZKE and of BRIGNOLI were well sustained in the former, and Mlle. LAVIGNE was graceful and expressive in her pantomime as Fenella. But the music of Auber's work seemed very tame and common. By far the best parts are those which have been so long whistled in the streets. Mme. LAGRANGE made amends in her scenes from L'Etoile.

Chamber Music.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S SOIREE, at Chickering's, last Saturday evening, was a very pleasant affair, and we wished there were more people to enjoy it. Here is the programme, quite a choice one:

PART I.

- 1—Trio No. 1, in E flat,.....Beethoven.
- 2—Aria from Le Nozze di Figaro,.....Mozart.

Mrs. J. H. LONG.

- 3—Piano Solos: by.....
{ Bach.
Chopin.
Mendelssohn.

PART II.

- 1—Andante Pastorale, for Clarinet,.....Crusell.
THOMAS RYAN.
- 2—Sonata No. 2, in A,.....Beethoven.
- 3—Serenade, from Tennyson's "Maud,"
J. C. D. Parker.

Mrs. J. H. LONG.

Come into the garden, Maud,
For the black bat, night, has flown,
Come into the garden, Maud,
I am here at the gate alone;
And the woodbine spices are wafted abroad,
And the musk of the roses blown.

There has fallen a splendid tear
From the passion-flower at the gate.
She is coming, my dove, my dear;
She is coming, my life, my fate;
The red rose cries, "She is near, she is near;"
And the white rose weeps, "She is late;"
The larkspur listens, "I hear, I hear;"
And the lily whispers, "I wait."

- 4—Quintette in E flat, for Piano and Stringed Instruments,.....Schumann.

The Trio was interesting as being the first of the numbered and published works of Beethoven.

It is less original in matter and in treatment, more in the vein of Mozart and of Haydn, and the composer's individuality is less pronounced in it, than in the works by which he is now most known. But knowing that great genius chiefly as we find him in the thick of life's hard battle, in his profounder, sadder, and yet gloriously triumphant works, it is pleasant for once to trace back his stream of life to where it sparkled in the sunshine of young, wholesome impulses and faculties, joyously eager for exercise; pleasant to have him where he knew joy, without going through Titanic spiritual trials to find it. A cheerful grace and elegance and melodious flow of strong, full harmony, characterizes the quicker movements, while the Adagio breathes a deep and tender sentiment. It is wonderful for an Opus 1, to say the least, and indicates those rare peculiarities which were developed later. Mr. PARKER played the piano part with great neatness, precision and delicacy. So he did the Sonata (one of the three dedicated to Haydn), save where a little nervous embarrassment caused him to miss a note or two in the first part. His chief want for a player of Beethoven, is the want of fire and energetic accent, and also of steady tempo movement; there was sometimes a little dallying; and the second movement (Largo appassionato) was taken a little too quick, and had not quite that grand and solemn tread, nor quite that nervous staccato in the short notes of the bass, which the character of the piece has seemed to us to require. A little too much tendency also to break the chords, which weakens the impression, and impairs the Beethoven-like decision. There were such great excellencies in Mr. Parker's playing, and the pieces had been so faithfully and intelligently studied, that it is but due to the young artist to confess these deductions.

Of the three smaller piano pieces, that by Bach, one of his innumerable happy little fancies, called, we believe, an Echo, which we never heard before, was to our mind the most satisfactory in the rendering. It was indeed exquisitely neat and clear and finished. Mr. Parker has all the delicacy and fineness for Chopin, but needs to make it more alive, to put more fire into it. The Song without words by Mendelssohn, a rapid movement from the posthumous set, was finely played. The great feature of the concert was that glorious piano Quintet of Schumann, in which he was accompanied by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. The inspiring energy of the Allegro, and the wild, dirge-like character of the slow movement, made their mark as deep as ever. It is a composition which we shall count it loss not to hear once at least in every winter.

The Andante by Crusell was highly relished. We like the rich, vivacious tones of the clarinet, and enjoy Mr. RYAN's playing of it. But in the quintet accompaniment to that song of Mozart: Voi chi sapete, the whole seemed drowned in excess of clarinet sound; the whole accompaniment was heavy, compared with Mozart's light and delicate instrumentation; a mere piano-forte would have been better. Mrs. LONG sang it very pleasingly, but wanted more life. In Mr. Parker's song from "Maud," she was warmly encored, as well as the song itself, which is graceful, and in the setting of the last verse, especially the last two lines, happy; but the principal melody seems to us too light, and not to have seized the spirit of the words.

The Concert as a whole gave generally great pleasure, and we trust that Mr. Parker will not be discouraged by the smallness of his audience from giving more such evenings. He is an artist of a true and earnest spirit, and is constantly improving and deepening in artistic character and power.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The first concert of the eighth season came off in Chickering's rooms on Tuesday evening, before quite a numerous and appreciative audience. The members of the Club were warmly greeted. They consist, as last year, of Messrs. AUGUST FRIES, first violin, CARL MEISEL, second do., GUSTAV KREB and THOMAS RYAN tenors, and WULF FRIES, violoncello. The programme was a very fine one and just long enough, as follows:

PART I.

1. Fifth Quartet in A, (first time).....Mozart
Allegro—Minuetto—Andante—Finale, Allegro
2. Piano Trio, op. 70, No. 2, in E flat,.....Beethoven
Andante and Allegro non troppo—Allegretto—Allegretto non troppo—Finale, Allegro.
Messrs. LEONARD, MEISEL, and W. FRIES.

PART II.

3. Adagio from the Second Concerto for Clarinet,.....Spohr
THOMAS RYAN.
4. Piano Solo: Polonaise, op. 68, in A,.....Chopin
HUGO LEONARD.
5. Third Quartet in D, No. 1, op. 44,.....Mendelssohn
Molto allegro vivace—Minuetto, Allegretto—Andante con moto—Finale, Presto con brio.

The new Mozart Quartet made a delightful impression, played so smoothly as it was, and with such spirit, just blending and individualizing of parts, and nice regard to light and shade. There is a most genial, spontaneous ease in the whole movement of the composition, which makes it seem simple, while it is a masterpiece of science, and comes over us as a breath from a pure, intellectual height of experience, remote from all that can be common-place or vulgar. The variations of the Andante are wonderfully imaginative and singular, especially one in which the whole strain is accompanied throughout by a mystical sort of drum-beat, first on the violoncello and then on the viola, till the second and finally the first violin get possessed by its rhythm.—The Mendelssohn Quintet in D took one back to the early days of the Quintette Club, and was always a prodigious favorite with the habitués of their concerts and rehearsals. It is one of the most characteristic works of Mendelssohn, full of fire, and rich in ideas marvellously well developed. The clarinet Adagio was one of the richest and most enjoyable productions of Spohr that we remember to have listened to. The fresh reed tones relieve in a measure the peculiar monotony of Spohr.

Mr. HUGO LEONARD, the young pianist from the Leipzig Conservatoire, a pale youth, with intellectual countenance, the long hair of "Young Germany," and a look of nervous energy, made his debut to great advantage as a player of Beethoven. He plays with rare distinctness, fire and firmness, tenderly sparing and exhibiting at the same time all the delicate little flowers of feeling and of fancy that lie scattered along the bold, exulting course of the inspired Titan. He has it in his head first, and brings it out with a will and with a sympathy. He seems to carve each musical idea out of his instrument with the sharp and positive, yet delicate outline of a sculptor. There is remarkable breadth and fulness in his touch and execution. Yet we should say his playing is more from the head than from the feeling. There is nerve in his playing, but he seems happily free from nervousness. In that bold, heroic, thoroughly Polish Polonaise, too, the pianist seemed to have chosen the side of Chopin most congenial to him. How he would be in the dreamy, poetic reveries and love yearnings of that master we cannot tell; but we have rarely heard one of the strong and fiery pieces executed more effectively. The execution was admirable, and it tasks execution to the utmost. We trust Mr. Leonhard will give us more of his artistic quality, and that the coming concerts of the Club will prove as satisfactory and enlivening as this good beginning.

New Music.

We have before us a large pile of the recent issues from our various publishing houses, among which are not a few of real permanent value. We have only time to mention some of the more important now, reserving them for fuller notice.

Messrs. G. ANDRE & Co., of Philadelphia, send us three posthumous works of MOZART, now for the first time published. (Mr. G. André is one of the Andrés of Offenbach, Germany, who own the larger portion of the Mozart manuscripts.) The three pieces are:—1. A Litany (Litania di venerabile altaris), for four voices, with organ or piano accompaniment. Orchestral parts may be had. This was composed in 1776. 2. One of his earlier operas, called L'Oca del Cairo (The Goose of Cairo)—of course an opera buffa—in two acts; vocal and piano score. 3. Another early opera, called Lo Sposo Deluso, ossia: La rivalita di tre Donne per un solo Amante (The De-luded Husband, or the rivalry of three ladies for one lover); opera buffa in two acts, vocal score, and also a piano-forte arrangement for four hands. If not among the greatest of the author's works, these cannot but be interesting to every lover of Mozart. We shall give soon a more minute account of them, as well as of other useful publications from André & Co.

From Mr. F. MEYER, Buffalo, N. Y., who is connected with the house of Meyer in Brunswick, Germany, we have a very neat and serviceable piano and vocal score of Don Giovanni, with Italian and German words. The book is in 180 pp. of oblong form, clearly and handsomely engraved, and costs the very moderate sum of $2 50. By his card in another column it will be seen that the same gentleman is agent in America for the sale of the same Brunswick editions of the seven principal operas of Mozart, which we can commend after considerable use of them.

OLIVER DITSON, of our City, issues weekly and daily an incredible variety of music of all forms, styles and qualities, from the most popular clap-trap to the immortal classics and true living works of genius. Among the most important of his recent issues are The Well-tempered Clavichord (Clavecin bien tempéré) of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH, being the celebrated forty-eight Preludes and Fugues in all the major and minor keys;—a work which all true pianists and indeed all musicians, who lay claim to true musicianship, for many years have made the foundation of their studies. One who has mastered the "Well-tempered Clavichord" is equal to almost any difficulties within the legitimate sphere of piano music. Nay even a Liszt and a Thalberg have this culture quietly underlying their own modern, freer seeming and more dazzling peculiarities. They will not all be found merely dry and scientific things for the curious scholar; many of them are exquisite tone-poems, full of the light of fancy, and such as dwell sweetly in the mind through all one's life. No. 1, containing Preludes and Fugues in C and in C minor, are already out. The whole 48 will make two volumes, each $3; complete, $5.—Mr. Ditson has also ready several more numbers of those wonderful Chorales harmonized by BACH, of which we have before spoken.—Also selections from the new oratorio of "Eli," by COSTA, now in rehearsal by the Handel and Haydn Society. Two numbers we already have, viz: a Solo, The Morning Hymn, and Duet, Wherefore is thy soul cast down,—both beautiful and chaste compositions, considerably Mendelssohnian in style.—Mr. Ditson's catalogue is really a curiosity. It fills 204 closely printed pages, and contains thousands upon thousands of pieces of sheet music, besides eight pages full of titles of books, including operas, masses, oratorios, sonatas, symphonies, Songs without Words, treatises on harmony, and instruction books for voice and every kind of instrument in use,—all of his own publishing.

Musical Intelligence.

MANCHESTER, N. H.—The first of the series of Orchestral Concerts came off last evening, and was a complete success, in every particular. The house was filled, half an hour before the performance was announced to commence, and all seemed eager to hear the first chord, which was struck at eight o'clock. Miss DOANE did her part of the programme to the entire satisfaction of all present, and was loudly encored. She seems to be a particular favorite, and why shouldn't she be? She is certainly a very finished singer.

Mr. KREISSMANN proved himself (if it need be proved,) a thorough bred musician, and sang his songs with much expression; the duets with Miss Doane went off finely.

What can we say of the Orchestra? We surely have never heard such a complete and well drilled band in this city before. The Overture to "Don Juan" opened the Concert, and was well played, as far as we are a judge, and it being one Mozart's best, it would be almost folly for us to say it is anything but a great piece. The Polkas and the March were good, and pleased the little ones much.

The Concert overture, No. 1, of Mr. STRATTON's, brought down a storm of applause, and had to be repeated; this was served the same way the first time it was played, (last year,) and seems to lose nothing by repetition; all considered it the best piece of the evening, [what! better than Don Juan!] and no doubt would like to hear it played at every concert. We understand Mr. Stratton's Overtures already number three, and we hope to hear the others during the series. Great credit is due Mr. Stratton for giving us such an interesting concert.—Manchester Mirror, 19th.

PHILADELPHIA.—The City Item has the following notice of the concert given last week by Mr. BENKERT, a young Philadelphian, who has just returned from musical studies in Germany:

Mr Benkert was assisted by Mlle. D'Ormy, the contralto; Mr. Berner, the new tenor; Mr. Preiser, the violoncellist, and a large deputation of the Musical Fund Society's orchestra, which, under the baton of Leopold Meignen, performed with unusual excellence the work assigned them, doing full justice to Mr. Benkert's overture to Richilde and to its part in the Concerto Irlandaise. In Mlle. D'Ormy's voice there are some notes very good and some very indifferent; her style is not of the purest, but in opera her acting is said to atone for all her vocal deficiencies. Mr. Berner sang two German ballads, composed by Mr. Benkert, with much feeling and taste. Mr. Preiser performed a violoncello fantasia from Robert le Diable, arranged by Kummer, the piano-forte accompaniment being played by Mr. Benkert. Mr. P. overcame some startling difficulties and was warmly applauded; we think, however, we have heard him to greater advantage in other solos; the limited size of the audience may have chilled his usual ardor. Mr. Benkert played several times; his manner is very easy, and devoid of all the nauseating affectations of modern pianists. He does not belong to the brilliant school of performers; his attributes are neatness, clearness and delicacy, and had the instrument, upon which he performed, possessed any tone or excellence, these characteristics of his playing would have been heard to much greater advantage; unfortunately the piano was of that muffled description with which nothing can be done, under any circumstances; it must have left its tone on the other side of the Atlantic. He seems to us a performer likely to show to more advantage in private than in public.

It is of Mr. Benkert's compositions that we would rather speak. His concerto, for piano and orchestra, appeared to us to be the best; it is extremely well written for the solo instrument and the accompaniment is full of beautiful harmony and combinations. It may be justly called a classical work, and shows that the young composer has not only studied in a good school, but has profited by his studies. The overture to "Richilde" is solidly and carefully scored, modelled upon Lindpainter, as no one could fail to notice after the "Vampire" overture by that master, which opened the concert. He was the director of Mr. Benkert's studies during the greater part of our young townsman's European residence, and it is but natural that the pupil's style should resemble that of his instructor. The first movement is full of rich harmony, the second abounds in good violin passages and skilful scoring, but there is a want of a strongly marked subject. This want we felt in some other of his compositions. Mr. Benkert's style is exclusively German, and gave great satisfaction to the audience, which was composed mainly of representatives of that nation. He has evidently been a close student of the theory of musical science, in all its branches, and possesses in himself fully as much, if not more, knowledge than is divided among the majority of American "composers."

Foreign.

PARIS—A letter in the Courier & Enquirer, dated Oct 30, describes the hearing at the Italian Opera, of the American cantatrice, Miss JULIANA MAY.

Some weeks since I referred to this young lady as having brought with her from Italy a high reputation, not only as possessing one of the very finest voices (a soprano sfogato) in Europe, but as having profited by her two or three years stay in Italy, to perfect herself in her art. Her début (as it may be termed) at "the Italians" was, therefore, looked to as an event in the musical world, and you will see by the brief report of that remarkable audition, to which I am unfortunately obliged to confine myself, that neither expectation nor the desire to hear the finest music conveyed by the sweetest organ were disappointed.

Among the auditors of this delightful musical treat, were two persons deeply interested in the result, which, if favorable, would raise up a rival Prima Donna, with (from the youth of the fair aspirant) a probability that if she did not positively supersede them, she might divide with them the favors of the dilettanti of Europe. They had, however, this consolatory circumstance to mitigate any such feeling of apprehension, namely:—a rumor that an arbitrary call from her own country, imperious and irresistible as the ukase of a Czar, had arrived to compel her to appear on her native scene. Whatever that fact and whatever their feelings, Miss May presented herself at the Italian Opera last Friday, accompanied by her mother and some Parisian friends, and was received by the popular proprietor of that establishment, Signor Calzadò, and his son, with kindness and respect.

Resolved, it would appear, to place her pretensions in the fullest evidence, Miss May selected for her opening morceau the prayer in Verdi's Opera, the Duo Foscarei—a piece which from its difficulty and variety, and its consequent demand upon all the powers of the singer, whether of voice or of execution, is—where the débutante is meant to be treated with severity,—chosen as the test of capability. I think I need offer no further proof of Miss May's unqualified success in this most trying effort, than that, in the course of her performance, it elicited from the gentleman who presided at the pianoforte, and who was, in fact, no less a personage than the chef d'orchestre, of the Theatre des Italiens, repeated cries of "Brava!" In these M. Calzadò concurred, but Alboni "made no sign," which may fairly be interpreted as a favorable sign for her young rival in perspective.

The next piece, a totally different one in construction and object, "Di piacer mi balza il cor," from Rossini's Gazza Ladra, was given, by Miss May, most beautifully and effectively, thus proving the versatility of the cantatrice. The first, impassioned and almost violent, required all the resources of the performer for its development, and seemed, in truth, the identical proof she sought for, to display the immense compass, flexibility, and power of her voice, and her brilliancy of execution. The second, so well known to all lovers of music, demanding for its presentation, in the spirit of its immortal composer, voice, grace, sweetness, and finished education. I know not how far it would be Miss May's interest to accept an engagement at the Italian Opera of Paris this season,—crowded as is the list of its Prime Donne—for she would have no fewer than six competitors for public favor, including Grisi, Alboni, Frezzolini, and Piccolomini, and Catinari, who from their precedence in point of engagement, would assert the prescriptive right to the principal roles of the repertoire of the Italians.

Advertisements.

BEETHOVEN CONCERT SOCIETY.

From a want of the requisite number of subscribers, it has been found impossible to give the Eight Concerts, as heretofore proposed; but as much disappointment has been expressed at the prospect of no Orchestral Concerts, and as a sufficient number of Season Tickets have been subscribed for at $8, to warrant the giving Four Concerts, the Committee hereby announce that they will give the Four Concerts, on the condition that the present subscribers will be held for the number of sets of Tickets now against their names, at $3 each, with the extra privilege of attending the last rehearsal before each concert, making it equivalent to Eight Concerts.

Any person who may decline to receive the tickets now subscribed for, upon the above terms, will please send word immediately to the Music Store of Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON, that their names may be stricken from the list. New subscriptions received at the same place.

THE FIFTH THOUSAND OF THE GOLDEN WREATH,

IS now ready. The demand for this new volume of Vocal Instruction exceeds that of any Juvenile Book of the kind ever issued. It is adopted wherever known, teachers and scholars being at once convinced of its superior merit as a method of instruction, while its 150 pieces of the most popular music render it not only the best but the cheapest book for Schools. Price only 30 cts. $3 per doz.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

COMPLETE OPERAS,

WITH ITALIAN AND GERMAN WORDS.

MOZART, Don Giovanni,.....	$2.50
— Titus,.....	1.50
— Il Flauto Magico,.....	2.00
— Le Nozze di Figaro,.....	2.75
— L'Enlèvement du Serail,.....	2.00
— Così fan Tutte,.....	2.50
— Idomeneo,.....	2.25
These seven Operas together,.....	12.00

The usual discount to the trade and profession. Imported and for sale by

F. MEYER, Buffalo, N. Y.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

308 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO. Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices. THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbanit, a few copies. Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1858. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1856. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland; all held during the month of September, 1856;—making Six First Premiums in one month!!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the First Prize over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal bass. The one with pedal bass contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $60 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address

MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,

FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,

Gives instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,

Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

To Choral Societies and Choirs.

NOVELLO'S Catalogue, No. 8, contains a list of Music for the use of Choral Societies, Church Choirs, and Singing Classes, printed in separate Vocal and Orchestral Parts. Containing Oratorios, Odes, Cantatas, Festival Hymns and Anthems; Operatic Music, Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets and Choruses; Overtures, Symphonies and Marches; Madrigals and Glee; Music with Latin words; Masses, Motets, &c., &c., sent postage free for one cent.

The Vocal Parts are printed in full music size at the rate of three cents per page.

Novello's Octavo Editions of Oratorios,

Of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., in Vocal Score, with Piano-forte accompaniment. Handel's Messiah, $1 63; Judas Maccabaeus, $1 63; Haydn's Creation, $1 25. All the Oratorios of these great masters have been published in this series at similarly low prices.

NOVELLO'S OCTAVO CHORUSES.

All the Choruses in the octavo editions of the Oratorios may be had distinct in Vocal Score with organ and Pianoforte accompaniment, at 8, 6, 8, or 13 cents each.

NOVELLO'S CHORAL HAND-BOOK.

A collection of music in separate vocal parts. In this work are published the whole of the chorus parts of the following Oratorios:

Handel's "Messiah," price 38 cents each part.

Handel's "Judas Maccabaeus," price 38 cents each part.

Handel's "Samson," price 38 cents each part.

These parts are printed in the octavo size with the Alto and Tenor parts in the Treble Clef.

COLLECTION OF GLEES.

Novello's Glee Hive, Part Song Book, and the Musical Times, and Singing Class Circular. For particulars see Catalogue, No. 5, sent postage free for one cent.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,

TEACHER OF SINGING,

47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sign. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church,)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.

ALBANY, N. Y.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,

RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

J. M. MOZART,

BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

Apr 20

27

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmonium,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,

Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,

Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (12 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 243.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 9.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.
OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 806 Chestnut St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

Alexander Winterberger and the Modern Organ-playing.

[From the 'Neue Zeitschrift für Musik,' Leipzig, July 1, 1856.]

The time when virtuoso-dom could be content to stand upon its own clay feet, lies happily behind us. The satiety and consequent indifference and estrangement of the public will have the good effect of considerably reducing the number of "prestidigitateurs" speculating on applause. Certainly it can do no harm to the more genuine and artistic virtuosity, which finds its real merit in subserving higher aims, to have the ground too long usurped by weeds entirely reclaimed. If America can still feast for some time on these leavings of the European table, it will be a poor justification of the name "New World," in an artistic point of view. The wanderings of our left-behind European virtuosos into the most uncivilized countries, whence there is scarcely an exotic "order" to be brought away—an actual selling out—go to contradict this reproach. With in a short time virtuosity in the new world, also, will have to take that transition step, which we already witness here in the appearance of a more or less respectable, more or less conservative humbug of classicality, which in its awkward dullness is very far from reaching the future ideal of virtuosity. This humbug costs far less exertion in technical matters, and even in mind, since but a moderate musical instinct is required for the interpretation of universally well-known matter; one simply pays due homage to the improved taste of the age, lays claim to serious and sterling achievements, and lends all possible brilliancy of instrumentation to that which formerly would have won a succès d'estime. Classicism has become the fashion: let us not overestimate what is a virtue of necessity and therefore not without stain.

Far be it from us to fail to recognize a relative progress in all this. The public has learned to discriminate between false and genuine virtuosity; nor will it rest satisfied with this first gleam of recognition. "Hypocrisy is the homage which vice pays to virtue;" the public will soon also learn to feel the distinction between rightly professing and intrinsically true virtuosity. Then these desperate grimaces, these affected spasms in the rendering of the most popular and hack-nied of the Beethoven Sonatas, which give a man the air of a snobbish (verphilisterten) Western dervish, will produce nothing but a ludicrous effect. To us it is impossible to have faith in the conversion of the false virtuoso. The true, artistic virtuosity has no need, on the one hand, to abandon the technical problem. That would be unartistically convenient. On the other hand it presupposes a thoroughly reformed artistic culture and development. The difficulties, the exertions it requires are more many-sided, and in view of the new demands none of the old (mechanical) ones are intermitted. But in this terror to uncalled practitioners he that is chosen will hardly find discouragement.

What FRANZ LISZT has effected practically for this reform of virtuosity in the domain of the piano, will scarcely be questioned by competent and impartial judges. No other could have done it; the initiative required genius. The piano has not only assumed, but conquered for itself the sovereign position in the present world of music; it has become the concert instrument, the wrestling ground par excellence of virtuosos; and it was just here that the reform (we choose this expression instead of one more ambiguous) was the most necessary, as being most decisive and establishing the law for other instruments. JOSEPH JOACHIM, who in a certain sense may call himself a pupil of Liszt, might perhaps have achieved alone a similar reform in violin-playing. Liszt himself has not limited himself to the principal achievement—an ordinary human life would not have sufficed for this—he has extended this reform of virtuosity to the instrument most nearly related to the piano, to the Organ, whose importance in these latter times was threatening to fall into undue neglect on account of its supposed stiffness and one-sided dignity. Liszt's recent organ compositions, and the young organ virtuoso, his pupil, thus far the only one who has been raised up for this mission, Herr ALEXANDER WINTERBERGER, are the living evidences of this new act of Liszt. The Erard of the organ seems to have been found at the same time. Our readers have already been informed about that masterpiece in the cathedral at Merseburg, the new organ by Herr LADEGAST. The perfectibility of this instrument in the modern spirit is now clearly proved; the "stiffness" of the organ is broken, and this experience may also react upon the instruments of older construction to modify our views of what may be expected of the organ as such. Every person who was present at either of the concerts got up by Herr Music-Director ENGEL in the Merseburg cathedral, must still remember the astonishing impression. The most experienced connoisseurs could not trust their ears; Herr Winterberger's performances filled the stationary gentry with that strange awe, which a German Concert-master may have felt on first hearing Paganini. In fact the boundary, within which professional jealousy or the envy of colleagues could have stirred, was completely overstepped.

Let us first cast a hasty glance upon the organ virtuosity of the most recent times. We cannot indeed give a complete review of meritorious organists. * * * From the very nature of the instrument we count among the virtuosos on the organ, who have gained notoriety by travels, far fewer tares, as well as far less wheat, compared with other instrumental virtuosos. The late Herr Orgel-Kloss (organ-blockhead?), as well as a pair of Italian vagabonds, to whom we may add perhaps an unconfirmed discovery of M. Fétis in Belgium, represent the chaff of organ-virtuosity. The prominent true virtuosos of the instrument, in our experience, have been at the same time greater or lesser masters of piano-playing. Above all we remember here with real enthusiasm MENDELSSOHN, whose gentle constitution only seldom allowed him to afford this pleasure to his admirers, the less so, since he, once before the instrument, in his artistic self-forgetfulness lost utterly all due regard for his own nerves. His playing had a decidedly modern character, quite as interesting and poetical as that of organists who cannot play the piano, whose style is hard without energy, in short dry and leathern. Next to Mendelssohn, we may name ADOLPH HESSE, in Breslau, one of the most distinguished pianists of the Hummel school, but who succeeds excellently well too in the performance of Chopin's compositions. With him, too, one forgets the "stiffness" of the instrument, and his own works for it have an unquestionably higher value than any juiceless productions of a THIELE, who is so extravagantly glorified by some organists. As important virtuosos on the organ we may further mention from our own personal hearing: Professor HARTMANN in Copenhagen, and TH. KIRCHNER in Winterthur, both composers of talent, and good routine piano-players.

If we had not facts enough in the examples of living artists to establish the assertion, that only a remarkable pianist can achieve anything remarkable upon the organ, and that the modern organist must first mount up on the shoulders of the piano-player to the "Pope of instruments" (as Liszt calls it), we should not shrink from proving it a priori by pointing to the relationship as well as the distinction between the two instruments, enumerating the required technical studies and preliminary exercises. In fact, this relationship is so evident, that we need not enter into details. Parallel epochs in piano and in organ playing present themselves. If Hesse represents the school of Hummel, so has Alexander Winterberger made the first successful advance in introducing the Liszt school into organ playing. What a rich gain this is for the future, cannot be set forth in a word. The historical clique may murmur to the contrary, as they have always done: but it is certainly not the least characteristic feature of the Liszt school, that it has taken up into itself all that did not deserve to go to the bottom, all that does not belong to the past and to oblivion, all that is justified by any organic vitality, and upholds it with the superiority of its own individual stamp. JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH's works, a music of the future as much as any other, will first meet with a worthy execution through the impulse and progress gained by means of the Lisztian epoch, both on the piano and the organ.

Herr Alexander Winterberger had originally educated himself for a piano-player, and completed his studies to that end under Liszt's direction. The results which he attained were brilliant; his virtuosity qualified him for the solution of the most difficult problems both in the classic and romantic masters. As a salon or as a concert-player, he could be sure of an honorable rank. Already at that time he felt a distinct impulse towards the study of the organ; the character of this instrument seemed to harmonize with a certain chord of his musical thought and feeling, which was destined soon to be the ruling chord, when he went to pursue his theoretical studies at Berlin, where he could enjoy Prof. MARX's instruction in the art of composition. After his return from there, he devoted himself with all his energies and with almost exclusive zeal to organ playing, in which he soon did such astonishing things, that his master, Liszt, decidedly advised him to make this his speciality, since, harmonizing with his inward calling, it promised him externally also an important future, by the certainty of distinguishing himself as one of the first in point of rank and time in a sphere which is in a certain manner new. Already, during his pupilage at piano-playing, he made continued pedal studies on a chamber organ constructed by a Prussian officer in Erfurt. The facility which he acquired in pedal playing surpasses the feats of the organists of the old school in quietness and certainty, in energy and fluency, to the same degree that his finger execution is superior to theirs. He represents the Liszt school both with hand and foot. The rapidity and clearness of his trills, his scales, his precision and dexterity in the execution of the most various rhythmical figures on the pedal, are quite as unheard of as the invincible firmness and endurance of his touch upon the manuals. His performance of the wonderful fantasia on the choral from Meyerbeer's Prophète by Franz Liszt, is unquestionably the most extraordinary thing ever done upon the organ. Few pianists would be able to reproduce to us a fragment of this mighty work upon a piano of easy action. With equal perfection Herr Winterberger plays Liszt's transcription of Nicolai's festival overture upon the Choral: Ein feste Burg, as well as two more recent organ compositions of Liszt (still in MS.): a Prelude and Fugue on the name BACH, and an organ piece full of a mystical and searching spirit, based upon the Choral: Aus tiefer Noth. It was this Merseburg organ, which Herr Winterberger after Herr Music-Director Engel has inaugurated by his surprising talent, that first moved Liszt to the composition of a number of church works, of which the series, we trust, is far from closed. Meanwhile Herr Winterberger has acquired a numerous repertoire of older and newer pieces for the organ, which will bring his extraordinary achievements into deserved notoriety. The incomparable genius of his master in the discovery of new combinations of sound, in the choice and mixture of the appropriate colors for the representation of an idea, has paved for the young organ virtuoso the right way to a thorough practical knowledge and command of registration.

Herr Winterberger is intending soon to commence his first artistic tour as organist, and has selected Holland as the first field. Holland is confessedly rich in master-works of the older style of organ-building, and has a good musical reputation, which it is to be expected will not suffer by a hospitable reception of the young artist. He unites in himself everything which stamps the virtuoso a true artist, and makes him qualified to work for his own and his master's honor.

HANS V. BUELOW.

The Works of Chopin.

[Concluded.]

We now come to the TARANTELLA, Op. 43, which, for sparkling animation and deliciously characteristic gaiety, has no competitor among the smaller works of Chopin. * * * This piece is in the key of A flat major,—of itself a new feature—for, till now, we never heard of a Tarantella in other than a minor key. However, Chopin shows us that he can render the major mode as supple and bendable as the minor—as Tarantellish and twist-about-able—as mournfully gay and sparkingly melancholy—the true characteristics of that singular national dance. The time is presto, and the theme, in melody as simple as the first axiom in mathematics, is rendered piquant and Apician by the assistance of the most tasteful, savory, and palate-tickling harmonies conceivable. The course of this simple motto lies through a world of evolving progressions—among the intricacies of which it is conducted on the supple shoulders of a rolling accompaniment of light-footed triplets, which bear away their delicious burden, with all the delight of a lover carrying his mistress to the world's end—anon caressing it, and kissing it tenderly—anon coquetting with it, and leaving it to its own guidance. * * *

The IMPROMPTUS of Chopin, of which there are two, are remarkable for the laissez aller, which should invariably characterize compositions partaking in a great measure of the essence of improvisation. They also present, in an eminent degree, another feature, no less necessary in the structure of such pieces viz.—a continuity of feeling, distinguished from monotony by the skillful manner in which the artist develops his resources. Thus a certain subject is given out, and is diversified, transmogrified, modified, beautified, abstrusified, simplified, &c. &c. ad infinitum—not through the medium of fugal treatment, but simply by the artful management of its progressions, and the varied contrivance of its harmonies. Nothing can be more delicately playful than the first improvisu, in A flat, with its graceful episode in F minor, wherein Chopin, by the happy usage of the ornamental, shows himself a perfect master of this, as of all other modifications of style—and nothing more glowing and impressive than the second—in F sharp major, an unusual key, but rendered wonderfully effective in the hands of Chopin.

Of the RONDOS and lighter effusions of Chopin, in the purely brilliant style, we shall merely state, that they possess all the requisites for effective display, which are the prepossessing charm of the great majority of the writings of Herz and his school, in addition to those more solid qualities that appeal to the understanding, and afford that improvement to the mind, which in such music is ordinarily confined to the fingers. The Rondo, in C minor, Op. 1, (known to us in England as the "Adieu à Varsovie,") is an admirable specimen of the brilliant and solid styles, most felicitously combined, and, in the hands of a tolerably skillful pianist, can hardly fail of producing a powerful effect; since, in addition to the brilliant flow of its passages, it possesses a most exquisite and ceaseless vein of melody, which pervades the entire composition—directly in the motivo—indirectly (but not the less apparently) in the passages. The Rondo à la Mazurka, in F major, Op. 5 (known in England as "La Polonaise") is remarkable for the most picturesque and striking character—and the "Krakowiak," or Grand Rondeau de Concert, in the same key, Op. 14, is one of those surprising feats of digital agility, which, in the hands of Chopin, are rendered so piquant and enticing, as to induce the most scrutinizing critic to lay aside his cynicism, and listen with unfeigned delight. The Bolero, in A minor, which has been somewhat aptly christened "Souvenir de l'Andalousie," is a delicious specimen of that melee of the sad and cheerful, in which none have so frequently and so happily indulged as the subject of this notice. The motivo is rife with the peculiar feeling of that quaint national dance, and in its treatment the thoughtful composer never once loses sight of the character which is indicated by the first eight bars of his work, continuing it to the close with masterly ingenuity and untiring fancy. How few there are happy enough to possess this enviable power of continuity, those who do possess it best know; and those who do but know, provided they also know the works of Chopin, must admit, without hesitation, his supremacy in this, the highest attribute of the musician.

Among the miscellaneous pieces of Chopin which we have not individualized in detail, not one has afforded us more gratification than the "GRAND FANTASIA," in A flat major, Op. 49, dedicated to the Princess de Sonzoo, one of the last of the published works of Chopin. This is a complete concert piece, and its effect under the hands of a finished pianist, must be transcendent. All the modern difficulties are here in rife abundance—are here exemplified, and consummated to perfection—are here increased and multiplied, as the locusts under the rod of Moses. Thalberg, himself, the licensed concoctor of passages unplayable, may hide his diminished head;—Liszt, his giant rival, may cry peccavi! for one and the other are fairly beaten at their own weapons.

If the intellectual be the highest order of music—if the poetical be an essential in Art—then it must be allowed, by all who know enough of the works of Chopin, that, among modern writers of piano-forte music, he reigns pre-eminently without a rival. The present vitiated hankering after mere mechanical difficulties cannot by any possibility last—it must of necessity wear itself out, for it has nothing substantial enough in its materiel, to preserve it from decay—nothing tough enough in its texture, to be enduring. The popularity, once so widely extended, of Herz—is now only a name—a thing which was, but is not—a mere memory of the past. Thalberg is at present where Herz was of yore—at the head of the "manual dexterity school." * * * But really fine music cannot be imitated—much less equalled by those who attempt to mimic its character. For example, who ever heard of an attempt to imitate the Pastorale, or any one of the symphonies of Beethoven; and who ever dreamed of an imitation of one of them equaling its model in merit? And so it is with the music of Chopin—to endeavor to equal which, by aping its most manifest characteristics, were an utterly profitless experiment. Chopin is a vigorous and original thinker, and to write like Chopin involves the necessity of being endowed with the invention and impulses of Chopin, without which, a mere effigy—a mere plaster-of-Paris imitation of life is the result. In fine, Chopin is a composer of decided and individual genius, and cannot be mimicked by the children of mediocrity. * *

Chopin has the peculiar gift (so rarely granted to musicians) of attracting the attention and exciting the admiration of philosophers and poets, as well as of the votaries of his own art; it would be difficult to name a writer of any note in Paris, who is not an intense worshipper of his genius; indeed, one can hardly turn to a romance of the present day, without finding some allusion to him, or his works. In the fine roman de Province, "Ursule Mirouet," one of the latest works of the celebrated De Balzac, the creator of the Rastignacs, the Gobsecks, the De Marsays, the De Trailles, those types of distinct races, all true, though all ideal; the master of French fiction, whose "Peau de Chagrin," "Père Goriot," "Eugenie Grandet," "Maitre Cornelius," "César Birotteau," and other chefs d'œuvres, have gained for him so lofty a place in modern literature—in "Ursule Mirouet," one of those exquisite pictures of provincial life, which only De Balzac can draw, we find the following highly complimentary allusion to Frederic Chopin:—"Il existe en toute musique, outre la pensée du compositeur, l'âme de l'exécutant, qui par un privilège acquis seulement à cet art, peut donner du sens et de la poésie à des phrases sans grande valeur. Chopin prove aujourd'hui, pour l'ingrat piano, la vérité de ce fait déjà démontré par Paganini pour le violon. CE BEAU GENIE EST MOINS UN MUSICIEN QU'UNE ÂME QUI SE REND SENSIBLE ET QUI SE COMMUNIQUERAIT PAR TOUTE ESPÈCE DE MUSIQUE, MEME PAR DES SIMPLES ACCORDS." * *

Chopin himself is, to our knowledge, the most modest and retiring of beings; though fully conscious of his superiority over the great majority of his contemporaries, by his excessive reserve and marked retiredness of demeanor, he has won the suffrage of all his brother artists, who look up to him as a star for wise men to follow, as an idol for universal worship.

The philosophical and poetical tendency of the writings of Chopin is so manifest, and its consideration, in passing judgment on them critically, so enticing, that we are apt to forget, what, to the multitude, is of infinitely more importance—viz.—their usefulness in the development of the hand, and in the production of that finished execution necessary for the formation of a perfect pianist. First, then, it is an admitted fact, even by such as dispute his supremacy as an intellectual composer, that the works of Chopin effect more for the enhancement of pure finger dexterity—do more towards producing equality of touch—lend more assistance towards the attainment of flexibility of the wrist, if studied with undiminished assiduity—than those of any other master whatsoever. Thus they are eminently serviceable, even to inexperienced performers; while to the finished and well-read pianist, from the startling novelty of their progressions, and the original tournaire of their passages, they present a totally new field for practice—an altogether unexpected channel for the development of powers hitherto latent and unexercised. It is quite certain that any one who possesses sufficient command over the instrument, to enable him to execute the works of Chopin properly, and with the feeling intended by their composer, has it in his power to play whatever else, of whatsoever difficulty, of any other author, that may chance to be placed before him. The compositions of Chopin leave no species of difficulty unprovided for—no peculiar figure of passage unexplored—no cunning twisting of an antique cadence untried—so that in matter of execution their utility is universal, and a careful practice of them is of consummate importance. To show how various is their tendency, and how general their applicability to the purpose of attaining universality of style and infinite diversity of executive power, we will, merely for the convenience of our readers, endeavor to throw them into classes and sections, so that those wedded to peculiar species of music may all know where to find something to their taste, and that something, of the highest order of merit.

CLASS I.—FOR PIANISTS OF THE FIRST FORCE.

- § 1. The Brilliant and Bravura Style. Op.
'Homage to Mozart' (variations on 'La ci darem') 2
First Concerto, E minor, dedicated to Kalkbrenner 11
Fantasie Brillante, sur des airs Nationaux Polonais 13
'Krakowiak,' Grand Rondo de Concert, in F major 14
Second Concerto, in F minor21
'Grande Polonaise Brillante,' in E flat.....22

These have all Orchestral Accompaniments; the remainder of this Section are Solos.
Second Grand Polonaise, in F sharp minor.....44
Allegro de Concert, in A major.....46

- § 2. The Metaphysical and Poetical Style.
First Scherzo, in B minor20
(Known in England as 'Le Banquet Infernal')
Second Scherzo, in D flat.....31
Third Scherzo, in C sharp minor.....39
Grand Sonata, in B flat minor35
Grand Fantasia, in A flat49

These are not a whit less difficult than the preceding Section, but are of a more grave and thoughtful character, addressing themselves principally to the imagination and the intellect.

CLASS II.—FOR PIANISTS OF THE SECOND FORCE. (Still difficult, though much less so than the first class.)

- § 1. In the Bravura Style. Op.
'Adieu à Varsovie,' Rondeau, in C minor.....1
'La Posiana,' Rondeau à la Mazurka, in F major...5
Rondeau Elegant, in E flat, dedicated to Mlle.
Hartmann16

- First Ballade, in G minor.....23
(Known in England as 'La Favorite') Deux Polonaises.....26

- Deux Nocturnes (Fourth Set of Notturmos).....27
(Known in England as 'Les Plaintives')
First Improptu, in A flat29

- First Grand Waltz, in A flat.....34
Second Improptu, in F sharp major.....38
Second Ballade, in F major.....36

- (Known in England as 'La Gracieuse')
Deux Polonaises, dedicated to Jules Fontana.....40
Third Ballade, in A flat47

- Nocturne, in C minor.....48

- § 2. In the Expressive and Legato Style.
Trois Nocturnes (First and Second Set of Notturmos) 9
(Known in England as 'Les Murmures de la Seine') Trois Nocturnes (Third Set of Notturmos).....15

- (Known in England as 'Les Zephyrs')
Deux Nocturnes (Fifth Set of Notturmos).....32 (Known in England as 'Il Lamento,' and 'La Consolazione')
Deux Nocturnes (Sixth Set of Notturmos).....37

- (Known in England as 'Les Soupirs')
These last two Sets of Nocturnes are more difficult than any other items in this section, requiring intense expression, united to great command over the instrument. Their difficulty is not however sufficiently remarkable to admit of our placing them in the 1st Class.

- Prelude, in E major.....45
Nocturne, in F minor.....48

- § 3. In the Characteristic Dramatic Style.
Tarentelle, in A flat.....43

- First Set of Mazurkas.....6
Second ditto.....7

- Third ditto.....17
Fourth ditto.....24
Fifth ditto.....30

- Sixth ditto.....33
Seventh ditto.....41
Eighth ditto.....50

- These are all known in England under the denomination of 'Souvenirs de la Pologne'; the Seventh Set is more abstruse and difficult than the rest, and the Eighth is comparatively easy,

CLASS III.—FOR PIANISTS OF ORDINARY FORCE.

- § 1. In the Brilliant Style.
Introduction and Polonaise, in C major.....3
(Known in England as 'La Gaîté')
Bolero, in A minor.....19

- (Known in England as 'Souvenir d'Andalousie')
Grande Valse, in A flat.....42

- § 2. In the Light and Amusing Style.
'L'Invitation pour la Danse,' (Grande Valse Brillante, in E flat).....18

- Grande Valse, in A minor (No. 2 of 3).....34
Grande Valse, in F major (No. 3 of 3).....34

- The TWENTY-FOUR GRAND PRELUDES, Op. 28, through all the keys, and the TWENTY-FOUR GRAND STUDIES, Ops. 10, 24, 25, form a complete class of themselves, of great utility, nay of absolute importance to pianists of every calibre, as being the most perfect school of execution and expression in existence. They illustrate every conceivable difficulty, and besides embracing all that had been previously (but much less comprehensively) enforced, in the studies of Cramer, Steibelt, Woelfl, Clementi, Moscheles, Hummel, Czerny, Herz, Bertini,—and later—in those of Thalberg, Döhler, Liszt, Hiller, Henselt, Mayer, Kessler, Wolff, Dreyschock, Moscheles, and Sterndale Bennett—they touch upon peculiarities, which have since become embodied in modern piano-forte playing, but were unthought of until the appearance of the studies of Chopin. In short, we think few will be inclined to deny the unequivocal supremacy of the studies of Chopin over all others that have preceded or succeeded them.

Original Manuscript of the "Magic Flute."

HOW IT LOOKS.

[The New York Musical World translates the following description of Mozart's original manuscript of the "Magic Flute" from a very interesting article recently communicated to a Leipzig Music-Journal, by the celebrated Schnyder von Wartensee.]

Before me lies the entire opera of the Magic Flute in Mozart's own handwriting. The paper is square, untrimmed and of so bad a quality that an elegant composer of our day would deem it unworthy of being touched by his pen. The staff-lines are regularly and handsomely ruled by Mozart, comprising, however, but twelve on a page, on which account he was compelled, when many instruments were employed, to put the flutes, clarinets, trombones and drums upon separate bits of paper; as in one instance, where he wrote "detached wind-instruments of the second finale."

Mozart first sketched the opera from beginning to end with evidently astonishing rapidity. All that this comprised, however, was written with very black ink, just sufficient to prevent his forgetting the idea. This sketching is confined to the voice-parts and the text, almost without exception, until toward the close: very rarely is it the case with the orchestration, and then sometimes with one instrument, sometimes with another. The subsequent completion of the score was with pale ink; so pale, that many instrumental parts in the overture are now nearly illegible.

The introduction: "To help, etc." is generally richly spiced with trumpets and drums. But these are entirely crossed out by Mozart, and allowed first to come in where the ladies sing "Die, monster, by our might. Triumph! triumph!"—seven measures only. It is certainly not wise that immediately on the rising of the curtain the ears of listeners should be paralyzed with a devils' din: they are then no longer susceptible to tender passages; and how were a subsequent climax possible, without the help of cannon—at least of gongs? In the entire first act of Don Juan, even during the tremendous excitement at the close of the finale, no trumpets are introduced, Mozart saving these to augment the horror in the grave-yard scene. To be sure, the more accomplished music-directors improve in this respect on wise old Mozart, and very generally—as has happened here in Frankfort—apply trumpets not only to the finale, but to other passages of the first act.

When the hero Tamino flies before the monster, and, fainting, and almost beside himself cries for help, Mozart has written beneath the notes, the words "to the furious lion a sacrifice chosen." The lion is afterward crossed out, and Mozart writes with pale ink over the same notes, "to the treacherous serpent." Now, one must suppose that Mozart and Schikaneder (author of the libretto), had diplomatic conferences, haply, as to the peculiar genre of murderous monster (whether hair-beast or reptile) and that a snake was chosen, because in the "Magic Flute" only tame and well-behaved lions (ditto monkeys) might make their appearance. No—Mozart had evidently made a zoological blunder in writing; for his music at this point paints, with wonderful truth and beauty, the sinuous windings of a serpent—not the cat-leaps of a lion. Another possible supposition I will not overlook, that Schikaneder, with his immense Shakespearean talent, wishing to paint the terror of the flute-y Tamino, which had reached the swooning point, causes him to see a snake for a lion.

In the last movement of the introduction, (C major, allegro,) there is still another important alteration. When, finally, each of the three ladies has determined to hasten to the Princess and announce to her the arrival of the beautiful youth, each takes leave of him: "Youth, handsome and captivating, fond youth, farewell, until we meet again," and here, Mozart, probably as donatio ad pias causas, in order to give the ladies opportunity to exhibit their art of trill, introduces a cadenza. This reminiscence of an earlier opera-habit, in which the yielding composer gave way to the tel est notre plaisir of almost every singer, was cancelled by his better genius before the production of the opera. Thirteen measures are entirely rejected. The passage includes, in addition to the stringed instruments and vocal parts, two hautbois, two bassoons, two horns in C, two clarinets in C, and drums. The instruments which I do not find in the score, the tenor violins for instance, Mozart did not fill out, and everything that I have named is written with black ink; it belongs evidently, therefore, to the first sketch. In the eighth measure there is an evident omission of the syllable le in the word lebe, the slur of the G having no antecedent. After the cadence come the twelve measures which close the piece.

In the duet, Bei Männern welche Liebe fühlen, the whole composition, according to the first sketch, is thrown into an entirely different measure. It began with the down beat, therefore with the first quaver instead of the fourth, as we now know it. In completing the score with pale ink, Mozart crossed out all the former bars to the measures from beginning to end, and drew new ones for the aforesaid fourth quaver, sometimes a few in each part, and sometimes continuing them through the entire score, and carefully adding, as well, whatever the new division required. This change is proof to us of Mozart's fine instinct for accent; for the reason of the change is purely a dynamic one; and we can easily appreciate it by performing the composition first in the old and then in the new way, with marked accentuation.

It is remarkable, that Mozart, who otherwise never forgot anything, omitted, after the first four notes of the ritornel by the stringed instruments, to write the response in the wind instruments. This was caused probably by his zeal in correcting the bars above alluded to.

In the first finale, at the words of Sarastro, "Yet will I not give thee thy freedom," between the double bass and the vocal part, there is a very evil sounding place, which is always disagreeable, and which those who would not willingly ascribe anything of this kind to Mozart, have regarded as a sin of the copyist; but yet have not known exactly how to correct it. This dissonance really stands precisely thus in Mozart's score, and, still more—very plainly. The passage, nevertheless, is very un-Mozart-like, and he may possibly, in the great haste with which the "Magic Flute" had to be produced, have over-hurried himself; for his fine taste and his delicate musical instinct preserved him from such harsh harmonies as we sometimes find in Beethoven, as for instance in his Opus 132. This Titanic tone-ocrat, who often made light even of the physiological possibilities of human voices, thought nothing of such things.

In the great bravour aria of the Queen of the Night, where the D minor vengeance is throbbing in her heart, is a spot, which has often been pointed at as a proof of the unconscionable manner in which our language was sometimes abused by Mozart: it is the following:—

This is often seen in piano scores of the opera. Sometimes persons have wished goodnaturedly to better Mozart's blemish, and say, So bist du, du meine Tochter nimmer mehr. He wrote, however, So bist du nein! meine Tochter nimmer mehr. This correct reading appears in the piano score now in press at André's in Offenbach. Mozart's

"nein!" is of course a patch-word: just as many composers (in order to make the rhythm very piquant) throw in an exclamatory ja!—and, in this case, the sublime metre of Schikaneder does not suffer thereby. Of this great Shakspearean genius, I will here give but another specimen:—In the finale of the second act, two boys put the enquiry, Wo ist sie denn? (Where is she then?) meaning Pamina: whereupon the first boy replies, Sie ist von Sinnen. (She is from her senses.)

Such a reply could never have occurred to any ordinary intellect.

While in Prague in 1832, I made the acquaintance of Capellmeister Trübensee, who has been dead now some years, and who told me that he served in Schikaneder's Theatre in Vienna as second hautbois, and played in the orchestra on the first performance of the Magic Flute, under Mozart's direction. The opera at first did not please. The overture, the introduction, etc., were a palpable failure, and the gentle Mozart, who had depended greatly on the success of the Magic Flute to better his pecuniary condition, grew deadly pale. The duet, Bei Männern welche Liebe fühlen, first met with marked favor, and from that moment the brilliant success of the opera was certain. Trübensee further told me, that one of the two compositions of the duet, which, as is well-known Schikaneder rejected, was written in very grand style and was still in existence; that in the many subsequent performances of the opera it was the custom to alternate with the two compositions; and there stood generally upon the opera poster,—With the old duet, or the new duet. I begged a friend of mine in Vienna to hunt up this grand duet for me, but it was not possible to find it; for Schikaneder's Theatre, with its entire inventory, since that time had passed through many hands. Perhaps Herr Capell-M. Spohr might know something of this; for he told me that he had conducted the Magic Flute at Vienna from the same score as Mozart.

In conclusion, let me record a proof that Mozart possessed no dramatic talent, which during the earlier history of the Magic Flute, appeared in a very prominent literary journal:—

"Mozart, in the duet, Bei Männern, etc. has expressed the loves of Pamina and Papageno by the same Cantilena: this is nonsense; for an accomplished Princess feels very differently from a rude peasant and sings differently. Wherefore—Mozart has no power of delineating character."

One sees that Art-Agriculture began to flourish even in that period.

The Manuscripts of Mozart, which were purchased by Hofrath André, were a short time since distributed among his seven heirs, and Dr. Julius André is now the happy possessor of the Magic Flute. For his kindness in entrusting this treasure to my hands for several weeks, I herewith tender him my heartiest thanks.

Berlioz on Instrumentation.

[From the London Athenæum, Nov. 1.]

A Treatise upon Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration, &c. New Edition, Revised, Corrected, Augmented, &c., by Hector Berlioz (Op. 10). Translated from the French, by Mary Cowden Clarke. (Novello.)—This treatise on instrumentation by M. Berlioz has been again and again pointed to as the great work which was to justify and assure his supremacy among modern composers, which has long been, is still, and, we fancy, will be forever contested. It is here given, in an inexpensive English form and clear type, as the seventh volume of the "Library for the Diffusion of Musical Knowledge,"—in most points neatly translated, with one exception. To print the English meaning to the French text of the examples quoted by M. Berlioz, is superfluous at the time present,—but if rendered, the examples should show less indifference to euphony, elegance, and musical accent than in the case here.

We confess to have turned to this book with more than ordinary expectation, but we have left it with disappointment. A careful perusal satisfies us that, showy as it seems, and not without its share of acute definitions and picturesque suggestions, it is ill-proportioned and remarkable for the difference, not to say inaccuracy, with which certain subjects are treated—more novel and amusing, in short, than profitable. M. Berlioz, it is easy to see, has certain instruments of predilection,—of these, the Harp is one. This will be clear to every one who reads his specification for a great concert orchestra,—in which, among other essentials, four harps are numbered. Now, with the exception of the compositions of M. Berlioz himself, the overture and music to "Athalie" of Mendelssohn, the overture to "Struensee" by M. Meyerbeer, and two of the choruses of Signor Costa's "Eli," we cannot call to mind a single concert composition in which the harp is, save as a solo instrument, wanted. It has no place, we think, in any work by Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart or Weber. If this chapter on the Harp be compared with the chapter on the Organ, the character which we have given will be fully illustrated. In his dashing way, M. Berlioz describes a great organ as including five manuals, besides the keyboard for the feet, or pedal board. Now, it is impossible to avoid perceiving that M. Berlioz can know very little of the instrument for which he thus prescribes beyond the music-lofts of Sainte-Sulpice and Saint-Roch. If there be yet a few of the ferocious, shrieking old French organs in existence, with five ranks of keys, such are only so many curiosities, and they must have been always so many French exceptions to the general rule of the great organs in Holland by Müller and Batti—in Germany by Silbermann and Gabler—in England by Smith and Harris—in Switzerland by Aloys Mooser. We have "travelled" the foreign organs of repute fairly well, and have never yet fallen on a single five-manual monster, such as M. Berlioz in a treatise coolly takes for his type. In another matter connected with the instrument, he is somewhat French and trenchant, we apprehend from insufficient knowledge. This is his wholesale abuse of the organ as forming part of an orchestra of accompaniment. Now this amounts, virtually, to an abuse of Handel's great effects,—since in his grand performances the organ played a grand part; not, it is fair to presume, indiscriminately stuffed into any and every part of every chorus (as has been the fashion of coarse and clumsy modern players), but in some places binding the mass of voices and orchestra together, enriching the harmony, and not seldom, we fancy, entrusted with those independent yet pertinent designs which an organist, with a score before him, was in old times expected to produce from a figured bass. But from the first to the last page of the volume, even when M. Berlioz treats of choral writing, not a single example from Handel, not even his name, will be found. In truth, we suspect the author's acquaintance with that sublime writer to be on the French scale, which amounts to no acquaintance whatsoever. At the Conservatoire, they get through 'Chantons victoire' ('See the conquering hero'), and they have heard of 'Le Messie' (which, indeed, in company with "La Laitière Suisse," figures within a wreath on the ceiling of the Opéra Comique),—but 'Samson,' 'Saul,' 'Acis,' (above all 'Israel') are seldom heard of, and we have reason to think are virtually unknown. It is not from such a measure of experience that the great treatise of instrumentation of the nineteenth century is to be written.

As a further illustration of the partiality in selection and partiality of knowledge shown by M. Berlioz in this treatise, we may refer to his depreciating and insufficient description of the Serpent. This instrument, though accused by him (as here translated) of "frigid and abominable blaring"—probably from his experiences of it as coarsely abused in French churches,—when it is at the mouth of a refined and accomplished player, has a rich, grave, and unctuous tone, giving it a peculiar value when it is employed to bind and to blend together a mass of voices. Compare this superficial and unjust character with the space admirably devoted to the Drum,—illustrated by the publication of many pages of the score of the 'Tuba Mirum' from the writer's 'Requiem,' in order to show how a group of eight drums and ten drummers may be portentously used. For one student who will emulate such a specimen of combination pushed to its utmost limit, a hundred would be glad to hear the average instruments, or attainable groups of instruments, intelligently discoursed on.

Throughout the book, indeed, the individual fancies and feats of M. Berlioz are too largely allowed to supersede facts. His chapter on Vocal Writing is meagre, deficient in depth and knowledge. Indeed, were it otherwise, no temptation could have made him include among his examples the excerpt No. 17 from his 'Cinq Mai' Cantata, with that wondrous and repulsive leap of a ninth on the words "O gloire!" Nor is this the only case in which an eccentricity is pushed into the place of a precedent or a model. In the directions to an orchestral conductor, it is curious to see the minute pains taken by M. Berlioz to show how certain very difficult passages in his own Symphonies are to be handled—difficulties the frequent recurrence of which is utterly improbable, since when conquered there is no effect.—His citations are mainly confined to the works of five authors,—Gluck, Spontini, Weber, Beethoven, and Berlioz. There are three examples by M. Meyerbeer, one by M. Halévy, two from 'Guillaume Tell,' but no reference to Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Dr. Spohr and M. Auber, through each one of these four composers had a manner of instrumentation so marked and distinct as to merit mention, at least, in a book devoted to the subject.

On the whole, no one who writes concerning music is more brilliant in rhapsody than M. Berlioz. No one describes or analyzes what he knows and delights in with better grace; but his brilliancy seems unaccompanied by patience in examination; and he writes concerning the things he knows little, with as much freedom and resolution as he exercises on his own ground. He is good for a monograph; he is bad for an encyclopædia. We desire nothing better than a history of harpers and harps from his hands, or a panegyric of the 'Orgue Alexandre,' or a careful "study" on the operas of Gluck; but we do not consider him complete, calm and self-postponing enough to be of high value as a teacher.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE SOLITARIES.

[From the German of ANASTASIUS GRUEN.]

Stood a gray rock, solitary,
In mid-ocean's billowy moan;
Almost I that rock could envy,
Standing there so firm, alone.

On the gray rock, solitary,
Proud and bold, a tree was seen;
Almost I the tree commended,
Standing there alone, so green.

And a lark went, solitary,
Wheeling round the rock and tree;
Almost I could call her happy,
Singing there alone so free.

Rock and tree and lark! no longer
Envy do ye wake in me!
For a blast, that tree uprooting,
Hurled it to the hungry sea.

Weary sank the lark in ocean,
Ere she reached the sisterhood;
And the waters sapped and swallowed
E'en the rock that proudly stood.

Ah! of you I then bethought me,
Poets of my native land,
Who alone, apart, unloving,
Clutch your wreaths with selfish hand.

To the Northward, Southward, Eastward,
Bent with yearning gaze ye stand,
All, alas! your backs are turning
On your patient mother-land!

Solitary rocks in ocean,
Solitary trees are ye,
Solitary larks that warble
To lone space lone melody.

Haughty rocks, draw near together;
Wandering larks, assemble ye!
Stately trees, your roots and branches
Twine in sweet society!

Be a wall of rocks, my brothers,
Be a dike that proudly braves,
In its massive, close-knit union,
Vulgar passion's restless waves!

Let us be of trees a forest,
Doubly green in unity;
O'er whose interlacing branches
Impotent the storm sweeps by!

Let us be of larks a choir,
Then our music doubly fair
From a hundred throats shall warble,
Soaring up the sunny air!

C. T. B.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, NOV. 24.—The great event of the week has been the first concert of our PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, which took place at the Academy of Music, Saturday evening. The concerts had been previously given at Niblo's, but that building being found too small, the Academy has been engaged for the present season. Long before the hour of commencing, every seat in the house was occupied, and chairs were brought in and hired to those who were fortunate enough to get them, at the rate of a quarter of a dollar apiece. Never has the Academy of Music presented a more splendid sight; the immense audience filled it to the very farthest nook, and the "lamps shone bright on fair women and brave men." THALBERG was there—GOTTSCALK was there—MASON was there—MARETZEK was there—Mlle. ANGRI was there—Mrs. EMMA BOSTWICK was there—the Opera Company was there—while the Orchestra included every resident instrumental musician of note in the city. HENRY C. TIMM, the President of the Philharmonic Society, was distinguished by his red rosette, even while modestly engaged in the background with making crashing noises, at proper intervals, on the cymbals: THEODORE EISFELD is the leader this season in place of CARL BERGMANN, who is now almost lost to sight under the shadow of a mammoth violoncello.

The programme of the Concert embraced:

PART I.

- 1—Grand Symphony in C minor, Beethoven.
- 2—Aria: "Non mi dir," (sung by Mme. Lagrange), Mozart.
- 3—Solo for Violin: from Schubert's "Praise of Tears," (Performed by Wm. Doehler), F. David.
- 4—Piano-forte Solo: a. Arpeggio Study, Chopin.
b. Morceau from Mozart.
c. "La Cavalcade," Goldbeck.
(Performed by Mr. Robert Goldbeck.)

PART II.

- 5—Overture: Medea, Cherubini.
- 6—Rode's Variations, (sung by Mme. Lagrange), Rode.
- 7—Overture: "In the Highlands," Gade.

The Symphony of Beethoven was the piece de resistance of the evening, and its performance elicited merited applause. The immense orchestra exhibited a perfection and care in light and shade, that reflects the greatest credit on the able conductor.

MADAME LAGRANGE volunteered her services in place of Mlle. JOHANNSEN, of the late German opera troupe, who had been engaged, but was indisposed. Lagrange was received with great favor, and her marvellous execution in Rode's Variations excited the liveliest approbation, drawing forth a hearty encore.

Mr. WILLIAM DOEHLER is known in musical circles as an effective member of our operatic orchestras, but as a soloist he cannot take a first rank. He plays with neatness and precision, but does not throw into his performance that sympathetic expression that infuses itself into the performances of a true genius. Mr. GOLDBECK, the pianist, is a very young man, recently arrived from London, and originally from Berlin. He exhibits rare talent, and his delicate, crisp touch reminds the hearer frequently of Gottschalk; he also plays with refined taste, and will in time take a prominent rank among pianists. He was enthusiastically encored.

The Cherubini overture was finely performed, and the concluding piece was wholly ruined by the noise made by those who left, to avoid the final rush, regardless of the inconvenience to which they subjected others.

At the Opera, they are repeating old operas, while Verdi's Traviata is in active rehearsal. The greatest interest is manifested in regard to this opera, which has been tabooed by the London Times, and other English journals. ADELAIDE PHILLIPS appeared as Orsini in Lucrezia Borgia, on Friday night, and was encored in the drinking song. The critics agree in the opinion, that she has greatly improved of late.

THALBERG recommences his concerts on Thursday, assisted by the new contralto, Mlle. ANGRI.

TROYATOR.

BALTIMORE, NOV. 25.—Now for a few "jottings" of what is moving in the musical atmosphere of the "Monumental City." Baltimore is not eminently a musical place; we are indeed much behind the other large cities; still I hazard nothing in saying that I never found more of modest worth and individual merit in any place than in this same Baltimore. What we most lack in the mass is public spirit, and an acknowledgment of the claims of the "divine Art." We need some brave general to marshal our forces, march into the affections of the people, and win their hearts at the point of the baton; then, it may be, a change will come over our fair city, and what the police cannot do, Music will—i. e. preserve order.

The item of the week is the Opera, by the PYNE and HARRISON troupe, at Holliday Street Theatre. They are here with the smallest possible orchestra and chorus. Miss Pyne is as pleasing as ever, and "long may she wave"; some think her passée, but I cannot concur. With the exception of GUILMETTE, the basso, who is really enjoyable, the rest are beneath criticism; for we are "nothing if not critical."

Our Mozart Society, which is more of a success than anything of the sort since the "Philharmonic," for it is now entering upon its second year, has in active rehearsal the 42d Psalm, "As the hart pants," of Mendelssohn, which they will shortly bring out. It is whispered that "Moses in Egypt" will be next attempted. This society is under the able conductorship of Mr. HARMAN. We have many hopes built on the "Mozart."

Our Episcopal choirs are thrown into a state of excitement by the letter from the house of Bishops, wherein they deprecate the prevalence of operatic music in the church, and call upon the clergy to assist in putting down the evil. They are on the qui vive to see how the clergy are going to make the congregations join in singing simple tunes, as advised by the bishops. I hope you and I may live to see congregational singing successfully practised in this country, but we are a long way from that—farther than we are from Germany.

Pease's Hall was last night crowded by an admiring and appreciative audience to listen to Mr. ALLEN's second soirée. Here is the programme:

PART I.

- 1—Overture: Jean de Paris.
- 2—Trio: Don Juan.
- 3—Quintet, Onslow.
- 4—Chorus: St. Paul.

PART II.

- 1—Duo: Der Freischütz.
- 2—Duo: Piano and Violin, Vieuxtemps and Wolf.
- 3—Aria: Don Juan.
- 4—Chorus: Semiramide.

It is hard to particularize where all was so good; but the Quintet by Onslow, and the Aria from Don Juan, deserve more than a passing notice: in the former, Mr. HENRY A. ALLEN played the first violin with great effect. Mr. A. is one of our first musicians, and I am inclined to think no stranger to you. He is deserving of much credit for getting up such delightful soirées. The aria was sung by Mrs. BUCKLER, who has a voice of singular sweetness and much cultivation; her style is unexceptionable, and she may feel flattered that the rule, "No applause," was broken only for her. But I am getting lengthy, which may be excused in my first essay. More anon. Fraternally, TRUMPET.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 29, 1856.

WHAT SHALL BE DONE.—There is food for reflection in the concluding passage of the New York Courier and Enquirer's notice of the first Philharmonic concert, from which we quote under our head of Musical Intelligence.

The assembly, though so very large and fashionable, was very cold and unintelligent. We never saw BEETHOVEN's masterpiece fall so flat before a Philharmonic audience before. The performing members of this Society are now erring as much on one side as in former years they did on the other. They now seem to be attempting to turn the association into a money-making concern. This will end in its ruin as a Philharmonic Society. Its tone will inevitably become low—musically first, and socially afterward—and then it will become no better than a promenade concert, which, however good in its way, is not a Philharmonic concert. There was not one person in twenty of that vast concourse on Saturday evening who understood or enjoyed the music, or who went to the concert for the music's sake.

We fear there is too much truth in this, and that we shall have to take the same truth home to ourselves here in Boston also, inasmuch as the falling off of our once immense and eager audiences for Symphony concerts exposes us to like temptation. Must then a Philharmonic Society be Barnum-ized before it can succeed pecuniarily? If so, we had far better have it understood that classical concerts are for the few, and keep them up to the true standard, lest all real taste for music, in the highest sense of Art, die out for lack of any opportunities for any one to hear it. It is better that only a few hundreds, or ever so small a circle of persons in each large community should learn to appreciate and love the masterworks of genius, than that none at all should. Is not Shakspeare the proud possession of the race? And yet, at any given moment, it is only the few, in any city, who so appreciate and love Shakspeare, that they are drawn to read or witness his creations in preference to inferior works. It is one thing to go to music as a careless, thoughtless evening's amusement (a Musâ), and another thing to love music as music (con Musâ), and embrace it with one's whole soul. It is one thing to play with it, in pretty much the same sense that one would dance to it, not bound to listen, and still less to think about it, and another thing to be in earnest with it. Now the great orchestral music, the Symphonies and other compositions in which the master spirits like Mozart and Beethoven have embodied the best results of their lives, demand an earnest audience. Not necessarily a very knowing, but an earnest audience. They must be listened to at least with respect and with desire to learn and enter into more and more deep acquaintance; and this desire, with decent opportunities, is almost sure to ripen into enthusiasm, till the listening to great music becomes a truly edifying soul's communion,—the answer of what is deepest in us to music which appeals thereto out of the deepest life of genius greater than our own, yet representative for all of us.

The theme is forced upon us by the discouraging result of the effort to procure enough subscribers to warrant the usual series of Orchestral Concerts here in Boston. That only seven hundred tickets for the series, at the fabulously low price of three dollars for eight concerts, should be taken up, among a people who for twenty years have had so many opportunities of hearing the great symphonies, is something which no one three years ago would have supposed possible. Such a suggestion would have seemed an insult to the fair fame of our music-loving city. Alas! we fear we shall have to come to it, and to acknowledge that after all Boston is not so very musical a city. That it contains many truly musical persons, there can be no doubt; but a musical public, in any really high sense of the term musical, is quite another thing, and possibly a thing which does not exist to the extent that has been imagined in any city on this discordant little planet. Musical entertainments are like other entertainments, things of fashion and the moment, things of impulse and caprice, now all the rage, and now put aside in favor of some other idle fancy. Musical progress is not perhaps to be expected of the public; it is found with the few, like good society (by which we do not mean fashionable, but—good). Of such progress there are plenty of evidences in Boston. There is more good music in private houses; more circles drawn together by the love of what is best in music; more purchases of the best compositions, vocal or instrumental; more private quartet parties, and so forth, among our people than there ever were before, or than can be found in many cities.

The advent in the history of music of the modern Grand Orchestra, with its many-voiced eloquence, would seem to indicate the period when Art in its highest utterances should be brought home to men in masses; nor do we yet despair of the arrival of that happy time. But meanwhile it is best that all we do be genuine; that we do not mistake the excitement of fashion for the enthusiasm of sincere response to Art; that we do not make brilliant and crowded audiences and all sorts of external éclat the sine quâ non of concerts, and so lend the name of Art to what is only clap-trap, in order to secure such questionable triumphs. We did, to be sure, a few years since, have reason to suppose that "classical" music (by which we mean nothing formal and traditional, but music of genius, and thereby bound to live) could be made "popular" among us. Recent experience must make us all less sanguine. Let us not lose faith that the best there is in Art, as in all other revelations of the highest, is meant for all mankind, and will eventually reach and inspire all; but let us not be too anxious to make music "popular." There will always be a plenty of popular things—we need not trouble ourselves about that. But good things demand our efforts and our sacrifices. Let us see to it that we do something really good, and popularity will follow—when it will. It is time to be suspicious, when a Philharmonic Society seeks first of all to make its concerts "popular" and fashionable. Then its truest friends speak out in language like that of the Courier & Enquirer.

Some compromises we know must be made, to put ideas into practice. "Mixed programmes" and appeals to secondary motives may be useful in enticing listeners or quasi listeners to music which is above them; and some who go to be amused, may come away with a new and deeper chord in their own natures touched. But it is always important that we preserve somewhere a pure "well of (Music) undefiled"; that we establish en permanence at least one set of concerts which shall always faithfully and truly point the audience upward in the direction of true Art. Such concerts have usually borne the name of "Philharmonic." Here we may call them "Orchestral Concerts," "Beethoven Society Concerts," or what not; their end has always been essentially and should be the same. Shall we not manage to support, even if it be on a more modest scale than we have been used to, one genuine society of this kind? We shall return to the subject again, but we wait first to see the result of the new experiment of offering but four concerts instead of eight, with opportunity to subscribers to attend one rehearsal of each concert. We hope and trust this will succeed. The disinterested labors and risk of those who offer us this opportunity, deserve to be cordially met and crowned with full success. If there are a thousand people who love great orchestral music, as much as they love balls and suppers, they will not resist the "economical fever" to the end of all the rest, and only give in when the music comes.

Four-Part Songs by Robert Franz.

Good additions to the stock of short four-part pieces, suitable for choirs and singing clubs, are among the most desirable of musical publications. We have already had a rich mine opened to us in the four-part songs of Mendelssohn. Those who have had opportunity to know and love the songs for single voice by ROBERT FRANZ, will be glad to find him entering the same field. That his talent for part-writing, (trained in the strictest science and in the spirit of Sebastian Bach,) is almost as remarkable as his rare gift for wedding poetry to song, has been already proved by his Kyrie, his Psalm, and other sacred compositions. He has now issued his op. 24, entitled: "Sechs Lieder für gemischten Chor (Six Songs for mixed Chorus, i. e. composed of male and female voices); Leipzig: F. Whistling." The Neue Zeitschrift has this to say of them:

"These new compositions contain in a high degree the many peculiar excellencies of their author, although the free unfolding of his individuality was hindered by the limitation of means and especially by the nature of this kind of composition. The instrumental accompaniment, in which a great deal of Franz's mastery lies, is wanting here entirely; nor are those finer nuances of individual moods, by which the composer has so often compelled our admiration, so happily practicable in chorus songs. Yet all these wants we do not feel in the songs before us, since they are sufficiently covered by the most brilliant peculiarities. The intelligent choice of poems, not one of which even in small details resisted a polyphonic treatment; the declamation, excellent as ever, and the capital manner in which he hits the mood and character of the whole; the strict independence of the single voices, (the result of a thorough, fondly pursued and richly rewarded study of Bach and Handel, the lyrical style of both of whom is not so far off as it might seem from our's of to-day); the rich harmonic beauties everywhere abounding, without giving cause for frequent complaint of useless dissonances: all these are excellencies seldom found united in compositions of this sort. Especially seldom, when associated, as they are here, with simplicity and nobility of invention, with marked and constant euphony, and easiness of execution.

"The first of the songs (in A minor, 2-4 measure, Andantino,) has for its poetic substratum the people's song: Es ist ein Schnee gefallen, is kept in a simple and heartfelt tone, especially in the third stanza (A major): Nun Lieb' lass dich's erbarmen, dass ich so elend bin, and interests by characteristic peculiarities. We give the highest place to the second: "At parting," by Osterwald, (Con moto, B flat major, common time.) It has a Volkslied character, which is fully justified by the poem, is especially distinguished by the above mentioned independence of the voices, and enchains us by its strong simplicity of conception and single beauties of harmony of a surprising freshness. In the following fine song of Martin Luther's: Die beste Zeit, (B major, 6-8 time, Allegretto,) we could have wished a little less of reflection and modern conception, although the music in itself excites great interest. At the same time we cannot get rid of the thought, that much in it is far-fetched and that the peculiar naivete of the poem has not found its corresponding musical expression.

"On the other hand, Uhland's famous Frühlingsglaube, (Spring faith,) (Allegretto con moto, A flat major, 6-8 measure,) is admirably composed, in regard to feeling, ideas and technical working up. Particularly beautiful in this piece is the passage: O frischer Duft, O neuer Klang, (O fresh fragrance, O new sound,) expressed by the chord f, b^b, f, c, and a^b, a, f, f, which diffuse over it a poetic breath, and have a wonderful effect. Osterwald's "May Song," (Allegretto con grazia, A major, 2-4 time,) breathes the loveliest grace, and is masterly in the carriage of the voices. Geibel's "Morning Stroll," (Con moto, E flat major, 4-4 time,) has an earnest, inspired mood, and is equally distinguished by technical excellencies, especially by the climax so full of poetry in the fourth verse, to the words: Und der Morgenröthe Schein stimmt in lichter Glut mit ein.

"If Franz's compositions needed any recommendation, we would not fail to urge these six songs upon the attention of Sing-akademien and Liedertafeln, and make it a duty with them to procure and study them."

There is a prospect that they will soon be republished here with English words.

Musical Intelligence.

NEW YORK.—Of the first Philharmonic concert on Saturday evening, the Courier & Enquirer says:

The performances were all creditable, and some of them very much so. The most important of them was the famous Symphony in C minor, by Beethoven, which was played in fine style, under the direction of Mr. EISEL, who had given it the benefit of very thorough rehearsal, and had so far resisted the temptation to make concerts of the Saturday afternoon rehearsals as to cause certain passages of it to be repeated again and again, almost bar by bar, instrument by instrument. The consequence was a very accurate performance in all respect. We noticed no point missed nor effect lost. But the performance, though correct, was somewhat deficient in spirit. The forte passages of the superb Andante lacked grandeur and diffusive power; the notes of the brass and wood bands were not given with sustained force, and the unity of effect was consequently broken by a too great prominence of the triplets and groups of four notes, with which the violins here run through the harmony—the accompaniment overpowered the melody. The Scherzo was better, the trio being more cleanly given by the basses than we remember to have heard it before, and the Allegro best. Its grand effects were produced with great breadth and vigor.

Madame DE LA GRANGE appeared to less advantage than usual in the execution of MOZART's exquisite Nom mi dir, which is of a little too severe a style for her; and the remaining solo performances were not particularly noteworthy.

Thalberg's new series takes the form of "Grand" Concerts, although they are held in the same place, Niblo's Saloon. The programme for Thursday evening contained Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, overtures by full orchestra to "Oberon" and "Tell," a couple of Thalberg's fantasias, and vocal selections (chiefly from Rossini) by the newly arrived contralto Mlle. D'ANGRI and by Sig. MORELLI.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The Mozart Society gave their first concert of the season on Tuesday evening of last week, before a large audience, in the City Hall. The first part consisted of selections from the "Messiah," the choruses, "And the Glory," "O, thou that tellest," "Lift up your heads," "Behold the Lamb of God," "All we like sheep," and "Their sound is gone out," which were sung, for the most part, in good time and with good expression. The air, "O thou that tellest," was sung by an alto voice of remarkable depth, possessing much of the pure contralto quality of tone. Miss Fiske's singing of "Come unto him," was a most satisfactory performance, creditable alike to her taste and skill. The air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and "How beautiful are the feet," were wisely allotted to a lady whose musical talent needs only to be appreciated to enable her to stand at the head of our resident singers. On this, her first appearance in public, some natural want of confidence was visible; but every candid listener must have noticed the silvery sweetness of her upper tones, and the mellow, reed-like quality of the lower ones. We hope to hear her again. Mr. Hamilton's bass recitative and air were among the best things of the evening. Romberg's ode, "The Transient and Eternal," with the solo and chorus, "When thou comest," formed the second part of the programme. The different solos, &c., were without exception, very well sustained by Misses Whiting, Wilder and Fiske, and Messrs. Hamilton, Hapgood and Holmes; while Mr. B. D. Allen's masterly piano-playing added much to the performance. Between the parts, songs were sung by Miss Whiting, who is a decided acquisition to the society, and by Miss Fiske. "The Dearest Spot," and a song of Abt's, as sung by the former, were loudly encored, as was also the latter's rendering of Schubert's "Erl-King," which was impassioned and true to its wild, weird beauty. As a whole, the concert was remarkably successful, reflecting much credit upon the society and its esteemed conductor.—Worcester Palladium.

Foreign.

BERLIN.—On Thursday, the 16th ult., Herr Liebig, the indefatigable musikdirector, commenced his soirées for classical orchestral music, at the Singacademie. The first piece was Mendelssohn's magnificent overture to Alhalla, which was followed by a symphony in C major by Haydn. The second part began with Bennett's Naiads' overture, and concluded with Beethoven's symphony in B major.—A comparatively little-known quartet in A major, by Robert Schumann, was executed at the last Quartet-Soirée of Herren Oertling, Rehbaum, Wendt, and Birnbach.—The Count von Redern, who accompanied Prince Friedrich Wilhelm to the coronation at Moscow, has brought back with him a large number of Russian sacred songs, which are said to date from the earliest period of the Christian era. Kriger's Gesangverein are getting up a performance in memory of Robert Schumann. Among other works of this composer, which are not generally known here, will be the Requiem from Manfred, the introduction from the opera of Genoveva, and the "Adventlied."

DRESDEN.—Professor Rietschel is at present employed on a large statue of Carl Maria von Weber, which will be erected near the Theatre.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—A new opera, Das Osterfest, by Dr. Alois Schmitt, has been successfully produced.

HEIDELBERG.—Mme. Clara Schumann is living here with her children in the greatest privacy.

Musical Chat-Chat.

THE HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY are making a very thorough study, under the directorship of CARL ZERRAHN, of Costa's oratorio "Eli." The rehearsals go on in good earnest; the conductor is indefatigable as he is able, and commands the unanimous attention of his great choir. We have never heard so good a balance of the four parts, and all so effective, in the society, as they exhibit in these rehearsals. Of the music, judging from such portions as we have heard, we must confess that it far exceeds our expectations. Some of the choruses are very beautiful, even without the orchestral accompaniments, which we are told are very rich. We feel that the oratorio is destined to make an impression here, as it has done in England. It is really remarkable that so German a work should proceed from an Italian composer. But Mr. Costa has been for years conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts, and of Mendelssohn's and Handel's oratorios, as well as of the Opera, in London, and has always had the reputation of a master in all the technical secrets of composition.

THE MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, finding it a losing business to give Oratorios as they have done, have adopted a new plan. They propose to enlist the aid of all the lovers of great sacred music as "Associate Members." We copy from their circular:

The privileges of an Associate Member are, two admissions to all the Rehearsals and Concerts of the Society, upon payment of five dollars annually.

It is proposed to give six musical entertainments during the season, viz: upon the last Tuesday evenings of December, January, February and March, for associate members only, at Messrs. HALLET, DAVIS & Co.'s Rooms, 409 Washington St.; also a grand concert, with orchestra, upon the anniversary of Mendelssohn's birth, consisting entirely of selections from his works; and another of Haydn's works, comprising the "Mass in D," "Passion," &c., with piano-forte or organ accompaniment.

Here will be an excellent opportunity, at moderate cost, of becoming acquainted with a good deal of good music, and we trust that applications for Associate Membership will flow in freely to the Secretary of the Society, Mr. WM. STUTSON JR., 350 Washington St.

Don't forget the second concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, which takes place next Tuesday evening. Mr. LEONHARD will play again that Trio by Beethoven.

Our friend the "Diarist," Mr. A. W. THAYER, has prepared a very interesting and instructive lecture on the lives and music of the five great composers: Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, which he will be glad to read before Lyceums, Musical Societies, &c. The lecture contains much information that is new, and presents the whole subject in an original and vivid light. Wherever music and these great names are held in respect, there ought to be an audience for such a lecture. Places like Worcester, New Bedford, Salem, Providence, &c., where are so many music-lovers, would do well to secure a chance to hear it.

Advertisements.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's SECOND CONCERT

Will take place on TUESDAY, Dec. 2, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms, assisted by Mr. HUGO LEONHARD, Pianist.

By request the Beethoven Trio in E flat will be repeated;—a Quintette in C minor, by Mozart, and a new composition, by Mr. Ryan, for Violoncello and Piano, etc., will be presented.

Package of Eight Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $5; Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

A TENOR SINGER, who reads music at first sight, and has been engaged for some years in one of the principal churches in New York, wishes a situation in a Boston church. Address "S. W." at this office.

THE FIFTH THOUSAND OF THE GOLDEN WREATH,

It is now ready. The demand for this new volume of Vocal Instruction exceeds that of any Juvenile Book of the kind ever issued. It is adopted wherever known, teachers and scholars being at once convinced of its superior merit as a method of instruction, while its 150 pieces of the most popular music render it not only the best but the cheapest book for Schools. Price only 30 cts. $3 per doz.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

COMPLETE OPERAS,

WITH ITALIAN AND GERMAN WORDS.

MOZART, Don Giovanni,.....	$2.50
— Titus,.....	1.50
— Il Flauto Magico,.....	2.00
— Le Nozze di Figaro,.....	2.75
— L'Enlèvement du Serail,.....	2.00
— Così fan Tutte,.....	2.50
— Idomeneo,.....	2.25
These seven Operas together,.....	12.00

The usual discount to the trade and profession. Imported and for sale by

F. MEYER, Buffalo, N. Y.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO. Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices. THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbault, a few copies. Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

MESSRS. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1856. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1856. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland; all held during the month of September, 1856:—making Six First Premiums in ONE MONTH!!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the First Prize over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal bass. The one with pedal bass contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $80 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address

MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,

FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,

Gives Instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION.

MR. NATHAN B. CLAPP, from the "Conservatorium der Musik," Leipzig, having returned to his native city, is now prepared to receive pupils for instruction in the Art of Piano-playing. Applications may be made at his residence, 24 Hudson St., or at Richardson's Musical Exchange.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

To Choral Societies and Choirs.

NOVELLO'S Catalogue, No. 8, contains a list of Music for the use of Choral Societies, Church Choirs, and Singing Classes, printed in separate Vocal and Orchestral Parts. Containing Oratorios, Odes, Cantatas, Festival Hymns and Anthems; Operatic Music, Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets and Choruses; Overtures, Symphonies and Marches; Madrigals and Glee; Music with Latin words; Masses, Motets, &c., &c., sent postage free for one cent.

The Vocal Parts are printed in full music size at the rate of three cents per page.

Novello's Octavo Editions of Oratorios, Of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., in Vocal Score, with Piano-forte accompaniment. Handel's Messiah, $1 68; Judas Maccabaeus, $1 68; Haydn's Creation, $1 26. All the Oratorios of these great masters have been published in this series at similarly low prices.

NOVELLO'S OCTAVO CHORUSES.

All the Choruses in the octavo editions of the Oratorios may be had distinct in Vocal Score with organ and Piano-forte accompaniment, at 8, 6, 9, or 18 cents each.

NOVELLO'S CHORAL HAND-BOOK.

A collection of music in separate vocal parts. In this work are published the whole of the chorus parts of the following Oratorios:

Handel's "Messiah," price 38 cents each part.

Handel's "Judas Maccabaeus," price 38 cents each part.

Handel's "Samson," price 38 cents each part.

These parts are printed in the octavo size with the Alto and Tenor parts in the Treble Clef.

COLLECTION OF GLEES.

Novello's Glee Hive, Part Song Book, and the Musical Times and Singing Class Circular. For particulars see Catalogue, No. 5, sent postage free for one cent.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,

TEACHER OF SINGING,

47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

It is now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 36 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.

ALBANY, N. Y.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOOMS,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,

Teacher of Singing and Piano-Forte,

RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 244.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 10.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, E. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Mozart's "Twelfth Mass."

Some forty years since Simrock of Bonn published a Mass by MOZART, both in score and for piano-forte, arranged by Zulehner, and numbered VII. In October, 1821, a criticism of the work appeared in the Leipzig Mus. Zeitung, by which it seems that the people had doubted its authenticity, and had said hard things of it, as being a work in which "a church style similar to that of the Requiem had been sought, but not, even in the slightest degree, found." As to the authenticity of the Mass, the writer of the notice says that "he had owned it already some thirty years, and had obtained it at the most truthful source, Salzburg, where Mozart wrote it and had it performed several times." Most of the article, however, is devoted to an explanation of the fact that the piece is not written in church style, by a historical notice of the state of music in the cathedral of his tyrannical, brutish eminence, the then Archbishop of Salzburg, and the influence which the taste of that man (whose treatment of the great musician has "damned him to everlasting fame,") or rather which his want of taste had upon the compositions of that musician. The writer therefore decides that the work is really what it pretends to be—a posthumous Mass by Mozart.

After a due lapse of time the newly found work reached Vienna and came into the hands of SEYFRIED, the great Mozart man of the thirty years succeeding the master's death. He scrupled to accept it as authentic, and wrote a letter, humorous in form, but not in substance, in which he made known his objections as: "First scruple, second scruple," &c., which I give in as small space as possible.

First Scruple, on page third: "Adagio quasi andante." Quasi, he says, is a word never used by Mozart.

Second Scruple, is the heterogeneous manner in which the keys of the different movements follow: G major, C major, F major, C minor, C major. In Mozart's time, says he, it was not the custom to mingle the keys in such manner; most of the movements were in the key selected as the principal one; the first and last were always the same; and nobody had any conception of such a succession as G and F. He concludes, then, that if the various hymns of this Mass be really of Mozart's composition, still they were never put together by him in such a manner.

Third Scruple—that the Et incarnatus est is a solo, with Crucifixus, spoken by the choir sotto voce, "just as in opera buffa one hears zitto, zitto, zitto—taci, taci, taci."

Item, the triplets and thirds, which on certain pages accompany the long-continued four-part chord, "with which now-a-days," says he, "Rossini and consorts overfeed us with most liberal generosity."

On page 47 he finds a "splendid consecutive fifth," and in the Dona "a most charming consecutive octave." He copies the two passages, and wonders what Christian soul can attribute them to Mozart.

He finds other scruples, in the tedious length of the Kyrie, in the "vulgar, silly" Quoniam, Et incarnatus, Benedictus and Dona; also in the false scanning of the words, as Kyrie, giontām, sēc-ūti, vēntūri; also in quite a large number of instances of want of taste and the like in the music.

This letter was printed in the first volume of the Cæcilia, and two or three numbers later Simrock inserts in the same periodical his reply. He states that he had received the work from CARL ZULEHNER (as great an arranger of vocal music as CZERNY of instrumental), and had considered him sufficient authority. Moreover he remembered that in the days of the Elector of Cologne, the fugue: Cum sancto spiritu, had occurred in a Mass by Mozart, sung in the electoral chapel. The hand in which the MS. was written was much like Mozart's, though, says Simrock, it could hardly be his. How it came in possession of Zulehner he did not know, but doubted not Z. would explain it. Simrock supposes the work in question to be one patched up out of things old and new for some abbey or convent in which the composer, while still quite young, happened to be staying. This hypothesis, he thinks, explains many queer things in this Mass, and it must be looked upon as a mere occasional piece, which Mozart never thought of publishing. It is clear that Simrock considers the work as a very weak one, though, publishing it himself, he does not say so directly. "It is well known," says he, "that in those days there were often very good instrumentalists and singers in the abbeys and cloisters, who wished for a solo to sing or play at the Mass, which demand the master according to circumstances might well be disposed to meet; and this may have been the origin of the Benedictus, which Herr von Seyfried declares to have been a minuet theme, without taking into consideration, that in those times roudades were much in vogue, and a bass solo like that in the Benedictus would have passed for very beautiful."

Here the matter seems to have rested. I do not find that Zulehner took any notice of the public request for information, nor do I find the work mentioned directly either by NISSEN or HOLMES.

But now in the winter of 1855-6 appears the first volume of JAHN'S "Life of Mozart," in the Appendix to which he discusses the master's early church compositions, and decides that "the arguments of Seyfried against the authenticity of the work have been overthrown by neither the critic in the Allg. Mus. Zeitung, nor by Simrock."

But why have I spent so much time upon this matter?

Because this "Mass for four voices, No. VII.," of which I have a copy of Simrock's edition, is, note for note, that which in our country is so popular under the title of Mozart's Twelfth Mass!

A. W. T.

Operas in Paris.

[The following article, from the London Athenæum of Oct. 4, probably presents a fair view of the general condition of opera in the various Parisian theatres.]

That the principal musical theatres in Paris are not in their most satisfactory state just now we fancy few French musicians would dispute. For this many reasons could be given: the dearth of composers, the want of executive artists (tenors especially) able to satisfy the highly-wrought expectations of the day, and the abuse of those indirect influences which, after a time, so vitiate opinion that the public loses faith, the weak artist due incentive to strive honorably, and the strong one to hope for justice. Without personally visiting the scene of action, accurate information on any musical subject in Paris seems unattainable. To begin with the Grand Opera—what person at a distance has any chance of knowing "the rights and wrongs" of any matter concerning the new prima donna, Madame Borghi-Mamo? The critic who is understood to write under a nom de guerre in the Moniteur, the official organ of the French government, of which the Grand Opera is now a strict dependency, distinctly stated the other day, in another journal, in which he writes with his own signature, that Mme. Borghi-Mamo would not come out while he was absent from Paris. Her début was actually or accidentally postponed till M——'s return; and of course when she did come, she was stupendously praised as a Phoenix among débutantes at the Opera. The fact would matter little were the Grand Opera not a state machine, or were the Parisian press free; under the circumstances, the interference works towards the maintenance and encouragement of corruption, unblushing in its cynicism, and towards ruin to Art, as a certain consequence. Persons of high nature will not "eat dirt"; persons of a less high nature, who consent to eat dirt, provided it be disguised with a sugared or piquant sauce, by partaking of such dainty dish, are thereby weakened, impregnated with fever, and made incapable of wholesome action. These are harsh constructions and considerations, it may be said, to figure in a mere theatrical report; but they belong to the time, to the present state of Art, and to the significance of "the fourth estate" in Paris. Should any Grimm redivivus be now writing the memoirs of the world of French Fashion, Art, and Diplomacy, for the edification of some far-off friend, they will figure largely in his letters, to come to light among other strange illustrations when this generation shall have raved and fretted itself into its long sleep. To return:—Madame Borghi-Mamo's success in 'Le Prophète' is agreed to be a great success—by the journals. But we question the measure of its greatness from having been present at the lady's fourth performance in 'Le Prophète.' Madame Borghi-Mamo is doubtless in some respects a valuable acquisition. As a voice and as a singer she stands midway betwixt Madame Tedesco and Madame Alboni. Her organ is rich, powerful, and smooth; but she has not the natural power and splendor of the first lady, nor does she as yet command the vocal delicacy and grace of the second, though she sings correctly and has improved, we think, since her first appearance at the Italian Opera in Paris. Madame Borghi-Mamo is as little of an actress as either predecessor:—a performance more essentially lifeless than hers is rarely to be seen. Her face says nothing: her limbs merely execute some of the motions established as traditional by Madame Viardot. This seems to be already felt or found out by her audience:—at all events, the effect made by her on the evening when we heard and saw 'Le Prophète' was confined to that well-known spot in the parterre with which every one versed in Parisian theatricals is familiar. M. Roger was singing with refreshed voice, and acting with all his known intelligence, but with more grandeur and simplicity than formerly. Mlle. Poinot, too, the Bertha, was in her best tune; and by her dramatic energy carried off the honors in the duet in the fourth act. Madame Medori is shortly to appear as heroine in 'Les Vêpres' of Signor Verdi. Of a new opera the only whisper heard is an announcement that Signor Biletta's 'Rose de Florence,' having been shortened, is again about to enter into rehearsal;—and indeed there are now only two French sources from which anything may be expected,—these being MM. Halévy, and Gounod. M. Meyerbeer has left Paris, so that, according to his usual rate of proceeding, if 'L'Africaine' is to be given by him, the opera may hardly be expected before the Carnival of 1858. But it is said that the long-talked-of, reconsidered edition of M. Auber's 'Cheval de Bronze' is preparing for performance; and, further, a version of 'Il Trovatore,' to which Signor Verdi has undertaken to add an overture, a duet, a new finale, and some ballet music.

At the Opéra Comique few, if any, of the novelties which have been lavished there during the past twelvemonth seem new enough to keep the stage; and M. Perrin has had recourse to a solemn revival of 'Zampa,' with Madame Ugalde and M. Barbot as heroine and hero. The music suits neither precisely, nor is the work, in spite of the fire and fancy which it contains, a great work, so much as an opera meant to be grand, but (with small exception) virtually written in the style which is comic—a style of brisk measures, sharply cut rhythms, tunes that suggest dance rather than song, and an instrumentation fatiguing by its uniform glitter. Our remark, it might be urged, applies to M. Auber's 'La Muette,' but then that opera has melody in a quantity and of a quality which Hérold had not reached when he died. The next revival talked of at the Opéra Comique is that of 'Jean de Paris,' for the débuts of Mlle. L'Héritier and M. Stockhausen. This, if well carried through, should prove very interesting. Boieldieu was as much fresher in style and subject than M. Auber, as M. Auber is than Hérold. The first finale to his 'Jean,' beginning with the entry of La Princesse, is a masterpiece of elegant and lively writing,—the 'Troubadour' ballad in the second act is delicious among romances.—Meanwhile, the new opera alternating with 'Zampa' at the Opéra Comique is M. Auber's 'Manon Lescaut,' with Madame Capel as its heroine. That this is a veteran's work every one must feel who hears it; but a thoroughly bred and thoroughly trained old courtier of the ancien régime will seem—nay, will be—y younger than many a "fast" young man of the present day who has neither youth of manner nor youth of mind:—and so it is with this music. If it contain less to enjoy than 'Le Domino' or 'Fra Diavolo' does, there is throughout something to remark, something to learn,—a lucid grace, variety, and ingenuity in the orchestra,—everywhere sly touches of flute, oboe, harp, or viola talking to the purpose,—which does more for the scene than the most profound or preternatural combination ever piled up by the Wagnerites. In the first finale, too, where Manon sings at the tavern to pay for her dinner, M. Auber has broken out, as he might have done thirty years ago, into a laughing, irresistible inspiration. Madame Cabel plays the first two acts of this opera with great archness (up-hill work it must be to play to such an unsentimental looking Des Grieux as she has been here paired with), and she sings the aforesaid laughing song to perfection,—throughout the rest of her part, which has been loaded with vocal audacities for her display, she is more dashing than scrupulous in her execution, and less excellent than some of her predecessors in the florid style. M. Faure, who is the Marquis, the courtly persecutor of the thoughtless grisette, has made progress, and is now one of those excellent bassi at home alike in figurative or in expressive music, able to act and to talk, as well as to sing,—who seem only to be met with at the Opéra Comique of Paris. But the theatre seems deplorably in want of a tenor,—a want which is not new. Or it may be that the classification of voices and the art of singing were less understood in France formerly than they are now,—for we shall find the best elder writers perpetually employing mixed baritone voices with a few notes of high falsetto (of which Herr Pischek is, perhaps, the only modern specimen): hence, since these are not common now-a-days, an inevitable difficulty and loss of effect in reviving many of the old French operas. Whether the Ellevous and Martins themselves sang in a manner which even a Frenchman, as devotedly national as M. Berlioz himself, would in these days accept as singing—may be doubted, without cruel scepticism.

The Théâtre Lyrique is said to be prospering,—thanks to the reign there of the wife of its manager, Madame Miolan-Carvalho, one of the most accomplished vocalists of her class that has ever appeared. People still crowd to 'Fanchonnette' for her sake, and not for the story of the opera, which is absurd, still less for M. Clapisson's music, which is "dry as a remainder biscuit," without any extraordinary cleverness to carry off the dryness. No matter—as the young heiress who has chosen the life and calling of a street-singer, in order that, after the fashion of one of Lady Morgan's heroines, she may watch over the disinherited relation whom she unrequitedly loves, Madame Miolan-Carvalho works marvels with M. Clapisson's poor score. She plays with the difficulties of her long and fatiguing part, by displaying an amount of spirit, brilliancy, accent, and expression for which even those who, like ourselves have always rated her highly, were not prepared. Her voice has gained in power and body, without losing in delicacy or expression,—her acting in intelligence and readiness. She has profited, for a wonder, by removing from the second to the third opera-house in Paris, and now ranks among the most fascinating, as well as the most finished, singers before the public.—It seems generally agreed that M. Maillart's 'Les Dragons de Villars'—which has been at least produced at the Théâtre Lyrique—has little style or invention to recommend it. "The successor of Auber (to quote a contemporary) seems as far as ever from presenting himself." There is a chance, say some who should know, of Mr. Balfe bringing out a new opera here; and, if so, a chance that its libretto may be one of semi-English origin. Should the tale prove true, it will not be the first time that our allies have had assistance from our island in the manufacture of their comic opera. D'Hèle (as the name is spelt in Grétry's Memoirs), who furnished several books to that delicious and intelligent melodist, was a countryman of ours.

Last and not least, we must speak of M. Offenbach's little theatre,—which has just removed from the Elysian Fields to its winter quarters in the Passage Choiseul. Certainly, never had singers such a cage of gold and garlands and velvet curtains to sing before as has been here arranged for the delectation of their audience. A theatre belonging to a Petit Trianon might be fancied, in better taste, but it could hardly be more sumptuous than this. Light, slight, and bright are the wares set by M. Offenbach before the public,—allowance being made for the proportions of his stage, which make his actors look somewhat of the largest. Here every sort of farce—every sort of folly within the limits of decorum—is permissible; bergeries after Watteau—buffoneries, whence or where got Momus knows!—La Fontaine's fables moralized into dramas of speaking, singing life, such, for instance, as 'La Financier et le Savetier,' the most recent of the souffles served up at the Bouffés Parisiens. The dialogue to this, with all its pertinence and impertinence (meant, apparently, to hit as hard in high places as Polichinelle or Pasquin have leave to hit), is by M. Hector Cremieux,—the music by M. Offenbach himself. The relations betwixt the vulgar financier and the light-hearted cobbler, who must sing or he will choke—the "ups and downs" by which the one suddenly becomes poor and the other rich—also, how the cobbler loves and is loved by Aubépine, the financier's daughter—are neatly and merrily set by M. Offenbach, and whimsically said and sung by his three actors. His tiny orchestra claims more serious praise—the manner in which this is used in the overture to set off a pretty phrase, and the perfect pianissimo obtained in execution, could hardly be exceeded as a clever example of legitimate miniature music. Of M. Offenbach's endeavors, by offering prizes, to encourage composers to be simple, gay, and ingenious, the Athenæum has spoken. It may now be added, that the jury impanelled from the first musicians in Paris has expressed itself surprised by the amount of original talent revealed on the occasion,—no less than six candidates having presented themselves,—all of high merit,—and who are now to compete in setting a libretto, with the certainty that the most successful work will be crowned with honor and pay. Let us hope that good will come of this. In Paris, as everywhere else, the cry is for composers, not for opportunities. Whether our age is one in which composers are nourished is doubtful. The combinations of Music are not yet exhausted; but the comparative ease of life and luxury of manners operate as a heavy disadvantage upon those born with a certain fluency of creative power. The energetic fling themselves into an antagonistic ruggedness; the industrious addict themselves to antiquarian puerilities; the sybaritic produce such commonplaces as most readily find a market. But this is too grave talk for the threshold of M. Offenbach's temple of innocent follies.

MUSICAL CRITICISM.—Here is a good specimen of the astuteness of that rather numerous class of critics who are most positive and dictatorial when they are the most ignorant of what they are writing or speaking about:

Several years ago in York, England, the performance of the "Messiah" was advertised to take place with Mozart's instrumentation, at a grand musical festival. When the managers, who came from London, were about to lay out at the first rehearsal the music for the various instruments, they discovered, to their great dismay, that they had left the parts behind, and they were not to be procured in York. As there were no railroads at that time, the good managers were in no little trouble, until at length a clever fellow suggested that they should take Handel's original parts in place of Mozart's, adding that no one in the place would detect the change. The name of Mozart, however, stood in large characters upon the bill. After the concert the Duchess of York approached the conductor in a most cheerful and satisfied manner, and said, "she felt most happy that she had at length heard the 'Messiah' with Mozart's accompaniment, after having heard it so many times with Handel's. The latter was in her opinion stiff and thin, while the work under Mozart's hand had been much improved." The conductor of course felt much pleased, and could scarcely conceal his smiles; but the lady had scarcely left him, when Mr. Tempelwest, a very well known amateur in England, and a man who intensely disliked anything new, advanced impatiently towards him, and greeted him as follows: "Sir, are you not ashamed to mar on this classical ground a masterpiece of Handel in such a manner? Mozart's treatment is a piece of bungling, and everything he may have written cannot atone for it. O, I have listened intently; there is not one bar which the miserable Mozart has left untouched."

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

"And for our tong, that still is so empayred
By travelling linguists,—I can prove it clear
That no tong has the muses' utterance heyred
For verse, and that swete music to the ear
Brook out of Rhyne so naturally as this."—CHAPMAN.

Give me of every language, first my vigorous English,
Stored with imported wealth, rich in its natural mines,
Grand in its rhythmical cadence, simple for household employment—

Worthy the poet's song, fit for the speech of a man.

Not from one metal alone the perfectest mirror is shapen,

Not from one color is built the rainbow's aerial bridge, Instruments blending together yield the divinest of music,

Out of a myriad of flowers, sweetest honey is drawn.

So unto thy close strength is welded and beaten together

Iron dug from the North, ductile gold from the South;
So unto thy broad stream the ice-torrents born in the mountains

Rush, and the rivers pour brimming with sun from the plains.

Thou hast the sharp clean edge and the downright blow of the Saxon,

Thou the majestic march and the stately pomp of the Latin,

Thou the euphonious swell, the rhythmical roll of the Greek;

Thine is the elegant suavity caught from the sonorous
Italian,

Thine the chivalric obeisance, the courteous grace of the Norman—

Thine the Teutonic German's inborn guttural strength.

Raftered by firm-laid consonants, windowed by opening vowels,

Thou securely art built, free to the sun and the air.
Over thy feudal battlements trail the wild tendrils of fancy,

Where in the early morn warbled our earliest birds;
Science looks out from thy watch-tower, love whispers in at thy lattice,

While o'er thy bastions wit flashes its glittering sword.

Not by corruption rotted, nor slowly by ages degraded,
Have the sharp consonants gone crumbling away from our words;

Virgin and clean is their edge, like granite blocks
chiselled by Egypt,

Just as when Shakespeare and Milton laid them in glorious verse.

Fitted for every use, like a great majestic river, Blending thy various streams, stately thou flowest along,

Bearing the white-winged ship of poesy over thy bosom,
Laden with spices that come out of the tropical isles, Fancy's pleasuring yacht with its bright and fluttering pennons,

Logic's frigates of war, and the toil-worn barges of trade.

How art thou freely obedient unto the poet or speaker,
When, in a happy hour, thought into speech he translates;

Caught on the word's sharp angles flash the bright hues of his fancy—

Grandly the thought rides the words, as a good horseman his steed.

Now clear, pure, hard, bright, and one by one, like to hailstones,

Short words fall from his lips fast as the first of a shower—

Now in a twofold column, Spondee, Iamb, and Tro-chee,

Unbroke, firm set, advance, retreat, trampling along—
Now with a sprightlier springiness, bounding in triplicate syllables,

Dance the elastic Dactyls in musical cadences on,
Now their voluminous coil, intertangling like huge anacondas,

Roll overwhelmingly onward the sesquipedalian words.

Flexile and free in thy gait, and simple in all thy construction,

Yielding to every turn, thou bearest thy rider along;
Now like our hackney or draught-horse serving our commonest uses,

Now bearing grandly the Poet Pegasus-like to the sky.
Thou art not prisoned in fixed rules, thou art no slave to a grammar,

Thou art an eagle uncaged, scorning the perch and the chain.

Hadst thou been fettered and formalized, thou hadst been tamer and weaker:

How could the poor slave walk with thy grand freedom of gait?

Let then grammarians rail, and let foreigners sigh for thy sign-posts,

Wandering lost in thy maze, thy wilds of magnificent growth,

Call thee incongruous, wild, of rule and of reason defiant:

I, in thy wildness, a grand freedom of character find.
So, with irregular outline, tower up the sky-piercing mountains,

Rearing o'er yawning chasms lofty precipitous steeps, Spreading o'er ledges unclimbable, meadows and slopes of green smoothness,

Bearing the flowers in their clefts, losing their peaks in the clouds.

Therefore it is that I praise thee, and never can cease from rejoicing,

Thinking that good stout English is mine and my ancestors' tongue.

Give me its varying music, the flow of its free modulation—

I will not covet the full roll of the glorious Greek, Luscious and feeble Italian, Latin so formal and stately,

French with its nasal lisp, nor German inverted and harsh.

Not while our organ can speak with its many and wonderful voices—

Play on the soft flute of love, blow the loud trumpet of war,

Sing with the high sesquialtro, or, drawing its full
diapason,

Shake all the air with the grand storm of its pedals and stops.

Poems by W. W. Story.

Three Weeks in Berlin.

(From the Correspondence of the London Musical World.)

If Berlin is not the most musical city in the world, it is probably, London excepted, the city at which you may hear the most and the best music. The orchestras are not, it is true, better than our own—nor is the best of them—that of the Symphony Concerts over which M. Taubert presides—so good as the band of the Société des Concerts in Paris, or as the Festival orchestras at Birmingham, Bradford, and Norwich. But, on the other hand, there are several distinct bodies of instrumental performers in Berlin, which have no connection with each other, and all of which are more or less efficient.

The Opernhaus of the Königliche Schauspiele
—the largest theatre in Berlin, and perhaps the most beautiful in Europe—has been to me the greatest of attractions. Not because the performances are superior in many respects to what I have heard elsewhere. On the contrary. With one exception (Mme. Köster) the singers might be easily overmatched; while the chorus and orchestra, numerous and efficient as they are, can by no means justly be denominated perfect. But the charm is in the ensemble. . . . Everything is cared for, from the first lady and gentleman, to the last "super;" and the result generally leaves a satisfactory impression of completeness.

There are two conductors at the Opernhaus—
MM. Taubert and Dorn. M. Taubert is a sound musician, and a composer of "distinction," although without genius or originality. Mendelssohn—who has influenced one great department in the art quite as much as Rossini another—is the type which haunts M. Taubert both in his symphonies and his piano-forte music; but it is Mendelssohn's form (diffused)—or perhaps rather Mendelssohn's shadow, without Mendelssohn's substance. M. Taubert conducts more effectively at the Opera than at the Symphony Concerts (about which more anon); but he is always more or less spasmodic, and, if I may so express myself, rhythmically capricious. M. Dorn, the other chef-d'orchestre, is more precise, and easier to follow, though he lacks the fire which his fellow-conductor (given as M. Taubert is, nevertheless, to take the music of Mendelssohn too slow) to some extent possesses. M. Taubert (to revert to the eternal topic) is anti-Zukunft to the death.
So was M. Dorn, until one fine day M. Liszt brought out the opera of Niebelungen (Dorn's, not Wagner's) at Weimar. From that time Tannhäuser was considered worthy to be produced at Berlin.

There is another important feature connected with the Opernhaus at Berlin—viz., the great variety of works to be heard there which can rarely be heard elsewhere. A condition inseparable from its constitution ordains that the great composers dead are to be treated with the same consideration as if living, and their memory honored by frequent revivals of their masterpieces.
Thus the operas of Gluck, owing to this just and wholesome rule, are familiar to the Berlin public, while the Titus and Idomeneus of Mozart, though not played so often, are no more laid upon the shelf than Figaro's Hochzeit and Don Juan. The operas of Spontini, too, appear at intervals; and for all who entertain any curiosity about the lyric drama, the music of that composer must possess a special interest. Weber's Euryanthe, a periodical visitation, is welcome to all admirers of the gifted composer of Der Freyschütz. Not to enter further into particulars, however, or to cite other instances of great old operas, which, by authority, constitute part and parcel of the repertoire, I may add simply that the works of living composers are not by any means neglected. Meyerbeer, Auber, even Richard Wagner, (as I have elsewhere suggested) and indeed the modern school in the persons of nearly all its most brilliant representatives, are called upon in due succession. Of course, under these circumstances, the system of giving the same operas often in succession, or at intervals, is out of the question. And this confers upon Berlin a vast superiority over Paris, where the revival of any of the classical chefs d'œuvre is an occurrence of the greatest rarity. At Berlin the same opera is very seldom performed two nights consecutively. To give you some notion of how much can be heard owing to the enforcement of this regulation, I may just mention that but lately, within a period of less than three weeks, I was present at the performance of six operas and three ballets. The operas were Boieldieu's Die Wiesse Dame (Oct. 13); Mozart's Titus (Oct. 14—the anniversary of the King's birthday); Auber's Carlo Broschi (Oct. 19); Wagner's Tannhäuser (Oct. 22); Spontini's Fernando Cortes (Oct. 24); and Mozart's Don Juan (Oct. 28). The ballets (in all of which the popular Marie Taglioni was the heroine) were Satanello (Oct. 14); Der Seerauber (the Corsair—Oct. 17); and Ballanda, oder der Raub der Proserpina (Oct. 21). These were ballets of action, in three acts, on a grand scale, produced in a style of lavish magnificence, and occupying the entire evening, without even a lever de rideau.

In the same three weeks six representations were given at the Opernhaus by Mad. Ristori and her troupe, of which I was satisfied to witness one, being rather curious to visit the Schauspiel, or Comedy, than to witness what I had already seen so often in Paris and London. At the Schauspiel, then, where there is an admirable company (which made the puppets that Mme. Ristori drags about with her hide their diminished heads), I saw Schlegel's translation of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with the whole of Mendelssohn's music; Michael Beer's tragedy of Struensee, with the music of Meyerbeer; and three plays—viz.: Charlotte Birch-Pfeiffer's Die Waise von Lowood (the "Orphan of Lowood," founded on the novel of "Jane Eyre"); Donna Diana, a four-act comedy from the Spanish of Don Augustin Moreto; and Graf Essex, a tragedy by H. Laube, in five acts, the subject of which may be guessed from its title.

But I have not said all. In the same apparently inexhaustible three weeks I was able to attend the first of the Symphony Concerts, which are held in the large and spacious music room connected with the Schauspiel-Haus. The Berlin Symphony Concerts—like those of the Society of Concerts in the Paris Conservatoire—are extremely difficult of access; so much so that it is a privilege highly valued to be a subscriber; and the right of possessing an annual subscription ticket is bequeathed by will, as a sort of real property. I must confess that with the one concert which I heard I was greatly disappointed. The following was the programme:

Overture in C, Op. 126,.....Beethoven
Symphony in A major,.....Mendelssohn
Variations ("God save the Emperor").....Haydn
Symphony in F, No. 8,.....Beethoven

Beethoven's overture is the very long fugued one, generally known as the "Consecration of the House." It is grand, but (for Beethoven) occasionally dry and labored, and with themes unusually trite. It was, however, the best performance of the orchestra, except perhaps the first allegro of Mendelssohn's symphony, the last three movements of which were taken at so slow a pace by M. Taubert, that the spirit of them entirely evaporated. This habit of ruining Mendelssohn's music by disregarding the intentions of the composer, seems inveterate in certain German conductors. * * * I was much surprised to find an imitation of the Conservatoire French clap-trap at staid and classical Berlin. I allude to the variation movement from Haydn's quartet, which was played (as in Paris) by the whole body of stringed instruments, and produced an effect the composer never dreamed of, and with which, had he heard it, I question whether he would have been altogether pleased. In the Beethoven Symphony the obbligato in the trio of the minuet was played by all the violoncellos, instead of one, as Beethoven intended. But for this week—salus.

Mr. Thalberg's Concert.

(From the Courier & Enquirer of Nov. 28th.)

It is a long time since we had a concert of so high a grade as that which Mr. THALBERG gave last evening, to an audience which filled Niblo's Saloon to the last inch of standing room, and which was distinguished by the well known taste and culture of persons thickly scattered through it. A small but very effective orchestra directed by CARL BERGMANN's precise baton, a baritone of Signor MORELLI's high standing, a cantatrice of the first class—Madame D'ANGRI, and Mr. Thalberg himself—without a superior, if he have his peer—in a programme ten of the twelve pieces on which bore the name either of Rossini, Weber, Beethoven, or Mozart—and what more could the most exacting musical taste demand? The concert was chiefly distinguished from those which have just preceded it by the first appearance of Madame D'ANGRI (think of the melancholy puns upon her name which are imminent in the future!) and the performance of Beethoven's Concerto in C Minor by Mr. Thalberg. Mr. Thalberg was the giver of the concert; but—place aux dames.

Madame D'Angri—a dark haired, dark eyed dame, with a meaning look, a winning smile, and a plenteous person—is a vocalist of the first rank. Among the contraltos she has had no equal here, except ALBONI. A glance at the music which she had selected, which included the cavatina from Semiramide, and the rondo from Cenerentola, showed either conscious power and assured success, or ambition—to be miserably disappointed. But she had but uttered Eccomi alfine in Babilonia! when her success was attained. The noble voice, the large and simple style of musical elocution, the air of quiet confidence, and the expression of reserved power, betrayed at once the first rate artist. Madame D'Angri's voice is an absolute contralto, very full and powerful in the middle and lower register, and much less attenuated in the upper than is generally the case with voices of this quality. Its capacities for passionate expression are unlimited, and these are developed by a dramatic, declamatory style, of the best Italian school. Her enunciation and pronunciation are matchless, and her accent the purest Roman; and how much this aids the pure delivery of the voice, free vocalization and distinct musical articulation, only those know who have carefully observed the difference between singers who possess and those who do not possess it. Madame D'Angri delighted her audience by the mingled passion and dignity which she threw into the first movement of the cavatina from Semiramide, and hardly less by the brilliancy and fire with which she gave the last. So in the rondo from Cenerentola, it required the full flowing flexibility with which the rondo itself was sung, to eclipse the effect of the tenderness with which she sang the introductory slow movement Nacqui all'affanno, al pianto. But perhaps it is in recitative that Madame D'Angri is greatest; there the inflections of her voice and her accentuation are charming indeed, and her ear for rhythmical elocution, which recitative so severely tests, appears almost faultless. Her voice lacks the smoothness, and the luscious richness which we have heard in contraltos; it might also be more purely delivered; but where there is so much and so great excellence, we are unwilling to see slight blemishes. Mme. D'Angri brings a new sensation to musical America.

Mr. Thalberg played only the first movement of Beethoven's concerto. The performance was a great one, we need hardly say. We do not think the union of the piano-forte with the orchestra a very congruous one, or the happiest for the piano-forte. The instrument, from the quality of its tone, and the manner in which that tone is produced—percussion, appears better either in solo or accompaniment than in concert with the various qualities of tone which are produced by the orchestra. They blend with or relieve each other by harmonious contrast; but with no one of them, nor with all of them, does the piano-forte seem to have sympathy. Besides, the power, variety, and richness of the orchestra are more than the monotoned piano-forte—limited as its power is, even in the hands of the greatest master—can successfully contend with. But to work out great ideas satisfactorily, and to attain large effects for the concert room, an orchestra is necessary; and so we have some of the finest thoughts of the great composers in the form of piano-forte concertos, to which we listen and are thankful. Especially do we acknowledge the claim upon our gratitude when the thoughts receive such interpretation, and, we may add, such illustration as those of Beethoven did last evening at the hands of Mr. Thalberg. Every phrase of that graceful movement, the theme of which, simple as it is, bears the stamp of a master mind, was given by the performer with absolute precision and most delicate appreciation of its significance; and at the close he gave a cadenza of his own; and such a cadenza! It was itself a concerto. It was based upon the counter theme of the movement, which was worked up in a style so elaborate and yet at the same time so consonant with the spirit of the music to which it was an addendum, as almost to raise the performer to the rank of the original composer. Its brilliancy and its intricate difficulty were no less striking; and as Mr. Thalberg performed it, Carl Bergmann and his fellow musicians listened with bated breath. It was a splendid combination of fancy, learning and executive skill. Yet Mr. Thalberg in playing the air of "Home," which he did on receiving a merciless encore, showed himself no less a great master in his art. The thing was so simple, that he could have played it as well asleep as awake; but the purely vocal style in which he gave it, the tenderness which he threw into its unadorned phrases, and the manner in which he made the piano-forte sing it, made the performance of it a great piece of art. We can only add that the concert gave the greatest delight to the audience.

Musical Correspondence.

(From our own Correspondent. Too late for last week.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 24.—On Saturday night the Academy of Music was so crowded, at the first Philharmonic concert of the season, that even the amphitheatre was graced—for the first time probably—by the presence of ladies. It was difficult to realize that not ten years ago, when these concerts were given at the Apollo Saloon, down town, that hall, which holds about five or six hundred people, used to be only comfortably full, while at the rehearsals (which have this season nearly filled the Academy) there were generally hardly a hundred persons assembled.

The Academy is certainly a splendid house for hearing. Never did music sound more beautifully than the Fifth Symphony from the second tier, where I sat that night. It was admirably played; and those who may have preferred Mr. BERGMANN's leading and training last year, could say nothing against the result of Mr. EISENBERG's conductorship, as shown in this number, and indeed throughout the evening. The other orchestral pieces were Cherubini's Overture to Medea, and one of Gade, denominated "In the Highlands." The former is one of the composer's best, in point of instrumentation, working up, and flowing, pleasing melody. But it seemed to me too pretty for the grand, awful subject of which it treated; I could find nothing in it characteristic of the name it bears. Gade's composition did not strike me as very remarkable. In fact, Gade seems to have exhausted himself in a few of his first works. His Symphony in A minor is beautiful, and his "Sounds from Ossian" have much merit; but this attempt at rendering the spirit of the "Highlands" is not far from a failure. It is not Scotch enough to be very characteristic, and yet too much so to be good for anything else. Besides this, it is extremely Mendelssohnian—a fault which even the composer's best works have in a slight degree.

Madame LAGRANGE was the singer of the evening, having consented, ever ready and obliging as she is, to perform that part at very short notice, instead of Mlle. JOHANSEN, of the German Opera, who was indisposed. She sang the grand aria from Don Giovanni and Rode's "Variations." The latter is a style of vocalization in which she excels at all times; the former I have heard her sing better in the role of Donna Anna, though she would have done very well on this occasion without the unfortunate "wobble" in her voice. But, as a friend said, "she would not be Lagrange without that."

There were two more solo numbers—one for the violin, by Mr. WM. DORHLER, a member of the orchestra, whose extreme youth and very unassuming demeanor excused any want of force and character in his playing. His stroke was almost too soft and tender, though indeed the piece which he played, a Fantasia by David on Schubert's "Praise of Tears," seemed to require that. The pianist was Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK, "from Berlin, and just arrived from London," as the programme said. He played the Arpeggio Etude of Chopin, from Op. 10, a Rondo in E flat by Weber, and an Etude of his own. His performance gave more evidence of a sound, sterling school than of great force or brilliancy of execution. He was encored, and played a pleasing trifle, suited to the occasion—probably also his own work.

Nov. 26. One could almost believe in "bad luck," considering the bad weather which poor Mr. EISELDT invariably has for his concerts. Yesterday, too, a very fine morning changed into a drizzly day, and a most unpleasant evening, so that there was but a very small audience present. Those who were there, however, enjoyed the treat held out to them none the less. It consisted of a Quartet in C, No. 6, by Mozart, one in F, Op. 18, by Beethoven, Schubert's first Trio in B flat, and a couple of songs from Miss BRAINERD. The quartets were very well played, though we noticed in the first violin the old tendency to flat, in a considerable degree. The Quartet of Mozart was not one of his finest, but has still enough food for enjoyment in it; that of Beethoven, one of his earlier works, savored strongly of Mozart and Haydn, yet the strong individuality peeped out every now and then. The Adagio appassionato was particularly beautiful. Schubert's Trio made on me the same impression as when I heard it played, two years ago, by Mr. SATTER, although Mr. HOFFMANN (the pianist on this occasion), while he played with all his usual excellence in every respect, still lacked the peculiar fire and spirit which characterized Mr. Satter's playing. The Trio is exquisite throughout, in the rollicking, sparkling Allegro, the deep, mournful Andante, the Scherzo such as only Schubert can write, and the Finale, with its quaint melodies, and the wondrous working up of the whole. Mr. Hoffmann did it full justice, and remained true to his character of an earnest, vigorous, healthy artist in his rendering and whole conception of it. Miss Brainerd was not in as good voice as usual. She should hardly have attempted Mendelssohn's Zuleika; her voice has not enough of the mournful element in it for that song, which is so expressive of the deepest, tenderest longing. The other song, "The Streamlet," by Kalliwoda, an old-fashioned and very tedious composition, was better suited to the singer's organ, but was too indifferent in a musical view to please much.

Why does not Mr. Eiseltd introduce some of Franz's songs at his concerts? I think they would find appreciative hearers among the music-loving audiences who are gathered together on these occasions.

(From another correspondent.)

NEW YORK, Dec. 2.—Mr. THALBERG's new series of concerts commenced last Thursday evening at Niblo's Saloon, before the largest audience that has yet greeted the eminent pianist. He performed Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, with full orchestral accompaniments, and his own Lucrezia and L'Elisir fantasias. The Concerto was very well received, though the greater portion of the piano playing was completely drowned by the orchestra. In the other pieces Mr. Thalberg sustained his well-earned reputation.

One great feature of the concert was the debut of the new contralto, Mme. D'ANGRI. Her name has been for some time before the British public, and her fame preceded her to this country. In person the new comer is highly favored—magnificent form, splendid black eyes, dark hair, and with a certain air of abandon that evidently will make her a much better opera than concert singer. Her voice is a pure contralto, rich, full and deep, and capable of considerable expression. Her execution is but tolerable; she attempted a set of variations by Vaccaj, a specimen of those vocal gymnastics in which LAGRANGE so peculiarly excels, and in which she surpasses every other living singer. The unavoidable contrast between D'Angri and Lagrange in this style of music, is by no means favorable to the former.

But it is in the passionate, declamatory style that Angri cannot fail to meet with eminent success; in her aria from Semiramis, she gave us a taste of her true powers, and also in an inferior English air from one of Macfarren's operas. Her pronunciation of our language was very good, but the absurdity of the words, repeated in the Italian manner, was amusingly apparent. For instance, she sings:

My Hassan, he—is gone, is gone,
And I—and I—I am left—and I am—left—left—alone, and I Am left a-a-a- (long trill) lone!

These, with such interjections as "What see I?" "An empty ch-a-a-a-ir!" &c., made the piece sound more like a burlesque than anything else. However, this had little to do with the merits of the singer, who received the greatest applause, and was honored in the Non piu mesta of Cenerentola with a hearty encore.

Mr. Thalberg's concert on Saturday night attracted another fine audience, although the weather was extremely unpleasant. He played fantasias from La Sonnambula and La Figlia with his usual success. Mr. Thalberg's performance is the perfection of Art; there is no affectation, no snobbery, no clap-trap about him; he has arrived at the topmost rung of the ladder of musical fame, and needs no extraneous stimulants to success. But notwithstanding all this perfection, this elegant, gentlemanly manner, this marvellous command over the instrument, he does not appear to be himself touched by the divine spirit of musical inspiration. He is never carried away by his own music, but on rising from the piano, with the plaudits of delighted listeners bursting upon his ear, he is the same quiet, respectable, self-possessed, middle-aged gentleman that he is at the dinner table of his hotel. His playing reminds one of a poem of ROGERS—elegant and polished almost to excess, as if a little more fire and even brusqueness, would add to its charm. But then it should be remembered that Mr. Thalberg is no longer young; he has passed that glorious age of youth when Genius cries out the loudest and impels her gifted sons to "deeds of high emprise." I can only compare his career to that of the day: in the morning tinged with the golden and ruby clouds, that in a few short hours lose their variegated brilliancy in the fuller effulgence of the increasing sunlight. So youth is touched with the fires of Genius, and thus they fade before the fuller light of knowledge, and we know not whether to rejoice or mourn that they are departed.

The industry of Mr. Thalberg is equal to his musical talents. His engagements for this week include for yesterday (Monday) a concert at Brooklyn, this morning a gratuitous concert before the public school children at Niblo's, a regular concert this evening, a concert at Philadelphia to-morrow, and at New York again on Thursday. He will visit Boston in about three weeks, and there is little doubt that the Bostonians will give a hearty welcome to the king of pianists.

THEODORE EISELDT commenced his Classical Soirées last Tuesday evening, with his old quartet party, and the further assistance of RICHARD HOFFMANN, pianist, and Miss BRAINERD, vocalist. The soirée was but poorly attended, but gave satisfaction to those present. The chief novelty was a beautiful trio by Franz Schubert, performed by Mr. NOLL (violin), Mr. BERGNER (violinello), and Mr. HOFFMANN (piano-forte.)

Signor BAILINI, a young Italian tenor, formerly of the Astor Place troupe, and for several years a teacher in this city, took a benefit the other evening, LAGRANGE, BRIGNOLI and others assisting.

APTOMMAS, the harpist, commences to-night a series of monthly Soirées, at which he will perform classical music on the harp, with miscellaneous selections. He will be assisted by several artists from the opera, and by a host of resident talent.

All the musical world is waiting with anxiety for the production of Verdi's Traviata, which will positively take place this week. Rossini's Semiramide is in rehearsal, with Miss PHILLIPS as Arsace. I should be happy to say more of this estimable young artiste, who is rapidly becoming a favorite here; but as this communication is already rather voluminous, I must wait, and withhold the vast stores of musical gossip, which during the past week have come to the ears of

TROVATOR.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 6, 1856.

To Correspondents.

We go to press on Friday morning. Communications of any length should reach us by Thursday morning, and even by Wednesday, to be sure of insertion.

Will "TROVATOR" oblige us with his real name?

Mr. A. W. THAYER may be addressed at Natick, Ms., or at this office.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The audience at the second concert, on Tuesday evening, was moderate in numbers, but composed, as usual, of the most musically cultivated persons. The programme contained the following pieces:

PART I.

- 1—Quartet in G, No. 66, (first time),..... Haydn.
Allegro con brio—Minuetto—Adagio sostenuto—Finale, Presto.
- 2—"Songs without Words," for Piano-forte,..... Mendelssohn.
Hugo Leonhard.
- 3—Quintet in C minor, No. 1,..... Mozart.
Allegro—Andante—Minuetto—Allegro.

PART II.

- 4—Morceau de Concert, for Violoncello and Piano, (first time,) composed and dedicated to Mr. W. Fries, by T. Ryan.
Wolf Fries and Leonhard.
- 5—Adagio and Canonet, from the Quartet in E flat, op. 12,..... Mendelssohn.
- 6—Piano Trio, op. 70, No. 2, in E flat,..... Beethoven.
Andante and Allegro non troppo—Allegretto—Allegretto non troppo—Finale, Allegro.
Messrs. Leonhard, A. and W. Fries.

In the rendering of the Haydn Quartet the players did not do their best. There was neither the usual smoothness nor precision; and the first bars of the Allegro failed to convey a clear, intelligible statement to our ear; the figure there and afterwards at times was a little blurred. We suppose there is a luck about these things, even with accomplished artists. But we fear that the very familiarity of Father Haydn's music betrayed into undue confidence and neglect of nice rehearsal. Yet it grew better as it went on. The tender Adagio and the dancing Presto made a very pleasant impression. The whole Quartet, though in a lighter and more common vein than Beethoven or Mozart or Mendelssohn, had the peculiar Haydn elegance and ever-youthful freshness and naiveté, and was worthy of careful treatment.

The Quintet by Mozart went much better, as the composition itself is far more rich and full of meaning, the product of a deeper inspiration and a deeper nature. This awakened the right feeling, and really transported us into the free heaven of music. The selections from Mendelssohn's quartet music were of the very best. There is profound feeling and beauty in that Adagio, and the "Canzonet" movement is as characteristic of the author as anything could be, beginning in a wild Volkstied vein, like some of his songs without words and some of Schumann's little Album pieces, and ending with that little elfin hum and flutter of pervading sounds, which occurs so often in his works, and in which you always hear the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn's fancy oscillates continually between these two poetic elements.

Mr. LEONHARD's rendering of the two "Songs without Words," was unfortunate. In the first, that musing, hymn-like strain which forms the first number of the first set, he showed to be sure a good conception of its meaning; but whether from embarrassment or some other cause, he struck wrong notes and blurred over passages. The other piece, (No. 3 of the same set) a brilliant, fiery movement in A, whose quick, buoyant rhythm reminds one of the Allegro in Beethoven's Symphony in the same key, was taken quite too fast, or faster than he could well scramble through. Perfect execution, to be sure, might have justified so swift a tempo. We thought, too, that for once the Chickering piano was less sympathetic in its tone than usual and less encouraging to the performer. But the pianist more than made amends by his clear, spirited, intelligent and effective rendering of the Beethoven Trio. He played it even better than in the first concert, and confirmed the impression that we have in him one who, though wanting much to be gained only by experience, has many of the essential qualifications for a player of Beethoven's concerted music. And what more useful sphere can a pianist fill?

Mr. RYAN's concert piece for 'cello and piano proved a pleasing piece, but rather too long. It leads off with a flowing cantabile melody, tender and gracefully rounded, not very original, and then its unity crumbles away into rather an indefinite, protracted medley of dramatic scena-like passages. The melody was beautifully sung on Mr. WULF FRIES's violoncello, to which it is always a great pleasure to listen.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.—A new prospect opens for Orchestral Concerts, and to our mind the most hopeful that has dawned upon us yet. Plan number two having been abandoned, Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, relying on his own tried energy and knowledge of the thing we want as well as of the ways and means, has determined to try the experiment of a series of concerts in a hall of medium capacity, namely, the old Melodeon, which was always a good room for sound, and which will be thoroughly renewed internally, and made sweet and clean and handsome. It will seat about 1200 persons. To be sure it is somewhat mortifying to go away from our noble Music Hall and the Beethoven statue, but it may only be to return there after a little while in triumph. It is certainly best, after our recent experience, to begin on a modest scale. If only six or seven hundred persons can be relied on for a series of concerts, who will risk the expense of a hall that holds four times that number?—to say nothing of the chilling influence of a hall not one half full. Let us fill the quart measure first, and then we may overflow into the gallon.

Full particulars of place, prices, number of concerts, &c., will probably be announced next week. It is Mr. Zerrahn's intention to make the programmes altogether of the highest order of orchestral music and avoid all clap-trap. If solo talent be at all introduced, it will be only that of the most artistic character. For since he will rely for audience almost entirely on subscribers to the whole series,—that is to say, upon the sincere lovers of great classical music,—there will not be the usual necessity of throwing out cheap glittering baits to miscellaneous outsiders, at the expense of that true artistic tone and unity which one has everywhere a right to demand of "Philharmonic" concerts. We believe Mr. Zerrahn means to adopt this name, in the sense that has become established in New York, London, and many European cities.

We would earnestly advise all of the six or seven hundred subscribers to the concerts which have been abandoned, to transfer their subscription to Mr. Zerrahn, feeling assured that they will more than get their money's worth, and will be aiding a wholesome experiment which promises to lead (if anything can do it) naturally and safely back to the glorious heights from which we have fallen. Beginning in this sound and modest way, we may yet, before the winter is past, go back in triumph to the Music Hall, and celebrate that triumph with the Choral Symphony—chorus and all—with the statue of the Master who composed it rising in the midst of its interpreters!

P. S.—The first concert will be on the 10th of January. Subscription lists will be circulated in a few days.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From the Country.

NATICK, Dec. 2, 1856.

In the olden time, what is now our South village was a right famous place—indeed, quite the blarney stone of the Massachusetts colony. Without delaying to discuss the great question first propounded to an inquiring generation in my last letter—whether Mr. Eliot's route hither was by the back way or not—the discussion of which topic, I am credibly informed, has rendered divers persons irate—persons who evidently have no due appreciation of the great value of the labors of our antiquarian societies—be it sufficient to state that he did come, and that, on sundry occasions and oft, the wise, the learned, the curious, the high, mighty, and lifted up of the colony joined him in his visits. Was there not a grand visitation of the Indian plantation here in 1651, in which the Rev. Mr. Wilson of Boston, and the worshipful Mr. Rawson, some time Secretary of the Colony, and sundry others took part? And some hours after they had arrived and had already viewed the two fair streets upon 'ye north side of ye river, and the long street upon the other bank, and the foot-bridge built archwise, and the circular stockade in which was the house built after the English manner, did not His Excellency the Governor, the worthy Mr. John Endicott, come up from Dedham, where he had spent the night, with his sergeants and others to the number of about twenty persons, and make a like view, after which there was a lecture or sermon in the fort?

And more than a score of years afterward did not the facetious Mr. John Dunton, bookseller, of London, ride on horseback twenty miles through the woods from Boston, with Madam Brick, the flower of that city, behind him, who in this case proved but a beautiful sort of luggage, as he says, to witness the wonder-workings of Providence among the natives? And were not such visits described in glowing terms and printed in books, so that the name of Natick came even into the ears of the Lord Protector, and of that famous poet, Mr. John Milton, Latin Secretary to his highness?

And did not the great controversy carried on by Mr. Allen, of Dedham, on the one part for the inhabitants of that town, and by Mr. Eliot on the other, in behalf of the "poor Indians of the plantation of Natick," respecting the disputed territory on the south side of the river, divide the counsels of the Great and General Court for a series of years?

I say no more; only let him who disputes the importance of our town in the history of the universe study the documents and be silent forever!

Standing upon one of the hills which overlook the valley of the Charles, the other day, I carried myself back in imagination to one of the Thursday lectures of Eliot. The whole view, even to the hills of Milton, was that of a dense forest—a view which, as I have seen them from the mountains near Lake Superior, fills me with a sense of solitude and sublimity, not surpassed by the ocean. Here and there below me, along the sides of the elevations, wreaths of smoke arose from the few small openings made in the forest for the wigwams and maize fields of the Indian converts; but these were not numerous nor extensive enough to form any contrast to the grand expanse of the wide spreading woods. It is a beautiful October morning, and all these woods save the dark pines and firs are brilliant in Autumn's gayest colors. Deer bound by me; the wild, solitary cries of the loons reach me from Bullard's Pond; squirrels chatter; partridges whirr-r-r by me, as I move along the hill-top to find some better point of observation. It is the middle of the forenoon, and now a new sound comes up from a distant point of the plain below, growing each moment more distinct, as you may to-day hear it in the Adirondack or Ontonagon woods, far away, the clatter of horses hoofs upon the soft, leaf-covered earth. Mr. Eliot and two or three companions, preachers perhaps or members of the General Court—at all events, men of importance. They started early, and have had a ride of some three or four hours, following the Indian path from Roxbury, at a slow pace, for the roots, stumps and decaying timber of the original forest are not favorable to rapid equestrianism. Of course the all-engrossing topic has been the great work of God among the Indians; but there has been time enough for other conversation, and in those days subjects were surely not wanting. The last vessel that came from "home" had brought out not only an abundance of news in relation to Cromwell and the progress of the saints, but the latest publications from the theological and political presses. Mr. Milton's new book in defence of the Revolution, the last treatise of Mr. Richard Baxter, anything which may have just appeared from the pens of Sir Henry Vane and Hugh Peters, would possess special interest. It is no difficult matter to weave conversations out of such materials, and I find myself debating many curious questions of church and state in the persons of my visitors to the settlement below.

But the preacher and his friends have reached the old oak, under which in my childhood I played so often. Their horses are tied, and are munching hay which the Indians have gathered along the banks of the river and meadows. And now the roll of the drum "pierces the fearful hollow of mine ear"; but in this case it is the sound of peace. Its sharp tone reaches the recesses of the forest, and in a few minutes I hear the sound of voices from the woods below, but the speech is in an unknown tongue. I comprehend nothing of it. The Shenæs, the Wahans, the Trags, the Pegans, Monequassun the schoolmaster, Nataous, Tothorswamp, Ponantum, perhaps Cutshamakin the sachem, and many others are coming from hill and pond, from corn-patch and hunting-ground, to the place of worship, built with their own hands, save the two days assistance of the English carpenter. The voices die away in the distance, and soon another roll of the drum, and all draw into the circle of the palisades. One part of the service rises on the still air, and falls sweetly upon my ears. It is the psalm which Mr. Eliot has translated into metre in the Indian speech, and which, abounding in vowel sounds, swells sweetly and smoothly as the stanzas of Metastasio, and withal is worthy of Mr. Wilson's testimony: "all the men and women sang it together, in one of our ordinary English tunes, melodiously." Mr. Endicott, the Governor, records that "they sang cheerfully and pretty tunable."

Now this matter of their singing has been a subject of infinite speculation to me.

Daniel Gookin, Gentleman, Captain General of the Colony, and guardian of the Indians, speaks of the singing of the uncivilized Indians, but gives us no means of judging of its excellence. Being thus thrown upon my own resources, I think of the Chinese music (?) which I have heard, of the Indian music of the wandering tribes I have seen at the Saut St. Marie, of the descriptions of travelers among savage nations, and conclude that the singing of the Pow-wows in the woods of Massachusetts must have been of like character. How could they have learned to sing otherwise? The historians of music quote Juvenal's opinion that man learned to sing from the birds. But birds do not sing,—they whistle. I have taken lessons in whistling from our bluebirds and thrushes; never one in singing. Suppose, however, Juvenal be right; were there any singing birds here before the destruction of the forest, and introduction of civilization? Are not singing birds almost unknown, in our latitude, until the woods are cleared away? The little experience I have had in wild wood life leads me to this idea, and I think I have seen remarks to the same effect in the course of my reading. The loon, the wild goose and duck, the partridge, the king-fisher, the wild turkey, pigeons, and sundry such like birds of passage were certainly here, but did the Indian know the thrushes, the bluebird, the mocking-bird, and the like? Who will inform us? I take it that anything like melody, like harmony, like musical expression, was utterly unknown among the natives until in the meeting-houses of Plymouth, Salem, the New Town, Watertown, Boston, &c., they listened to "the common English tunes" of that day; such as you may find in Ainsworth, and Ravenscroft, and Sternhold, and Hopkins, in the College Library at Cambridge.

What are our pleasures as we hear for the first time a chorus of Handel, or a symphony of Beethoven, compared with the feeling of the red man, as with wonder and delight he stood fascinated at the door of that church with a bell upon it, which in 1651 was erected in "the New Town," hard by where the Dane Law School now stands. York and Old Hundred, and Canterbury, and other good old solid chorals, formed the staple of the musical feast, and they stand the test of experience to this day. And when under Mr. Eliot's zealous instruction and care, the new converts in their own meeting-house, and in their own language, first joined, men and women, in marrying sacred verse to immortal strains, though on a mean and feeble scale, were not their souls touched with feelings which Handel or Mozart might envy?

When I fall into reveries upon the aboriginal inhabitants of Natick, no scene is more prominent than this in which Monequassum "deacons off" the psalm from Mr. Eliot's manuscript, the eager eyes black as night, of sachem, sanop and squaw, fixed upon his face, and then the voices of all bursting into old "York," melodiously and pretty tunable; and Mr. Eliot sits in his place, now joining lustily in the tune, and now brushing a tear from his eye, with the mental thanksgiving: "Father, I thank thee that thou hast revealed these things unto babes!"

A. W. T.

Musical Chat-Chat.

THALBERG will not visit Boston before January. . . . The habitués of the New York Academy of Music stood aghast this week at the sudden announcement that the Italian Opera would positively come to a close on the 10th of this month, LAGRANGE, MARETZKE and all having accepted an engagement at the Tacon theatre in Havana. ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, too, goes with them, having given the Salem people a flying concert first. So there is small hope of opera for any of us this winter. . . . The HANDEL & HAYDN SOCIETY will perform the "Messiah" at Christmas. After that will come the long and thoroughly rehearsed "Eli." We learn there is some hope of securing Fraülein JOHANNSEN, the successful prima donna of the late unsuccessful German Opera in New York, to sing the principal soprano part.

Is it not a pleasant and a rare thing to unite the votes of both contending parties? A musical warfare has been raging between the Musical Journal and Fitzgerald's City Item, both of Philadelphia, from which we have the vanity to cite a passage on each side—indeed we owe it to such friends. The Item winds up a spirited rejoinder thus:

"A word more and we are done, as this article is already much longer than it should be. We take this paragraph from the Philadelphia Musical Journal:

"From the first we have never disguised our relationship to the N. Y. Musical Review (if it pleases the Item better, say "likeness," to that paper); for we candidly esteem it as the most strictly musical paper of any standing in this country; not excepting others, which may contain weekly tedious literary articles and translations, that interest none save the sensitive novel reader or the chaffed critic."

We would merely say to this, that the writer does not strengthen his praise of the Review by adding the concluding uncalled-for, ungenerous, and untrue fling at the Boston Journal of Music. It shows him to be unable to appreciate its selections, translations and editorials, which abound in information of the most useful and interesting description, and to be too prejudiced and self-sufficient to avail himself of the labor of one of Boston's most capable, theoretical, and practical professors, who acts in the capacity of musical editor to the musical paper so unkindly and unnecessarily alluded to by the author of the paragraph above quoted."

To this the Musical Journal pleads off in the following:

"MISREPRESENTATION CORRECTED.—The City Item of the 15th inst. does us injustice in its closing paragraph. We have been in the receipt of more than one weekly musical paper, and in our writing had no allusion to the Boston Journal of Music, which, we trust, (notwithstanding the Item's severe insinuation) we are able, in some measure, to appreciate as a most excellent exponent of the art."

While here in this famed citadel of classical music, where stands the statue of Beethoven, there are no symphonies to be heard this winter, and while here, after some twenty years of symphony concerts, we have not yet a permanent society for classical orchestral music, it is curious to turn to the young city of Milwaukee, where the sixty-eighth concert of its "Musical Society" was given on the 26th ult. with the following programme:

PART I.
Symphony in C minor, by Beethoven, consisting of: 1. Allo. con brio. 2. Andante con moto. 3. Allo. assai. 4. Allo.

PART II.
1. Song of the Pilgrims at their Return—chorus for male voices from Opera "Tannhäuser," by Wagner
2. Song for Soprano with Piano accompaniment.
3. "Good night,"—serenade for male voices.
4. Song for Tenor, with Piano accompaniment.
5. Overture to "Der Freyschütz."

The New York Philharmonic Society have in rehearsal for their next concert two overtures never before given in this country: one to the drama, "Uriel Acosta," by L. SCHINDLMEISSER, and an Overture characteristic, "Faust," by RICHARD WAGNER. The Symphony will be Mozart's "Jupiter." The orchestra of the Philharmonic numbers eighty-one performers: 31 violins, 11 violas, 9 violoncelli, 10 double basses, &c. . . . A friend, in whose judgment we have great confidence, writes us: "Mme. D'ANGRI is a great singer—style at once very grand and highly finished—voice a little mannish, however. Stands next to Lind and Alboni; lacking, however, the genius of the former entirely." Our old friend ARDITI, the conductor of so many Italian operas in this country now occupies, it seems, the same post in the orchestra of the Italian Opera at Constantinople. L'Eco di Italia says: "He was eagerly sought for by the impresarii on his arrival in Italy, and might, if he had chosen, been director of the grand orchestra of Parma or of the royal theatre of Turin. But the Ottoman capital snatched him away from Italy. It is thought that Arditi will occupy the post of the deceased Donizetti, director in chief of the military bands in Turkey. It would be fine to see our friend created a Pasha of three tails!"

Among the passengers lost in the ill-fated steamer La Lyonnaise was Mr. T. FRANKLIN BASSFORD, a young American pianist and composer, who had won the approval of good judges by his concerts in New York. . . . Mr. APTOMMAS, in the programme of the first of his Harp Soirées, in New York, announces that he will play, with harp, violin and 'cello, Beethoven's piano-forte Trio in C minor; also the celebrated Fantasia on the Prayer in Moise. Query: Does he mean Thalberg's, or that which some say is the prototype of Thalberg's, composed originally for the harp by Parish Alvars? . . . Miss MAY, the American cantatrice, has postponed her return home, having been engaged by Mr. Lumley to appear in London at Her Majesty's Theatre during the coming season. . . . JULIEN's concerts at the London Opera House are triumphs in their way. His prima donna this time is CATHERINE HAYES, who has been the most enterprising of concert-givers in extreme foreign parts, and has carried home much gold from Australia. . . . Signora STEFANONE has appeared in Paris, as Leonora in Il Trovatore, with unqualified success. She "turned up" to the relief of the despairing manager, on the occasion of the sudden indisposition of Mme. FREZZOLINI, and the result was her engagement for two months, instead of departing for Vienna.

In the article translated in our last number about a new Lisztian style of organ-playing, which has broken out at certain spots in Germany, there was rather an obscure allusion to somebody called "Orgel-Kloss." Kloss is the German for clod, block-head, or more commonly dumpling. It seems there was an organ virtuoso by the name of Kloss, who cut a rather sorry figure six or eight years since, and to whom the writers of the Neue Zeitschrift in Leipzig gave the nickname of "Herr Orgel-Kloss," or Organ-dumpling. . . . The Worcester Palladium follows up our hint to lecture committees. We copy, to keep the ball in motion:

One word in the ears of our music-loving citizens. Would not a lecture on the lives and works of the five great musical composers, Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, given by an accomplished scholar, and one of the best critics in the country, be something enjoyable and worth striving to attain? Mr. A. W. Thayer, the able "Diarrist" of Dwight's Journal of Music, has prepared such a lecture, which he would deliver before any lyceum or musical association. He was recently well known in New York as the musical critic of one of the leading daily papers of that city, and has since been spending a year or two in Germany, collecting the materials for such a life of Beethoven as has not yet been written. Probably no one in this country is better qualified to deliver such a lecture, and no one certainly could make it more interesting. Who will move in this matter?

STELLA.

But "Stella" is under one erroneous impression. Our friend's position in the New York daily was not that of "musical critic." His modesty forbade him to stand forth in that formidable character, and he preferred to whisper his shrewd observations in some quiet corner in the shape of Diarristics.

COLOGNE.—The first Gesellschafts concert for the season took place on the 21st ult., under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller. The great feature of the evening was Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica. It was admirably performed.

Advertisements.

CHORAL SERVICE.

TWO Tenors are wanted for Episcopal Service in this city. Salary $250 per annum. Apply to H. S. CUTLER, Church of the Advent.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

A TENOR SINGER, who reads music at first sight, and has been engaged for some years in one of the principal churches in New York, wishes a situation in a Boston church. Address "S. W." at this office.

THE FIFTH THOUSAND OF THE GOLDEN WREATH,

IS now ready. The demand for this new volume of Vocal Instruction exceeds that of any Juvenile Book of the kind ever issued. It is adopted wherever known, teachers and scholars being at once convinced of its superior merit as a method of instruction, while its 150 pieces of the most popular music render it not only the best but the cheapest book for Schools. Price only 80 cts. $3 per doz.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,
Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

J. H. HIDLEY,
PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.
WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.
Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices.
THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbault, a few copies.
Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1856. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1856. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland; all held during the month of September, 1856;—making Six First Premiums in ONE MONTH!!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIRST PRIZE over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal base. The one with pedal base contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $60 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeon $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address

MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,
FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
Gives Instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
FLUTE AND SINGING.

MRS. CARL ZERRAHN,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y. To Choral Societies and Choirs.

NOVELLO'S Catalogue, No. 8, contains a list of Music for the use of Choral Societies, Church Choirs, and Singing Classes, printed in separate Vocal and Orchestral Parts. Containing Oratorios, Odes, Cantatas, Festival Hymns and Anthems; Operatic Music, Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets and Choruses; Overtures, Symphonies and Marches; Madrigals and Glee; Music with Latin words; Masses, Motets, &c., &c., sent postage free for one cent.
The Vocal Parts are printed in full music size at the rate of three cents per page.

Novello's Octavo Editions of Oratorios,
Of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., in Vocal Score, with Piano-forte accompaniment. Handel's Messiah, $1 68; Judas Maccabæus, $1 68; Haydn's Creation, $1 25. All the Oratorios of these great masters have been published in this series at similarly low prices.

NOVELLO'S OCTAVO CHORUSES.
All the Choruses in the octavo editions of the Oratorios may be had distinct in Vocal Score with organ and Piano-forte accompaniment, at 8, 9, or 13 cents each.

NOVELLO'S CHORAL HAND-BOOK.
A collection of music in separate vocal parts. In this work are published the whole of the chorus parts of the following Oratorios:

Handel's "Messiah," price 38 cents each part.
Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," price 38 cents each part.

Handel's "Samson," price 38 cents each part.
These parts are printed in the octavo size with the Alto and Tenor parts in the Treble Clef.

COLLECTION OF GLEES.
Novello's Glee Hive, Part Song Book, and the Musical Times and Singing Class Circular. For particulars see Catalogue, No. 5, sent postage free for one cent.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,
389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI
IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late at St. Paul's Church,)
ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

Piano-Forte Instruction.
Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.
RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL
Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29 MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

THOMAS RYAN,
Teacher of Singing and Piano-forte,
RESIDENCE, 15 DIX PLACE.

JOB PRINTING
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.
First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 245.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 11.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 288 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Musical Instruments at the Eighth Exhibition Of the Mass. Charitable Mechanic Association.

FULL REPORT OF THE JUDGES.

HENRY K. OLIVER, OTTO DRESSEL, J. C. D.
PARKER, GEORGE MINOT, L. P. HOMER, WILLIAM REED, GEO. WM. WARREN, Judges.

The following instruments were offered for examination, in competition for awards:—

Forty-eight Piano-Fortes, subdivided as follows:
Nineteen Grands.
Three Semi-Grands.
Two Parlor Grands.
Thirty-three Squares.

Also,

Two 'Composing-Desk' Pianos.
Twenty-three Melodeons.
One Chime of Twelve Bells.
One Drum.
Two Violins.
Two Bells, (not of the 'chime'.)
Seven Flutes, five 'common,' and two 'octave.'
Two Clarinets.

All of which instruments, eighty-eight in number, were carefully examined by the Committee.

The Piano-Fortes were offered by the following manufacturers:

136 and 145. Chickering & Sons. Six Grands.
Two Semi-grands. Two Parlor Grands. Six Squares. Two "Composing-Desk" Pianos.
W. F. Emerson. Two Squares.
194. Hallet, Davis & Co. One Grand. One Semi-Grand. Four Squares.
871. George Hews. Three Squares.
1510. James W. Vose. Three Squares.
1522. A Newhall & Co. One Square.
1527. Timothy Gilbert. One Grand. Four Squares.
1630. A. W. Ladd & Co. One Grand. Five Squares.
1605. Lemuel Gilbert. One Square.
1680. Brown & Allen. Three Squares.
1680. Jacob Chickering. Two Squares.

In the department of Piano-Fortes, the Committee, uniting into one class, as is obviously correct, the Grands, Semi-Grands, and Parlor Grands, recommend the following awards:

Chickering & Sons, for their Grands, Semi-Grands and Parlor Grands, for most decided and meritorious improvement, and particularizing specially Nos. *17,524, *17,673, and *17,590, a Gold Medal.

Timothy Gilbert & Co., for their Grand Piano-forte, No. *6731, a Silver Medal.

Hallet, Davis & Co., for their Semi-Grand Piano-forte, No. *6,895, a Silver Medal.

Chickering & Sons, for the two best Square Piano-fortes, of Seven Octaves each, *17,671 and *17,674, the first Silver Medal.

James W. Vose, for his Seven-Octave Square Piano-forte, *162, the second Silver Medal.

A. W. Ladd & Co., for their Seven-Octave Square Piano-forte, *1,630, the first Bronze Medal.

T. Gilbert, for his Seven-Octave Square Piano-forte, *6,349, the second Bronze Medal.

Hallet, Davis & Co., for their Seven-Octave Square Piano-forte, *6,895, the third Bronze Medal.

Brown & Allen, for their Seven-and-quarter Octave Square Piano-forte, *6,581, the first Diploma.

George Hews, for his Seven-Octave Square Piano-forte, *1,667, the second Diploma.

Jacob Chickering, for his Seven-Octave Square Piano-forte, *938, the third Diploma.

William P. Emerson, for his Seven-Octave Square Piano-forte, *1,174, the fourth Diploma.

Of the "Composing Desk" Piano-fortes, the Committee speak in terms of commendation, as articles of convenience to the composer, who, after he has written a musical phrase or passage, may desire to realize its effect upon the ear. They do not, however, intend to say that they are of indispensable use, for the accomplished and talented musician ought to hear all the effects he intends to produce "in his mind's" ear, without the aid of any such convenience, and it, moreover, can hardly be possible, in the torrent and rush of his musical ideas, and when "in a fine frenzy rolling," that he should be willing to run the risk of checking them by stopping to test effects. There would be great danger that, by such delay, his thoughts would be "thrown off the track," and he find it very hard to get them back again. It is said of an ancient Greek warrior, of great bravery, and who had achieved all his deeds of prowess in hand-to-hand encounters, man against man, and foot to foot, that when he first saw the Ballista, a contrivance for killing, by throwing large stones from a distance against the enemy, he exclaimed, with a deep sigh, "Farewell to all courage." Might not the "mighty masters of song," with equal feeling, say, in view of these "aids to musicians," "Farewell to genius"? The great Haydn once wrote what he called "a Philharmonic Game," (printed in Boston in 1834, by Comer & Ostinelli,) a most ingenious and extraordinary production, so arranged and subdivided that, by means of a figured table of directions, anybody, whether musician or not, with ears or without, deaf or dumb, or both, can invent, (no, not invent—can string together,) a countless number of melodies, without the mental parturition of a single original idea! With the aid of the "Desk" and the "Game," what might not toddling geniuses hope to achieve in the yet unexplored regions of Apollo's great domains?

Among the Piano-fortes from the manufactory of Chickering & Sons, was one, No. *17,675, having connected with its bridge an apparatus which its inventor, Mr. A. G. Corliss, calls the "Swell-mute Attachment," by which the swell effects of Crescendo and Diminuendo are produced, and in Arpeggio passages a really harp-like effect is secured in a pleasing and truthful manner. These results are brought about by a peculiar application, which, placed on both sides of the bridge, from the bar to the outer end of the bass strings, compresses and releases the bridge at the will of the player, by means of a system of leverage, resting upon the inside of the bottom of the case, and by a let-back movement of a spiral spring; the whole being under the control of one of the pedals. Of this new feature of a piano-forte the Committee speak favorably, because the effects produced seem to them to be legitimate to the instrument, and apparently calculated to enlarge its capabilities, and widely differ from those appliances which, within a few years, have attempted to reduce the piano-forte to the illegitimate condition of an unhappy hybrid between a stringed and a wind instrument. The Committee awarded for it a Diploma.

The Committee, in coming to a decision upon the merits of the several instruments of which they have just determined their award, were of entire unanimity. They did not hesitate for a moment in deciding that the Grand Piano-fortes from the justly celebrated house of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, were not only altogether manifestly superior to all competitors at the present Exhibition, but were an equally manifest and greatly advanced improvement over the well-commended productions of the same establishment offered at anterior Exhibitions. And the Committee not only feel it to be a pleasure, but an obvious duty, to congratulate the present heads of this long-established house, that they have so well sustained its high repute. The memory of the good name, and of the good deeds, and of the great skill of its founder, shall long be cherished; and it is a matter of equal satisfaction and pride that the garment of praise he so fairly won and wore, has fallen upon shoulders worthy to receive and able to honor it.

To determine which of the two (*17,524 and *17,673) is the superior instrument is somewhat difficult. One is more clear and brilliant; the other has more depth and body of tone. One is more distinguished in its power of action, and the other in its elasticity and delicacy of touch. They are both of unsurpassed excellence, and the owner of either may rejoice in his purchase.

The Grand Piano-forte of Messrs. T. Gilbert & Co., No. *6,731, is a very good instrument indeed, and highly creditable to the manufacturers. There was some slight defect in the certainty of response to the finger, in rapid repetition upon the same key, resulting, probably, from inaccuracy in the adjustment of the leverage. The tone was very clear and satisfactory. There were no other Grand Piano-fortes from other factories worthy of special mention.

The Semi-grands of Chickering & Sons, and a Parlor Grand by the same firm, were superb instruments; and this last, had the several varieties of Grands, Semi-grands, and Parlor Grands been kept distinct in class, would have been justly entitled to a highest award, both for its own intrinsic merit and as a new and meritorious invention. But all these were united into one class, and the award was made accordingly. The Parlor Grand first emanated from the house of Chickering & Sons, and made its appearance at the Exhibition of 1853, and the Committee of that year awarded to it a Gold Medal; but inasmuch as the late lamented head of the firm was a member of the then Government of the Society, the award could not be confirmed consistently with the laws of the Association. It would afford the Committee great satisfaction could this award be now confirmed.

The Semi-grand of Messrs. Hallet & Davis, No. *6,895, is an instrument of merit, and far better than their Grand, which last is inferior to that presented by the same firm in 1853.

That the judgment of the Committee may be distinctly understood, they now repeat their awards on the class of instruments under discussion. They put the several varieties into one class, and they award to Chickering & Sons the first premium, to cover the three varieties offered by them—Gold Medal.

To T. Gilbert & Co., the second premium—Silver Medal.

To Hallet & Davis, the third premium—Silver Medal.

Before leaving the subject of Grand Piano-fortes, the Committee desire to say, that in their judgment, while very much, nay, wonderfully much, has been achieved by the American manufacturers in the production of so desirable a class of instruments, there is yet a great task to be accomplished by them, and that is, to make these instruments of such price as will bring them within the reach of purchasers whose means are limited, and who are therefore compelled to content themselves with the ordinary square instrument, which is, after all, not the genuine reality of the Piano-forte, but only a convenient (or as some decide, a poor) substitute for the original and true article, the Grand. The prices charged operate as a prohibitory tariff to many a family and many a student at his first start. The fact that Grands have been imported from Germany into the United States at prices from twenty-five to thirty-three per cent. lower than our ruling rates for the same class, seems to indicate that something in the way of reduced prices might be accomplished with us. One direction which might most happily be attempted by us, and which is peculiarly the direction that good taste suggests, is to avoid all meretricious ornaments in the case. The gewgaws of pearl keys, (a positive nuisance), elaborately carved legs and trimmings, tawdry and tinsel bedeckings about the front boards and other parts of the instruments, should be at once and forever done with. A sensible and prudent man will never pick out a partner for life for the tawdry rigging of her personal dress; nor will a sensible and true musician select an instrument for its gay ornaments and dazzling appendages of pearl and paint. Pearls and paint may, in either case, be but adroit adornment of charlatanry, to dazzle the eye and cheat the heart. Pearl keys may please an ill-disciplined taste; but compared with ivory, the whiteness of which contrasts so well against the ebony, they disappoint a refined taste, and they are positively and extremely unpleasant to sensitive fingers.

In the class of Square Piano-fortes, the awards of the Committee were made with equal unanimity. The instruments of Chickering & Sons are at the head, and next to them comes that of J. W. Vose, No. 162, of seven octaves. Its tone is musical and noble; the high treble notes are particularly fine, and the action is satisfactory. It has one fault, in a certain, though slight deficiency of resonance from the blow of the hammer, produced by a looseness of the upper coat of hammer felt. This may have been caused by the temperature of the room, which, being always crowded, was always hot, and the air close and vitiated, though too many manufacturers fail in drawing the felt sufficiently close over the hammer-head.

It is not necessary to discuss the merits of the other Square Piano-fortes in detail. Those to which awards have been assigned are placed in the order of their merit, as adjudged by the Committee, and those of which special mention is not made, are passed by as not coming up to a just standard of excellence.

Before leaving this class of instruments, the Committee would refer to a model of piano-forte action, exhibited to them by Mr. D. H. Shirley, of which the Committee can only say, that, while in the model it operated well, and appeared effective and to possess obvious advantages in securing rapidity of reply to all rapidity of finger-action, it did not produce in the Piano-forte which contained the action, the expected result. The inventor explained this want of success to be caused by some want of accuracy in the position of the fulcrum. It would be more just to the inventors of similar improvements to refer them to a Committee of practical Piano-forte makers, than to a Committee of musicians; and to a similar Committee should be referred specimens of Piano-forte legs, music stools, canterburys, et id omne genus—"all that sort of thing." One may reasonably be a good judge of tonal effects, and an indifferent judge of furniture. Bronze Medal.

Your Committee next proceeded to examine the Reed Organs, represented by a variety of instruments, called by the manufacturers: Melodeons, Organ Melodeons, Model Melodeons, Organ Harmoniums, &c., amounting to twenty-three in number, and exhibited by the firms of Mason & Hamlin, Boston.

S. T. & H. W. Smith, Boston.
Nichols & Gerrish, Boston.
S. A. Ladd, Boston.

And one Tremolo attachment, exhibited by the inventor, is attached to one of Mason & Hamlin's Melodeons, by

L. Louis, Boston.

As the Committee of the Association are well aware, the amount of capital invested in the manufacture, and the extent of trade in these instruments has within a few past years reached such a magnitude, that whatever may be the individual judgment of musicians as to their proper rank among other musical instruments, the propriety of encouraging, by every proper means, the efforts of the different makers to improve them, and, above all, whatever tends to do away with the harshness of tone which, from the mode of obtaining it, has hitherto seemed to be inseparable from reed instruments, should be met with the utmost encouragement and favor.

In this respect your Committee are happy in being able to report a great and manifest advance upon the results of former exhibitions. Not only does there seem to be a spirit of invention, and a determination to extend the capacity of these instruments, among the various exhibitors, but the superior workmanship of some of them, and the smoothness of tone obtained by the great pains evidently taken in "voicing" the reeds, give proof of great skill in their department, and argue well for the future excellence of this much-decried kind of instruments. One instrument in particular, from the establishment of Mason & Hamlin, of Boston, stands out so preëminently amongst all on exhibition, that a more detailed description is here given, as well to inform the public what has been attained, as from its intrinsic value it was thought worthy of being thus noticed. The Committee refer to the Organ Harmonium, of which two were contributed by the same firm.

One of these has a pedal bass, the other has none; and both have two banks of keys.

The latter has eight stops, viz.: Dulciana, Flute, Hautboy, Bourdon, Diapason, Principal, Expression, Coupler.

Of these the first four are speaking stops, and each of them extends through the entire compass of the keyboards, which are five octaves in extent. The Dulciana and Flute act upon the upper bank of keys, and the Hautboy and Bourdon upon the lower. From this it will be perceived that there are four complete sets of reeds in the instrument, each extending through its entire compass. These four sets of reeds are voiced in such a manner as to give to each a quality of tone peculiar to itself, and imitate so closely the organ stops, whose names they bear, that the ear can with difficulty distinguish between them—a result which obviates the great objection which has heretofore been urged against reed instruments.

The Dulciana and Flute are voiced quite soft, the Hautboy louder, so that when combined, a full organ-like tone is produced, of great power and effect. The Diapason and Principal are swell stops, acting respectively upon the Dulciana and Flute. The "Expression" stop is peculiar to this instrument, and is the invention of the makers, by whom also it has been patented. Its effect, when drawn, is to shut the main or receiving bellows, so that the slightest motion of the feet upon the pedals operates the two exhausting bellows and affects the power of the tone produced, enabling the performer to get every gradation of tone, from PP through crescendo and diminuendo to FF, and back again. By means of this also, all the effects of sforzando, tremolo and affettuoso can be produced at will. This is an entirely new and valuable improvement, and under the control of a skilful performer must be a desirable addition.

The Coupler, as its name implies, connects the two banks of keys together, so that they act as one, precisely as in the Organ. By this arrangement of stops, coupler, &c., every grade of power can be produced, and when all are in operation, a volume of tone is obtained which makes the instrument worthy of being classed with Organs of moderate size, while the cost of an instrument constructed upon this plan being very much less, will render them, as they become more and more known, formidable competitors of that kind of instruments.

In the "Harmonium" with pedal bass, the general mechanism, as regards stops, coupler, &c., is the same as that already described, but the "Expression" stop is left out, and a "Pedal Coupler" substituted. The compass of the pedals is two full octaves, from CC to c, for which there is an independent set of reeds, so voiced as to resemble, as nearly as possible, the sub-bass of the Organ. It has, in addition, a swell pedal, and the bellows is worked by a lever at the back of the instrument, and a tell-tale is put in a conspicuous place, so that the blower is kept informed of the quantity of wind in them. By means of the couplers the pedals can be connected with any one or more of the stops of either or both key-boards. From this description it will be seen that this instrument is altogether different and far in advance of any that have been heretofore manufactured of its kind. It comes very near in tone to the Church Organs of moderate size and power, while in volume of sound and extent of combination, it more than equals them. Whether the enterprise of those engaged in their manufacture will carry them as far ahead of their present degree of excellence as the results of the three past years have brought them remains to be proved. With all the foregoing in view, and without discussing the question whether reed instruments can ever be made to equal the Organ in its best qualities, the Committee recommend that to Mason & Hamlin, for their great and valuable improvements in the Organ Harmonium exhibited by them, be awarded a Gold Medal.

To Mason & Hamlin, for their Melodeons of superior quality of tone, a Silver Medal.

To S. T. & H. W. Smith, Boston, for their Melodeons, a Bronze Medal.

To Nichols & Gerrish, Boston, for their Melodeons, a Diploma.

To L. Louis, Boston, for his "Tremolo Attachment," by which many and very beautiful effects are produced, and the use of which, while they would not be considered as deciding upon its ultimate value, the Committee think, in the hands of a competent and judicious performer, is capable of being made a very expressive and pleasing feature of any performance, a Diploma.

To Nichols & Gerrish, for a Melodeon, Diploma.

The attention of the Committee was next directed to a Chime of Twelve Bells, ranging from D below the staff to G above, including two F's sharp, and one C sharp, and so representing the two keys of D and G, as in the table following:—

Pitch of Bell.	Diameter.	Weight.
D	55 inches.	3,148 lbs.
E	47 $\frac{3}{4}$ "	2,096 "
F sharp	42 $\frac{5}{8}$ "	1,432 "
G	40 $\frac{3}{4}$ "	1,348 "
A	35 $\frac{3}{8}$ "	841 "
B	32 $\frac{1}{2}$ "	727 "
C	31 $\frac{1}{4}$ "	613 "
C sharp	29 "	494 "
D	27 $\frac{5}{8}$ "	436 "
E	25 $\frac{1}{4}$ "	375 "
F sharp	22 "	231 "
G	20 "	198 "

Total weight, 11,939 lbs.

This Chime was contributed by the widely known firm of Henry N. Hooper & Co., the sound of whose "tongues," spread far and wide over the land, makes vocal many a hill and valley, on the blessed day consecrated to rest and to worship—calls many a laborer to his daily toil, and gives him note to rest, when the day's toil is done. How could man live without bells? And how full of interest must be the history of bells, whenever it shall be well written, beginning with the little golden bells that adorned the hem of the Jewish High Priest's robe, taking up that of the codones of the sentries round the Greek camps, and those of the Greek fish markets; that of the petasus and tinnabulum of the Roman baths, and coming down to the larger bells of merry England, the "Guthlac" of the Abbey of Croyland, with its associates, "Bettelin," "Turketul," "Tatwine," "Pega," and "Bega;" a ring of bells, of which the venerable Bede says, about the close of the seventh century, "that no such chime of bells could be found in all England;" and down further to those monster bells of Moscow,—that of St. Ivan's towers, weighing 128,000 lbs.; that of the Cathedral, weighing 288,000 lbs.; and that of the Empress Anne, weighing 432,000 lbs., and standing 19 feet high, and being 21 feet in diameter! Into such a history must come the musical history of bells, and this, not its least interesting department, must be complete in the "Chapter on Chimes," and give us complete illustrations of what mean the single bob, the plain bob, the grandsire bob, the bob major, the bob royal, and the bob maximus, and all the varied bobs of a complete and perfect chime! But the Committee are wandering, and must return to the "chime in hand," and do so by saying that, after a long and very careful examination, testing each bell separately and in the progressions of the chime, both melodically and in harmony, they recommend that there be awarded for their goodness of tone and adaptation to each other as a chime, a Silver Medal.

There are two other Bells, not of the chime, from the same excellent establishment, both possessing good tone and clear resonance.

The Committee next examined the remaining musical instruments submitted to them, consisting of—

A Musical Rocking Chair.

Four Flutes, by Berteling, being

One in B flat,

Three in D.

Two Octave D Flutes, by same maker.

Two Clarinets, by same maker,
One in B flat,
One in E flat.

These were all well made instruments, and some of them uncommonly good. One of the D flutes was very excellent. An award is recommended for the whole, of a Silver Medal.

The "Musical Rocking Chair" was, certainly, a unique novelty. Within the seat was arranged a sort of compact set of reeds, so adjusted that when one sat down and rocked to and fro, he "discoursed most excellent music," and might easily rock himself "to sleep, perchance to dream," to the music of his own fundamental harmonies. Or, viewing it in the light of "a blessing to mothers" who cannot sing "their fondlings to repose," it commends itself as a means of rock-away lullabies, never till now made vocal in nursery realms. Its ingenuity justifies a Diploma.

One of the Violins contributed by J. H. Arey, was a newly-made instrument, of very fair quality of tone, for which the Committee recommend a Diploma.

The attention of the Committee was lastly directed to specimens of Sheet Music, entered by Nathan Richardson, of the "Musical Exchange," Boston. The designs were of superior style and finish, and the whole appearance of the printing, from engraved plates, executed under the immediate superintendence of Mr. Richardson, was eminently clear and excellent.

Examination was also made of Mr. Richardson's "Modern School for the Piano Forte," entered by him as a specimen of music printing from electrotype plates, it being the first musical work ever printed by the common letter-press method, from such plates. There was a uniformity and clearness of impression in an uncommon degree, and, throughout the work, an evenness of appearance and execution rendering every note on every page, perfectly plain to the eye of the player. This is a great merit in music printing, and one not always nor easily attained. The work, itself, as a system, is most highly recommended, by the leading composers and teachers of music, at home and abroad; and by musical journals in Boston and New York; and, although the Committee entertained doubts whether it were strictly within their province to adjudicate upon any "system of instruction" for any instrument, yet, as this had been received by the government of the society, and admitted for competition as such, and had been thus brought legitimately before them, and as it had received the high sanction and recommendations of most eminent Pianists, three of whom were members of this Committee, they decided to award to it a Silver Medal.

82. E. G. Wright, Boston. Silver Bugle. This Bugle seemed upon trial to be a very satisfactory instrument, and quite correct in intonation; and the workmanship was good.

Bronze Medal.

1592. White Brothers, Boston. Violins and Guitars. The Guitars were good instruments, of more than common power and richness of tone. The Violins were highly creditable to the manufacturers as specimens of work, but were unattended with the usual accompaniment—a bow, so necessary to produce the proper vibrations and prove their quality. For these instruments, the Committee award a Bronze Medal.

Gluck and Lavater.

At the time of Gluck's first efforts in the lyric drama, he had occasion to make a journey to Zurich, where Lavater, who was then laying the foundations of a school since so celebrated, was residing. The German musician had heard vaguely of Lavater's physiological labors, and, without precisely believing in the infallibility of his doctrines, or without putting implicit faith in his observations and prognostications, Gluck's ardent spirit and mind, so enamored of the marvellous, had become warmly interested in all that was elevated, new, daring, and brilliant in the hypotheses of the learned innovator. He profited, therefore, by his sojourn at Zurich to pay Lavater a visit.

The founder of the School of Physiognomy was in his study, a perfect museum, containing casts, moulded with the most fastidious exactness, of all the illustrious personages of the time. He was engaged in terminating the voluminous correspondence to which he was accustomed to devote the greater portion of his mornings. He did not so much as appear to perceive the arrival of the musician, and, carried away by his ideas, continued writing his letters, without even turning his head towards the new-comer. This had lasted for upwards of half an hour, and the maestro was beginning to grow tired of waiting so long, when Lavater, suddenly casting upon him his blue eyes, full of intelligence and tenderness, said:—

"Whom have I the honor of addressing, sir?"

"Excuse me, sir," replied the musician, smiling. "Excuse me if I do not answer the question you have asked, and if I leave to you the task of doing so. There is no doubt with your penetration and sagacity the task will be an easy one. Allow me, therefore, to ask you who I am, and what I am?"

Gluck's intention was evidently to embarrass the illustrious savant, but the latter was accustomed to challenges of this description, and, on more than one occasion, had come forth triumphantly from these difficult ordeals. Without appearing, therefore, at all shocked at the maestro's answer, he began to study attentively Gluck's features and physiognomy, terminating his examination by exclaiming, at the expiration of a few minutes—

"No—I am not mistaken. You are a musician."

"That is true," replied Gluck; "but it is a very vague qualification. Could you name the musical speciality which I particularly cultivate?"

At this fresh question Lavater was silent, and appeared to be plunged in profound reflection. Suddenly he interrupted his meditations.

"Yes, that is it," he said. "You are a composer—yes, a dramatic composer. The qualities distinguishing you are—vigor, energy, daring, elevated sentiments, grandeur of ideas, and—there," he continued, taking down from one of the shelves of his bookcase a volume, magnificently bound, "I would lay a wager you are the author of that score."

Gluck cast his eyes upon the work and recognized one of his operas, entitled The Fall of the Giants, which had just achieved a colossal success all through Germany. The astonishing and prodigious sagacity of his interlocutor both amazed and terrified him.

"This is not all," continued Lavater, while his face gleamed with inspiration, and his voice assumed, from minute to minute, a more solemn accent: "this is not all. You are destined for great, for magnificent things—you will leave behind you a luminous track in the career you pursue. You will be the founder of a great school, for there is within you an immense power of creation, and, moreover, that eagerness for the struggle and the combat which render chiefs illustrious, and victory certain."

Three years subsequent to the interview we have described, Gluck was in France, where he brought out his Iphigénie en Tauride, that chef-d'œuvre of inspiration and genius, and which imparted fresh youth to the forms of the lyric drama. On this occasion, the musical world divided itself into two camps, and the name of Gluck, rendered greater by the contest, has come down to us, glorious and respected. Thus Lavater's prediction regarding the celebrated German composer was realized in every particular.

GEORGE F. BENKERT.—The Philadelphia Inquirer has the following account of a young American composer, who is exciting attention in that city.

George Felix Benkert was born in Germantown, (Philadelphia) April 11th, 1831; his father, a bootmaker, a man of energy and honorable ambition, with no small streak of the ideal running through every action of his life. The mother, quiet and industrious, looked upon her first-born as only mothers can look, in hope—days and months passed on, and as years succeeded years, the child grew up,—thoughtful, modest, and quiet in the extreme. The fun and folly that produced uproarious laughter in his schoolmates, painted on his face only a quiet smile, mingled with melancholy. George was blessed with parents such as other children usually have, and many discussions were held as to what trade George should be put to, and as the business of the father is considered good enough for the son, it was proposed that at some future day, he should be a shoemaker, and although quite young, he was taught to hammer a piece of leather, and at other times to stitch a little, but it was all of no use. He who loved to gaze at the beauties of a new born day, and could see something in a leaf as it trembled in the evening breeze, was but poorly fitted to make shoes for the bad formed feet to travel in the mud. However good and useful boots and shoes may be, George had no turn for this kind of work, so he began to scribble music and would sometimes forget the harmony of surrounding things to listen to the sounds of a piano, whose keys were touched by the fingers of innocence in a house hard by. He listened and his fingers moved. The spirit said write—and an overture came forth. He wrote again, and an oratorio was there. Yet George was but nine years old. At this time, our young composer was placed under the care of a teacher in the city, Mr. Joseph F. Duggan, who was instrumental in developing still further this talent for composition. He soon began to be known in Philadelphia as the writer of some pleasing songs, whose grammatical correctness, (we speak in a musical sense) was surprising in one of such youth and limited experience. He also made for himself a name as a pianist while while presiding over the orchestra at Barnum's Museum, and was known among musical people by his remarkable facility in reading music, no matter how complicated or difficult to perform at sight. Not long after this, he was sent to Germany to study, and became the favorite and only pupil of that most distinguished German composer, Lindpaintner, who had the pleasure, before long, of presiding at the performance of a Grand Mass, composed by his pupil, and brought out in a church in Stuttgart, which won for our native artist the approbation of the select audience of the occasion, and the favorable notice of the press, and the musical critics of the place.

The same Mass was brought out in Vienna, under the skilful direction of Helmesberger, assisted by an orchestra and chorus of one hundred performers. The triumph of George F. Benkert in Germany was now complete; the multitude as they poured from church expressing their hearty approval of the Mass, as being calculated to awaken feelings of the sublimest kind, while every critic of Vienna was warm in his applause, and such newspapers as the "Wanderer," the "Allgemeine Zeitung," and "Monatschrift für Theater und Musik," noticed with flattering comments, the productions of "the young American musical composer."

After five years of absence and study he returned to his native city, gathered together a good orchestra, and presented a selection of his instrumental and piano-forte compositions at the Musical Fund Hall, on the evening of November 6th. The favor with which they were received, and spoken of by the press and critics, has induced him to prepare another, which will shortly be given. It is Mr. Benkert's intention to reside in Philadelphia, and pursue his profession as composer and instructor; that he will succeed in establishing himself among our best musicians, no one can for an instant question: for his works entitle him to be at once enrolled among them, and likewise prove that his name has just claims to stand on the list, in a high place over those of some, who with more pretensions and far less real merit than he, have managed to be ranked with the truly deserving.

Street Organs.

(From the Boston Atlas.)

We are not of those who palpitate with pain at the revolutions of the inharmonic crank. We have never pretended to be auricular epicureans, desperate and despairing at the sharp squeals from the windy barrels. We have never showered down from our attic window, upon the poor, peripatetic chapman of cheap quavers, the same oburgatory donations which we bestow upon sentimental cats and upon faithful dogs, who have failed to accompany their masters to heaven or home. The music may be immelodious and strident; but from the vexed interior of the machine is emitted a reminiscence. It is something to have coming through your windows, when the evening gas is lighted, whiffs of old-time song, puffs of pathos which melted you at the opera.

and little snatches of the waltz which put mercury into your heels at the last assembly. Breaking clearly, if not sweetly, upon the thin, delicious air of these winter nights, we hear the death-song of Edgardo, the lunar prayer of Norma, the great duo from Favorita, the hop-and-go devilifications of Strauss and Labitzky, and the touching tribute to Dog Tray. We close our eyes, and remember once more the metallic, rattling Laborde, the quiet Truffi, the robust Benedetti; we see again Grist the queenly, and Albou, the corpulent, and Mario, handsome, but slim; we recall Jullien, in unexceptionable pantalons and immaculate cravat, his locks redolent with Macassar, his gloved hand guiding the armies of harmony. So much conjuring is there in the organ! It were easy to shrug one's shoulders and play the connoisseur. We had rather be thought honest than tasteful. Pardon the confession—we do like hand-organs! We know that the conservators of society, ancient people, with whom, of course, wisdom will expire, pronounce our bumpy friend in the velvet jacket to be a vagrant. Pray let us be a little charitable. The grinder, after all, is not a bold-faced beggar. He gives us music for our coppers, and if we do not want music, he will, for a consideration, leave us, and tune his pipes in more appreciating quarters. Surely, his work is not easy; surely, his burden is far from light. Baron, as he may have been in his own sunny Italy, and cradled as he may have been in song; born under infinite blue skies, in climes where the very commonest people sing the choruses from Auber's Masaniello, and matured upon maccaroni and music, hard misfortune has driven him from his ancestral villa, to wander about with one hundred pounds of bad harmony strapped upon his back. Virtuous in misfortune, in niveous or in pluvial weather, he sticks to his business. He resists the blandishments of his vocation. Music may be the food of love, but no one ever saw an organ-grinder in love. Music is a notorious provocative of inebriety, but no one ever saw an organ-grinder full of Bacchus. Yes, we remember one. He had succumbed to the hot weather and beer, and did slumber upon a door-stone. Wicked boys turned the abandoned organ until it was taken, with its owner, into the charge of a policeman. But this unfortunate only strengthened the rule; his brethren go about sober and sad. And what a life! To play Norma until the oak-crowned priestess grows into a diabolic, dogging, ugly-visaged familiar; to play waltzes until waltzing becomes a torture. Let the ancient conservator of society think of such a daily fate! How would he like organ-grinding?

Music in New Orleans.

[The Picayune puts forth the following claims for the Crescent City,—not without reason. But to the charge that Northern musical journals have ignored them, we at least must plead not guilty. Our columns for these five years have contained frequent, if they have been necessarily brief, notices of French opera, &c., in New Orleans. The musical taste of that city has seemed to us, at this distance, to be quite a remarkable reflex of the taste of Paris.]

Beyond all question, there is no city in the United States in which there exists a decidedly musical taste—we mean a taste that eminently and practically characterizes the people as a community—with the single exception of New Orleans. What it costs an expensive and vexatious struggle in other places to keep up, is with us a fixed and time-honored institution. New York has an Academy of Music, and Boston a Music Hall, while Philadelphia is in the throes of gestation with an Academy of Music, the birth of which is among the most problematical of future events. The opera is a thing of fits and starts in all these cities, and may be truly said never to have settled down, at all, in either of them; but only occasionally alighted, with its wings nervously quivering, like a bird on a sprig, not knowing how speedily a puff of idle wind may dislodge it from its resting-place, and send it off capering to other regions. With us the opera is a fixture, and as stable as anything can be that has its foundations in the hearts and tastes of a homogeneous population.

It is amusing to one who has been in the habit of seeing operas produced at the French theatre in this city, to look over the musical periodicals of the North, and mark how utterly their sapient and well informed conductors ignore the very existence of such an establishment here. When, in the course of the last season, the academicians of New York produced the "Etoile du Nord," (and translated it on their posters, "The North Star!") of Meyerbeer, they told the Gothamites, in the biggest kind of type, that it was the first production of the opera in America. And yet it had then been a stock piece at the Theatre d'Orleans for two seasons. So with "Le Prophète," the good people of the North were felicitated upon the assurance that they were hearing that for the first time in this country, when, in point of fact, it had been a regular stock piece at the French opera here, ever since the 1st of April, 1850, which was less than a year from its original production in Paris.

Good concerts, and all deserving musical entertainments, as well as the opera, are always liberally patronized in New Orleans, as Parodi, Strakosch, Vestvali, and other adventurers in this way, will readily attest. And, besides those for which we are indebted to strangers, (whom, by the way, we are proverbially always glad to welcome to our city,) we have occasionally others, made up of indigenous materials, and appealing to our social sympathies for support.

We are convinced that in no other city of the Union is there, in proportion to its population, so much attention shown to the cultivation of music, as an accomplishment, as in our own. We can point to young ladies, not yet graduated from our schools, whose singing would shame many a concert prima donna the North has sent us; while in private society, it is not an uncommon thing to hear performers on the piano, who would maintain an equal rank with many of the highly celebrated and much bepudded public executants upon that instrument we have had amongst us.

These reflections have just occurred to us with peculiar force, in connection with the receipt of a polite invitation to attend a concert, to be given to-morrow evening, at Odd Fellow's Hall, by the amateur musical association, called, "L'Athenée de la Nouvelle Orleans." This is an entirely private society, and is composed exclusively of amateurs, resident in this city. To it belong some eighty ladies, all accomplished musicians, and a proportional number of gentlemen. They give concerts occasionally, during the season, whereto those only are admitted who are subscribing members, and such others as they may invite. In what other city of the land could such concerts as these be given?

New York may say, behold our Philharmonic! Boston may point to her Handel and Haydn, and Mendelssohn, and Philadelphia to her Musical Fund. But these do not square with the case we have put: an association, of ladies and gentlemen, from the circles of private society, giving first class concerts, and in first class style.

And while this is doing in the vocal way, we are pleased to hear that our new "Cecilia Music Society" are determined, this season, to give four grand instrumental concerts, and that they have already commenced their regular rehearsals, with such a view. In the same way which has proved so successful in the management of the New York Philharmonic, seeking no pecuniary benefit for themselves, they have resolved to ask the coöperation of a music-loving community, and to invite honorary memberships on these very liberal terms: One gentleman and lady, per annum, $5. Family tickets, (five tickets to each concert,) $10, the subscribers, on these terms, having the privilege of attending all the rehearsals.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Dec. 9. The manager of our Italian Opera is a shrewd observer of human nature. He knows that people now, as in the days of Father Adam, hanker after forbidden fruit, and so he offered them the Traviata—not on account of its musical merit, but simply because it had attained a certain doubtful reputation, which would arouse curiosity, and for the satisfaction of which curiosity people would pay. The anathemas hurled upon this opera by the English press have been re-echoed and commented upon by the American Press, and it is amusing to notice the difference of opinion expressed by our musical critics. Mr. Seymour, the critic of the Times, treats the contested point of the immorality of the opera in his usual light, facetious style, considering it as of no special moment. Mr. Fry of the Tribune ignores the suggestions of the story altogether. The critics of the Courier and Evening Mirror apologize for the opera, attribute any disapprobation to excessive and false prudery, while the Post, Express, and Day Book condemn the work as unfit for public presentation.

And I must agree with these latter critics, for certainly the career of a prostitute is not a fit subject to be brought into public notoriety, and especially in a manner that arouses for the guilty creature not merely pity, but a lively sympathy. The opening scene of the opera is one which it is improper even to name, and indeed no extended critique on the plot can be written, without introducing language unfit to appear in your columns. The Express gives the following synopsis of the plot, which is taken from Dumas's "Dame aux Camelias," translated into English under the title of Camille:

Violetta, the heroine, is a youthful beauty, who, in the elegant language of the libretto, has been "thrown by circumstances, and the loss of her parents in childhood, into a course of voluptuous living." In a gay company she meets with Alfred, a young gentleman, who falls in love with her, and whose affection she returns; they retire to the country to live in seclusion; but shortly their rural felicity is invaded by Germont, who, in Alfred's absence, announces himself to Violetta as his father, represents to her the ruinous consequences of his son's present course, and with amiable generosity urges her to leave him (Alfred) forever. In her anxiety for his welfare, she immediately departs for Paris, and, plunging again into the vortex of dissipation, in the course of time again encounters Alfred. He, unaware of the cause of her desertion, flings her miniature at her feet and upbraids her as the cause of his misery. Violetta, broken-hearted, seeks her home to die, but on her death-bed a gleam of joy shines on her troubled career; she receives a letter from her lover's father, telling her that, moved by her noble self-sacrifice, of the extent of which he was not at first aware, he cannot resist her sufferings, and is about to bring his son again to her feet. While reading this letter, Germont and Alfred arrive; but it is too late; the guilty woman, overcome by sudden rapture, dies in her lover's arms.

The music is really very pretty, though not equal to Verdi's more celebrated works. It appears to be hurriedly written, and the instrumentation is poorly worked up; but there are a number of airs easily caught by the ear. Most of the opera is written in waltz time, and has a light, pleasing effect, though seldom rising to dignity, except in the closing scenes and the finale of the third act, which is one of those effective concerted pieces that will rank with the finale of the third act in Ernani, the Quatuor in Rigoleto, and some other of Verdi's finest inspirations. The opera is plentifully sprinkled with drinking songs and Bacchanalian music, and there is a very curious gipsies' chorus, sung with an accompaniment of tambourines, strangely suggestive of the Tambourine song in the "Star of the North." And indeed there are very many passages in the opera that sound familiar to the ear—faint echoes of Trovatore, Ernani, and even of operas of other composers.

One peculiarity of Verdi, and one which other composers would do well to imitate, is, that he always works his operas up with a view to climactic effect. The last act is always the finest; and whatever the former portions may have been, there is no disappointment in the finale. So it is with La Traviata, the last act being one of the most effective in some respects that I now remember. The scene is in the private apartment of Violetta, where the poor "lost one," deserted by her lover, and loaded with his reproaches, is lying broken-hearted on a bed of sickness. With the assistance of her maid she rises, and in a delicate scena bewails her hapless fate, while a strong contrast to her swan-like song is heard in a Bacchanalian chorus outside her window. Alfred then rushes in, assuring Violetta of his forgiveness, and in a sweet duet they fondly sing of future joys. But a death-like pallor overspreads the countenance of the fair and frail lorette; her last hour is at hand, and even the joy of forgiveness cannot wholly heal the broken heart or restore the wasted frame. With a last request to her lover to reverse her memory and forgive her crimes, the death-rattle overcomes her voice, the flushed cheek loses its color, the bright eye becomes glazed and dim, and with one last gasp, she dies in her lover's arms.

Each representation of this opera has attracted crowded houses, and it nightly becomes more popular; the immorality of the story is wholly overlooked in the beauty of the music.

As I have occupied so much of your space with La Traviata, I cannot dwell upon the other musical attractions offered to us. THALBERG continues his successful career, and leaves us this week for Boston (?). The PYNB and HARRISON Opera Troupe commence an engagement at Niblo's next week, and our Italian Opera troupe leave us for Havana.

TROVATOR.

Musical Intelligence.

MANCHESTER, N. H.—Mr. STRATTON's Second Orchestral Concert took place last week. He had the vocal aid of Mr. and Mrs. Mozart, of this city, and of the "German Trio," (Messrs. Gartner, Hause and Jungnickel.) Mr. Stratton's Overture No. 2 was well received. So was of course the "Wedding March." The Mirror says:

The concert, as a whole, gave perfect satisfaction to the large audience, and won new laurels for Mr. Stratton as a musician and conductor. He has his orchestra under complete control, and everything goes like clock-work. One of the Boston performers remarked that "there could not be found (out of Boston) in this part of the country, an orchestra so well drilled and complete as this," which, no doubt, is true.

(The following items were crowded out last week.)

PHILADELPHIA.—Fitzgerald "cannot find words" (yet does find them, glowing and good ones, too,) "to express the perfect satisfaction and fullness of delight" which he experienced in hearing THALBERG. Of course the material and personnel of his Philadelphia concerts are the same as in New York. He was to give three, oscillating back and forth between the two cities.

There have been plenty of concerts in the Quaker city this past fortnight. On Monday the Musical Union performed Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" before a large audience. Mr. Henry Thunder presided at the organ; the principal singers were the Misses Heron, Mr. Rudolphsen and Sig. Cortesi....Mr. John Bayley has given several morning orchestral concerts, (at the hour of 12 M.); the programmes light and miscellaneous, the orchestra "well drilled, very large, and in its character of tone reminding one of the old Germania Society."....The Handel and Haydn Society last week inaugurated a new Music Hall with choruses, organ performances, and the particular attraction of Gottschalk's brilliant pianism. The special object was to try the organ, one of Appleton's, purchased from a society in Boston. Of the new Hall Fitzgerald says:

It is not very large, about thirty-six feet wide, and a hundred in length; a gallery at the south end adds a hundred seats to the capacity of the room, and we should think that the entire saloon could be made to accommodate, by crowding, nearly a thousand persons. It could not have been fuller than it was last night. The ceiling is twenty-five feet high, and handsomely decorated; the walls are tastefully frescoed, and the appearance of the room would be beautiful were it not for the windows, which are much too tall for their width. The organ of the Handel & Haydn Society occupies the northern end of the Hall, standing on the floor, reaching to the ceiling, and wedged in between the private boxes, so that the sound is completely boxed up.

The City Item says: The first public rehearsal of the Germania Orchestra took place on Saturday afternoon at the Musical Fund Hall, and we are happy to say, for the credit of Philadelphia, that it was largely attended by the best people of our city, and that the music was listened to with care, the rehearsal being regarded as a concert, rather than as a conversazione. The selection of music was of a popular character, and the excellence of the orchestra was well displayed by the varied character of the pieces chosen. The members are nearly all solo performers, and, inspired by a true love and appreciation of the art, they give correct, feeling interpretations of the music they play. The overtures to Zampa and Martha were given with great spirit and effect. A waltz, by Lanner, was warmly applauded, and quite a sensation was created by the splendid manner in which a transcription of the Anvil Chorus, from Il Trovatore, was performed. The celebrated Terzetto from Attila, was played with much expression, by the first Horn, Bassoon, and Clarinet. At the second Rehearsal the choice of pieces was admirable. We were too late to hear the "William Tell" Overture, but were too much gratified with the selection from Lucrezia Borgia, which was played with great spirit. An allegretto from one of Beethoven's symphonies afforded some idea of the manner in which the Germanians can play classical music; and we hope to hear the C Minor or some parts of it, at some of these rehearsals. The "Anvil Chorus" was repeated, by particular request, and was encored of course.

The First Concert of the Musical Fund Society was given at the Hall, last evening, (Tuesday) and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, a very large audience assembled to enjoy the programme prepared. The concert was perfectly successful, and passed off with spirit. Madame De Lagrange was received with much applause, and sang with her usual brilliancy, although it seemed to us, as though her voice had been somewhat over-exerted of late. Brignoli was encored in the beautiful romanza from L'Etoile du Nord, which he rendered with much good taste. The orchestra, which was strong and effective, performed the overture to Robert le Diable, and one of the three composed by Beethoven, for his opera of Leonora (Fidelio). It also sustained its part in Weber's concerto for orchestra and piano, Gottschalk presiding at the latter, and adding to his well-earned laurels by his excellent reading of this classical work. Indeed, it appeared to us that we had never heard this pianist to such advantage as at this concert; he performed Henselt's "Si l'oiseau j'étais," a Nocturne by Chopin, this Concerto, and several of his own compositions, so that by the various styles, his facility of execution and his expression were unusually well exhibited.

NEW ORLEANS.—Our opera has commenced in good earnest and with the promise of good success. Mr. Boudousquie has now shown us his resources, and they have been proved to be equal to our most exacting demands. We have a good prima donna, in grand opera, in Mlle. Muller; another, in comic opera, in Mme. Colson; two fine tenors, in Messrs. Delagrave and Moulin; a fine baritone, in Mr. Magne; and excellent basses in Messrs. Junca and Guillot; while the bulk of the operatic company, including the orchestra and chorus, are equal to any emergency.

English opera has a good beginning, too, at the Gaitey, where Mr. Crisp has produced Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," Auber's "Fra Diavolo," and Brougham's burlesque of "Po-ca-hon-tas," in very acceptable style. Rosalie Durand, Georgiana Hodson, Messrs. Frazer, Stretton, Lyster and Trevor have proved themselves adequate to the performance of operas in admirable style, and we are to have "Midas," "Freischütz," "Daughter of the Regiment," and other lyric pieces, in convenient succession.—Picayune, Nov. 16.

Foreign.

LONDON.—Don Giovanni was brought out on the 16th ult. at Drury Lane. GRISI, as Donna Anna, "looked, acted and sang with all the power and beauty she has ever displayed at any period of her career." M. GASSIER is pronounced a really good Giovanni, handsome, gentlemanlike, and a truly admirable singer. Mme. GASSIER's Zerlina and Mme. RUDESDORFF's Elvira, too, are highly praised. HERR FORMES was the Commendatore, and Signors LORINI and ROVERE (well known on this side) took the parts of Don Ottavio and Leporello. The latter seems to have given great satisfaction.....JULIEN continues his mammoth miscellanies at Her Majesty's Theatre. The second half of the last concert we find noticed, was composed of selections (instrumental of course) from Verdi's Traviata. Among his recent assistants have been Miss CATHARINE HAYES, Miss DOLBY, Miss ARABELLA GODDARD the pianist, and "Signor MILLARDI."....The Sacred Harmonic Society, Nov.

23, performed Handel's "Solomon.".....Handel's "Israel in Egypt" opened Mr. Hullah's winter season at St. Martin's Hall.

PARIS, Nov. 12.—(Corr. Lond. Mus. World).—The Opéra-Comique is quite in vogue just now. Jean de Paris, one of Boieldieu's most popular works, has been brought out for the debut of M. Stockhausen (well known in the concert-rooms of London) in the part of the Sénéchal. He has a baritone voice of considerable range, and he sings with taste. As an actor M. Stockhausen is awkward and stiff—faults that may be attributed to inexperience. Mlle. Boulart, in the part of the Queen of Navarre, showed herself an agreeable vocalist. In the air, "Beau troubadour," she was warmly and deservedly applauded. M. Delaunay Riquier was not quite "the thing" in the part of Jean; the music is much too high for him. M. Lemaire was very amusing as the Aubergiste. The opera altogether was successful.

Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord has nearly accomplished its two hundredth representation. A new "sensation" is experienced by the blasi Parisians in witnessing the charming performance of Mme. Cabel in Catarina, and the Opéra Comique is crowded every night the Etoile du Nord is played. The parts in which the acting of Mme. Cabel is seen to the best advantage, are in the finale to the second act, when, condemned to death by the inebriated Peter, she endeavors to recall herself to his remembrance and fails. The intense grief expressed in her countenance, as she is led away by the soldiers to be shot, is natural in the extreme. In the last act, when Catarina, almost bereft of her senses, is recalled to reason by the encounter with her brother, &c., Mme. Cabel is equally effective and charming. In the first act, her physical capabilities are less manifestly equal to her "good intentions." The singing of Mme. Cabel throughout the opera is perfect. Her vocalization, and the ease with which she overcomes all sorts of difficulties, place her in the first rank of those who have made the Opéra-Comique one of the greatest attractions of the "metropolis of amusements."

The "star" at the Italiens lately has been Alboni, who, as Ninetta in the Gazza Ladra, has made a positive furor. It is unnecessary to describe her performance of a part in which she has been heard and admired so much in London. Suffice it that the incomparable cantatrice was enthusiastically applauded throughout the opera, and recalled at the end with acclamations. There is no "claque" at this theatre. Mario has arrived, and it is expected will make his rentrée in the Puritani. The next novelty will be Mlle. Piccolomini in the Traviata. The greatest excitement prevails among the dilettanti, and every place has been bespoken, although the precise night of her debut has not yet been fixed. Quite the talk of the town is the visit paid by the little vocalist to the Vaudeville to witness the Dame aux Camelias, the original of the Traviata. Piccolomini was so affected by the performance of Mlle. Doche, that she "wept like a child."

At the Académie-Imperiale the long expected opera, La Rose de Florence, by M. Biletta, composer of White Magic, was produced on Monday night in presence of the Emperor and Empress. The piece is not worthy a place in the répertoire of the grand opera. It would suit the Vaudeville and theatres of that calibre; or it would make a very good ballet. Indeed it bears some resemblance to a ballet produced some time since under the title of La Jolie fille de Gand. M. Biletta's music does not make us forget the poverty of the libretto. It is a succession of dance-tunes. The length of time this opera has been in preparation, and the frequent delays in its production, caused a great deal of curiosity to hear it, but "the mountain brought forth a mouse." The theatre was crowded, and the "claque" in great force.

Nov. 22.—One of the most brilliant audiences of the season was attracted to the Theatre-Italien on Saturday last, to witness the performance of Il Barbiere di Siviglia with ALBONI as Rosina, and MARIO as Count Almaviva, (who made his rentrée on this occasion.) Alboni was in splendid voice, and sang magnificently. In "Una voce" she was rapturously encored, and in the "lesson scene," her wonderful execution of Hummel's variations excited the audience to a degree of enthusiasm seldom given way to by the aristocratic abonnés of the Theatre-Italien. Mario has seldom been in better voice than he was on Saturday. His reception was very cordial, and after he had been encored in "Ecco ridente," which he sang to perfection, he was recalled, to receive again the applause of the audience. Sig. Corsi made a very intelligent Figaro. Signors Zucchini and Angelini, as Dr. Bartolo and Don Basilio, assisted materially in strengthening the ensemble, and the opera has rarely been better played in the ancient Salle Ventadour than on the present occasion. Sig. Bottesini presided in the orchestra.

BERLIN.—Herren Oertling, Rehbaum, Wendt, and Birnbach, have announced a new quartet, by Herr Voigt, at their next Quartet Soirée. Herr Voigt was a pupil of the Academy of Music here, and carried off several prizes. Herr B. Klein's oratorio of Jephtha was lately produced, under the direction of Herr Frantz, in the Nicolai-Kirche. It was pretty well received, and tolerably executed, although the performers were selected from different Gesangvereine, and co-operated for the first time, probably, with Herr Frans's orchestra. The first Quartet Soirée of Herren Laub, Radecke, Wüst, and Brauns, took place on the 29th ultimo, in Arnim's small room. The principal features in the programme were Mendelssohn's quartet in E minor, and Beethoven's in E major. On the 30th ultimo, the members of the Singacademie, with the assistance of Liebig's orchestra, performed Sebastian Bach's grand mass, in B minor. The execution, however, of this fine work was far from being all that could be desired.

Nov. 22.—The principal event, this week, at the Royal Opera-house, has been the début of Mlle. Jenny Bauer from London. The part she selected for her first appearance before a Berlin public was that of Susanna, in Le Nozze di Figaro. Her performance gave great satisfaction to a very numerous audience, and she was called on during the fourth act.—Iphigenia in Aulis was performed on the 19th inst., in celebration of Her Majesty's birthday.—Concerts have been most numerous lately. The little Arthur Napoleon gave one, his last, in the Engliches Haus, on the 4th inst., when he played, with Herren Espenhahn, Bial, and Wendt, a quartet in G minor, by Mozart. He also performed Schulhoff's "Airs Bohémiens," Chopin's Notturmo in F minor, and A. Schmidt's Allegro Scherzo.—On Thursday, 6th inst., Herr Liebig gave his third soirée for classical orchestral music, in the Singacademie. The programme included Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, Haydn's Symphony in F major, Mendelssohn's Hebrides overture, and Mozart's symphony in C major with fugue.—On Friday, the 7th, Herren A. Grünwald and R. Radeke gave their first soirée of Chamber Music in the Engliches Haus. They were not particularly successful in Mozart's sonata in A major, for piano and violin, but Herr Radeke made up for this by his artistic execution of Beethoven's sonata, Op. 111. The same composer's serenade, for violin, viola, and violoncello, was splendidly played by Herren Grünwald, Wendt, and Espenhahn, and greatly applauded. On Saturday, the 8th inst., Herren Zimmermann, Ronneberger, Richter and Espenhahn commenced their Quartet Versammlung in the Singacademie with a quartet of Haydn in B major, cah. 11, No. 3. This was followed by Mozart's quartet in A major, and Beethoven's seventh in F major. The last was certainly the great attraction of the evening. A concert in memory of Mendelssohn has been given by Stern's Gesangverein in Arnim's Rooms. Herr Stern himself accompanied on the piano. The ninety-fifth Psalm was first sung. This was followed by the "Walpurgisnacht," and Herr Laub performed the celebrated violin concerto in a masterly style. Billert's Gesangverein will perform two grand oratorios this winter: on Friday, the 6th December, Ferdinand Hiller's Zerstörung Jerusalems, and on Friday, the 20th February, 1867, Dr. Louis Spohr's Letzte Dinge. Liebig's orchestra will furnish the accompaniment.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 13, 1856.

"WHY PUBLISH THAT?" is a question often asked us with regard to certain articles, which we translate or copy, and which do not always accord with the opinions of the querist, and possibly seem even to conflict with well-known tastes and convictions of our own, which give what may be called the tone to our Journal. Pray, gentle reader, do not delude yourself with the idea that we endorse whatever we put into our miscellaneous reading matter. Many things we copy for no better reason than that they are curious or amusing;—many things which are not even amusing to ourselves, nay, positively dull and almost insignificant, but because they form a part of that great musical world whereof we are expected to report;—many things from which we utterly dissent in principle, and which to our mind indicate a false direction and false taste, but which it is well for all of us to note now and then, as signs of what is going on.

In a recent number two long articles provoked the query. One was an article, which we took perhaps too much pains to translate, giving an account of an effort lately made by Liszt and one of his remarkable pupils to introduce in Germany a Lisztian style of organ-playing. This questionable phenomenon, or "notion," as we say in Yankee land, was exciting not a little attention in Young Germany. It could do no harm to let our readers see the monster and judge for themselves. We do not always in such cases feel that we need add our comments, when the whole tone and direction of our paper in the long run yields the comment. We might have condensed the story to an item of ten lines. But the article was a glowing one, spirited and well written, and contained some excellent ideas about virtuoso-players, and about the humbug of "classicality" affected by such virtuosos. At any rate it told in quite an amusing way of queer things going on in high quarters of the world of Art; and as we are bound to furnish a certain amount of pleasant reading to offset our own dullness, we are sometimes tempted to present such a thing in full.

Another offense was the copying of the Athenæum's review of Berlioz's treatise upon Instrumentation. When such an important work appears, do we not do well to let our readers see how it strikes eminent critics of various leanings, and from various points of view? And have we not all seen enough of the peculiar crotchety humors of Mr. CHORLEY, (when he denounces Schumann, for instance, in his wholesale way,) to make allowance therefor, while we enjoy the real vigor of the man, and profit by his learning and acumen? We had long waited in the hope of seeing and judging of the work for ourselves. Meanwhile what better than to show our readers what is thought of it in higher quarters, we all of us reserving our own criticism? Chorley came first, and we took him. He shows us possibly the worst side, all the faults which a fault-finding mind could pick out. Now we are prepared for the best criticism on the other side, and we shall be happy to present such to our readers when we find it. Still happier to report at first hand of our own impressions, since, thanks to the courtesy of Mr. Novello's agent in New York, the book, in English and in elegant form, now lies before us;—although we should not for a moment dream of measuring our capacity to fathom such a work with Mr. Chorley's. Yet we may judge of the opinions of our betters.

The objects of a musical Art journal—a weekly journal, which partakes imperfectly on both sides of the miscellaneous hurried daily newspaper and the deliberate Review—are more than one, and not confined to the advocacy in every page and paragraph of certain all important doctrines and opinions about Art. One object is simply news; and this we give not only in the condensed form of news, but sometimes also by letting other writers, who stand in a different relation to a matter from that we chance to occupy, speak for themselves: just as a political newspaper may publish without comment an opponent's speech. One important function of a journal is simply to mirror all that it can of the great multifarious world, and of the ways in which masses, parties, or single representative minds, view it. And it is a comfort sometimes to enjoy or hate the picture, without having the exhibitor interpose his comments.

Another object, as we have said, is simply to amuse; by pleasant and piquant varieties, not in themselves uninteresting, to attract and reconcile to other earnest matter. A certain quantity of gossip is not to be despised. Even rumors must be noticed, though they should turn out unfounded as the idle wind.

Again, what we pride ourselves upon is a certain hospitality to others' thoughts and tastes.

In our own person, in an editorial article, of course, we speak our own tastes and convictions; we can speak no other; we cannot by any force of will affect a preference or a liking which we do not feel. But there are large classes, whose tastes are to be respected, who attach much higher consequence to certain schools or certain artists than we find it in us to do. To these we would be just and even hospitable. Again and again have we invited such—for instance, those who think Italian Opera the crowning flower of music—to set forth their own views (within certain obviously necessary restrictions) in our columns. We invite upon our platform those who differ from us, so they be courteous, reasonable, and not dull. Our friends to whom we are indebted now and then for correspondence, often write from quite another standpoint, both of taste and culture, from that with which we most sympathize; yet not the less have they our thanks, for helping us to make our paper useful and acceptable to many readers.

We have said more than we intended, and yet not enough. We shall have to return to this matter and make a fuller exposition of our theory and (we would we might say more confidently) our practice of musical journalism.

New Music.

From OLIVER DITSON, Boston, we have:

1. Several more numbers of the German Chorales, as harmonized by JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH, with English words, nearly completing the promised twelve. Choral societies will do well, for themselves, and for the cause of a high, pure taste in music, to avail themselves of such excellent material for practice. Their beauty does not wear out with their novelty, which is more than we can say of many of the new pieces sent us every week.

2. Thirty-six Vocalists for Soprano or Tenor voices, in modern style, by MARCO BORDOGNI; Book second; pp. 49. The name of the author, the late master of singing in the Conservatoire of Paris, is warrant enough of the excellence of these exercises. Simply as music, they are more interesting than half of the newest Italian melodies which just now enjoy an ephemeral favor.

3. Favorite Songs, Duets, &c. of MOZART, arranged by WESLEY. Two more of the forty odd promised; namely, the Serenade: Deh vieni, from Don Juan, for baritone, and the pretty duet for soprani from the "Marriage of Figaro": Sull aria.

4. Selections from Verdi's later operas, including two of a series from La Traviata, one of which, a minor Aria: Ah! forse è lui, is quaintly Verdi-ish; a Barcarolle for four voices from Les Vêpres Siciliennes, which is light and Epicurean, hardly redeemed from commonplace by some modulations in the latter part. Also a Quatuor from "Macbeth": Sanguis a me, translated and adapted by T. T. BARKER—this last forming one of Ditson's long series of concerted pieces, under the title of "The Harp of Italy."

5. Twelve Two-Part Songs by KÜCKEN, ABT, MENDELSSOHN, &c. No. 2. "O how sweet the Hunter's Song," by Kücken.—Eight Four-part Songs for men's voices, by Abt. No. 3. "The Huntsman's Song." Both simple and spirited, but not in any way original or striking.

6. Easy Piano-forte pieces for four hands. a) Morceaux Elegantes on favorite operatic themes, by THEO. OESTEN: No. 3, from La Sonnambula, 11 pages. b) Revue Melodique, by F. BEYER, another collection of little operatic fantasias; No. 3, from Norma, 11 pages.

7. More difficult, for two hands. a) Raymond, ou la Secret de la Reine, brilliant Fantasia by H. ROSELLEN, op. 130, on themes from the French opera by AMBROSE THOMAS, pp. 15. b) Music on the Waters, a salon piece, being one of three grouped under the title of "Chimes and Rhymes," by ALBERT LINDAHL, a sort of song without words, Allegro agitato, in continuous semi-quavers, which require a practised hand to render evenly and neatly.

8. a) Never Give Up, by GEO. J. WEBB, words by TUPPER. The melody is simple, and seizes the spirit of the words—well calculated to be popular. b) Wayside Flowers of France and Italy, translated and adapted by T. T. BARKER: No. 5. La Stella d'Amore (Star of Love), a pretty Barcarole by COSTA.

Musical Chat-Chat.

We are happy to learn that Mr. ZERRAHN finds, so far, great encouragement in his efforts to secure subscribers to his proposed Orchestral, or as he calls them, "PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS," of which we spoke last week. To save time and decide the question quickly, he now invites music-lovers (at the same time that a canvasser is going round) to call at the music stores, where they may read the terms and subscribe for the series. See advertisement..... The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB at their third concert, next Tuesday evening, will have for pianist that modest, sterling artist, Mr. TRENKLE, who will play in a Duo with 'cello by Mendelssohn, and a couple of solo pieces by Chopin. A new string Quartet by the young Rubenstein and Beethoven's Septet will be leading features in the programme. We trust that Chickering's beautiful saloon will be very full.GUSTAV SATTER, the pianist, will give another series of his "Philharmonic Soirées" this winter, at Hallet, Davis & Co.'s rooms, as formerly, and probably commencing on the 27th of this month. See his first Programme in another column; it is quite novel. The Quartet by Willmers is said to be his best composition. We should be glad to find it giving us a higher idea of the composer than the showy, pretty, sentimental concert pieces for the piano, to which we have been treated now and then by Jaell and others. Mr. S. is to be assisted from time to time by such artists as WILLIAM MASON, B. J. LANG, and a lady pupil, pianists; Messrs. SCHULTZ and ECKHARDT, violins; JUNGNIKKEL, violoncello, &c.....The GERMAN TRIO will commence their third season of six concerts at Chickering's rooms on Saturday evening, Dec. 20th, with the assistance of the "Mozart" Quartet of singers (Mr. and Mrs. MOZART, Miss TWICHELL and Mr. ADAMS). Messrs. HAUSE, GARTNER and JUNGNIKKEL will play two Piano Trios, one by Beethoven (Op. 97), and one by Rubinstein, besides each a solo....Thus there will be no lack of Chamber Concerts; yet we shall sadly miss our OTTO DRESEL, who has so far yielded to his sensitive, Chopin-like dread of concert-giving as to resolve to play no more in public, but find a purer pleasure, and, as he thinks, exert a more genuine artistic influence, by discoursing music in congenial private circles. In this he plainly sacrifices interest to a conscientious ideal. We cannot but hope, for the sake of all true lovers of music, that he will one day see the matter in a different light....Christmas comes and we have not yet heard an Oratorio or a Symphony in Boston! But the signs indicate a better time at hand. We only fear too furious a reaction in the latter part of winter. Why must it always be either a dearth or a glut of music? This does not indicate a healthy, genuine appetite.

Our German Männerchor, the "ORPHEUS," will give a series of subscription concerts in the Mercantile Library Hall, commencing early in January. Good German choruses and part-songs, solo songs by their conductor Mr. KREISSMANN, and others, piano and violin pieces by Messrs. LEONHARD and SCHULTZ, &c., will combine to furnish forth a pleasant feast.

There is no lack of musical activity in the towns and cities within easy hail of Boston. Indeed we hear of concerts—series of concerts—vocal and instrumental, classical and miscellaneous, Chamber Quartets and great Oratorios, all around us. In Lowell, Providence, Salem and Worcester there are concerts on foot. In Manchester, N. H. there is Mr. Stratton's orchestra. In Cambridge, Jamaica Plain, and we know not how many places, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and the German Trio are giving Classical Soirées in private houses. This musical appetite in the "rural districts" keeps the best singers and instrumentalists of our city busy. That excellent singer, Mrs. J. H. LONG, seems to be in demand everywhere. On Monday she sings at the annual concert of Gillmore's Band in Salem; on Tuesday at Stratton's third Orchestral Concert in Manchester; at Christmas in the first of a subscription series at Lowell, and so on....See NOVELLO's advertisement for a rich assortment of Christmas music—anthems, carols, &c., by the most esteemed authors, published in a style at once economical and elegant. Mr. G. W. WARREN's "Christmas Carol" for children, too, published by Hildley in Albany, is a lively, pretty thing, to be sung in four parts, and beautifully got up, with vignette title.

The following extract of a letter, dated at Paris, is from the pen of the eldest son of the late EDWARD SÉGUIN, a promising young American artist, who has received musical instruction at the best schools abroad: "My departure to Florence has been delayed in consequence of Mr. Panzeron advising me, by all means, to sing as his pupil at the Conservatoire examination. There were ninety aspirants, ten of whom were to be chosen out of that number. We had to be judged by Auber, Halévy, Ambroise Thomas, Caraffa, etc., etc.; and you will, I am sure, be pleased to hear that I sang a song from L'Etoile du Nord, a trio from 'G. Tell,' etc., with great success; was highly complimented by the professors, and was elected an 'Elevé du Conservatoire Imp. de Musique, Paris.' I was afraid, on account of being an American, that I should not get it; but Auber, Halévy, etc., expressed themselves greatly pleased with me, and the next thing I hope to inform you of, will be my first appearance in opera. I have had the pleasure of singing with Miss May, who leaves here on the nineteenth."

The Opera in New York closed on Wednesday evening, of course, as it begun, with Il Trovatore. There was a benefit night appended, however, for Mme. LA GRANGE, on Thursday, when she appeared both in La Traviata and the "Barber of Seville." The troupe are off immediately for Havana, and now, if never before, the semi-French city of New Orleans may boast itself the only city in the Union which supports Opera as a permanent institution. Of Verdi's Traviata, the Courier & Enquirer says: "The music is as poor as Verdi can write; that of Rigoletto, even, shines by contrast. At the end of the third act there is a careful piece of concerted writing, but as to the rest—niente, niente, niente." As to its alleged immorality, the same journal justly says:

It is true that La Traviata is a young lady whose relations to some members of the other sex are not very clearly defined; but those relations are not obtruded by the action, and would not be known to one in a hundred of the audience, were it not for the translation of the libretto which Mr. Darcy has published. Still, the story having got out, the lady must be considered improper and frowned out of good opera society, although many of those who maintain their position are no better than—she is; for instance Elvira in Don Giovanni, Leonora in La Favorita, Mrs. Norma, Mrs. Borgia, and Thisbe in Il Giuramento.

Still we are inclined to think that in the matter of moral censorship, La Traviata, taken as a whole, both musically and dramatically, is fair game, as palpably appealing to a corrupt appetite in both regards.

A marriage took place last week in one of the principal Bristol churches, (says the Musical World), which attracted great numbers to see it, owing to a report having got abroad that the bridegroom was twice before on the eve of happiness, and had gone half way to the altar, but owing to a singular nervousness, had, upon each occasion, turned heel, and made a speedy retreat from the church, not having sufficient resolution to go through the celebration. Aware of his weakness, he, it is said, candidly declared that, unless some means were adopted to give him courage, he would be sure, in spite of himself, to levitate the third time, as in the two previous instances, and suggested music as the most likely agent to sustain his self-possession. The lady's friends acted on the hint, and engaged the organist, who played vehemently during the whole ceremony. It had the desired effect; he did not run away, much, apparently, to the annoyance of the crowds assembled in and outside the church, who confidently looked out for a scene.—Everything, however, passed off as it should.

In the New York correspondence of a religious paper, the Christian Watchman and Reflector, of this city, we find a definition of Italian Opera, which is charming for its simplicity, to say the least. For instance:

What is the Italian Opera? We cannot speak from our own personal knowledge and observation. We never witnessed it. But we have witnessed incidental fragments, thrown into concerts, and we should describe it somewhat in the following manner. One dozen men and women on a stage, each with a sheet of music in their hand, and each striving to scream louder than the other, flourishing the music, and accompanying the strange sounds with violent gestures and contortions of the body, hands and head, while behind them a company of musicians make a desperate assault upon their instruments, pounding pianos, beating bass drums, tearing violins, and blowing up French horns, as if they intended their utter destruction. With a few lulls and returns, the storm finally subsides, and the performers, apparently exhausted with the laborious effort, take their seats to rest five minutes and then repeat this singular performance. Now many admirers of fine music will call all this a caricature, and charge it to our want of taste. We certainly plead guilty to the want of taste. But it is dreadful to call such performances music, and somewhat amusing to see people try hard to appreciate and pretend to admire them.

Advertisements.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's THIRD CONCERT

Will take place on TUESDAY, Dec. 16, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms, assisted by Mr. J. TRENKLE, Pianist.

A new Quartette in F, by Rubinstein, will be played for the first time. Mr. Trengle will play in Mendelssohn's B flat Duo, with 'Cello, and two Moreaux by Chopin. Beethoven's Septet and other good works will be presented.

Package of Eight Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $5; Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE undersigned proposes to give a series of FOUR Orchestral Concerts as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall be obtained. Subscriptions received at Wade's music store, 197 Washington Street, and Russell & Richardson's, 18 Tremont, or 232 Washington Street, where the prospectus may be seen.

CARL ZERRAHN.

GUSTAVE SATTER'S PHILHARMONIC SOIRÉES. FIRST EVENING.

PROGRAMME.

- 1—Quartet: G minor,.....R. WILLMERS.
- 2—a) Mazurka,
b) Nocturne, } (first time,).....G. SATTER.
c) Scherzo,
- 3—a) Constancy: Song, }.....G. SATTER.
b) Clélie: Ballad,
- 4—Sonata (Kreutzer) for Piano and Violin,.....BEETHOVEN.
- 5—Reminiscence de "Robert le Diable,".....FRANZ LISST.

The Concerts (three in number) will take place at Messrs. HALLET, DAVIS & Co.'s Piano Rooms, on evenings to be hereafter specified. Among the Artists who will assist during the Series, may be mentioned Messrs. WILLIAM MASON, SCHULTZ, JUNGNIKKEL, ECKHARDT, B. J. LANG, and others.

—THE— Modern School for the Piano-Forte

IS THE Best Instruction Book ever published!

It has been awarded the first Prize Medal at the late Exhibition of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, and is recommended by

- | | |
|-------------------|----------------------|
| S. THALBERG, | A. DREYCHOCK, |
| A. JAEHL, | WM. MASON, |
| OTTO DRESEL, | JULIUS KNORR, |
| Dr. LOWELL MASON, | GEO. J. WEBB, |
| W. B. BRADBURY, | G. F. ROOT, |
| B. F. BAKER, | and over 200 others, |

Comprising Music Teachers, Principals of Seminaries, Amateurs, &c. &c. If you wish to buy the best book, that will teach you to play in the shortest time, it is the

MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE PIANO-FORTE, BY NATHAN RICHARDSON.

Price Three Dollars.

PUBLISHED BY RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, Boston,
And for sale by all Music Dealers in the United States.

....A....
CHRISTMAS CAROL,
 WRITTEN BY THE
 REV. T. A. STARKEY,
 MUSIC BY
 GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN.
 —ALSO—
 THIRD EDITION OF WARREN'S
BOBOLINK POLKA,
 JUST PUBLISHED BY
J. H. HIDLEY,
 544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
 WESTFIELD, MASS.

Piano-Forte Instruction.
Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
 RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

THE FIFTH THOUSAND OF
 THE GOLDEN WREATH,
 IS now ready. The demand for this new volume of Vocal Instruction exceeds that of any Juvenile Book of the kind ever issued. It is adopted wherever known, teachers and scholars being at once convinced of its superior merit as a method of instruction, while its 150 pieces of the most popular music render it not only the best but the cheapest book for Schools. Price only 80 cts. $3 per doz.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,
Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
 806 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
 Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

J. H. HIDLEY,
PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
 And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
 544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.
WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.
 Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced price.
 THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbaud, a few copies.
 Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.
 Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1866. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1866. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland; all held during the month of September, 1866:—making Six First Premiums in one month!!
 N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIRST PRIZES over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal base. The one with pedal base contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $60 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.
 For descriptive circulars and further information address
MASON & HAMLIN,
 Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ma.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,
 FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
 Gives Instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
 TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
 FLUTE AND SINGING.

Mrs. CARL ZERRAHN,
 TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
 Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
 Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
 U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Anthems for the Coming Season.
Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
 (Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

Anthems for Christmas.
HOPKINS, M. J.—Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, S. A. T. B., 19 cts. Single vocal parts, 13 cts. Class copy, 8 cts.
CROCE—Behold, I bring you glad tidings: S. A. T. B., 19 cts.
GREENE—Behold, I bring you glad tidings: for two Trebles or Tenors, with Chorus for four voices, 38 cents. Separate vocal parts, 22 cents.
HANDEL—For behold darkness. Recit. } 13 cents.
 The people that walked in darkness. Air. }
 For unto us a Child is born. 81 cts. Sep. voc. parts, 25 cts.
 Behold, a Virgin shall conceive; and O! thou that tellest;
 Alto Solo and Chorus, 81 cts. Ditto, 8vo. 6 cts. Separate vocal parts, 25 cts.
JACKSON, (Masham.)—Short and Easy Anthems, suitable for Country Choirs:—
 Sing, O heavens! (4 voices,) 25 cts. Sep. vocal parts, 13 cts.
 O Zion! that bringest good tidings, (4 voices,) 68 cts.
 O! come hither and behold, (4 voices,) 68 cts.
NOVELLO—Sing unto the Lord: Short Anthem for S. A. T. B. with a Verse for Four Trebles, 19 cts. Small class copy, in score, 8 cts. Separate vocal parts, 16 cts.
PURCELL—Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings: In full score. Verse, A. T. B. 68 cts. Separate chorus parts, 13 cts.
 Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings, (abridged from the above,) from Boyce's Cathedral Music. Verse, A. T. B. 25 cts. Separate vocal parts, 22 cts.
VITTORIA—Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings: S. A. T. B., Folio size, 19 cts. Class copy, in score, 8 cts.

Carols for Christmas-tide,
 Set to Ancient Melodies, by the Rev. THOMAS HELMOR, M. A.
 Words, principally in imitation of the original, by the Rev. J. M. NEALE, M. A.
 18mo size, 13
 " post-free, 15
 " in packets of 50, 5 00
 " bound in scarlet cloth, 25
 " compressed four vocal parts, 25

These Carols may be sung by a Solo voice, with accompaniment for the Piano and Organ, in which form they are printed in Music Folio. Ad libitum vocal parts for Alto, Tenor, and Bass, have been added, in order that, when these voices are present, the harmony may be rendered complete without an instrument. The Volume, folio music size, $1.13.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,
 389 Broadway, New York,
 And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
 47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI
 IS now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
 (Late at St. Paul's Church.)
ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
 ALBANY, N. Y.

OTTO DRESSEL
 Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
 MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
 OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
 Instructor of the Piano-forte, Organ & Harmony,
 8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST PRIES,
 Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.
 RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
 Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

JOB PRINTING
 OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
 EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
 No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
 Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
 BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
 MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
 10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ma.
 PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
 HAVE REMOVED TO
 No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
 NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
 TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
 Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
 OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
 Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
 IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
 701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
 CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
 Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
 A Paper of Art and Literature,
 Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
 Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
 Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.
 First insertion, per line, 10 cts.
 Each subsequent insertion, per line, 5 cts.
 For one column, (126 lines) first insertion, $12.00
 do each subsequent, $6 00
 Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
 Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 246.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 12.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Theodore de Witt.

(Translated for this Journal, from the Supplement to the Conversations-lexicon.)

THEODORE DE WITT, a descendent of the famous family in the Netherlands, to which belonged the two patriots murdered by the people in the time of Louis XIV., was the son of John de Witt, a music teacher and organist yet living in Niederwesel. Under his father's instruction he made such remarkable progress that he ventured in his seventh year to let himself be heard in public. Gifted in his childhood with really striking beauty and with a wonderfully fine soprano voice, he exercised a rare attraction upon everybody. Without having studied counterpoint, he composed pieces in which not an error could be found. A musician, who would not believe that the boy was able to do such things without help from others, gave him one day a theme and shut him up with it. In this solitude Witt set a piece of music, of which the most thoroughly-trained musician would not have been ashamed. His first proper instruction in the theory of music he received through Bischof, the (to musicians) well-known director of the gymnasium of Wesel. His attention had been attracted to the boy in a concert, which he gave in his own name at the age of eleven years.

At the age of seventeen Witt conceived the resolution of going to Berlin, there to educate himself as a musician. Without means and without friends, he relied with the naive confidence of youth on good men, who should make his hard way easy. He was commended to Felix Mendelssohn; but all the aid he got from him consisted in an earnest dissuasion from the musical career; and he even refused his request for a free ticket to one of his oratorios. Piano-forte teaching, too, by which he sought the means of living, would not go at first, the extreme youth of the teacher being the greatest obstacle in his way. Such bitter experiences only added spurs to his zeal, and it was not long before Witt earned the couple of thalers, which he had to give Professor Dehn for each hour of instruction. Moreover, he needed for his studies costly works, and so he had to let his body suffer all the more, as he was tormented by those social requirements which no young musician can escape; not seldom did he make music late into the night, and then walk a long way home through snow and ice, and by seven o'clock the next morning be ready again to give lessons.

Witt sought to distinguish himself not merely as a composer, but also as a piano-player. In this latter character he made LISZT his model. In this he did not strive to conquer technical difficulties for the sake of performing wonderful artistic feats, but because he said to himself that in this way the power of musical interpretation would be enlarged and the most soul-ful delivery of the older works be rendered possible. He practised away as his own teacher, and invented a system of finger exercises, which was calculated to put aside all special mannerism and lead to the mastery of the most-difficult tone-figures. A man who has often heard him, says in the Allgemeine Zeitung, that as a piano-player he has rivalled MENDELSSOHN. "Especially charming was his delivery of the latter's 'Songs without Words,' which he rendered as impartially and lovingly as if the chords gushed from his own artistic soul. He had not much real sympathy with this sort of music, and he despised the public which was carried away by the sensuous charms herein presented. Yet he only indulged in this severity of judgment towards those who had the capacity of comprehending something higher. Above all was he happy in the rendering of BEETHOVEN'S masterworks. These, under his mode of treatment, became really popular. The impenetrable difficulties which we used to hear complained of, vanished before this practical unfolding of the musical idea. To hear him present these divine tone-pictures was not merely a single enjoyment, but also the source of the richest instruction. One might say that his illustrations bore about the same relation to the thoughts of the great master, as set down in notes, that an engraving of MARCO ANTONIO does to one of RAPHAEL'S sketches, which have served and satisfied him for a model. Free from ornament, as there, but clear, full and noble, came out every single idea from the foaming waves of tone, and the rhythm, of which a deep understanding seemed inborn in him, reigned with an unswerving omnipotence in his harmonic play, just as in painting a firm comprehension of form reigns in the midst of a brilliant rendering of color, the one-sided predominance of which after a while excites in a true artist the same loathing that Witt felt in listening to pieces of the New Romantic music which were piped to him upon his sick bed frequently for days and weeks together."

His undeveloped physique was ill calculated in the long run for such manifold exertions. One evening in bed Witt had an attack of bleeding, which robbed him of his speech. Only on the next morning did the maid find him in his blood. As soon as he had sufficiently recovered, he went home to seek a fuller cure at a retired country house. After a year's respite he was again in Berlin, and now directed all his study to the Fugue. Here again he overtaxed his strength, until one day he sank powerless from his seat, and was taken with a nervous fever, which, with an intermittent character, never left him till his death. At the baths of Heringsdorf, where his physician sent him, he made the acquaintance of EMANUEL GEIBEL and Chancellor von DACHROEDEN. Geibel wrote songs, Witt set them to music and Dachroeden sang them. Afterwards Meyerbeer rescued him from his embarrassments, by procuring for him from the king of Prussia a stipend for a year's journey to Italy. When he made his appearance at Rome, some of his works were published, but more were refused by the publishers. Some compositions which he prepared for another musician, and which that other gave out as his own, had procured for the latter a lucrative place from the then minister, Eichhorn; but he himself got only a beggarly quit-tance.

In the autumn of 1850 he went to Rome. In the winter he had seldom a well moment, but in the spring he most happily revived and could resume his studies. He now composed a Christmas Cantata, which grew under his hand to a small oratorio, an Agnus Dei, Tantum ergo, and several psalms; of these works only a few have reached publication. He was recommended by distinguished connoisseurs, and yet it generally happened that the music-publishers courteously declined the works he sent them. With the Italians he found comparatively more recognition. Among those who received him with distinction, we may name especially the celebrated RAIMONDI, composer of a gigantic work upon Fugue composition, who died as maestro di capella at St. Peter's. Also many Italian virtuosos placed themselves gratuitously at his service and formed an orchestra, which under his direction studied the Beethoven symphonies. In these productions he showed the demoniacal power which he exercised over his performing musicians, and through which he carried along with him even those who were not talented. To the kindness of Chancellor von Dachröden he owed it, that the king of Prussia converted his stipend, at the moment when it ran out, into a permanent subsidy. His future was now secure.

The continual rejection of his works by publishers had indisposed him to compose more himself. He now busied himself with a critical edition of the Motets of PALESTRINA.—While he worked assiduously at these, he gradually collected around him the material for a complete edition of the works of the great master. A good edition of that sort does not exist, and there was danger that the authentic copies of Palestrina's works would go utterly to ruin. In the existing copies there is a fearful want of exactness, which perplexes even connoisseurs. To be sure, BAINI, the last chapel-master of the singing choir in the Sistine Chapel, has set the whole of Palestrina in score, and has bequeathed this work, since he was unable to bring it out himself, to the Minerva library in Rome, on the condition that it shall be published. The jealousy of the Sistine choir has not respected this bequest of Baini. The score lies buried in the archives of the Sistine, and the editions, which Baini could still use in the libraries, have now disappeared from thence. The Sistine Chapel will never publish Baini's work, for it calls it its own property, while on the other hand it is an established fact that Baini has plundered the archives of cloisters to make his edition complete.

Witt had the good fortune to hunt up the original impressions of Palestrina, and even such as were unknown to Baini. He constructed his edition in such a manner as to be equally just to the wants of the public and to the nature of the case. With him we find the modern, more easily read clefs employed; and yet the original ones which cannot well be dispensed with in the regulation of the pitch of the parts, are added. He visited the Sistine Chapel as often as possible, in order closely to examine the peculiarity of the traditional manner of delivery in the papal choir. He had completed the three first volumes, and yet no publisher appeared. Finally, in the autumn of last year Häckel, in Mannheim, made him honorable proposals. It was the last joy that poor Witt had. A few weeks later, on the 1st of December, 1855, a gentle death delivered him from his hard trials.

His Palestrina will make his name celebrated. His compositions we should be pleased to see soon published; for a competent writer, from whom we have already quoted, gives them extraordinary praise: "The greater part of the melodies in his songs are remarkably simple, but full of touching grace and noble pathos, with an earnest depth of feeling. His rare originality reveals itself especially in unexpected and brilliantly effective modulations. The accompaniment is full and rich, and shows a thorough knowledge of harmony and of its resources. But what enchains one more than all these excellencies is the fidelity and purity with which his whole being, his strongly marked character, is mirrored in his artistic products; that lofty enthusiasm, with scientific completeness and severity; that noble, high-hearted feeling, with an all-penetrating acumen; that love for truth, which you may trace into the most delicate details; and that logical continuity and strictness, with the most glowing warmth of heart and imagination."

Musical Extremes.

[The following pithy little Introduction by M. BÉRLIOZ to his Treatise on Instrumentation, contains much in little.]

At no period in the History of Music has there been greater mention made of Instrumentation, than at the present time. The reason of this is doubtless to be found in the completely modern development which has taken place in this branch of the Art; and perhaps, also, in the multitude of criticisms, opinions, different doctrines, judgments, rational and irrational arguments spoken or written, for which the slightest productions of the most inferior composers form a pretext.

There appears at present to be great importance attached to this art of instrumenting, which was unknown at the commencement of the last century; and of which, sixty years ago, many persons who passed for sincere friends of Music, endeavored to prevent the advance. There is an effort, now-a-days, to place an obstacle in the way of musical progress, upon other points. It has always been thus; therefore it can scarcely create surprise. At first, music was only acknowledged to exist in a series of consonant harmonies, intermingled with a few discords of suspension; and when Monteverde attempted to subjoin the chord of the seventh on the dominant without preparation, blame and invective of all kinds failed not to be levelled at him. But this seventh once admitted, in spite of all, with the discords of suspension, there were not wanting those among so-called learned authorities who held in contempt all compositions of which the harmony was simple, sweet, clear, sonorous, natural; it was absolutely requisite, to please these gentry, that it should be crammed with chords of the second major and minor, with sevenths, ninths, fourths, and fifths, employed without reason or intention, unless that of being as frequently as possible harsh to the ear. These musicians took a fancy for dissonant chords, as certain animals have a predilection for salt, prickly plants, and thorny shrubs. It was the exaggeration of reaction.

Melody was not to be found among these fine combinations; when it appeared it was cried down, as the ruin of Art, the neglect of time-honored rules, &c., &c.; all was apparently lost. Nevertheless, melody maintained its ground; a reaction of melody, in its turn, was not long in appearing. There were fanatical melodists, to whom every piece of music in more than three parts was insupportable. Some of them asserted that, in the majority of cases, the subject should be accompanied by a bass only, leaving to the hearer the delight of imagining the complementary notes of the chords. Others went still farther, desiring to have no accompaniment at all, affirming that harmony was but a barbarous invention.

Then came the turn of modulations. At the period when the habit was to modulate only in relative keys, the first who ventured to pass into a foreign key, was treated with contumely,—as might have been expected. Whatever the effect of this new modulation, masters severely objected to it. The innovator vainly pleaded:—"Listen to it; observe how agreeably it is brought in, how well worked, how adroitly linked with that which precedes and succeeds, and how deliciously it sounds!" "That's not the question!" was the reply. "This modulation is prohibited; therefore it must not be made!" But as, on the contrary, that is the precise question throughout, irrelative modulations did not fail soon to appear in grand music, aiding in producing effects no less felicitous than unexpected. Almost immediately arose a new order of pedantry; when people thought themselves degraded by modulating into the dominant; and who frolicked sweetly, in the smallest rondo, from the key of C natural into F sharp major.

Time, little by little, has re-arranged each thing in its place. A too rigid adherence to custom has been distinguished from the reactions of vanity, folly, and obstinacy; and it is pretty generally agreed to allow, at present, in all that regards harmony, melody, and modulation, that whatever produces a good effect is good, as that whatever produces a bad one is bad; and that the authority of a hundred old men, even if they were each a hundred and twenty years of age, cannot make ugly that which is beautiful, nor beautiful that which is ugly.

As for instrumentation, expression, and rhythm, that is quite another affair. Their turn for being discerned, denounced, admitted, fettered, freed, and exaggerated, not having come until much later, they cannot have attained the point previously reached by other branches of the Art. It may be said, that instrumentation, as first in order, is at the stage of exaggeration.

It requires much time to discover Musical Mediterraneans; and still more, to master their navigation.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Violins at the Fair.

Mr. Editor:—Being somewhat partial to the Violin, I have read the several reports of the Judges on that instrument, appointed at the late Mechanics' Fair, and have been considerably amused. First it was reported that "to JOHN WHITE a Diploma was awarded for a Violin,"—then we were told that mistakes had been made, and that a new report might be expected. In your last paper we have: "WHITE BROTHERS, Boston, Violins and Guitars. The Guitars were good instruments of more than common power and richness of tone. The Violins were highly creditable to the manufacturers as specimens of work, but were unattended with the usual accompaniment—a bow, so necessary to produce the proper vibrations and prove their quality."—There sir, that is from gentlemen supposed to be violin players, and consequently owners of bows, else, a bow would not have helped them. One would have supposed that the statement attached to one of the Violins, would have caused desire enough to hear its tones, even at some little trouble. The Statement read thus: "In 1761 the Mayor of London made to the town of Cambridge a present of an Organ built by the famous Snetzler;—During the Revolution a great part of the metal pipes were taken to make bullets of, and about ten years since the remains of the Organ were taken down. The top of this Violin was a part of that Organ.—The back and hoops were made from the old communion table of the Church in Lexington." That there are persons to whom a Violin made of a part of a Snetzler Organ, or of Noah's Ark, would be no more valuable than if made of a barn door, I am aware. There are also others of a different temperament; witness the canes made of Constitution wood, enough to build a navy. Violinists believe that the excellence of old Violins is in part owing to the age of the wood;—and here is a Violin the wood of which is a hundred years old. Of the excellence of the workmanship any one could judge with half an eye, and without troubling a Committee. But sir, Mr. White assures me that there was a bow in the case with the Violins, and that he was careful to have it nicely rosined.

When the lamented ARTOT visited this country, years ago, he brought with him two Violins that cost him $3,000, one of them an undoubted Straduari in its original state. Being very much pleased with Mr. White's work, he allowed him to measure and copy those instruments, and those measurements have been the basis of Mr. White's work since that time, modified by the various Guarneri, Amati, &c. which have since passed through his hands. I presume there is hardly a Violinist in Boston who is not well acquainted with the excellence of Mr. White's work, and it is to be regretted that in consequence of his reputation as a repairer, he gets but little time for new work. He has made in all about Eighty instruments, and I will here state that he never steams or soaks his wood to make it appear old, as is the practice of some modern Violin makers;—he prefers to have his instruments grow better instead of worse;—in fact he is working for a posthumous reputation.

The Judges did no more than justice in their report of the Guitars. One of them was played behind the scenes in one of our Theatres, and the gentlemen of the orchestra supposed it to be a Harp.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

GONDOLA-SAIL.

[From the German of GRÜEN.]

Hark! past the midnight hour!

The streets from men are free!

The moon pours down her splendor

On palace, church and sea!

Would'st thou behold fair Venice?

Delay not now the sight!

This is the very hour—

This is the very light!

The marble forms are living!

The palace walls grow white;

Gigantic silver tablets

Recording deeds of night.

Love, would'st thou taste her pleasures?

List to her summons soon;

The Gondola her cradle,

Her dawning red the moon.

'Mid the old world's gray shadows,

With loving arm to twine

Around the blooming Present,

What fair attendance thine!

And though thy tears fell freely

On graves of days gone by,

The lily-handed Present

Should quickly wipe them dry. C. T. B.

Friends and Music in Berlin.

[We are indebted to some unknown friend for a marked copy of the St. Louis Intelligencer of Nov. 29, containing the following pleasant letter about one who needs no introduction to our readers. The appended information about music in the Prussian capital will not be new to many, but is interesting enough to hear again from the mouth of a new reporter.]

BERLIN, February, 1856.

Dear Sir—Very few Americans visit Berlin with the purpose of spending any time, without becoming acquainted with a fellow-countryman there, so long resident in the Prussian capital as to be in many respects a German, though at heart and in hand a Yankee through and through still.

Americans visit his little room—No. 5. Marien Strasse—to ask those thousand questions which strangers in a strange land are always anxious to put; and Germans, young men wishing to emigrate, or old men inquisitive about our institutions, all resort to him, and find him always a man of the widest information and of the most genial heart.

The first time I met ALEX. W. THAYER was at a Thanksgiving dinner in his own rooms, where some fifteen of us young Americans sat down to the nearest approach to an old-fashioned home dinner that Thayer's Yankee ingenuity could improvise.

The dinner was got up in spite of disheartening circumstances.

There wasn't a grandmother, nor mother, nor aunt, nor cousin, nor sister, nor even sweetheart, within five thousand miles, to grace and adorn the table, to say nothing of seeing to the cooking. But Thayer was not discouraged; and with the help of what reminiscences of New England housewifery he brought with him, and the assistance of his Frau Wirthin, he astonished the rest of us completely. For roast turkey, we had roast goose, and for everything else a famous dish of baked beans; not to say we had no side dishes, of which a plenty, but baked beans was the dish of the evening.

It may appear a very tame affair, recurring to it now, and to those who were never so far away from home and native land under similar circumstances; but if you had seen the burst of applause that greeted the appearance of those beans, and the affection—more than the ordinary emotion or display at sight of something "nice"—with which each loaded plate was tenderly passed around, then you might have appreciated our feelings on that illustrious occasion.

This was in 1854. In 1855, one year thereafter, we sat down together to another Thanksgiving dinner; but this time there were twenty-four of us, and in proportion to our larger numbers, we had a larger room and a more extensive bill of fare. But again Thayer was the presiding genius, and to him alone is New England indebted for planting and thus fostering the growth of one of her most peculiar festivals upon a foreign soil.

But so many pleasant reminiscences, so many remembrances of him and the "times" we used to enjoy together, rush up when I mention Thayer's name, that I must force myself to the thing in hand, or I shall not reach it.

In more than one respect Alex. W. Thayer is an honor and an example to his country.

Passionately fond of music, a first-rate musical critic—although a performer on no instrument—driven to it by his own strong impulses and a felt need of the want of such a work, he has devoted himself to the writing of a life of Beethoven.

It is nothing extraordinary now-a-days for a young music teacher to spend six, twelve, eighteen months or two years in Germany, "completing his musical education," as the phrase goes, and on his return to get out a work on church psalmody, a glee book, lessons on the piano-forte, or something of the sort, which shall have quite a run. This is nothing difficult. Their "works" are, with scarcely an exception, mere compilations, abridgements, hotch-potch translations of standard works across the water. They get their reward, however—pay.

Thayer has been already some six years in collecting material for his biography. He has crossed the ocean several times, has traveled over the most of Germany, ransacked Bonn and its libraries, where Beethoven was born, and for years buried himself alive, as it were, among the rusty shelves of the Royal Library at Berlin, where the major part of Beethoven's correspondence, his pencil marks on book margins, scraps of thoughts, and the like, have been preserved.

It is something refreshing in this book-making time, where a dashing fellow publishes his book a year, as coolly as he draws off his boots at night, to know there is at least one countryman of ours doing better.

Thayer's health has been poor for the last year, and writing for the New York papers as a means of support has taken too much of his time, yet the work is drawing near its close.

Beethoven, that great Titan in the realms of tone, will then no longer remain unhonored by a work every way worthy of him, in its inexhaustive research and its profound critical acumen.

While speaking of Thayer, I cannot help mentioning one of the peculiar pleasures to be enjoyed during a winter spent in Berlin, and to which he first introduced me. I mean the concerts at Hennig's Winter Garden, outside the Oranienburger Thor.

Here Herr Liebig, a Royal kapellmeister, and leader to the band of the Alexander regiment, has, in the course of four or five years, cultivated a taste for the classic productions of Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn and Mendelssohn. It was an attempt to furnish music for the masses, and that of the very choicest kind, at a price that would bring it within their reach. All of Beethoven's symphonies, including the instrumental part of the Ninth, were produced there this winter, the most of them several times. So also of Mendelssohn's, and many of Mozart's and Haydn's.

His orchestra consists of forty. The concert begins at 4 P. M., which is just dusk in Berlin, and is divided into three parts, of an hour each. The first hour generally consists of short pieces; the second and third hours are usually occupied by a symphony each. Beside those symphonies, I heard there Mozart's Dorfmusikanten, Haydn's Children's Symphony, Spohr's Weihe der Töne, together with the overtures to nearly all the grand operas, William Tell, Oberon, Euryanthe, Don Giovanni, and especially that of Tannhäuser, with extracts from the body of the opera.

It was thus that, with no acquaintance whatever with the great masters of song when I went to Germany, I became familiar with nearly all their finest productions, and began to feel myself almost a friend and disciple of Beethoven.

The admission price to these concerts is twelve and half cents, but if you buy six tickets at a time you get them at half price. You wonder why they don't make admission free at once. But even at this price it is profitable to Herr Liebig, the conductor, and to Madame Hennig, proprietress of the Gardens. The German custom is, to drink a cup of good coffee, or a tankard of good beer, or smoke a poor cigar, while enjoying such good music. Consequently, there is a small table to every four or six persons all through the saloon. You and your party of gentlemen and ladies gather around one or two, call the Kellner, order your beer or coffee, and, sipping either, but never whispering while the music proceeds, listen.

It is a pleasant audience that assembles here. I have learnt to know all the pretty faces and nearly all the whiskered ones. The ladies bring their knitting or embroidery, and the gentlemen their cigars, and their respect and decorum is something almost inexplicable to an American.

A low P-s-t! now and then is necessary to keep the waiters from jostling the cups and saucers as they pass them around; all else is oppressively still during the execution of the symphony.

Several times there were fifteen of us young Americans gathered in a clump together, a little island of English in a sea of German. The saloons hold from five to seven hundred, and if anything like a choice programme is advertised in the morning papers, we have to go very early, often by three o'clock, to secure seats.

Yours, W—x.

HEARING "TOO MUCH OF A GOOD THING."
—The London Musical World, in an article greatly glorifying the sonorous Verdi, having said that his great pleasure consists in living upon his lands, in the midst of his peasants, who all know by heart the finest pieces in his operas, and that at Brussetto the reapers perform their work singing the chorus of "Rigoletto," "Ernani," "La Traviata," and the "Trovatore"—that incorrigible joker, Mr. Punch, expresses the opinion that "this sort of homage would be rather inconvenient if addressed to all composers. For instance, Balfe would soon grow tired of hearing every printer's boy, who was waiting in the passage for corrected proofs, while away the time by singing 'I Dreamt that I Dwelt in Marble Halls'; and we imagine, that Dr. Mackay would very quickly lose all patience if, whilst he finished looking at the newspaper, the newsman's boy, who was shuffling his feet outside, amused himself every day by shouting out, as loudly as he could, 'There's a Good Time Coming, Boys.' Auber would not be too well pleased with his servants if they assembled round his bed-room door, regularly at 6 o'clock, to tell him to 'Behold, how brightly breaks the morning,' any more than Rossini, we fancy, would be delighted by his tradesmen rushing into his room every night, before he went to bed, to sing to him in a chorus, 'Buona Sera.'"

Thalberg and the Children.

THALBERG before the children must have been something worth seeing as well as hearing. From the Musical Review Extra we learn that: The first gratuitous concert for children of the public schools of New York was given on Tuesday, Dec. 2, at one o'clock. The arrangements made by the City Superintendent, S. S. RANDALL, Esq., were most excellent. Some three thousand of the happiest young ladies, selected from the fifty ward schools of the city, filled Niblo's Theatre to its utmost capacity, while the stage was occupied by the officers of the city and of the Board of Education, and the clergy. A temporary platform was erected in front of the stage, upon which stood the Erard grand piano-forte. Dr. LOWELL MASON introduced the artist to the assembled pupils in a few appropriate words. Then THALBERG and Mme. D'ANGRI delighted the audience with some of their best pieces. Mr. Randall thanked the artists in a brief address, and at the suggestion of Dr. Mason the pupils all rose and sang "Sweet Home," and Mr. Thalberg spoke a few graceful words to them. Willis says:

Of how these artists acquitted themselves, it is needless to speak. Neither could or would have taken more pains to please, had they been performing before the assembled cities of the Universe, instead of an audience of young girls. It was interesting to note what effect the music had upon them. While Thalberg confined himself to the exhibition of mere musical dexterities, cutting great swaths of harmony up and down the piano, and by some mystery of manipulation sustaining a melody in the centre of the instrument while he trolled out a ceaseless flood of music at both ends of it, the listeners looked on with eyes and mouth wide open and watched the twinkling movements of those cunning hands with an expression rather of wonder than of enjoyment. But when the gifted pianist took up the familiar theme of "Home Sweet Home," and wreathed it all about with delicious variations in which complexity was subordinated by beauty, then all the ruddy faces lighted up with a deeper glow, and a smile of pleasure rippled over them, and the whole house was vocal with whispered ejaculations of delight. At first the children hardly knew how to applaud. Some pattered their little feet and others clapped their hands, but neither process found much favor with the older pupils, who finally hit on the expedient of waving their handkerchiefs—and the way that the air was lashed up with linen and cambric was funny to behold. Madame D'Angri, who is a merry body, made the children laugh by singing "Yankee Doodle," and seemed to enter quite as heartily into the enjoyment of the occasion as the blitheest of them.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 20, 1856.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The Chickering saloon showed a great increase of audience on Tuesday evening; indeed, it overflowed. And, judging from the unflagging attention to the music and the lively rounds of applause after almost every piece, the crowd felt themselves very well repaid. The programme was as follows:

PART I.

1. Quartet in F, No. 3, Op. 17, (first time), Rubinstein
Allegro moderato—Scherzo—Andante non troppo—Finale, Allegro assai.
2. Duo Sonate, for Piano and Violoncello, in B flat, Op. 45,.....Mendelssohn Allegro vivace—Andante—Allegro assai.
Messrs. TRENKLE and WULF FRIES.

PART II.

3. Adagio, with Variations, and Minuetto, from Quartet in B flat, No. 77,.....Haydn
4. Piano Solos: Nocturne and Scherzo,.....Chopin
J. TRENKLE.
5. Septet in E flat, Op. 21,.....Beethoven
(Arranged by the Author for Quintet.)
Introduction, Adagio and Allegro con brio—Adagio—Scherzo—Finale, Introduction and Presto.

It is not easy to decide with confidence upon the merits of a Quartet on the first hearing; nor shall we venture to do so of this No. 3 by Rubinstein, the successor to the one we had last winter. Much of it was pleasing and skilfully wrought, but we must hear it more than once before we can recall much of it, or be convinced that it is particularly striking or original. The fault may be our own, but the impression it has left upon us is quite vague, as if the composition as a whole were uninspired and lacked definiteness of purpose. The Mendelssohn Sonata was to our mind the most important feature of the evening. The composition is pure, rich and spontaneously flowing; nothing at all in it appears forced or vague, or written only for the sake of writing something; it came out of the tone-poet's soul just as he felt and meant it. The two quick movements pour along with a delicious buoyancy and fullness of fresh life. But the Andante haunts the mind with its pensive, ballad-like beauty, as one of his most exquisite and soul-ful creations. Mr. TRENKLE played it with admirable clearness, evenness and grace, and the violoncello coöperated to a charm. It is not often that one hears better piano-playing in the most satisfying kind of music, than this effort of Mr. Trenkle's, which met with the warmest recognition of the audience. He is a modest and a growing artist, in whom one feels that there is always much good in reserve, while there is no outward pretension, save to conscientious faithfulness, whatever be the task in hand. The piano solos varied somewhat from the programme. He commenced with the Scherzo, one of those fiery, swift, insatiable outsweps of Chopin's most passionate fancy, equally remarkable as an utterance of passion and as dazzling bravura, and taxing the executive faculty to the utmost. In this Mr. T. was eminently successful; the flash and pathos of the piece lost nothing in his handling, and of course the audience were electrified. Instead of the Nocturne, he played the Funeral March, with grandeur and with feeling, but perhaps dallying with the rhythm a little too much now and then. When eagerly recalled, he played that charming little "Polka" (not a polka to dance by) of Otto Dresel.

The remainder of the second part belonged to the list of certain classical pieces, which, however excellent in themselves, have grown somewhat hacknied. But we must remember that there are young and fresh recruits in each year's audiences, and good things long since old to some of us would get to be unknown entirely, unless they were repeated for their sakes. Can we not also always find our pleasure in them? Such were Haydn's "God save the Emperor" Adagio, with its cunning variations, and the Septet (as Quintet) of Beethoven, both of which were remarkably well played. The Septet is one of the clearest, most elegant and artistically finished of Beethoven's earlier productions, but not one of his most characteristic and deep searching. Especially when reduced to the homogeneous coloring of the quintet of strings, instead of the original form with wind instruments, does it lose something of its interest. But it has delightful associations with the spring-time of one's Beethoven enthusiasm.

Music in Leipzig.

We have been looking through a series of programmes, which make one's mouth water, in the present dearth of orchestral music here in Boston. We allude to the far-famed "Gewandhaus Subscription Concerts," which are esteemed the best of all the instrumental concerts in Germany, and which yield supplies as copious and frequent and unfailing as they are choice. It is well known that they are given in a hall of moderate capacity, containing not more than nine hundred seats, all of which are always bespoken long beforehand for the season. And that season consists of twenty concerts. By next New Year, before we shall have had the first mouthful of our scanty series of four in Boston, the dainty Leipzigers will have heard the first ten of their weekly concerts. The first two took place on Sunday evenings, the rest on Thursdays. Six of the programmes lie before us:

First Concert, Oct. 5.—Overture to Der Waserträger, Cherubini; Scene and aria from Spohr's Zemire und Azor, sung by Fräulein AGNES BURY; Violin Concerto in D minor (MS.) composed and played by Concert-master DAVID; Recitative and Air from Zauberflöte: Non paventar, sung by Fräulein Bury. Part II. Symphony No. 4 (B flat), Beethoven.

Second Concert, Oct. 12.—Symphony No. 8 (B flat), Haydn; Air from Don Juan: "Il mio tesoro," sung by Herr A. REICHARDT; Concerto for Piano (No. 3, F minor), W. Sterndale Bennett, played by Prof. W. G. CUSINS, of London; Lieder, with piano accompaniment, by Herr A. Reichardt: (1) Liebesbotschaft, by F. Schubert; (2) Es weiss und rüth es doch Keiner, Mendelssohn. Part II. Overture to Calderon's comedy, "Dame Kobold," by CARL REINECKE (new); Scena from Lucia di Lammermoor, Fräulein BURY; Overture to Leonora, No. 3, Beethoven.

Third Concert, Oct. 23.—Devoted wholly to compositions of the lamented ROBERT SCHUMANN (Born in Zwickau July 7, 1810—died in Endenich, near Bonn, July 29, 1856). Overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Rückert's Advent Hymn, for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, the solos by Fräulein BURY, Frau DREYSCHOCK, and Herren GOTZE and CLAUS; Fantasia for Violin with Orchestra, played by concert-master DREYSCHOCK; the second part of "Paradise and the Peri," (solos, quartet, choruses, &c.) Part II. Symphony in five movements (No. 3, E flat major).

Fourth Concert. Symphony No. 3, (E flat major) by Julius Rietz; Scena and Aria: Ah! perfido, Beethoven, sung by Fräulein JENNY MEYER, of Berlin; Concerto for Piano (C minor, No. 7), Mozart, played by Fräulein EMMA VON STAUDACH, of Vienna. Part II. Overture to "The fair Melusina," Mendelssohn; Scena and Aria from La Donna del Lago, Rossini, sung by Fräulein Meyer; Sonata (A major) by Scarlatti, and Tarantella by Stephen Heller, played by Fräulein von Staudach; Jubilee Overture, Weber.

Fifth Concert. Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Concerto in form of a vocal scena, for violin, Spohr, played by Herr E. SINGER, concert-master from Weimar; Scene and Air from Weber's "Oberon": Ocean! du Ungeheuer, sung by Fräulein AUGUSTE BRENNEN; Tarantella, for violin, composed and played by Singer.—Part II. Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn, words recited by Herr WENZEL, solos by Fräulein Brennen and Koch, choruses by the ladies of the Singakademie.

Sixth Concert, Nov. 13. Overture to Faust by Lindpaintner (Born Dec. 9, 1791 in Coblenz—died Aug. 21, 1856); Scene and Aria from Marschner's opera, Hans Heiling, sung by Fräul. BRENNEN; Concerto for violoncello, by Molique, played by Herr FRIEDRICH GREUTZMACHER; Intermezzo to Lindpaintner's Faust; Concert Aria by Mendelssohn: Unglückselige! sung by Fräul. Brennen. Part II. Symphony No. 7, in A, Beethoven.

New Music.

(From Russell & Richardson.)

Compositions Célèbres de S. THALBERG. No. 1. Grand Caprice sur les motifs de la Sonnambula, Op. 48. pp. 17.

This is the first number of a series of twelve, which is to include the principal operatic fantasias and other concert pieces of M. Thalberg, as played by him in his concerts in this country. The title-page bears the certificate of Thalberg, to the effect that Messrs. R. & R. are the only authorized publishers of his compositions in America, and theirs the only correct editions, as he has personally revised and corrected the proofs. The present number is beautifully engraved; a more clear and elegant page of music, open where we will, we seldom see, even in European publications. The vignette too is tasteful. Of the music itself we need say nothing; when Thalberg comes, will it not speak for itself through the most perfect of interpreters?

Regard: a Cluster of Precious Gems. No. 1. Ruby. No. 2. Emerald, &c., &c. For the Piano, by A. BAUMBACH.

Such is the fanciful title of six pretty little pieces of very simple music for young beginners on the piano-forte. Each is published separately.

Beauties of MOZART and BEETHOVEN, in form of Petites Fantasias for Young Pianists, by TH. OESTEN, Op. 75. No. 6. "Song of Elis and Elide," Mozart; No. 7. Parting Song, Beethoven. 7 pp. each.

The themes are interesting in themselves, and pleasantly varied and expanded into pieces good for young pianists of quite moderate ability. The whole series, of which we have before mentioned one from the Septet and one from a Trio of Beethoven, one from Mozart's Figaro, &c., is calculated to attract the pupil in the direction of the best masters.

Many of our readers will be glad to know that Russell & Richardson will soon issue, with English words, the six four-part songs by ROBERT FRANZ, of which we spoke a few weeks since; as well as several more of his beautiful and more practicable songs for single voice.

(From Oliver Ditson.)

Il Trovatore, by VERDI, edited for the piano-forte by R. NORDMANN. pp. 90.

Another number of Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas, elegantly printed like its predecessors.—Those who chime in with the fashionable admiration of Il Trovatore will here have the means of recalling the whole opera to their memories through a piano and a simple pair of hands. Those whose minds are not already prepossessed with the cruel story as presented on the stage, may here judge of the intrinsic value of the music, divested of words and accessories. Yet the first words of each strain are indicated, so that the player may know whereabouts in the opera he is.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Dec. 16.—During the past week we have been treated to a musical novelty in the shape of Costa's oratorio of "Eli," which was performed on Saturday evening, for the first time in this country, by the MENDELSSOHN UNION. This young society, of but two or three years standing, is in a very flourishing condition, numbering, I should judge, about a hundred members, and doing great credit to their conductor, Mr. G. W. MORGAN. Your New York readers will remember that this body of singers performed Mendelssohn's Loreley music at a Philharmonic concert two years ago; the present occasion showed their very great improvement since that time, and the fact of their being the first to bring out Costa's Oratorio so soon after its appearance in England, certainly gives proof of an energy and "go-aheadativeness" worthy of a purely American Society.

Costa's composition made, on the whole, a very agreeable impression upon me, and is likely, I think, to become very popular. It is a very happy mixture of the Italian and German styles, which, without being ever very deep, is still full of merit in the working up, the distribution and interweaving of the parts, and the dramatic coloring of the whole. It has, however, its faults. One of these is its length, which is superfluous, particularly as the greatest point of interest occurs before the middle of the second part. Then, too, the chief part of the oratorio, that of Eli, is the least interesting, indeed, sometimes rather tedious, from being almost entirely recitative. And just in this line Sig. Costa's powers are weakest, while the choruses are nearly all full of vigor, and the smaller concerted pieces and arias highly melodious. Of the former I would mention particularly an Amen and Hosanna, fugues, which, though not very elaborate or complicated, were clear and well worked up; a chorus of praise, with harp accompaniment, that of the Israelites marching against the Philistines, and that of the angels, also with harp accompaniment, which is marvellously translucent. The chorus of the revelers at the gate of the temple was below my expectation, though its effect is probably very different with orchestral accompaniment, which is true, indeed, of the whole composition. As it was, this chorus lacked that wildness and sensuousness which one would expect from it.

The celebrated war scene, with the solo of the Man of Gath, intermingled with the choruses of the Philistines and the priests of Dagon, is justly praised, being exceedingly effective. Of the other solos, Hannah's two arias, before and after the birth of Samuel, are very beautiful; the first one so touching in its mournful meaning and supplication; the second: "I will extol thee," so triumphant and overflowing with joy and gratitude. This last was very finely sung by Miss DINGLEY, who had already made herself favorably known in the Society's performance at the Philharmonic. Her singing now, as then, was characterized by the same beauty of voice, excellent school, and earnest entering into the spirit of the music. Two other ladies divided the part of Hannah with Miss Dingley, who also deserved much praise.

The gem of the whole, however, was Samuel's morning prayer, of which words cannot express the touching simplicity and fervency. This was most exquisitely sung by Miss HAWLEY, a lady who has evidently more experience in her profession than any of the other female singers, and whose delicious voice, a rich, luscious contralto, was made the most perfect use of, and was thoroughly adapted to the music it interpreted. The evening prayer, also very pleasing, but not to be compared to Samuel's other Aria, was very indifferently rendered by Miss LEACH, who apparently suffered from timidity. A duet between Hannah and Elkanah, an unaccompanied quartet between these two, Eli and Samuel, and a prayer by Eli, still deserve to be mentioned as very beautiful. Of the male singers, Sig. GUIDI, tenor, who took the parts of Elkanah and the Man of Gath, merits particular praise for his conscientious rendering and fine vocalization. The Bassi were not so good. The execution of the choruses was almost invariably excellent and spirited. The piano accompaniment, which is apparently very difficult, was taken, in the unexpected absence of Mr. TIMM, by a young artist, Mr. BERGER, who acquitted himself admirably.

NEW YORK, Dec. 16. There has recently been organized in this city a new Musical Association, which, though as yet small in numbers and of limited influence, promises in time to become a mighty lever in raising the standard of musical appreciation in this country. It is called the "AMERICAN MUSIC ASSOCIATION," and its fundamental principle is the fostering of native talent and the production of native musical works. This object is more explicitly expressed in the first article of its constitution, which says: "The object of this Society shall be to further the interest of musical composers residing among us, by having their works effectively presented to the public, in order that they may be fairly criticized and impartially judged." By this it will be seen that, though intended as an American society, and as such presenting special claims to public regard, it is by no means proscriptive in its regulations. Any resident composer has a right to present his works for public presentation by the Society, on the payment of a fee of $5.00, and the society already enjoys unusual facilities for a proper presentation of such works. There are a body of chorus singers and a vocal quartet, for the production of vocal compositions, and a string quartet for the production of symphonic works, GEORGE BRISTOW, the composer, being one of the members.

At a recent meeting of the society, CHARLES J. HOPKINS, a talented young musician and organist of this city, through whose indomitable perseverance and energy the society has been organized, was elected President, and Mr. T. J. COOK, a Broadway music-publisher, Vice President. The consulting committee includes the well-known names of RICHARD WILLIS, of the Musical World, GEO. F. BRISTOW, and GEORGE H. CURTIS.

As yet this society is in its infancy, and the experiment may fail, and will unless a lively interest is taken in it by musical men. Strange to say, though many worthy musicians give it their hearty co-operation, a still greater number treat the project with contempt, while others, ladies especially, think it quite beneath their dignity to look favorably upon the day of small things. Among those who have, however, agreed to give it their hearty co-operation, are GOTTSCHALK, Dr. HODGES, and other eminent American musicians.

The PYNE and HARRISON Opera Troupe made their debut at Niblo's last evening in a dismal comic opera called "The Valley of Andorre." Louisa Pyne is a favorite, and was well received, as was Mr. GUILMETTE; but the opera on the whole went off very heavily. It is a most lugubrious affair.

You certainly remember the rotund baritone of the Lagrange Opera Troupe, Signor Amodio. This excellent young gentleman, like many other artists, has a pleasant custom of forgetting to pay his tailor's bills; and though this is neither your business nor your readers, nor mine, yet such is the lamentable depravity of human nature, that I am certain we all of us delight to hear such personal scandal about our neighbors. And there are some few waifs of floating gossip concerning Amodio in circulation, that I feel it my duty to retail to you, so that we may all have a chance of knowing and declaring how foolish such information is.

Alessandro Amodio is a young man, much younger than his personal appearance would denote; he imagines himself to be a great favorite with the fair sex, as, indeed, a young man of twenty-four, with a lively, agreeable disposition, an amiable temper, the master of several continental languages, the possessor of probably the richest male voice in existence, (?) and of good conversational powers, has a right to think. But Amodio is not of that light, slender form that a romantic hero should be, and consequently no young American damsel has as yet fallen desperately in love with him. However, he, good-natured soul, thinks himself quite a Don Giovanni in his list of conquests. He became an opera-singer from pure love of Art, being of a good family, and circumstances not rendering it necessary for him to embrace such a profession; but his devotion to music led him to his choice, and possessing considerable histrionic ability, he was successful. Before he became very extensively known, even in Italy, he was induced to visit this country, where he is a great favorite with all frequenters of the opera.

So much for his history. Now for this silly gossip, which we all profess to be disgusted with, and yet read with such infinite gusto.

The life of an opera singer is one of varied pecuniary repletion and depletion. During the opera season he receives an enormous salary, and during the rest of the season spends it. This is the custom of Amodio, and many times he is "hard up" during the intermission between his operatic engagements. On one occasion last summer he ordered of a fashionable Broadway tailor, a gorgeous new coat. It was made and taken to Amodio, but did not fit, and the worthy baritone was requested to step around to the tailor's the next day and it would be made right. Now the tailor (shrewd fellow) was already his customer's creditor to a considerable amount, and had laid a trap to catch the unlucky singer, into which he fell with ease. Arriving at the tailor's store at the appointed time, Signor A. doffed the ill-fitting garment, and seated himself to wait until it was fixed. Time passed on, and growing impatient, he intimated to the tailor that he was in a hurry. Judge of his horror when that individual responded by presenting an immense bill for clothing. Signor A. had no money, was out of an operatic engagement, and was in despair. The tailor was adamant; he would either have his money or keep the coat; and the sequel was, that poor young Signor Amodio, the elegant dandy, was obliged to run the gauntlet of Broadway arrayed in broadcloth pants, a gorgeous vest, unimpeachable kids, but as coatless as Mickey Free, the famous pedestrian, while running a race. The peculiar physical formation of the worthy Signor, who "inclines to embonpoint," as the Home Journal would say, was shown to great advantage in his coatless position, and his flight through Broadway excited no little attention.

But instead of improving this lesson, and repenting in sack-cloth and ashes, the excellent Signor again plunged into a course of sumptuous fare, and clothed himself as before, in purple and fine linen. He ran up bills at his tailor's and shoemaker's and his wine dealer's, and during his late engagement in the opera here, he, like Micawber, labored under a pressure of pecuniary liabilities. At this juncture Maretzek determined to try his fortunes in Havana, and the company were ordered to be ready to start in the Cuban steamer of Saturday.

At the appointed hour for sailing, the Cahawba, at her wharf, foot of Robinson, became violently agitated, and gave vent to her feelings in volcanic eruptions of hissing steam, and indulged in ungainly splashings of her paddle-wheels. The passengers were all on board—the queenly Lagrange, the manly Gasparoni, the elegant Brignoli (feeling superstitiously alarmed about sailing on Friday), the ladies of the chorus, and the indomitable Signor Quinto, alias Herr Quint, alias Mr. Quinn—were all on board. But Amodio—where was he?

He was locked up very tight in the steward's pantry! A rather singular place for a fat and fashionable baritone, it is true, but it was the only place where he could escape the lex talionis in the shape of a couple of sheriff's officers, who had boarded the ship in search of him. Maretzek had seen them coming in the distance, and his colossal mind immediately became troubled. Should Amodio be arrested for debt, what would his opera troupe do for a baritone? What would the fastidious Habanese say to Trovatore without a Count Luna, or Traviata without a Germet? For a moment the colossal Maretzek mind wavered, but in an instant he was calm. He beckoned to Amodio, told him to enter the steward's pantry. Amodio hesitated,—perhaps he thought of the Scripture parable, of a camel going through the eye of a needle.

Maretzek whispered into his ear; it was enough, and in he crowded; the key was turned upon him, removed from the lock, and deposited in Maretzek's pocket. The sheriffs came and searched through the vessel, but no Amodio could be found. They left the ship, the Cahawba swung slowly from the wharf, and steamed down the bay, carrying Maretzek and all his fortunes, not excepting Alessandro Amodio.

Now if all this cackle about Amodio and his misdeeds had been a sepulchral secret, I would not have ventured to disclose it; but it is public property, and talked about all over the city, and so I repeat it for the benefit of your readers, who will read it with great delight, and then say to each other that such stuff in a "Musical" correspondent's letter could only emanate from that impertinent wretch of a

TROVATOR.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Orchestral Concerts may almost be regarded as a fixed fact. The subscription list, if not full, is so near the mark, that a little effort can soon bring it up. Mr. ZERRAHN has already gone to New York to engage distinguished solo artists. He has hopes of securing that admired German prima-donna, Fräulein JOHANNSEN, and does not despair of even THALBERG and Mme. D'ANGRI for one concert. His orchestra will be the most choice in its composition that can be obtained, numbering from forty to forty-five performers, which will be larger for the Melodeon than the largest we have ever had was for the Music Hall, and will enable him to bring out some of the modern works which require extra horns, &c. Schubert's great Symphony, Wagner's overture to "Faust," Schumann's to "Manfred," &c., are among the pieces contemplated of this class. The Melodeon is to be thoroughly renovated, within and without; but we have not a doubt that, if the concerts once commence, it will result in a triumphant return to the Music Hall. At all events, should Thalberg play, this will be a matter of necessity.... The GERMAN TRIO concert is this evening.... An important addition, it will be seen, has been made to Mr. SATTER's programme for next Saturday evening: to wit, a posthumous Trio by Hummel, which is a charming composition. We were mistaken last week in supposing that he was to be assisted by a lady pupil as pianist. Mrs. LITTLE, the lady referred to, is a singer and will sing accordingly.... The very thorough drill which CARL ZERRAHN has given to the chorus members of the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY in "Eli," told with surprising effect in the first rehearsal of the "Messiah," which, according to the good old custom, is to be performed on the Sunday evening after Christmas. After that the orchestra will be added to the last rehearsals of "Eli." The Society have engaged Mrs J. H. LOW as principal soprano. The other soloists for the "Messiah" are Mrs. WENTWORTH, Mrs. HARWOOD, (contralto), Mr. ADAMS (tenor), Mr. DRAPER, and Mr. THOMAS BALL, the sculptor, whose rich bass voice will be welcomed back after two years' sunning in Italy. The Handel and Haydn have the whole field of public Oratorio to themselves this winter; both of the other two choral Societies, discouraged by the pecuniary losses of the past years, have resolved to confine their operations to meetings for practice, with occasional concerts of a semi-private character.

Mr. B. F. BAKER and others have issued the prospectus of a "Boston Music School," the object of which is "to furnish solid musical education in all its branches, practical and theoretical, to those who intend fitting themselves for the profession, either as artists or teachers." The subjects of instruction will be: System of Notation, Harmony, Counterpoint and Fugue, Composition with reference to Musical Form, and Instrumentation, Vocalization, Practice in Chorus Singing, Piano Forte, Violin, and any of the Orchestral Instruments. Instruction given in classes, the whole course to consist of six terms of twelve weeks each, occupying three years, and entitling to a diploma. Opportunities of hearing good music, too, will be made easy. The Board of Instruction thus far announced are: Messrs. B. F. BAKER, J. W. ADAMS, LEVI P. HOMER and J. C. D. PARKER. The two former gentlemen have had long experience in training singers, and in the management of choirs, Conventions, Institutes, &c. Messrs. Homer and Parker are competent teachers in the departments Harmony and of Counterpoint, Organ or Piano-playing, &c. We think it were wiser for any such experiment to bear the name of the responsible getters up and managers, rather than the name of "Boston." But this is no criticism on the plan itself, which is essentially a good one, and which promises to supply a want long felt. We wish it all success and growth. If it can only grow to be a concentration of all the best talent which we now possess, or which can be procured, to be employed in training up musicians; if it can grow to be a true Musical University or Conservatorium, (and why may it not by slow degrees, if rightly managed, and not kept too subject to personal or party interest or prejudice?) it will indeed be a great blessing to our country.

We hesitated about admitting the article on Violins, &c., on another page, not because its strictures were unreasonable, but because really the game seemed to us scarcely worth the candle; since the Fair, apart from Pianos and Melodeons, presented such a beggarly show of empty boxes in the way of musical instruments. Really we suppose the judges found their work chiefly in these two first named departments, and looked upon the rest as scattering appendix. But credit to whom credit is due; the brothers WHITE, according to all witnesses, deserve all our correspondent says of them as skilful makers and repairers of stringed instruments.—We printed a large number of extra copies of our last week's paper, containing the Report of the Committee on Musical Instruments, and the edition is not yet exhausted.

MADAME DUDEVANT (GEORGE SAND), when asked if she had been to hear Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," replied: "I do not care to be present where Catholics and Protestants shoot each other down, while a Jew makes the music." The story is told in the preface to the last edition of Thibaut's Ueber Reinheit der Tonkunst, and is good enough to be true.... The recent opera season in New York is said not to have been pecuniarily profitable; there is a MARETZKE party, and there is a stockholders' party, who charge the failure upon each other. The flight to Havana, it seems, is only for six weeks, and the troupe may possibly return to New York. They are engaged, we hear, to open the grand new theatre (Academy of Music) in Philadelphia on the 16th of February. . . . RICHARD STORRS WILLIS, of the Musical World, has commenced a series of three Lectures on Music, by invitation, before the members of the Board of Education, school officers and teachers in New York. Musical performances by the young ladies of the Daily Normal School under the direction of Mr. G. H. CURTIS, precede and follow each lecture, and on the last evening (next Friday) an address will also be made by WM. CULLEN BRYANT. We have not heard what are the method and special topics of Mr. Willis's lectures, but doubt not they are worthy of the man, the subject and the occasion. This was an excellent move on the part of the directors of the public schools. . . . GOTTSCHALK, it is stated, is called suddenly to France by the death of his mother. . . . THALBERG has been making friends of the school children also in Philadelphia. He played one day, and D'ANGRI sang, before two thousand of them.

The London Morning Herald has the following notice of Miss MAY, who has been engaged by Lamley to appear in Italian Opera in London :

America is about to supply Europe with a prima donna, in exchange for the many eminent vocalists who have visited and been hospitably received in the United States. Miss Juliana May, a young and gifted lady, who has studied and practiced under the best masters in Italy, and is now in Paris, is destined, according to general rumor in the French capital, to be the star whose glories are to equal, if not eclipse, in brightness the reigning planets. Her voice is a soprano sfogato of marvellous flexibility and immense power, the compass ranging from the la below the soprano cleff to mi above; the middle notes being particularly strong and sympathetic. At a private trial recently, at the Italian Opera House, Paris, her singing created a great sensation.

Musical Intelligence.

WORCESTER, MASS.—That our citizens may see that the patronage they extend to the Mozart Society is not lost upon them, I would state that they have purchased Haydn's beautiful oratorio of the "Creation," and have commenced vigorous rehearsal thereof. It will probably be given in the new hall, which would seem to be all that can be wished for a music hall; and, it is hoped with a good organ. Would we might add, with an orchestra.—Palladium.

NEW ORLEANS.—The French Opera, under the excellent management of M. Boudousquie, opened on the 6th with "Lucia di Lammermoor," with the charming Mlle. Colson in the leading rôle, M. Delagrave as Edgardo, and M. Mayne as Ashton. In the meantime Mlle. Bourgeois has immortalized herself in "La Favorita"—Mlle. Müller, M. Moulin, M. Mayne and M. Junca, had given a magnificent rendering of "Guillaume Tell"—Tournade and Latouche have distinguished themselves in "Les Mousquetaires de la Reine"—M. and Mme. Lacroix have given us the Armand and Camille in "La Dame aux Camellias,"—and the "Queen of Cyprus" has twice been admirably performed. You can always count upon a good house at the "French Opera," if at any place of amusement in town.—Corr. Evening Gazette.

At Crisp's Gaiety, last evening, Von Weber's grandest opera, "Der Freischütz," was produced with every proof of having been most carefully and conscientiously prepared. The scenery, costumes, machinery, and all the appointments were of the best and most appropriate, and the result was that, with but a hitch or two, in the working of the scenes, incidental to a first representation, this difficult piece went off smoothly and effectively.

It was sung well, moreover, and here there was no "hitch" of any kind: The second scene in the first act furnishes the test of a singer's ability to do justice to Von Weber's music; and when one considers that this was the first time Miss Rosalie Durand ever attempted to sing a note of it before an audience, it must be conceded that she succeeded to admiration.

Miss Hodson acted and sang the part of Anna very nicely, and greatly aided the ensemble, wherever she appeared throughout the piece. Mr. Stretton was a good Caspar, Mr. Frazer a most acceptable Rodolph, and Mr. Lyster and Mr. Vincent did their parts of old Kuno and young Kilian as well as need be.—Picayune.

CINCINNATI.—The Cecilia, a society of about 100 active members, chiefly Germans, regaled their friends one evening last month with choruses and solos from Mendelssohn's Paulus, Mozart's Idomeneo, Haydn's "Seasons," &c. The orchestra, all but a few musicians, was a section of the society. The performance is said to have been highly successful, and Mendelssohn's music to have quite transported the singers. . . . Sunday concerts in half a dozen German Halls, always with lager beer obligato, offer little that is edifying. Two good orchestras with sterling music vainly seek to win the attention of the public.—Deutsche-Musik-Zeitung.

Foreign.

We begin to suspect that VIVIER, the hornist, is a fictitious personage, perchance a fantastical sprite out the Boy's Wunderhorn, they tell such stories of him. Here is the last :

Among the curiosities to be seen in Paris at the present moment is Vivier's winter residence in the Rue de la Frme des Mathurins. It is situated on the roof of the building, and the ingenious cornist has contrived, with great labor, to make an entrance to it through the side wall, which, like most of those in Paris, is of great thickness. The time required, however to reach his apartments is considerable, nearly fifteen minutes being required to make the voyage. When once, however, the goal is reached, all fatigue is forgotten, and the traveller revels in the elegance that surrounds him, and in the extensive and beautiful view of Paris, which spreads out far beneath him. Among the latest visitors were MM. Rossini and Auber.

COLOGNE.—On the 4th inst., Messrs. Maurin, Chevillard and colleagues, from Paris, gave their second Quintet Soirée before a most numerous audience. The effect produced by their execution of Beethoven's quartet in A minor was very great. The audience were highly delighted and so were the artists, for, after the concert, they repeatedly exclaimed: "Oh! how well the public listens in Germany! How different it is in Paris!" The quartet was followed by Beethoven's pianoforte trio in B major, performed by Herr E. Frank, Messrs. Maurin, and Chevillard. The concert was brought to a close by Mozart's violin quartet in D major, No. 7. Messrs. Maurin and Chevillard left the following day for the purpose of playing in Bonn, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Düsseldorf. A concert which has attracted considerable attention, is announced for the 11th inst. The great feature in it will be the production of a new composition by Herr Ferdinand Hiller—a grand work, in two parts, for chorus, solos, and full band. The text is taken from the tenth chapter of the twenty-second book of Livy. The same subject has already been used by Uhland, in his poem, Ver sacrum, and has been arranged in a lyrical-dramatic form by Professor L. Bischoff. The action takes place at Alba-Longa, and is mixed up with the foundations of Rome, and the introduction of the worship of Mars and Vesta. The solo parts are those of the Priest of Mars (barytone), the Priestess of Vesta (soprano), a General of the Albani (tenor), and a female inhabitant of Alba (soprano). Both the soprano characters, with the exception of a quartet in the second part, may be sung by the same person. The chorus is treated sometimes in the antique style, as witnessing the action, and sometimes as participating in the action, as warriors, shepherds, populace, etc.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The Théâtre-Italien opened with Verdi's Macbeth. The company—in the main the same as last year—includes the following artists:—Mesdames Bosio, Lotti, Meric-Lalande, and Tagliafico, Signors Calzolari, Bettini, G. Bettini, Debassini, Bartolini, Lablache, Marini, Tagliafico, etc. Macbeth was to have been followed by Ernani, Il Trovatore, and Rigoletto. The audience appear not to have forgotten Tamberlik, for whom loud cries are raised every night.

Advertisements.

—THE—

Modern School for the Piano-Forte

IS THE Best Instruction Book ever published!

It has been awarded the first Prize Medal at the late Exhibition of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, and is recommended by

S. THALBERG, A. DREYSHOCK,

A. JAEHL, WM. MASON,

OTTO DRESEL, JULIUS KNORR,

DR. LOWELL MASON, GEO. J. WEBB,

W. B. BRADBURY, G. F. ROOT,

B. F. BAKER, and over 200 others,

Comprising Music Teachers, Principals of Seminaries, Amateurs, &c. &c. If you wish to buy the best book, that will teach you to play in the shortest time, it is the

MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE PIANO-FORTE, BY NATHAN RICHARDSON.

Price Three Dollars.

PUBLISHED BY

RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, Boston,
And for sale by all Music Dealers in the United States.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE undersigned proposes to give a series of FOUR Orchestral Concerts as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall be obtained. Subscriptions received at Wade's music store, 197 Washington Street, and Russell & Richardson's, 18 Tremont, or 232 Washington Street, where the prospectus may be seen.

CARL ZERRAHN.

THIRD SEASON.

THE GERMAN TRIO,

Carl Gartner, Carl Hause and Henry Jungnickel, Respectfully inform their Subscribers and the Musical Public of Boston that their FIRST CONCERT of the Series of Six will take place on Saturday Evening, Dec. 20, 1856,

At Messrs. Chickering's Rooms, Masonic Temple,

Assisted by

Mrs. MOZART, Miss J. TWICHELL,

Messrs. C. B. ADAMS and J. M. MOZART.

The Concert will begin precisely at half past seven. Single tickets $1 each. Packages of Six tickets, which may be used at pleasure, $5, may be had at the music stores and at the door.

GUSTAVE SATTER'S PHILHARMONIC SOIRÉES.

FIRST EVENING, Dec. 27, 1856.

At the Rooms of Messrs. HALLET, DAVIS & CO., No. 409 Washington Street.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1—Quartet: G minor, op. 85, (four movements,) R. WILLIAMS. Messrs. Schultze, Eckhardt, Jungnickel and Satter.

2—a) Mazourka, b) Nocturne, c) Scherzo, (first time,) G. SATTER.

3—a) Constancy: Song, op. 11, b) Cello: Ballad, op. 12, G. SATTER. Sung by Mrs. Little.

4—Sonata (Kreutzer) op. 47, BEETHOVEN. Messrs. Schultze and Satter.

PART II.

5—Reminiscence de "Robert le Diable," FRANK LIST. 6—Trio, E flat, op. 98, (three movements,) HUMMEL. Messrs. Schultze, Jungnickel and Satter.

Tickets, admitting two persons to the course, . . . $3 50
" " " one person " " " 2 00
Single admission to one concert, 1 00

Commences precisely at 7½ o'clock.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

The FIRST CONCERT of the season will take place on Sunday Evening, December 28, 1856,

AT THE

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

HANDEL'S "MESSIAH"

Will be performed, with the assistance of

Mrs. J. H. LONG,

Mrs. E. A. WENTWORTH,

Mrs. I. I. HARWOOD,

Mr. C. R. ADAMS,

Mr. J. P. DRAPER,

Mr. THOMAS BALL,

And an efficient Orchestra, under the able conductorship of CARL ZERRAHN. F. F. MUELLER, Organist.

Tickets, at 50 cents each, may be obtained at the principal music stores and hotels, and at the door on the evening of performance, or of the Secretary,

L. B. BARNES.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON, ORGAN BUILDER, WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO-FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

Il Trovatore. Piano Solo. Complete.

JUST PUBLISHED.

VERDI'S Favorite Opera, IL TROVATORE. Edited for the Piano-Forte, by R. NORDMANN. Prefaced with a biographical sketch of the Composer. Being the seventh volume of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas." Price $2.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

New Course of Juvenile Instruction.

A PRACTICAL COURSE OF INSTRUCTION IN SINGING. Prepared on School Principles. By CHRISTIAN HEINRICH HOHMANN. Translated from the fifth German edition.

NOW READY, Part I., containing Exercises and Songs for Younger Classes. Price 20 cts. $2 per dozen. The attention of Teachers is invited to this new and attractive series of Instructions.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

.....A.....
CHRISTMAS CAROL,
 WRITTEN BY THE
REV. T. A. STARKEY,
 MUSIC BY
GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN.
 —ALSO—
 THIRD EDITION OF WARREN'S
BOBOLINK POLKA,
 JUST PUBLISHED BY
J. H. HIDLEY,
 544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.
 MANUFACTURERS OF
 Grand, Parlor Grand,
 and Square
PIANO FORTES,
 WITH THEIR
 PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.
409 Washington Street, Boston,
 (Near Boylston Market.)

Piano-Forte Instruction.
Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
 RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,
Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
 306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
 Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.
J. H. HIDLEY,
PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
 544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.
WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.
 Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices.
 THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbault, a few copies.
 Just received, a small invoice of Maxa Flutes.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.
 Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1866. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1866. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland: all held during the month of September, 1866:—making Six First Premiums in one month!!
 N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIRST PRIZE over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal bass. The one with pedal bass contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $80 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeon $200.
 For descriptive circulars and further information address
MASON & HAMLIN,
 Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ms.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,
 FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
 Gives Instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

CARL ZERRAHN,
 TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
 FLUTE AND SINGING.

Mrs. CARL ZERRAHN,
 TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
 Residence No. 1 Winter Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
 Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Anthems for the Coming Season.
Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
 (Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

Anthems for Christmas.

HOPKINS, E. J.—Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, S. A. T. B., 19 cts. Single vocal parts, 13 cts. Class copy, 8 cts.
OROE—Behold, I bring you glad tidings: S. A. T. B., 19 cts.
GREENE—Behold, I bring you glad tidings: for two Trebles or Tenors, with Chorus for four voices, 38 cents. Separate vocal parts, 22 cents.
HANDEL—For behold darkness. Recit. } 13 cents.
 The people that walked in darkness. Air B. }
 For unto us a Child is born. 81 cts. Sep. voc. parts, 25 cts.
 Behold, a Virgin shall conceive; and O! thou that tellest;
 Alto Solo and Chorus, 81 cts. Duet, 8vo. 6 cts. Separate vocal parts, 25 cts.
JACKSON, (Masham.)—Short and Easy Anthems, suitable for Country Choirs:—
 Sing, O heavens! (4 voices,) 25 cts. Sep. vocal parts, 13 cts.
 O Zion! that bringest good tidings, (4 voices,) 68 cts.
 O! come hither and behold, (4 voices,) 68 cts.
NOVELLO—Sing unto the Lord: Short Anthem for S. A. T. B. with a Verse for Four Trebles, 19 cts. Small class copy, in score, 8 cts. Separate vocal parts, 16 cts.
PURCELL—Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings: In full score. Verse, A. T. B. 68 cts. Separate chorus parts, 13 cts.
 Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings, (abridged from the above,) from Boyce's Cathedral Music. Verse, A. T. B. 25 cts. Separate vocal parts, 22 cts.
VITTORIA—Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings: S. A. T. B., Folio size, 19 cts. Class copy, in score, 8 cts.

Carols for Christmas-tide,

Set to Ancient Melodies, by the Rev. THOMAS HELMORE, M. A. Words, principally in imitation of the original, by the Rev. J. M. NEALE, M. A.

18mo size,.....	18
“ post-free,.....	15
“ in packets of 50,.....	5 00
“ bound in scarlet cloth,.....	25
“ compressed four vocal parts,.....	25

These Carols may be sung by a Solo voice, with accompaniment for the Piano and Organ, in which form they are printed in Music Folio. Ad libitum vocal parts for Alto, Tenor, and Bass, have been added, in order that, when these voices are present, the harmony may be rendered complete without an instrument. The Volume, folio music size, $1.12.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,
 389 Broadway, New York,
 And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
 TEACHER OF SINGING,
 47 Hancock Street.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI
 Is now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
 (Late at St. Paul's Church,)
ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
 ALBANY, N. Y.

OTTO DRESEL
 Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
 MANUFACTURERS OF
 PATENT ACTION
 GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
 OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
 TREMONT STREET,
 BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
 Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
 8 HAYWARD PLACE.

MR. AUGUST PRIES,
 Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.
 RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
 Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

JOB PRINTING
 OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
 EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
 No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
 Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
 BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
 MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
 10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
 PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
 HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
 NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
 TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
 Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
 OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
 Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. F. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
 IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
 701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
 CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
 Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
 A Paper of Art and Literature,
 Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
 Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
 Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.
 First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
 Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
 For one column, (120 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
 do do each subsequent.....$6.00
 Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
 Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 247.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1856.

VOL. X. No. 13.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.
OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 283 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Gleaned from HECTOR BERLIOZ.)*

THE VIOLIN.

Instruments played with a bow, of which the combination forms what is somewhat improperly termed a quatuor, are the base and constituent element of the whole orchestra. From them is evolved the greatest power of expression, and an incontestable variety of different qualities of tone. Violins particularly are capable of a host of apparently inconsistent shades of expression. They possess (as a whole) force, lightness, grace, accents both gloomy and gay, thought, and passion. The only point is, to know how to make them speak. Moreover, it is not needful to calculate for them—as for wind instruments—the duration of a holding-note, and to contrive for them occasional rests; they are sure never to be out of breath. Violins are faithful, intelligent, active, and indefatigable servants.

Slow and tender melodies, confided too often now-a-days to the wind instruments, are nevertheless never better rendered than by a mass of violins. Nothing can equal the touching sweetness of a score of first strings made to sing by twenty well-skilled bows. That is, in fact, the true female voice of the orchestra—a voice at once passionate and chaste, heart-rending, yet soft, which can weep, sigh and lament, chant, pray and muse, or burst forth into joyous accents, as none other can do. An imperceptible movement of the arm, an almost unconscious sentiment on the part of him who experiences it, producing scarcely any apparent effect when executed by a single violin, shall, when multiplied by a number of them in unison, give forth enchanting gradation, irresistible impulse, and accents which penetrate to the very heart's core.

* A Treatise upon Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration; containing an exact table of the compass, a detail of the mechanism, and a study of the quality of tone and expressive character of various instruments; accompanied by numerous examples in score, from the works of the greatest masters, and from some unpublished works of the author. New edition, revised, corrected, augmented by several additional chapters on newly-invented instruments, and on the whole art of the orchestral conductor. By HECTOR BERLIOZ. Op. 10. Translated from the French by Mary Cowden Clark. London and New York: J. Alfred Novello.

The tremolo, simple or double, by many violins, produces several excellent effects; it expresses trouble, agitation, terror, shades of piano, of mezzoforte, and of fortissimo, when it is placed on one or two of the three strings, G, D, and A; and when it is not carried much above the middle B flat. It has something of a stormy, violent character, in the fortissimo on the middle of the first or second string. It becomes, on the contrary, aerial, angelic, when employed in several parts, and pianissimo, on the high notes of the first string. The tremolo below and in the middle of the third and of the fourth string, is much more characteristic in fortissimo, if the bow strike the strings near the bridge. In large orchestras, and where the performers take pains to give it its full effect, it produces a sound like that of a rapid and powerful cascade. This mode of execution should be indicated by the words—near the bridge. A fine application of this kind of tremolo occurs in the scene of the oracle, in the first act of Gluck's Alceste. The effect of the tremulousness of the second violins and violas is there redoubled by the grand and emphatic progression of the double basses, by the blow struck from time to time in the first violins, by the successive introduction of the wind instruments, and lastly by the sublime recitative which this surging of the orchestra accompanies. I know nothing of this kind more dramatic or more terrible.

Harmonics are those sounds which are generated by touching the strings with the fingers of the left hand, so as to divide them in their length, yet not with sufficient pressure to place them in contact with the finger-board, as is the case for ordinary sounds.

These Harmonics possess a singular character of mysterious softness; and the extreme acuteness of some of them affords the violin, in the upper part, an immense compass. They are natural, or artificial.

Some performers sound double strings in harmonics; but this effect is so difficult to obtain, and consequently so hazardous that composers can never be advised to write it.

The harmonics of the fourth string have something of the quality of a flute; they are preferable for delivering a slow air: Paganini employed them with wonderful success in the prayer of Moses. The harmonics of the other strings acquire delicacy and tenuity in proportion as they are higher; it is precisely this character, and their crystalline quality, which renders them appropriate to chords that may be called fairy-like; that is to say, to those effects of harmony which inspire brilliant musings, and carry the imagination towards the most graceful fictions of the poetical and supernatural world. However they may have become familiar, now-a-days, to our young violinists, they should never be employed in a lively movement; or at least care should be taken not to give them rapid successions of notes, if their perfect execution is to be ensured.

Sordines (or mutes) are little wooden implements which are placed on the bridge of stringed instruments in order to deaden their sonorousness; and which give them at the same time a mournful, mysterious and softened tone, which is frequently to be felicitously applied in all styles of music. Sordines are most generally used in slow pieces; but they serve scarcely less well, when the subject of the piece admits it, for rapid and light designs, or for accompaniments of hurried rhythm. Gluck has effectually proved this in his sublime Italian monologue of Alceste, "Chi mi parla."

The custom is, when employing sordines, to cause them to be used by all the band of stringed instruments; nevertheless, there are certain circumstances, more frequent than may be imagined, under which sordines placed in a single part (in the first violins, for instance,) will color the instrumentation with a very particular impression, by the mixture of clear sounds and veiled sounds. There are others also, where the character of the melody is sufficiently dissimilar from that of the accompaniments, which render the use of the sordine advisable.

The Pizzicato is still in general use for instruments played with the bow. The sounds obtained by vibrating the strings with the finger, produce accompaniments approved by singers, since they do not cover the voice; they do well also for symphonic effects, even in vigorous orchestral sallies, either in the whole band of stringed instruments, or in one or two parts alone.

Accompaniments pizzicato piano, have always a graceful effect; they afford a sense of repose to the hearer, and impart, when not abused, variety to the aspect of the orchestra. In future, doubtless, more original and striking effects will be obtained from pizzicato, than have hitherto been essayed. Violinists, not considering pizzicato as an integral portion of violin-playing, have studied it but little.

Some of our young violinists have learned from Paganini to execute rapid pizzicato descending scales, by plucking the strings with the fingers of the left hand resting on the neck of the instrument, and the pizzicato passages (still with the left hand) with a mixture of strokes from the bow, or even as serving for accompaniment to an air played by the bow. These various feats will doubtless become, in course of time, familiar to every violin-performer, and then will be available in composition.

Violins are able, now-a-days, to execute whatever they will. They play up to the extreme height as easily as in the middle; passages the most rapid, designs the most eccentric, do not dismay them. In an orchestra, where they are sufficiently numerous, that which one fails to perform is done by others; and the result is that, without any apparent mistake, the phrase is delivered as the author wrote it.

In cases, however, where the rapidity, complication and height of a passage would render it too hazardous, or merely that more sureness and neatness of execution should be obtained, it should be dispersed; that is to say, the mass of violins should be divided, and one portion given to some and the rest to others. In this way, the passage of each part is sprinkled with little rests unperceived by the hearer; thus allowing, as it were, breathing-space to the violinists, and affording them time to take the difficulties carefully, so as to give the necessary firmness for a vigorous mastery of the strings.

THE VIOLA.

Of all the instruments in the orchestra, the one whose excellent qualities have been longest misappreciated, is the viola. It is no less agile than the violin; the sound of its strings is peculiarly telling; its upper notes are distinguished by their mournfully passionate accent; and its quality of tone altogether, of a profound melancholy, differs from that of other instruments played with a bow. It has, nevertheless, been long neglected, or put to a use as unimportant as ineffectual—that of merely doubling, in octave, the upper part of the bass. There are many causes that have operated to induce the unjust servitude of this noble instrument. In the first place the majority of the composers of the last century, rarely writing four real parts, scarcely knew what to do with it; and when they did not readily find some filling-up notes in the chords for it to do, they hastily wrote the fatal col Basso, sometimes with so much inattention, that it produced a doubling in the octave of the basses, irreconcilable either with the harmony or the melody, or with both one and the other. Moreover, it was unfortunately impossible, at that time, to write anything for the violas of a prominent character, requiring even ordinary skill in execution. Viola players were always taken from among the refuse of violinists. When a musician found himself incapable of creditably filling the place of violinists, he took refuge among the violas. Hence it arose that the viola performers knew neither how to play the violin nor the viola. It must even be admitted that at the present time this prejudice against the viola part is not altogether destroyed; and that there are still, in the best orchestras, many viola-players who are not more proficient on that instrument than on the violin. But the mischief resulting from this forbearance towards them, is daily becoming more felt; and, little by little, the viola will, like other instruments, be confided only to clever hands. Its quality of tone so strongly attracts and captivates the attention, that it is not necessary to have in the orchestra quite so many violas as second violins; and the expressive powers of this quality of tone are so marked, that, in the rare occasions when the old masters afforded its display, it never failed to fulfil their intention. The profound impression is well known, which is produced by that movement in the Iphigenia in Tauride, where Orestes, overcome with fatigue, panting, oppressed with remorse, grows more tranquil as he repeats: "Composure lulls again my heart!" while the orchestra, deeply agitated, utters sobs and convulsive sighs, attended throughout by the fearful and persevering mutter of the violas. Although, in this unspeakably fine piece of inspiration there is not a note of voice or instruments without its sublime intention, yet it should be noticed that the fascination exercised over the hearers, and the sensation of horror which causes their eyes to dilate and fill with tears, are principally attributable to the viola part, to the quality of its third string, to its syncopated rhythm, and to the strange effect of unison resulting from the syncopation of the A abruptly broken off in the middle by another A in the basses marking a different rhythm.

In the overture of Iphigenia in Aulide, Gluck has ingeniously made them sustain alone the lower part of the harmony; not so much, in this case, for the sake of producing an effect arising from the peculiarity of their quality of tone, but in order to accompany as softly as possible the air of the first violins, and to heighten the tremendous impression of the basses coming in upon the forte after a considerable number of rests. Sacchini has also given the lower part to the violas alone, in the air of Œdipus: "Your court became my refuge," without intending, however, to prepare an outburst. On the contrary, the instrumentation here gives to the phrase of melody it accompanies a most delicious calm and freshness. Melodies on the high strings of the viola have a marvellous beauty in scenes of a religious and antique character. Spontini was the first to conceive the idea of assigning the melody to them in several passages of his admirable prayers in the Vestale. Méhul, allured by the sympathy existing between the tone of the viola and the imaginative character of Ossianic poetry, constantly availed himself of them, even to the exclusion of the violins, in his opera of Uthal. Hence arose what the critics of the time called an intolerable monotony detrimental to the work's success. It was in reference to this that Grétry exclaimed: "I'd give a guinea to hear a first string!" This quality of the viola, so choice when it is judiciously employed and skilfully contrasted with the qualities of tone of violins and other instruments, necessarily soon palls; it is too unvaried, and too much imbued with mournfulness, for this to be otherwise. It is not unfrequent, at the present day, to divide the violas into first and second violas; and in orchestras like that of the opera, there is no difficulty in writing for them thus; but in others, where there are scarcely four or five violas, this division can only serve to diminish the effect of a body already weak in itself, and which the other instruments are ever tending to overwhelm. It should also be remarked that the majority of violas at present used in our French orchestras are far from possessing the requisite degree of power; they have neither the size, nor consequently the strength of tone of veritable violas—being almost violins strung with viola strings. Musical directors should absolutely prohibit the use of these mongrel instruments; the slender sonorousness of which impairs one of the most interesting parts in the orchestra, by depriving it of energy, and of its fine depth of tone.

When the violoncellos play the air, it is sometimes excellent to double them in unison by the violas. The tone of the violoncellos then acquires additional roundness and purity, without becoming less predominant. An example of this is the theme of the Adagio in Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

[To be continued]

Opera in France—The Month of Debuts.

(Correspondence of the N. Orleans Picayune.)

PARIS, Nov. 18, 1856.

This is the month of débuts (except in this city) from the Channel to the Mediterranean. Every year all the dramatic and operatic companies of the French towns and cities, save Paris, are renewed, and the old actors, who are re-engaged, as well as the new candidates for public favor, must come before the public in three several pieces, at three several times, and receive the applause or the hisses, or the tumult between the hisses and applauders. Judge of the agony of the poor player on these eventful nights. His bread, the year's bread of his wife and children, depend upon the humor of the fickle mob! If he is rejected, he wanders from town to town in hope of a more favorable pit—these changes make dreadful inroads upon his meagre income—debts accumulate—the wardrobe diminishes—and charcoal or the river ends the sad story! * * *

The pay of the lyrical artists is far superior to that of the histrionic actors, because the public now-a-days is more favorable to operas than to plays; lyrical educations are more expensive than the education given to players, their expenses for costumes are greater, and above all, their career is a very short one—especially in towns fond of Verdi. Thus, while the usual pay of a grand opera first tenor is $200 a month, an opera comique first tenor is $120 a month, a first barytone is $100, a first bass is $100, a second bass is $50; a prima donna of opera comique is $200, a prima donna of grand opera is $160, a first dugazon is $80. The usual pay of comedians is, for the leading juveniles, $60, second juvenile $20, low comedians $30, leading lady $60, second lady $40, duenna $20. Most of the company receive some $20 or $18 a month, and on this miserable pittance they are obliged to dress, pay their return fare to Paris, and live during the four summer months when the theatres are closed! What agony, what privations, are not concealed beneath the painted cheek and the glittering costume of the lower ranks of the French players! The expenses of a manager of one of these provincial theatres, where grand opera, opera comique, comedy, drama, and vaudeville are given, in a second class city, (of from sixty to eighty thousand inhabitants,) are about $25,000 for the eight months the theatre is open.

As you may readily guess, the month of débuts is the most interesting month of the year in the provincial towns; and all persons who fly to the country or the capital during the summer months make it a point of duty to return to their residences in time to vote at the season of débuts. I heard the other day a good story told about these débuts. In a town some leagues south of Paris, where the old dramatic traditions are preserved, so far at least as they prescribe the right of the whole public to vote, the débuts are taking place. A new cantatrice appeared as the curtain rose, and certainly her appearance was far from being in her favor. She sang, and wounded the public ear with a hoarse, sharp, untuned, uncultivated voice. The public happened to be in its patient mood that evening, and the cantatrice's first song was greeted with an icy silence. The opera went on in its usual course, and the débutante presently was required to sing a second solo. She sang worse than at first. The audience hissed, grimly but without violence, until they perceived one man applauding, and applauding with enthusiasm. This sight excited their passions, and they hissed and screamed with great uproar: "Down with Mademoiselle! Refused! Refused!" The solitary applauder, fired with zeal, became more lusty in his applause, and cried with stentorian lungs, "Bravo! Vive Mademoiselle! Accepted! Accepted!" For a quarter of an hour this unequal contest lasted, and at last (since the cantatrice was both ugly and without talent) their curiosity became roused by so much obstinacy as he exhibited, and they asked him how it was possible for him to applaud such a singer. "Messieurs," he replied, "I applaud Mademoiselle for this simple reason, which I am sure all of you will appreciate: I have not the honor of living in this town—I am by birth a Parisian, by profession a bagman—I am consequently obliged to visit a great many departments, and sojourn in a great many towns; I have spent a fortnight here, and I leave to-morrow never to return. If you refuse Mademoiselle she will try to get an engagement elsewhere, and I shall run the risk of meeting her in one of the towns where I am going; if, on the contrary you accept her I have nothing to fear, and I can travel in peace, with the pleasing certainty of never again hearing that cantatrice whom I find in every respect horrible." Long and loud shouts of laughter greeted this reply, which sealed the poor prima donna's fate.

I now quit the country for Paris, where we are beginning to assume something of the winter's animation. At the Grand Opera, we have poor Mme. Medori struggling with might and main against the icy silence of the parquette, and the low but deep curses of the manager of the opera, who wishes she was at the—frontier. The critics are all favorable to her. M. Fiorentino says: "Here is an illustrious cantatrice, of an incontestable merit, endowed with a soprano voice, which for force, sonorousness and brilliancy, is unequalled; an actress full of spirit and fire, who has been applauded and admired on the principal stages of Europe—here she is suddenly paralyzed by the equivocal and reserved reception she received the first evening she appeared, from a small and almost imperceptible number in the vast theatre of the opera. Here is a woman, struck with stupor and inaction, unable to recognize her public and herself. What, so much will, so much intelligence, so much study, so much labor, so many successes, so many triumphs, cannot arm her, cannot defend her against a groundless, boundless apprehension! This ice must be broken, this misunderstanding must be cleared." All this, however, is in vain. Mme. Medori has an attack of "stage fright" every time she appears on the boards of the Grand Opera. We have had here a two-act opera, by an Italian named Biletta, a protégé of Prince Poniatowski, a "so-soish" imitation of Rossini. We have had Mario—lazy, spoilt Mario—in Il Barbiere de Siviglia, and a most favorable début of a Mlle. Steffanone, who, unknown and unheralded, engaged one night after the Italian Opera's doors were open, as a make shift, to replace Mme. Frezzolini, who had fallen suddenly sick, received by the audience not only coldly, but with hisses; and who in half an hour carried away the house, and is now engaged at a good round sum!

Music and Education.

Richards Storrs Willis, Esq., Editor of the Musical World, having been invited to speak before the Board of Education of this city, on the Relations between Music and Education, delivered the first of a series of lectures on that subject, in the Hall of the Board, on Saturday evening. There was a very large audience, and the lecture was preceded and followed by musical performances, executed in excellent style by the young ladies of the Normal School, led by G. H. Curtis. Mr. Aptommas gave one of his exquisite harp solos, by special invitation.

Mr. Willis spoke for an hour, and was heard with great attention.

After alluding to the universality and significance of the language of Music, he proceeded to treat of the relations that exist between it and Education, saying that it seemed a befitting thing that a Board of Education should interest itself in music. The word education, however, involves a great deal: its significance reaches beyond the intellect, includes the heart, comprehends the affections. Hence Music, the language of the heart, is the most befitting medium through which the cultivation of the intellect and heart should flow. The lecturer pointed out the defects of modern music; it has come to be too much cultivated for its collateral advantages; it has become rather a demonstrative society accomplishment than an interior, refining art. Music, in the modern sense, means astonishment,—it used to mean pleasure. Not that the speaker undervalued technical progress in any art, but the difficulty is that compositual art does not keep pace with mechanical. The pioneers of the modern school of pianism have been men of unquestionable ability; Thalberg is every inch an artist—Liszt is a prodigious genius. But these men, like a few of their disciples as well, are accidentals in musical life. They know Art, as well as the piano, yet it is by too many of their ungifted imitators that such antics are played with music. If, side by side with every great performer of music, a great composer were born, who could wed great performance with immortal music; if with every Liszt was a Beethoven; if, with all his capacity in composition, with every Thalberg were a Mozart; if with every Mendelssohn and every Chopin there were two more just like them, (for they combined both gifts in one,)—then when we go to a concert might we be sure of hearing music as well as seeing prodigies. Mr. Willis put in a plea for home music—for society music would always take care of itself—and held it to be absurd to educate children on an art scale as grand as though their capacity really justified it, and they were actually to become distinguished singers or public concert players. This was but waste of time and money. To accept the fact that mediocrity is the rule, and genius the exception, is, in fact, to regulate the musical education of children. It will regulate, first, the time given to the study; and second, the style and degree of art to be attempted. For excellence is essential, whatever be attempted; empiricism is detestable whether in high or low art. This point was enlarged upon with marked earnestness—the speaker claiming that we need to return to simples in music, as in many other things,—musical simples, which are practicable for home purposes; which are suited to quiet fireside evenings, and to please the children withal; which requires not the time and money of years to gain, and when gained, nearly as much time and as much money to retain, but which may easily be gained by a persistent, gradual culture, and not at the expense of other important things. The best general basis for home music, he held, is not to be found at home—but is to be found at school. In regard to instrumental music, he argued that the pianoforte is far too exclusively cultivated, to the exclusion of the guitar and harp, both graceful and attractive. Exercise in sight-reading of music was recommended, for this is an accomplishment, now too much neglected, which involves the soul of musical pleasure and interest. In conclusion, there were a few pleasant words to the Board of Education, and the lecture ended. The second will be delivered at the same place, on Saturday evening next.—N. Y. Daily Times.

Ancient Church Music.

(From the London Athenæum.)

Prof. Sir F. Ouseley's lecture on Ancient Church Music, delivered at Oxford on the 12th, "the first of this term's course," may be accepted, we trust, as an emphatic sign that all men of sense, whether Churchmen, laymen, artists or members of congregations, are beginning to weary of the fopperies which a set of persons—active in proportion to their want of taste and understanding—have endeavored to fasten upon the ritual of the Church of England. While we have always owned that the interest of "the tones" and "chants," "Ambrosian and Gregorian," must be recognized by every one who thinks on the subject;—while, under certain scenic conditions, and in conjunction with particular associations, their effect has a solemn gravity (not wholly clear of griminess) which nothing more modern can produce,—from a very early period of the "movement" we have lost no opportunity of pointing out, that to attach any traditional sanctity to these rude old melodies was, virtually, to place barbarism on the altar; or else to claim for Art an origin which the boldest human definers of divine inspiration would shrink, we imagine, from ascribing to it. Further, we have as often called the attention of the wranglers and formalists to the certainty of all musical traditions being more or less impure. Supposing even the antique notation mastered, supposing it reduced into modern clefs and scales—then comes the question of extent to which expression is modified by manner of execution. To appreciate the range of such variety, it is sufficient to point to the Sistine "Misereres" at Rome—so magical there, so powerless in every other place. In short, whenever real inquiry is barred by formalism, faith must be laid aside for fanaticism, and Art must perish; and with it, at no distant period, all true reverence. The above is mere recapitulation, so far as the Athenæum is concerned; but we are glad to see that others who have a voice potential are stirring in the question—preaching healthy action as better than palsy—justifying the right to inquire, on the one hand, and decrying, on the other, the substitution of hearsay sympathies for true knowledge. The concluding words of the Rev. Sir F. Ouseley's lecture, time and place considered, carry no small weight with them. "Would," said he, in taking leave of his audience, "that those men in our own day, who love to praise Gregorian music to the exclusion of all other, would in this particular take example by St. Gregory himself, and strive rather to devote the best they can find to the service of the Church—the best, and not the oldest—and let them remember, too, that those only are qualified to judge what is best, who have themselves mastered the art in all its phases, and studied it in all its developments."

G. F. Benkert and his Works.

Some one sends us a copy of the Philadelphia Saturday Mail, of Dec. 13, containing an article about this young composer (to whom we have already alluded), marked: "This is worth copying." As an amusing specimen of extravagant eulogy, we think it is; indeed we know not whether the sender is in earnest or in joke. Of course we do not know that the young prodigy referred to is not another Mendelssohn or Mozart, since we have not heard or seen his compositions; but it is safe to assume that such "tall" comparisons as some of these, applied to any new man, are extravagant, and will be more apt to injure than to help his cause. We are glad however to copy the information given about Mr. Benkert's labors; and as for the comments, the reader will attach what weight he pleases to them.

"What!" methinks you say—"what? an American musician like Mendelssohn and Weber?" And yet it is true. George Felix Benkert, the subject of this sketch, was born in Germantown, a small village near Philadelphia, and having displayed a great talent for music, his father sent him to Europe, that he might complete himself under such a master as Lindpaintner, the author of the "Standard Bearer." Under such a master, he soon ripened into a musician; mastering the science of harmony, and dissecting the classical compositions of the great masters. America is unquestionably a precocious nation; she has lived more, and to better advantage, during the last fifty years, than all the nations of Europe in twice that period of time. Look at her from any point of view, and one must acknowledge that no nation ever produced men so great in every department of science, art and discovery. This is not mere talk; let facts be confirmation strong as holy writ. In history, what nation can show a superior to Bancroft or Prescott? Let England compare her Walter Scott and Bulwer with our Cooper and Irving, and she will find that they emerge from it, not only unscathed, but the better off for the comparison. And so too, we have a Washington in war, a Webster in oratory, a Longfellow in poetry, and in music, that divine art which, though created first, was the last to be perfected; as Germany hath given the world a Thalberg and a Mendelssohn, so America, the Young Giant of the West, hath produced a Gottschalk and a Benkert, the former born on the banks of the noble and rushing Mississippi, and the latter on those of the vast and flowing Delaware. How do the associations and scenes of youth mould the mind of the man! Whilst the young artist of the South involuntarily bears you away, like unto his native Mississippi, by the nervous and resistless torrent of notes, making the piano start as a thing of life, under his creative fingers, breaking all barriers which resist the tempestuous flood, till like the great Father of Waters it is at last conquered by its own element, the musician of the North portrays upon his instrument as a shower of pearls, a melody, clothed in a garb at once as flowing and classical as the waters of his own native Delaware. Disdaining the clever trickery of modern piano players, the clouds of arpeggios continually obscuring a sun which never rises, he relies upon the pure classical creations imbibed at the fountain of harmony, of which Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Haydn, Weber and Chopin are the springs, containing, as they do, all the life and soul of musical composition.

It is notorious that Beethoven was incorrect and uncertain as a player; and yet, what name can be coupled with that noble artist, whose fame, like his music, is eternal? And so it is with Benkert; it is not by his playing one must judge of him so much as by his music. Our readers must forgive us if we appear extravagant in praise, but we are writing under the excitement produced by his music; it is still ringing in our ears, and engrosses all our thoughts; our brain is still wild with the impression produced on us by hearing his "Cordelia," being the music to Shakespeare's King Lear, in five acts. King Lear! what a field for genius! Lear, of whom the great Forrest is the mighty personation, is now embellished by another American. Who will deny to Chopin's Marche Funèbre the greatest meed of praise? And yet we, who have studied and admired Chopin, were surprised at the funeral march in the V act; we were fairly enchanted; the melody seemed to float upon the air like spirits of the dead; each falling cadence seemed to waft the soul into another sphere, converting for the time being the melody into an airy ladder, by which the dead might slowly ascend unto the highest heaven. But great as this was, we were hardly prepared for the wild sublimity of his fifth act, portraying the death of King Lear; the angels of heaven seemed quietly preparing to take possession of his soul, but the legions of hell buckle on their armor to contend. Then the air is swelling with the terrific combat. Lear seems thoughtful, but occasionally speaks, being moved alternately by the contending warriors of heaven and hell. This cannot forever last, and the mighty Michael, always the Napoleon of heaven, decides the fray, and the spirit of Lear is wafted upon a thousand spears into the presence of his Creator.

His powers of composition do not end here—they are as various as are the feelings of man. His operas are not known in America, but it remains for the American people to say whether they shall hear them or not. We will mention all that we have as yet heard of: Viola, an opera in three acts, from Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night"; and he is now engaged on a national American opera called Logan, illustrating an incident in the life of that celebrated Indian chief. These are his grander operas, and we question whether their instrumentality and melody be surpassed by many of Meyerboer's and Verdi's. His opera buffa are Une visite à Pierre le grand and The Dragon of Wantley, in three acts. He has written, as yet, but one grand concerto; but if he never writes another, this one in A flat major, would establish his reputation among musicians. We can only say that we never listened to as classical a concerto at any concert in America (but one, and that was Weber's) as that played by Benkert. It is rich in melody, lofty in outline, and splendid in harmony. He has also composed a grand mass; this is the test whereby the musician may be judged. We have not heard it yet, but if we can rely on the critics of Vienna, it is vast in conception and bold in execution, embodying the melody of Mozart and the harmony of Beethoven. Of it the following letter speaks better than any terms of praise that we are master of:

VIENNA, 10th Feb. 1855.

GEO. F. BENKERT, Esq., Phila.

Honored Sir—The kind and courteous readiness with which you allowed the choir of our church the first production of your truly successful and sublime mass, gives the undersigned the gratifying occasion of expressing their warmest thanks to you. Honored sir, with the assurance that the recollection of this exquisite composition, disposing all hearts to devotion, has created a lasting impression upon all lovers of sacred music, and that the day upon which it was granted them to listen to its melodious strains will continue imperishable in the annals of the Society, permit us, honored sir, to express these sentiments of true esteem, united with the sincere wish that your glorious talent may long continue to the glory of God and his holy Church.

FRANC. THILL, Pres.

No more flattering testimonial could be given a man; even the difference of faith was overcome, and forced praise to well-merited talent.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music Teachers.

BY DAISY.

What would the world say if the author of "Mother Goose's Melodies" should be placed on the list of poets? and how would the critics be offended if a mere dabbler in water-color drawings should aspire to the rank of a first-rate artist!

Yet one of the noblest arts ever given to man is daily and openly debased by mere pretenders to the title of "Musician."

Music is indeed worthy of being called a noble art, for it everywhere entwines itself with the highest and purest feelings of which human nature is capable.

But my object in writing this article is to call the attention of the public generally to a certain class of music-teachers, now in the United States. The country is flooded with them, of both sexes, and of all ages; and I venture to say, that there is not one in ten, on an average, who is fitted to be an instructor in the art.

First of all, a musical teacher should have a love almost amounting to enthusiasm, for his profession. If he has not the true inspiration in himself, he cannot awaken it in others. No one should ever attempt to teach merely as an easy way of earning his daily bread, unless he can find such pleasure in his instructions as will more than repay him for his sacrifice of time and the innumerable trials to which he is subject. Otherwise, however well he may endeavor to perform his duty, he will in the end be a mere mechanical player; and unless his pupils have naturally great musical talent, all their lessons are in vain.

Secondly, he should have a genuine talent for music, which no culture can supply, and without which, no one can be a good musician. We want no amateur teachers—those good-natured people, who think because they can rattle off a great many tunes on the piano-forte, they are perfectly competent to instruct others (like the old woman who thought she would make a good doctor because she was always taking medicine.) A person may be able to perform very difficult pieces of music, and yet not at all able to teach others in the art.

Thirdly, he should himself be always a student in his profession; there is no one living, nor has there ever been one, whose intellect could fathom the depths of musical science. Mozart, when he was an old man (?) once said: "If he could again be a boy and begin life anew, with all the experience he had already acquired, and live to be as old as he was at that time, he might begin to know a little about music."

Now turn to the egotistical performers of our day, and mark the difference!

Before closing this communication, I would say a few words to parents. Are your children fond of music? and have they sufficient natural ability to enable them to understand its principles? If not, do not permit them to study it. Do not for the sake of fashion make them objects of ridicule to all true musicians. If, on the contrary, they show a decided taste for music, and have in common phrase "a good ear," cultivate that taste by all means. In a moral point of view, it is a great aid to religion. You seldom find a bad man* who knows much of music, or who can appreciate it in hearing others play; and many an erring one has been brought back to righteousness by a remembrance of the hymn learned at his mother's knee.

* Unfortunately we do, too often. Because music is a good thing, it does not follow that man must of necessity receive good from good. The fact of moral freedom has to be considered.—Ed.

[To be continued.]

Musical Correspondence.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 22. THALBERG, the incomparable, the unapproachable, is among us; his advent dates a week back. He, with Mesdames D'ANGRI, DE WILHORST, and the two Erards, have enraptured us with the perfection of piano-playing, gentlemanly manners, fine physical development, and mechanical skill. Four very successful concerts have already been given, and the fifth and sixth are advertised for this and to-morrow evening at the Assembly Rooms, at both of which THALBERG and GOTTSCHALK are to perform a Duet on Norma. That will be an epoch in the musical history of Baltimore!

I hear that Thalberg has been enjoying the hospitalities of the White House for a few days past. I must not forget to mention that the school children of this city were treated to a morning concert by the great performer.

Persons writing criticisms of concerts in advance are frequently subject to ridiculous blunders. For instance, at the Friday evening concert, Madame De Wilhorst, though appointed to sing, did not appear on account of sudden illness; but the next morning's papers informed the public that "she was rapturously applauded in her parts!"

The coming weeks will be prolific of musical items, and you may anticipate a blast from TRUMPET.

NEW YORK, Dec. 23. With the return of Christmas tide come sweet thoughts of that greatest of anthems the world has ever heard, sung nearly two thousand years ago, by the angels to the shepherds on the plains of Judea. In every Christian church the words of that angelic strain will be this Christmas repeated; and whether it be among the cold, icy fields of Russia, or under the balmy sky of Italy, upon Britain's isle, and in all parts of the vast American continent, that song of "Peace on earth" will burst forth from thousands of lips. For a time at least, all sectional differences are laid aside; and all over the earth, every one who bears the name of Christian joins with unity of spirit in the vocal praise of Him whose star rose in the East nineteen centuries ago.

It appears at this blessed season almost irreverent to talk of any other than sacred music. To go to an opera on Christmas night is but a poor way of celebrating the Nativity; but when the strains of Handel's greatest composition, when the "MESSIAH" is to be sung, then, above all nights in the year, would one enjoy its matchless glories. The "Messiah" is gradually becoming identified with Christmas, and for years past its annual performance has been one of the greatest treats to the lover of music. This year it is to be performed as usual by the HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Church choirs are generally in a state of vivid excitement about Christmas time, and are much oppressed in mind by the weight of divers anthems appropriate to the occasion, with which they propose celebrating the auspicious day. And yet how seldom (as any one connected with choirs can bear witness) do the singers think of the true import and sentiment of those anthems! The rehearsals are mere trials of vocal skill; and the soprano will try the effect of a shake on the most holy words, while the organist embellishes his composer with extemporaneous demonstrations on the fancy stops. On Christmas Eve choirs generally have a final rehearsal of their Christmas music, and the experience of years has proved to me that the celebration of the Birth of Christ degenerates with them into a mere opportunity for musical display. This is especially the case with quartet choirs and in Episcopal churches; and though there may be exceptions to the rule, they have never come under my observation.

New York does very little for the promotion of sacred music. There is nothing here to compare with your old Handel and Haydn Society, though perhaps our Mendelssohn Union may in time do something in the right direction, as its recent production of "Eli" would prove. Our Harmonic Society has dropped its prefix of "Sacred," and intersperses Handel with Verdi, and Haydn with Donizetti. The opera and the oratorio both find a partial shelter in the embrace of the "Harmonic."

THALBERG appears here for the last time on Friday evening, playing at Mr. GOTTSCHALK's concert. The latter artist leaves us soon for Havana and Europe, and Mr. Thalberg, in performing on the occasion, reciprocates a similar compliment from Gottschalk. Thalberg will then positively visit Boston, where he cannot be otherwise than enthusiastically received. There is a rumor afloat that he intends taking charge of an opera troupe, to consist of PARODI, D'ANGRI, MORELLI, TIBERINI, and others, and conduct the performances himself. On the other hand it is rumored that MARTZKE will return here in about six weeks, and give another operatic season. The last one, under Mr. STANKOVICH, was peculiarly unsuccessful.

Mme. JOHANNSEN, the German prima donna, is engaged to appear at the Broadway Theatre, the scene of Alboni's operatic triumphs in this country. The opening opera will probably be Beethoven's "Fidelio." If Mr. Zerrahn succeeds in obtaining the services of Mme. Johanne, for his Philharmonic Concerts, the Bostonians may congratulate themselves, for the lady is a singer of the first class.

Your able New York correspondent, who signs his letters with the curious compound of two dashes, the letter t and an apostrophe, has relieved me from saying anything about Mr. Costa's new oratorio, "Eli." By the way, this unique and mysterious signature of your correspondent exhibits an originality of mind that is positively startling. The signature is a perfect typographical Sphinx to many beside

TROVATOR.

Musical Intelligence.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.—MR. ANDREAS THORUP, for several years so well esteemed as a musician and a gentleman in Boston, has commenced a good work in this earlier home, to which he has returned. On Friday evening last week he gave a concert at the Unitarian Church, with the following programme:

PART I.

- 1—Fantasia for the Organ, for two performers,..... A. Hesse
Messrs. J. H. Willcox and A. T. Thorup.
- 2—Selections from the 95th Psalm,..... Mendelssohn
a. Tenor Solo and Chorus—"O come let us worship."
b. Canon—"For the Lord is a Mighty God."
c. Chorus and Tenor Solo—"Henceforth when ye hear his voice entreating."
- 3—Organ Solos by Mr. Willcox.
a. Pastorale,..... Kullak
b. Wedding March,..... Mendelssohn

PART II.

"THE SONG OF THE BELL," the words a translation by Hon. S. A. Elliot of Schiller's "Das Lied von der Glocke." Music composed by..... Andreas Romberg
The Mercury says: "Both the organ solos and the concerted pieces were excellently rendered, the audience large and highly appreciative. The Wedding March by Mendelssohn, was given with the best effect, by Mr. Willcox, on the organ. As for the 'Song of the Bell' itself, which was the main feature of the performance, both the solos and choruses, were admirably performed. We think that Mr. Thorup deserves much credit for his exertions, and the ladies and gentlemen of the choir most ably represent the spirit and letter of the noble composition of Romberg."

PHILADELPHIA.—From Fitzgerald's City Item of Dec. 20th, we glean the following:

The present season has been remarkable for the great number of concerts that have been given, and still more so, for the success which has crowned them. All the societies have given their first entertainment of the season, except the Handel & Haydn, which will shortly take place, and even this association has appeared once, at the opening of Harrison Hall. This week, our young and gifted townsman, Mr. Benkert, gives his second concert, aided by Mme. Johansen, Mr. Berner, Ahrends and a large orchestra; on Friday the Harmonia presents "The Creation," with Miss E. Brook, Messrs. Bishop, Rudolphsen, several excellent amateurs and a large chorus; while, on Saturday, the fifth Public Rehearsal of the Germania will be held at the Musical Fund Hall.—Mr. Benkert's concert merits particular attention, from its fine programme, and from the fact of its affording the public an opportunity of hearing Mme. Bertha Johansen, who, while prima donna of the German Opera Company at Niblo's, New York, created for herself a high reputation among the musical circles of our sister city. She is said to be a beauty of the German style; a blonde, of course, with a profusion of light, golden hair; in figure, graceful, and in manner, fascinating. The chief interest of the concert, however, centres in the compositions of Mr. Benkert, several of which will be performed by himself, and by a large orchestra, led by Leopold Meignen.

THALBERG closed his second series of concerts on Saturday evening last, and his audience then was even larger than on the previous occasions. His visit to Philadelphia has proved a complete success, and must have been immensely profitable; the fact of seven such expensive concerts having been given in so short a time and with such great patronage, speaks well for the musical taste of our city, and we believe is unprecedented here, except perhaps in the case of Jenny Lind, Madame D'Angri made her debut at the concert of Friday evening, and created a deep impression by her skilful execution and remarkable contralto voice.

On Christmas night a musical entertainment is to be given at Handel and Haydn Hall, by J. B. Beckel, Esq., the well known teacher of music, upon which occasion will be presented for the first time, the original sacred cantatas of his composition, called "The Nativity" and "Ruth the Moabitess." The first will be performed exclusively by the children of Mr. Beckel's classes, numbering nearly three hundred pupils, and is a Christmas Carol, of which the words were written by Rev. E. C. Jones. The stage will be dressed with evergreens, a handsome Christmas tree, and a jolly Kris Kinkle. "Ruth" is a composition for adult voices, in which Mr. Cunningham and A. R. Taylor will sustain the male parts, the soprano being performed by amateurs whose names are not given.

CHICAGO, ILL.—The people of the Lake City are enjoying a series of Afternoon Concerts, modelled upon those of the late Germania Society in Boston. Mr. AHNER, an ex-Germanian, and who until recently has been doing much for music in Providence, has settled there and is the getter-up and manager. The concerts are given every Saturday afternoon. The pieces are mostly orchestral, performed by the "Great Western Band," Mr. VAAS leader. They have also instrumental solos, in which Mr. H. PERABEAU, the pianist, formerly of Boston, bears a prominent part. The following was the programme for the second Saturday, Dec. 6:

PART I.

- 1—Alexander's March,..... J. Gungl
- 2—Grand Overture,..... Hummel
- 3—Variations for Violin (performed by Mr. A. Vaas),..... Berlioz
- 4—Atlantic House Polka,..... Bergmann
- 5—First movement from Symphony in D major,..... Mozart

PART II.

- 1—Galop: "The Brightest Eyes,"..... Doppler
- 2—Solo for Piano (performed by Mr. H. Perabeau),.....
- 3—Song without Words (for Orchestra),..... Mendelssohn
- 4—Eckert's celebrated Swiss Song, (Solo for Cornet, with Echo,) arranged by..... H. Ahner
- 5—Finale, from "Marta,"..... Flotow

Several of the Chicago papers preach glowing exhortations on the subject of these concerts. We are tempted to quote from one of them, modestly blushing for our poor Boston, whose praise the writer quite exaggerates:

We really enjoyed the concert, and that is much more than we could say of some of those "grand concerts" that are usually heralded by great posters and by all the clap trap that is resorted to by those itinerant artists, who have the great mission of elevating the musical taste of us unhappy barbarians here in the North-west. The great artists that appear in these concerts, how familiar they have become to us, and how in consequence thereof, we have learned to appreciate them, so that we readily pay a dollar each night for three, four, and five nights in succession, to listen to Maurice Strakosch's delicious and exuberant strains of "Yankee Doodle," "Hail Columbia," of the pathetic "Old Folks at Home," and the "Dog Tray," so full of originality and variety; and then the voice of the "queenly Parodi," so full of style and culture. Does she not ever vary her arias and cavatinas? Is not her stock of songs inexhaustible? But thanks to her appreciation of our predilections, she knows that her "Duet from Norma," sung with Patti Strakosch, is irresistible, and we hear it at every one of those unique performances. Then those ballads of Patti's, are they not sweet pretty, as our lady friends would say. But what are we doing; we were to speak of Saturday evening's concert, and we have wandered off from a small and insignificant affair to those "great artists." Let our readers pardon us; we were carried away by the subject. It is so seldom that these artists bestow upon us the light of their countenances. But to come back to that afternoon concert. We say we enjoyed it, yes truly enjoyed it, and yet it was only music performed by some twenty resident musicians, combined into an orchestra of stringed, reed, and brass instruments. The programme was a good one, and the performances were a success. An orchestra, consisting of so many different members, and playing for the first time together, always labors under difficulties and disadvantages. But we were agreeably surprised at their precision and accuracy. The ensemble was all that could be expected, and we have thus a promise of obtaining an excellent and effective orchestra in our Chicago. We have long envied Milwaukee her's. Now, it stands with us to secure one that will soon excel that of Milwaukee, for we have more and better artists. * * * In Boston these afternoon concerts have become a regular institution, and are better patronized than any others given there. And so admirable have been their results that Boston, at the present time, is, musically, perhaps the best educated city in the world. Nowhere, not even in Germany, are all classes of a city so familiar with good music and love it as well, as in Boston. Yet this is not a particular merit of Boston. Thanks to the "Germania Society," &c.

Mr. AHNER has also been elected leader of the "Freie Snger-Bund," which was to give a grand concert on Christmas day.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 27, 1856.

TAXING MUSIC.—We have read once or twice of late in the newspapers a statement that our City government had refused a petition of the proprietors of the Music Hall for leave to give concerts, on the ground that concert-givers should be taxed well for a license! We have read and wondered. For we never dreamed that any such barbarous practice existed, except it might be some old puritanical rule grown obsolete. On inquiry, we were shown the following City Document:—

CITY OF BOSTON.

In Board of Aldermen, November 19, 1856.

The Committee on Licenses, to whom was referred the Petition of the Proprietors of the Music Hall, for leave to give Concerts during the present year, would respectfully present the following REPORT:

By the City Ordinances, it is provided that the Mayor and Aldermen may license all theatrical exhibitions, shows, public amusements, and exhibitions of every description, to which admission is obtained by the payment of money, upon such terms and conditions as they may think reasonable.

It has been usual for this Board, on the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Licenses, to grant licenses to parties on the payment of a mere nominal sum; and as the present Committee have thought proper to adopt a different course in this respect from their predecessors, they take the present opportunity to ask the consideration of the Board to some suggestions upon the subject, that, if proper, they may receive their sanction.

It appears to your Committee proper to make a distinction between the public amusements, &c., given by or under the direction and control of our own citizens, and those given by or under the direction or control of foreigners or non-residents. Among the former we would class the regular performances at our theatres, under the direction of the managers; and the lectures, concerts, &c., given by the various societies located in our city, the parties engaged in which being principally residents among us. A large portion of the money they receive from the public is spent in various ways to the benefit and increase of the trade and labor of our citizens.

Another class is composed of those persons or parties, who travel about from place to place, hire a theatre or hall for a short time, and after giving a few operas, concerts, or other exhibitions, and collecting what they can from our citizens, leave for some other place, carrying with them a large portion of the money they may have received for their performances.

It is evident from these circumstances that to allow to transient parties the same privileges as are granted to our own citizens, is neither just nor proper; because the latter aid us in the support of trade and expenses of government, while the former do neither, but draw from us large amounts to be spent in other places, and frequently carry away with them to foreign countries.

The Committee deem it unnecessary to do more than allude to these facts, to convince the Board that it is expedient for the Committee to confine their general licenses of theatres and public halls to such performances and exhibitions as may be under the direction of their own managers or proprietors, and of the societies located in the city. And whenever these places are engaged for transient use, by foreign parties, a special license shall in all cases be required, for which a proper and reasonable sum shall be paid, in the manner provided by the Ordinance of the city.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the Committee do not understand the Proprietors of the Music Hall to desire a license for concerts, &c., under their own management, but for the use of other parties who may rent it temporarily, they deem it their duty, for the reasons they have presented, to give the Petitioners leave to withdraw.

For the Committee,
T. C. KENDALL, Chairman.

There now is a precious document! Such is the respect our "Modern Athens" pays to Art! Music is treated simply as a trade, towards which we must exercise a selfish "protective" policy, and try to monopolize the trade ourselves, and treat the travelling artist as a "furrin" enemy! Such a narrow and mean notion of the matter is unworthy of an enlightened, generous city. Without questioning the patriotic motive of the sapient committee, we do think they undertake to serve their country in a strange way. Are not public amusements, pure and well-conducted, public blessings? Does not the health of the body politic require them? And if to amusement you add

Art, a beautiful revelation of high meaning, speaking to the soul, refining and elevating the tastes, and contributing to the best culture as well as to the momentary enjoyment of thousands, does not the blessing grow incalculable? Whoever brings us these gifts, be he citizen or stranger, is a benefactor, just in proportion as he brings the best, and wins most persons to receive and to enjoy it. Our best examples of Art, for a long time yet, must come to us from abroad. They who bring them must live by their labors. They run pecuniary risk in every invitation they hold out to us; they are as likely to lose as they are to win among us. Whatever they may carry away, they must spend something here. But did it never occur to the city fathers that true artists give at least an equivalent for all they take in the refining influence they leave behind, in the improvement of the public taste for Art, which surely is an end always esteemed worth the seeking in all civilized communities?

Taking the lowest view of the matter, if concert-givers merely furnish the amusement for which the people pay and go, they do, strictly speaking, furnish an equivalent. They give us what we think worth the money enough to be willing to pay for it. If I choose that Jenny Lind, or even the mere circus clown, shall have my dollar, to do what they please with it, whose business is it? who shall hinder?

It is true there is a great deal that is questionable, perhaps corrupt, mixed up with each annual harvest of amusement, wholesome in the main. There is a great deal of bad music played, a great deal of clap-trap, that ministers to a false and sickly taste. But the check and the correction we have elsewhere; taxing imported exhibitions does not reach the evil; that is a discrimination not on moral, not on truly patriotic, but on selfish, surly and exclusive grounds.

The effect of this restrictive measure in the present instance is to materially shorten the winter's supply of music. Our noble Music Hall, a just theme of pride to our city, was a costly investment of individuals for a public good—to wit, the popularizing of the love of music among us. To sustain itself now that it is built, it must have the frequent patronage of artists. The artists, on the other hand, to whom the public looks for concerts, are deterred from giving them, when to other heavy expenses is added such an arbitrary tax as the condition of a license from the city. It is just so much deadening of all the activities which centre upon the demand for and supply of music in our city; and the fathers, as mere utilitarian political economists, have perhaps not reflected how large a part those activities play in the collective business and prosperity.

Instead of taxing artists, the true policy of a republican city would be even to hold out a premium to them. Why does Art flourish in aristocratic cities? Because the "powers that be" there act the part of Mecenas. Here the people are the powers; the people in their public, as well as private capacity, should also be the patrons. At all events, if we cannot give gifts to the heavenly visitor, let us at least oppose no barrier to her entrance. As soon should we think of taxing truth, religion, virtue, light from heaven! As soon say to all sweet and humanizing influences, that come from abroad, ye shall not come without a license! "But it is not the license to benefit us, it is only the license to make money by benefitting us, which we reserve the privilege of withholding." What art, what literature, what schooling, or what preaching can live on air while it appeals to us? If it come at all, it comes at its own risk, and must earn the means to stay and bless us by demanding its price, like every other useful occupation.

Beethoven's "First Work."

We have had a rare enjoyment! No less than the perusal of two piano-forte Sonatas composed by the boy Beethoven. They are the second and third (would we could see the first) of a set of three, published in Vienna, by Tobias Haslinger, as "Sonaten für das Piano-Forte von L. VAN BEETHOVEN, erstes Werk, geschrieben im 10ten Lebensjahre."

Sonatas by Beethoven, written at the age of ten! We had heard of these works, but were not until now aware they had been published. Doubtless to many of our German musical professors they are quite familiar; and for more reasons than one they might to good advantage be made known more generally. For while they have the simplicity and clearness desirable in lessons for pupils not very far advanced, they possess also much intrinsic excellence, both as fair models of that well-connected Sonata form which all teachers employ more or less to lead their scholars in a classical direction, and as being full of charm and indications of real genius.

Of course they are juvenile productions, and cannot show the mature mind, the developed individuality and practised hand of the great master. But for a boy's work they are indeed remarkable. They are bonâ fide compositions. There is no vagueness about them. They show definiteness of purpose, and that he knew perfectly well what he was about. He has ideas positive and well pronounced, and he proceeds to develop them (not to be sure at great length) in a manner at once spontaneous and logical. And all from first to last is interesting, is earnest, is inspired with a true love, and the genuine joy of exercising a creative faculty. The vigor and conciseness of the man Beethoven are here too in the boy; the fire, and also the unfailing sense and zest of beauty. The harmony is thin, of course, compared with after works, but every note in it tells; and, what is the best pledge of the true gift, there is an individual vitality and movement in the parts; it is real counterpoint, and not mere melody with chords accompanying.

Already, too, there are strong symptoms of the symphonic or orchestral destiny. Thus No. 2, which is in F minor, opens with a strong full chord on that note, like the orchestral tutti, (Larghetto maestoso), answered in wailing thirds, suggestive of wind instruments, and so alternating with more and more power, as you could imagine the future composer of the Egmont music might do. This stately introduction leads off into a fiery Allegro, which seems natural enough again for the author of the Sonata Pathétique (only the suggestions are very brief), and then a winding up passage palpably after the manner of Mozart's endings. After the repeat the themes are regularly and clearly worked up, concisely, too, and without indefinite wandering. The Andante movement is full of grace and dignity and feeling—for a boy; the Presto as fiery and impetuous as the finales in some of his more developed works. And the three movements are held together by an internal, kindred tie of feeling and design, while they are sufficiently contrasted. Verily the boy possessed the vital secret of the Sonata form; he had seized its organic principle. For the rest his early training had been musician-like and thorough.

Still more striking perhaps is the truly Sonata-like development and structure of the cheerful Allegro in D, of No. 3. It is really a charming composition, as fresh and clear, and on the whole as interesting as many of the Sonatas of Haydn; the impatient Beethoven nature breaks out too, occasionally in little fiery, abrupt phrases. It has no Andante or Adagio, but a Mozart-like little Minuet, marked Sostenuto, followed by half a dozen pleasing variations, one of which, in syncopated rhythm, shows decided character. The finale (Scherzando) is quite original and genial, and truly related to the first movement and to the whole.

Seriously, it would be better to give pupils these earnest efforts of young genius among their things for practice, than much of the milk and water conventional trash in classic forms, or the polka and variation stuff so commonly used. At all events the admiring student of the man Beethoven will not play through these boy Sonatas without emotion and much food for reflection.

We have submitted the matter to our friend, A. W. T., the biographer and "Diary," who is so full of Beethoven lore, and he has kindly sent us the following extract on the subject from his long-promised work.

Beethoven's first compositions, says Dr. Wegeler, were the Sonatas copied into the Speyersche Blumenlese, and the song, "When a man on travel goes." [Wenn jemand eine Reise thut.] Neefe, Court Organist at Bonn, wrote a letter containing a list of musicians in Bonn, fortunately preserved, from which I quote the following:

"LOUIS VAN BEETHOVEN, son of the above-named tenor singer, a boy of eleven years of age, of very promising talents. He plays the harpsichord with great expertness and power, reads well at sight, and, to say all in a word, plays nearly all of Sebastian Bach's "Wohltemperirtes Clavier," placed in his hands by Herr Neefe. He that knows this collection of Preludes and Fugues in every key (which may almost be called the ne plus ultra of music) will know what this implies. Herr Neefe has also, so far as his other duties allow, given him some instruction in thorough bass. At present he is exercising him in composition, and for his encouragement has caused Nine Variations on a march* composed by him for the harpsichord, to be engraved at Mannheim."

At the Royal Library in Berlin may be seen Beethoven's earliest sonatas. They are engraved in old-fashioned style, with the title and dedication given below. In the Musikalische Almanac, Leipzig, 1789, is the following in the list of "living German composers." I translate from the German:

"Beethoven (Ludwig van). Three Sonatas for the Clavier. Spire, 1783. Fol. Also Songs in the Speyersche Blumenlese. He is yet hardly 12 years of age."

The title and dedication of these Sonatas I thus translate, taking some pains to preserve somewhat of the peculiar style. I could wish to know who wrote them for the boy.

* By Dressler.

DEDICATION.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN."

NATICK, DEC. 23, 1856.

FIRST EVENING, Dec. 27, 1856.

PROGRAMME

PART I.

- PART II.

Commences precisely at 7½ o'clock.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

HANDEL'S "MESSIAH"

Will be performed, with the assistance of

Mrs. J. H. LONG.

Mrs. B. A. WENTWORTH,
M. I. HARRIS.

Mrs. I. I. HARWOOD,
Mr. C. B. ADA

Mr. J. P. I.

Mr. THOMAS

And an efficient Orchestra, under the able conductorship of CARL ZERRAHN. F. F. MUELLER, Organist.

Tickets, at 50 cents each, may be obtained at the principal music stores and hotels, and at the door on the evening of performance, or of the Secretary, L. B. BARNES.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's

FOURTH CONCERT

Will take place on TUESDAY, Dec. 30, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms, assisted by Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, Pianist.

Hummel's Piano Quintette, in F minor—Chopin's Polonaise for Piano and 'Cello—Beethoven's Quartette in G—and a new Quintette, by Mr. Perkins, will be presented.

Package of Eight Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $5; Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The FIRST of the FOUR CONCERTS will be given on SATURDAY EVENING, January 3, with the kind assistance of OLD BULL.

Among the principal pieces will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony; Overture to Goethe's Faust, by Richard Wagner

(first time); the Pilgrim Chorus (sung by a select Choir) from Tannhäuser (first time); and the Overture to "William Tell."

Tickets for subscribers are now ready at Russell & Richardson's and Wade's Music Stores. Packages of four Tickets, $3, single Ticket $1

For particulars see programmes.
CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday.

At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 7th of January, 1867. There will be a large Orchestra composed of the best resident musicians, with Mr. CARL ZEHRBACH as Conductor. Further particulars hereafter.

ONE OF A THOUSAND OF THE FAVORABLE OPINIONS RESPECTING THE GOLDEN WREATH.

An Eminent Teacher of Music at the West writes as follows: "I think the Golden Wreath a treasure, and am sanguine of having it introduced in the public schools of this city. I shall distribute a dozen for inspection, and in the mean time dispose of One Hundred copies to my select classes, which please send me," &c. &c.
The Tenth Thousand is now ready. Price, 30 cents. $3 per dozen.
Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Il Trovatore. Piano Solo. Complete. JUST PUBLISHED,

VERDI'S Favorite Opera, IL TROVATORE. Edited for the Piano-Forte, by R. NORMANN. Prefaced with a biographical sketch of the Composer. Being the seventh volume of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas." Price $2.
Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

New Course of Juvenile Instruction.

A PRACTICAL COURSE OF INSTRUCTION IN SINGING. Prepared on School Principles. By CHRISTIAN HEIMANN HOHMANN. Translated from the fifth German edition. NOW READY, Part I., containing Exercises and Songs for Younger Classes. Price 20 cts. $2 per dozen. The attention of Teachers is invited to this new and attractive series of Instructions.
Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

SIGNOR CORELLI,
TEACHER OF SINGING,
47 Hancock Street.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late at St. Paul's Church),
ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

J. H. HIDLEY,
PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
644 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.
WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.
Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices.
THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbault, a few copies.
Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS.

Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN beg leave to inform their friends and the public that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have awarded them a GOLD MEDAL for their new musical instrument, the Organ-Harmonium, and a SILVER MEDAL for their Melodeons, exhibited at the Fair of 1866. The highest premium (a SILVER MEDAL) has also been awarded us for the best Melodeons by the Pennsylvania State Fair, held at Pittsburgh, September, 1866. First Premiums have also been awarded our Organ-Harmoniums by the following State Fairs:—Vermont State Fair, held at Burlington; New Jersey State Fair, held at Newark; Ohio State Fair, held at Cleveland; all held during the month of September, 1866:—making Six First Premiums in one month!!

N. B.—Our Melodeons and Organ-Harmoniums have taken the FIRST PRIZE over all competitors in every Fair at which they have been exhibited. The Organ-Harmonium is a new musical instrument of our own invention (holding two patents for it) for church and parlor use. We make two styles of it, one with, and the other without, pedal base. The one with pedal base contains eight stops, two rows of keys, two octaves of pedals, an independent set of pedal reeds, and a swell pedal. Price $400. The other style is precisely the same with the exception of the pedals. Price $350. Prices of Melodeons from $60 to $175. Price of Organ Melodeons $200.

For descriptive circulars and further information address
MASON & HAMLIN,
Cambridge St. (cor. of Charles,) Boston, Ma.

MR. HUGO LEONHARD,
FROM THE CONSERVATORY OF LEIPZIG,
Gives instruction on the Piano.....Residence 14 Hudson St.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Anthems for the Coming Season.

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

Anthems for Christmas.

HOPKINS, R. J.—Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, S. A. T. B., 19 cts. Single vocal parts, 18 cts. Class copy, 3 cts.

CROCE.—Behold, I bring you glad tidings: S. A. T. B., 19 cts.

GREENE.—Behold, I bring you glad tidings: for two Trebles or Tenors, with Chorus for four voices, 38 cents. Separate vocal parts, 22 cents.

HANDEL.—For behold darkness. Recit. } 13 cents.
The people that walked in darkness. Air. }
For unto us a Child is born. 31 cts. Sep. vocal parts, 25 cts.
Behold, a Virgin shall conceive; and O! thou that tellest;
Alto Solo and Chorus, 31 cts. Dito, Svo. 6 cts. Separate vocal parts, 25 cts.

JACKSON, (Masham).—Short and Easy Anthems, suitable for Country Choirs:—
Sing, O heavens! (4 voices,) 25 cts. Sep. vocal parts, 13 cts.
O Zion! that bringest good tidings, (4 voices,) 63 cts.
O! come hither and behold, (4 voices,) 63 cts.

NOVELLO.—Sing unto the Lord: Short Anthem for S. A. T. B. with a Verse for Four Trebles, 19 cts. Small class copy, in score, 3 cts. Separate vocal parts, 16 cts.

PURCELL.—Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings: In full score. Verse, A. T. B. 69 cts. Separate chorus parts, 13 cts. Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings, (abridged from the above,) from Boyce's Cathedral Music. Verse, A. T. B. 25 cts. Separate vocal parts, 22 cts.

VITTORIA.—Behold, I bring you Glad Tidings: S. A. T. B., Folio size, 19 cts. Class copy, in score, 8 cts.

Carols for Christmas-tide,

Set to Ancient Melodies, by the Rev. THOMAS HELMORE, M. A. Words, principally in imitation of the original, by the Rev. J. M. NEALE, M. A.

18mo size,	13
" post-free,	15
" in packets of 50,	5 00
" bound in scarlet cloth,	25
" compressed four vocal parts,	25

These Carols may be sung by a Solo voice, with accompaniment for the Piano and Organ, in which form they are printed in Music Folio. Ad libitum vocal parts for Alto, Tenor, and Bass, have been added, in order that, when these voices are present, the harmony may be rendered complete without an instrument. The Volume, folio music size, $1.13.

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

359 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Is now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF
Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square
PIANO FORTES,
WITH THEIR
PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,
(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.
RESIDENCE, 88 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,
Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,
GIVES instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO FORTE,
and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.
First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 248.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 14.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.
OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

(Continued from page 98.)

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Gleaned from HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

THE VIOLE D'AMOUR.

This instrument is rather larger than the viola. It has almost universally fallen into disuse; and were it not for Mr. Urban—the only player of the instrument in Paris—it would be known to us only by name.

It has seven catgut strings, the three lowest of which—like the C and G of the viola,—are covered with silver wire. Below the neck of the instrument, and passing beneath the bridge, are seven more strings, of metal, tuned in unison with the others, so as to vibrate sympathetically with them; thereby giving to the instrument a second resonance, full of sweetness and mystery. It was formerly tuned in several different whimsical ways.

The quality of the viola d'amour is faint and sweet; there is something seraphic in it,—partaking at once of the viola, and of the harmonics of the violin. It is peculiarly suitable to the legato style, to dreamy melodies, and to the expression of ecstatic or religious feelings. Mons. Meyerbeer has felicitously introduced it in Raoul's Romance, in the first act of the Huguenots.

But this is merely a solo effect. What would not be that, in an andante, of a mass of violas d'Amour playing a fine prayer in several parts, or accompanying with their sustained harmonies, a melody of violas, or of violoncellos, or of corni inglesi, or of a horn, or of a flute in its middle part, mingled with harp arpeggios! It would really be a great pity to allow this choice instrument to become lost; upon which any violinist might learn to play, by a few week's practice.

THE VIOLONCELLO.

The violoncello, on account of the depth of its quality and the thickness of its strings, is not susceptible of the extreme agility belonging to the violin and viola. As to the natural and artificial harmonics—of which frequent use is made on the violoncello in solo passages,—they are obtained by the same means as those of the violin and viola. The length of its strings even contributes to render the extreme upper notes in harmonics, which are produced near the bridge, much more easy and more beautiful than those of the violin.

To violoncellos in the orchestra is ordinarily given the part of the double-bass; which they double, an octave above or in unison: but there are many instances when it is advisable to separate them, either to let them play, on the high strings, a melody or melodious phrase; or to take advantage of their peculiar sonorousness on an open string, for producing a specific harmonial effect, by writing their part below the double-basses or, lastly, to assign them a part nearly like that of the double-basses, but giving them more rapid notes, which the latter could not well execute.

The composer should never—without an excellent reason, that is to say, without being sure of producing thereby a very marked effect—entirely separate the violoncellos and double-basses; nor even write them, as many authors have done, a double octave above. Such procedure has the result of considerably weakening the sonorousness of the fundamental notes of the harmony. The bass part, thus forsaken by the violoncellos, becomes dull, bald, extremely heavy, and ill-connected with the upper parts, which are held at too great distance by the extreme depth of tone of the double-basses. When it is required to produce a very soft harmony of stringed instruments, it is, on the contrary, often well to give the bass to the violoncellos, omitting the double-basses, as Weber has done, in the accompaniment to the Andante of Agatha's sublime air, in the second act of the Freischütz. It is worthy of remark in this example, that the violas alone give the bass, beneath a harmony of violins in four parts; the violoncellos only coming in, a little later, to double the violas.

Violoncellos together, to the amount of eight or ten, are essentially melodious; their quality, on the upper strings, is one of the most expressive in the orchestra. Nothing is more voluptuously melancholy, or more suited to the utterance of tender, languishing themes, than a mass of violoncellos playing in unison upon their first string. They are also excellent for airs of a religious character; when the composer ought to select the strings upon which the phrase should be executed. The two lower strings, C and G, especially in keys which permit the use of them as open strings, are of a smooth and deep sonorousness, perfectly appropriate in such a case; but their depth itself scarcely ever permits of giving them any other than basses more or less melodious,—the actual airs being reserved for the upper strings. Weber, in the Overture to Oberon, has, with rare felicity, caused the violoncellos to sing above; while the two clarinets in A, in unison, give beneath them their lower notes. It is both new and striking.

Although our violoncello-players of the present day, are very skilful, and well able to execute all sorts of difficulties, yet it is seldom that rapid passages of violoncellos do not produce some confusion in the lower part. As for those which require the use of the thumb, and lie among the higher notes, there is less to be expected; they are not very sonorous, and are always of dubious precision. In modern richly-filled orchestras, where the violoncellos are numerous, they are frequently divided into firsts and seconds; the firsts executing a special part of melody or harmony, and the seconds doubling the double-basses, either in octave or in unison. Sometimes even, for accompaniments of a melancholy, veiled, and mysterious character, the bass is left to the double-basses alone, while above them are designed two different parts for the violoncellos, which, joining the viola part, give a four-part deep harmony. This method is rarely well-contrived; and care should be taken not to misuse it.

The tremolo in double string, and arpeggios in forte, suit violoncellos perfectly; they add greatly to the richness of the harmony, and augment the general sonorousness of the orchestra. Rossini, in the introduction of the overture to Guillaume Tell, has written a quintet for five solo violoncellos, accompanied in pizzicato by the other violoncellos, divided into firsts and seconds. These deep-toned qualities of the same kind are there of excellent effect; and serve to make still more impressive the brilliant orchestration of the succeeding Allegro.

DOUBLE-BASSES.

There are two kinds; those with three, and those with four strings. Those with three strings are tuned in fifths. Those with four, are tuned in fourths.

The sound of both is an octave lower than the note written. Their compass in the orchestra is two octaves and a quarter; allowing for three-stringed double-basses, two notes less below.

To double-basses belong, in the orchestra, the lowest sounds of the harmony. In a preceding chapter, it has been stated, upon what occasion they may be separated from the violoncellos; and then may be palliated, to a certain degree, the defect which arises for the basses out of this disposal, by doubling them in octave, or in unison with the bassoons, the corni di basetto, the bass clarinets, or the ordinary clarinets, in the extreme lower notes. But for my part, I detest the mode which certain musicians have, on such occasions, of using trombones and opicicleides—the quality of tone of which, having neither sympathy nor analogy with that of double-basses, of course mixes execrably with it. There are cases where the harmonics of the double-basses may be successfully introduced. The extreme tension of the string, their length, and their distance from the finger-board, do not permit however, of having resource to artificial harmonics; as for natural harmonics, they come out very well, particularly commencing from the first octave, occupying the middle of the string; they are the same, in the octave below, as those of violoncellos. Strictly speaking, chords and arpeggios may be used on the double-bass; but it must be by giving them two or three notes at the utmost, of which one only need not be open.

The intermittent tremolo may easily be obtained, thanks to the elasticity of the bow, which causes it to rebound several times on the strings, when a single blow is somewhat sharply struck.

The continuous tremolo of double-basses is of excellent dramatic effect; and nothing gives a more menacing aspect to the orchestra; but it should not last too long, otherwise the fatigue it occasions the performers, who are willing to take the trouble of doing it well, would soon render it impossible. When a long passage renders it needful thus to disturb the depths of an orchestra, the best way is, by dividing the double-basses, not to give them a real tremolo, but merely quick repercussions, mutually disagreeing as rhythmical values, while the violoncellos execute the true tremolo.

They are so injudicious, now-a-days, as to write for the heaviest of all instruments, passages of such rapidity, that violoncellos themselves would find difficulty in executing them. Whence results a serious inconvenience: lazy or incapable double-bass players, dismayed by such difficulties, give them up at the first glance, and set themselves to simplifying the passage; but this simplifying of some, not being that of others,—since they have not all the same ideas upon the harmonial importance of the various notes contained in the passage,—there ensues a horrible disorder and confusion. This buzzing chaos, full of strange noises and hideous grumbings, is completed and still heightened by the other double-bass players, either more zealous, or more confident of ability, who toil away in ineffectual efforts at executing the passage just as it is written. Composers should therefore be careful to ask of double-basses no more than possible things; of which the good execution shall not remain doubtful. It is enough to say, that the old system of double-bass players, who simplify,—a system generally adopted in the ancient instrumental school, and of which the danger has just been demonstrated,—is at present utterly renounced. If the author have written no other than passages suitable to the instrument, the performer must play them, nothing more, nor nothing less. When the blame lies with the composer, it is he, and the audience, who take the consequences; and the performer is no longer responsible.

Flights of little notes, before large ones, are executed by sliding rapidly on the string, without paying attention to the precision of any of the intermediate sounds; and have an extremely good effect. The furious shock given to the whole orchestra by the double-basses coming upon the high F, by four little preceding notes, B, C, D, E, in the infernal scene in Orfeo, on the words, "At the dire howling of Cerberus," is well known. This hoarse barking,—one of the finest inspirations of Gluck,—is rendered the more terrible, by the author having placed it on the third inversion of the chord of the diminished seventh (F, G sharp, B, D); and, for the sake of giving his idea all the effect and vehemence possible, he has doubled the double-basses in the octave, not only with the violoncellos, but with the violas, and the entire mass of violins.

Beethoven, also, has availed himself of these scarcely articulate notes; but (contrary to the previous example), by accenting the first note of the group more than the last. He has done thus in a passage of the Storm in the Pastoral Symphony; which so well depicts the raging of a violent wind and rain, with the muffled rumblings of the gust. It is to be observed, that Beethoven, in this example, and in many other passages, has given to the double-basses deep notes, beyond their power of executing, which leads to the supposition, that the orchestra he wrote for, possessed double-basses descending as low as the C, an octave below the violoncello C,—no longer to be found now-a-days.

Sometimes it has a fine and dramatic effect, to give the violoncellos the real bass, or, at least, the notes which determine the chords, and strike the accented parts of the bar; while beneath them, the double-bass has an isolated part, the design of which, interrupted by rests, allows the harmony to rest upon the violoncellos. Beethoven, in his admirable scene of Fidelio, where Leonora and her jailor are digging Florestan's grave, has displayed all the pathetic and gloomy sadness of his mode of instrumentation. He has, however, given, in this case, the real bass to the double-basses.

[To be continued]

Thou must neither play bad compositions, nor listen to them, if not compelled to do so.—SCHUMANN.

The Salzburg "Kapelle."

[Here follows the translation of the interesting old document, to which "A. W. T." has introduced us in his article in our last number.—Ed.]

ACCOUNT OF THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE MUSIC OF HIS GRACE, THE PRINCE ARCH-BISHOP OF SALZBURG IN THE YEAR 1757.

KAPELLMEISTER.

1. Herr ERNST EBERLIN, of Jettenbach in Swabia. He is also the Prince's Truchses. He was formerly Court Organist; and if anybody deserves the name of a well-grounded and finished master in the art of composition, it is certainly this man. He has tones completely in his power, and sets music with such facility, that many would look upon it but as a fable if told the time actually employed by this skilful composer in the production of this or that extensive work. In the number of his completed musical works he may well be placed with those two most industrious as well as celebrated composers, Herren Scarlatti and Telemann. The only works by him yet printed are the Toccatas for the Organ.

VICE KAPELLMEISTER.

2. Herr JOSEPH LOLLI, of Bologna, in Italy. He was formerly tenor singer. With the exception of some oratorios he has composed hardly anything for the concert room, though for the church he has set several masses and vesper psalms.

COMPOSERS TO THE COURT.

3. Herr CASPER CRISTELLI, from Vienna in Austria, is Violoncellist, and a great master of accompaniment. He distinguishes himself from many violoncellists in the art of drawing out a good tone, strong and full, yet also pure and touching, from his violoncello, while his execution is manly and free from the viola style. He composes nothing but concert music. His compositions are mostly the pieces called Suites, Symphonies, and a few Trios; also duets and solos for the violoncello.

5. Herr LEOPOLD MOZART, from the imperial city, Augsburg. He is violinist and leader of the orchestra. He composes for church and concert room. He was born on the 14th of the Winter-month (December), 1719, and soon after finishing his studies in philosophy and jurisprudence, in 1743, he entered the service of the Prince Archbishop. He has distinguished himself in every style of composition, though he has sent nothing to press except six sonatas à trois in the year 1740, which he himself engraved on copper, and this principally for the sake of practice in the art of engraving. In the May-month (July) of 1756 he published his Violin-school.

Of the compositions still in manuscript which are known, the most worthy of note are many contrapuntal and church pieces; then a large number of symphonies, partly à quatre and partly for all the usual instruments; also thirty grand Serenatas, in which solos for various instruments are introduced. Besides these, many concertos, especially for the flute, oboe, bassoon, horn, trumpet, &c.; innumerable trios and divertimenti for different instruments; moreover twelve oratorios, a mass of theatrical pieces, and even pantomimes; also music for special occasions, such as a military piece with trumpets, drums, kettle-drums and fifes, in addition to the usual instruments; a piece of Turkish music; a piece for a keyed instrument with steel springs; and finally a sleighride composition introducing five strings of sleigh-bells; not to mention marches, night pieces (so called) and many hundred minuets, opera dances, and such minor pieces.

5. Herr FERDINAND SEIDL, from Falkenberg in Silesia, Violinist. He composes only for the concert room. He has made very many symphonies; also concertos and solos for the violin, in which his principal object has been to introduce uncommon and very peculiar changes and difficult passages.

The three Court Composers play their instruments both in the church and concert room, and take turns with the Kapellmeister in the direction of the music of the Court, each officiating a week, during which he has entire control over the music, and produces at pleasure his own compositions or those of others.

VIOLINISTS.

6. Herr Paul Schorn, of Salzburg.

7. Herr Carl Vogt, from Kremau in Moravia, is an earnest player, who knows how to draw a manly, powerful tone from the violin.

8. Herr Wenzel Hebelt, from Heiligenberg in Moravia. He brings out clearly the most difficult passages; hence he cares for nothing but the most difficult music, in which it is not easy to find anything too hard or quick for him. But his tone is very weak and feeble.

9. Herr Joseph Hülber, of Krambach in Swabia. He plays also the German flute.

10. Herr Nicholas Meisner, of Brauna in Bohemia. He plays also the horn.

11. Herr Franz Schwarzmann, of Salzburg. He plays concertos upon the bassoon, and executes finely on the oboe, flute and horn. Just now he is at Padua, in the school of the celebrated Herr Tartipi.

12. Herr Joseph Hölzel, from the city of Steyer in Austria. Also plays the horn.

13. Herr Andreas Mayr, of Salzburg. Plays well also upon the violoncello.

VIOLAS.

14. Herr Johann Sebastian Vogt, of Steinach, near Bamberg and Culmbach. Plays also the oboe.

15. Herr Johann Caspar Thumann, of Salzburg.

ORGANISTS AND HARPSICHORDISTS.

16. Herr Anton Cajetan Adelgasser, from Der Insel in Bavaria. Plays understandingly, with elegance, and for the most part cantabile. He is not only a good organist—he is also a good accompanist upon the Grand Harpsichord; for both of which accomplishments he is indebted to Herr Kapellmeister Eberlin, of whom he has also learned the rules of composition, so that he now composes very pleasantly. Only he depends too much upon imitating others, especially his teacher.

17. Herr Franz Ignatius Lipp, of Eggelfelden in Bavaria. He plays also the violin, sings a good tenor, and composes not badly.

These two gentlemen (the organists) have in turn to take charge of the grand organ, (which stands in the rear part of the church) and the side organs (where the concert singers are placed). Not the less though are they called upon for accompaniments in the concert room.

18. Herr Georg Paris, of Salzburg, has entire charge of the small organ below in the choir, where the choral singers are placed, and must play at the daily choral service. He has composed a few pieces for the church.

VIOLONCELLISTS.

19. Herr Joseph Schorn, of Salzburg. Plays also violin.

20. Herr Jacob Anton Marschall, of Pfaffenhofen in Bavaria, devotes himself particularly to accompaniment, in which, under the instructions of Herr Cristelli, he is continually becoming more perfect. The two take each in turn the duty of accompanist. He also plays a good violin.

CONTRA-BASSISTS.

21. H. Matthias Wirth, of Westendorf in Suabia.

22. H. Paul Hutterer, from the Böhmerwald.

BASSOONS.

23. H. Johann Jacob Rott, of Straubingen in Bavaria.

24. H. Rochus Samhuber, of Salzburg.

25. H. Johann Adam Schultz, } of Sagau

26. H. Johann Heinrich Schultz, } in Silesia.

Both play the oböe.

TROMBONE.

27. H. Thomas Oschlatt, of Stockerau, in Lower Austria. He is a great master upon his instrument, and there are few who can equal him. He plays also a good violin and violoncello, and plays none the less a fine horn.

OBOES AND FLUTES.

28. H. Christoph Burg, of Mannheim in the Palatinate. He plays concertos beautifully upon the flute and oböe, and also plays the violin.

29. H. Franz de Paula Deihl, of Munich in Bavaria. Plays also the violin.

30. H. Johann Michael Obkircher, of Donauwert.

HORNS.

31. H. Wenzel Sadlo. Plays also the violin very finely.

32. H. Franz Drasil. Plays also the violoncello. Both are from Brodetz in Bohemia.

These two excellent hornists a few years since might have entered the service of the Elector of Bavaria, at a salary each of a thousand florins; but they did not wish to leave the Salzburg service.

THE SINGERS.

SOLO SINGERS.

33. The very reverend Herr Andreas Unterkofler, of Salzburg, is Praefect of the princely chapel-house and titular court chaplain.

SOPRANISTS.

The places of the three other castrati—viz., H. Grossi, H. Augustini, and the recently deceased contraltist, H. Lonzi, are not yet filled.

34. The Right Reverend H. Johann Sebastian Brunner, of Neuötting in Bavaria.

BASSISTS.

35. H. Joseph Meisner, of Salzburg, a splendid singer. His voice is pleasing to an extraordinary degree, and enables him, without straining, to reach the high notes of a good tenor on the one hand, and the depths of a concert bass singer on the other, and with a beautiful equality of tone. His forte is the pathetic, and no one can surpass him in the passages which a simple style allows; for they come naturally to him. In Italy he sang first at Pisa, afterwards at Florence, and finally on the stage of San Carlo at Naples, and was heard both in Rome and the other large cities of Italy. In Vienna he sang at the Academy, to which he was invited. Upon a journey to Holland, he had opportunity to sing at the courts at Munich, Würzburg, Mannheim, Stuttgart, Liege and Cologne; also in the presence of the Bishops of Augsburg, Spire, and others, who all testified their satisfaction by splendid presents. He has just made a short journey to Padua and Venice.

36. H. Joseph Michelansky, of Prague in Bohemia. Tenor.

37. H. Joseph Zugeisen, of Salzburg. Tenor.

38. H. Felix Winter, of Salzburg, has a voice, which to some extent may be compared with that of H. Meisner. It reaches the height of a fair tenor and the depth of a concert bass. He sings with soul. He has just returned from Italy, where he has spent two years, and has sung in Rome and other places with much applause. At Naples he sang in the Carnival operas on the stage of San Carlo.

Two or three Sopranists and as many Altoists are selected from the chapel-house of the Prince for solos, who are placed under the instructions of Herr Meisner.

THE SINGERS OF THE CHOIR.

First the Gentlemen of the Choir—viz., the following right reverend gentlemen:

39. H. Franz Anton Oettel, of Bavaria. Tenor.

40. H. Johann Baptist Freymüller, of Suabia. Bass.

Leaders of the Choir.

These two leaders of the choir have in turn the direction of the daily church service, that is, in the choral and contrapuntal vocal music, since the chamber music (orchestra, &c.) is not present.

41. H. Christian Maller, from Suabia. Tenor.

42. H. Anton Saller, of Bavaria. Tenor.

43. H. Christoph Straller, of Salzburg. Alto.

44. H. Benedict Schmutzer, of Bavaria. Tenor.

45. H. Anton Ainkäss, from Carinthia. Tenor.

46. H. Sebastian Seyrer, of Bavaria. Bass.

47. H. Paul Pinzger, of Bavaria. Tenor.

48. H. Franz Schneiderbauer, of Bavaria. Alto-falsetto.

49. H. Christoph Bachmeyr, of Salzburg. Bass.

50. H. Johann Anton Eismann, of Berchtholdsgaden. Tenor.

51. H. Anton Schipfl, of the Tyrol. Bass.

52. H. Ignatius Seeleuthner, of Salzburg. Tenor.

53. H. Franz Joseph Menda, of the Tyrol. Bass.

54. H. Johann Veit Braun, of the Tyrol. Alto-falsetto.

55. H. Franz Cajetan Moschee, of Carinthia. Bass.

56. H. Lorenz Winneberger, of Suabia. Bass.

57. H. Donat Stettinger, of Bavaria. Bass.

58. H. David Veit Westermeyer, Salzburg. Tenor.

59. H. Johann Baptist Setti, from Italy. Bass.

To the choir singers belong secondly the following choralists:

60. H. Benedict Heiss, Salzburg. Bass.

61. H. Leopold Lill, Salzburg. Bass.

62. H. Joseph Schmid, Salzburg. Bass.

63. H. Johann Drauner, of Hungary. Alto-falsetto.

64. H. Judas Tadeus Wesenauer, Salzburg. Tenor.

65. Joseph Egger, Salzburg. Tenor.

66. H. Jacob Seeloo, of Suabia. Tenor.

67. Joseph Scheffler, of Bavaria. Bass.

Among these eight choralists are four who can play the contra-basso, as one of them is always called upon to play that instrument by the small organ in the choir, that which is under the charge of Herr Paris.

Thirdly, to the choir also belong the chapel boys, always fifteen in number, who have to carry the high parts. They all live in a building which is called the Chapel-house (Capellhaus), where also dwells the Chapel Praefect, who sits at their table in company of the Preceptor, who has charge of their instruction.

These boys receive from the court not only all their clothes, food and drink, having their own cook and house servants, but instruction at the cost of the court from the best masters in figured and choral song, upon the organ and violin, and in the Italian language. When they leave the chapel-house, each is well clothed from head to foot. The departure of a boy, however, does not immediately follow upon the loss of his voice, but, according to his previous conduct, he is supported two or even three years, through which he has time to perfect himself more fully in all his studies, and in time prepare himself to enter the service of the court, which is the result in most cases, because if they are suitable they are preferred to others.

Finally, connected with the choir are three Trombonists.

They play Alto, Tenor, and Bass trombone, and this duty must be performed or provided for by the Master of the City Towers and two of his assistants, for an annual salary.

The great organ is by the grand entrance of the Cathedral; four others are suspended to the sides of the choir [chancel] and one below in the choir, where the singers stand. The grand organ is only used in preludes, when some grand musical service is performed. During the music, one of the side organs is played constantly—viz., that one which is nearest the altar on the right hand, where the solo singers and the basses stand. Opposite, on the left of the side organ, are the violinists, &c., and in the lofts of the other two side organs are two corps of trumpets and drums. The organ below and the contra-bass are also played when the whole force is required. The oböe and German flute are seldom, the horn never, heard in the Cathedral. Therefore all the players upon these instruments in the church play the violin.

The two corps of trumpets and drums consist of the following persons:

1. H. Johann Baptist Gesenberger, head-trumpeter from Bavaria. He is a splendid performer, who has gained great fame for the extraordinary purity of his high notes, his rapidity of execution, and the excellence of his trill.

2. H. Casper Köstler, from the Palatinate, Court and field trumpeter. He is a pupil of the late celebrated Herr Heinisch, of Vienna. He gives to his trumpet a very fine, pleasing vocal tone; his style is good, and his concertos and solos are heard with great pleasure. He also plays the violin.

3. H. Andreas Schachtner, from Bavaria, court trumpeter. He is a pupil of H. Köstler; blows a right fine trumpet, and in good taste; plays also a particularly good violin and the violoncello.

4. H. Johann Schwartz, from the Palatinate, court and field trumpeter. He plays first trumpet and also the violin.

5. Ignatius Finck, an Austrian, court and field trumpeter. Plays second to H. Gesenberger; also plays violin and violoncello.

6. H. Adam Huebner, from the Palatinate, court trumpeter. Plays second trumpet; also the violin.

7. H. Johann Leonhard Seywald, of Salzburg, court and field trumpeter; plays second—also violin. This gentleman and H. Huebner by turns play second trumpet to the three first trumpets, Köestler, Schachtner and Schwarz.

8. H. Johann Siegmund Lechner of the imperial city, Augsburg, court trumpeter; plays also violin.

9. H. Franz Heffstreit, from Moravia, court and field trumpeter; plays violin, and is useful with the viola.

10. H. Matthias Brand, from Bohemia, court and field trumpeter.

Two other places are vacant, which must soon be filled.

DRUMS.

11. H. Anton Winkler, of Salzburg, court and field drummer; plays also the violin.

12. H. Florian Vogt, from Kranau in Moravia, court and field drummer; plays the violin very well.

No trumpeter or drummer is taken into the service of the Prince who cannot play also a good violin; and on extra occasions all must appear at court and play second violin or viola, as they may be directed by him who has the direction for that week.

To the Music belong also—

H. Johann Rochus Egedacher, of Salzburg, organ-builder to the court.

H. Andreas Ferdinand Mayer, from Vienna, court flute and violin maker.

These two gentlemen must at all times be present, to keep the instruments in good condition.

Finally, there are three servants to the orchestra or so-called Calcanten.

This, then, is the list of all those who are connected with the music, or in any way have salaries for musical services from the court, and consists of ninety-nine persons.

Hector Berlioz.

(From Paris Correspondence of the N. O. Picayune, Nov. 20.)

* * * * * Painting, and especially music, present an almost uninterrupted line of men during the last sixty years, whose earlier years have been one long period of the most terrible sufferings of soul and body, than which shipwrecked mariners never encountered more dreadful on desolate sandy island or wave-swept rock, and this in the midst of the most brilliant cities of the world, surrounded by civilization, carried to its highest degree of refinement, in the midst of every variety of luxury. Of a truth, besides Rossini, Auber, and that three times millionaire, Meyerbeer, I cannot now recall any musician whose life was one of ease.

Certainly Hector Berlioz's has not been a career of happiness. What a life of perseverance his has been! What obstacles he has encountered and overcome! What struggles, what cares, what disappointments are congested within his life! He was born 11th November, 1804, at La Côte Saint André, a small village in the department of L'Isère, and the first years of his life were passed away in a home governed by a pious mother. His father was a physician, and he anxiously desired to see Hector pursue medical studies and inherit in time the paternal practice. His father directed his education; but he is said to have exhibited little taste for Latin; his leisure hours were given to Florian and Millevoys. While Dr. Berlioz taught his son Latin, history, and a little algebra, he allowed him by way of amusement to study solfège, the flageolet, the flute and the guitar. Young Hector was soon able to understand even the most difficult music at sight. His father forbade him to learn the piano (which to this day M. Berlioz is ignorant of), for the moment he began to understand music his other books were neglected, and he remained day and night poring over a treatise on harmony which fell into his hands. He took the communion in the chapel of a convent, where his sister was at school; he says that as he approached the table with the other communicants, young girls sang, with their fresh and silvery voices, one of the Romish hymns to the eucharist, and he seemed to see the heavens open and angels descend to the altar. He was always marked by the greatest sensibility.

One day his father heard with amazement that young Hector had presented the Philharmonic Society of the town with a Quintet for flute, two violins, alto and bass, which was executed with great applause. The worthy doctor and his wife were horrified; Hector received a severe lecture; his musical books were taken from him, and he was ordered to apply himself exclusively to medical studies. Hector tried to beat anatomy into his head, but he could not. The doctor then attempted to allure him to them by promising that if he studied hard he should receive a silver-keyed flute; and at the same time one of his cousins came to join him in his studies. This cousin, however, was an excellent flute player, and while Dr. Berlioz was visiting his patients, the two medical students were playing duos and solos instead of attending to their books. In his twentieth year, Hector with his cousin was sent up to Paris to follow the courses at the medical school. Hector went to the dissecting rooms; the spectacle of those hideous corpses, putrified, dismembered, disfigured by the careless medical students, disgusted and horrified him. He quitted them, vowing never to set his foot there again. His cousin, however, conquered this aversion, and Amussat, then a celebrated professor of anatomy, succeeded in rousing him to some interest in anatomical demonstrations.

Unluckily Berlioz went one ill-starred evening to the Grand Opera. He returned again and again. He deserted the Medical School and the dissecting room. His mornings were passed away in the library of the Conservatoire, copying the scores of Gluck and Haydn. He wrote to his parents that he was determined to be a musician, and that no obstacle on earth should prevent him. A young professor at the Conservatoire applauded his first essays in the art of counter-point, and procured him admittance in the private class of Lesueur, who reckoned Berlioz a pupil of rare talents. Young Berlioz determined to write an opera. He wrote a letter to M. Andrieux of the French Academy, begging him to write a "book;" the latter replied that he was too old to write love verses, whereupon young Berlioz selected the tale of Estelle and Nemorin, and gave it to one of his friends to dramatize. The "book" proved ridiculous, and the music shocking. Our hero, however, did not feel disheartened. He wrote a mass, and one of his friends, a chapel master, made his choristers copy it. The rehearsal took place. The choristers had made all sorts of mistakes—a noise was produced which nearly killed the musicians with laughter, for it has been said that if M. Berlioz had collected all the cats of his quarter and pinched their tails collectively, he could not equal the awful noise he made at this rehearsal. He recopied with his own hand the whole mass. One of his acquaintances lent him 1,200 francs, to have it executed at Saint Roch. All the critics spoke of it favorably, and Lesueur, delighted with the success of his pupil, had him admitted to the annual concours of musical composition.

Whether it was that he worked too rapidly, or that Cherubini, then director of the Conservatoire, exerted his influence against him, Berlioz failed completely, and was excluded from the concours at the first test. Cherubini detested him from the day he laid his eyes on him, and Berlioz, from his insubordinate spirit and the jokes he played off on the irascible Italian, inflamed this aversion to the highest point. At the news of this defeat, his father summoned him home and cut short his allowance. Hector wrote Dr. Berlioz that he would never abandon music, but that he would pay them a visit. He went home to plead his cause. After a long controversy, Hector won his father to his side; but his mother and a maiden aunt stood out obstinately against argument and appeal, for they, in their bigotry, could not conceive how a Christian could compose operas! Nothing could convince them. The eve of Hector's departure from home, his mother entered his chamber. She knelt to him sobbing, and begged and entreated him not to dishonor her. He sobbed, too; but remained firm to music. He took her in his arms and sought to argue with her against her prejudices; she threw him off and left the room, saying, "You are no longer my child! curses be upon you!" And even when he quitted home, she refused to see him, bade him adieu, and give him her blessing.

[To be continued.]

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Dec. 30. I regret all the more that I was unable to send you a report of EISFELD'S second concert last week, as want of time and a slight indisposition oblige me to give you but a hasty sketch on the present occasion. The concert was exceedingly satisfactory. The Quartets were the beautiful No. 6 of BEETHOVEN, with its exquisite Andante, and one, performed here for the first time, by a composer who is far less known than he ought to be, named VEIT. So far as I can ascertain, he is a nobleman holding a government office in Prague, a dilettant in music, who has won much praise in the strictly musical world by several very fine compositions. This quartet gives one a very high idea of his powers; it is full of vigor and originality, highly melodious, and abounds in rich and striking harmonies. Altogether it made one wish to follow up the acquaintance of this new star in our Art-heaven. In a Trio by SPORR, the opus number of which I have unfortunately forgotten, the piano part was taken by Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK, of whom I have already spoken as playing at the Philharmonic concert. His performance on Tuesday night far exceeded the promise given on the former occasion. Then, partly owing to outward circumstances, he made the impression of being a very good player, but nothing above mediocrity; in the exceedingly difficult and brilliant piano part of the trio, he proved himself a thorough master of the instrument, and played with an ease and fire that completely carried away his auditors. And sparkling, healthy, and full of youthful freshness as was his playing, so the young artist himself appeared, with perhaps a little too much nonchalance and self-confidence, but not more than years and experience will rub off, for he is still very young. The remaining parts of the Trio, as well as the Quartets, were played well as usual, even to the first violin, which has improved in tone and exactness again. Mr. H. SCHMITZ gave us in an admirable manner a Nocturne on the French Horn, which was less valuable as a composition than as being calculated to bring out the best tones of the instrument. The other solo number consisted of a couple of songs, one by Kücken and Schubert's "Hark, hark! the lark," sung by Mr. FEDER, who has improved since last year, both in voice and execution. In connection with these two numbers, however, I cannot refrain from suggesting to Mr. Eisfeld the expediency of not playing his accompaniments quite so loud.

On Christmas night the "Messiah" was given by the HARMONIC SOCIETY, of which my colleague, "Trovator," (whose remarks, by the way, are becoming rather too personal) has already in advance informed you. Trusting to him for a full description thereof, I will only say, as my private opinion, that the choruses were exceedingly well sung, that Mrs. JAMIESON, who gives ample evidence that she ought to know better, sang wofully out of tune in the two alto solos, and that a gentleman whose name I am not acquainted with, though his face is familiar from the Philharmonic orchestra, came very near losing his breath entirely in the trumpet accompaniment to "The trumpet shall sound." No wonder. I was only surprised that he succeeded as well as he did, for his part must be an exceedingly difficult as well as painful one.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY are beginning to be in earnest about the talking disturbance at the rehearsals and concerts. At the second of the former, placards were hung around the galleries, with a polite request that the tongue obligato might be omitted; and as this step proved fruitless, at the last two rehearsals small notices were handed to all that entered, to the effect that "the Board of Directors were determined to put a stop to this infringement on the rights of the majority; that officers would be employed to prevent the disturbance; and that if this had no effect, more stringent measures would be employed." If there were only some hope of all this doing any good!

Fidelio was given last night at the Broadway Theatre, for the first time entire, I believe, in this country. I was not present, but hear that it went off very well, the choruses being particularly good, as well as Mad. JOHANSEN's acting. With regard to her being "a singer of the first class," I rather think Signor "Trovator" is mistaken, but that she has all the caprices of one is proved by her breaking her engagement with the Philharmonic Society at the very last moment, in which dilemma Mad. LAGRANGE nobly came to the rescue. — t —

NEW YORK, Dec. 30. THEODORE EISFELD has given us another of his very excellent Classical Soirées, introducing several compositions entirely new to our musical public. The chief of these was a Quartet by WILLIAM H. VERT, an amateur composer of Prague, who, with a fair European reputation, is entirely unknown here. His Quartet is just what one might expect from an amateur of refined taste and good musical education—a collection of delicate melody and pleasing modulation, but without the impress of a master mind, like Beethoven or Spohr. A trio of Beethoven for piano, violin, and violoncello, was admirably given, the difficult piano part being taken by Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK, a pianist from Berlin, who recently made a flattering début at the Philharmonic Concert. Mr. Goldbeck, though very young, plays with great expression, and with masterly execution, appearing able to grasp the full meaning of even Beethoven's composition. I understand that he has already written an entire opera, which has been accepted at one of the London Theatres, and intends returning to Europe next year to superintend its production. It may be safe to predict, that in ten or fifteen years the name of Robert Goldbeck will stand high in the musical world.

The HARMONIC SOCIETY gave a splendid performance of the "Messiah" on Christmas night, the solos being taken by Mrs. JAMIESON, Mr. GUIDI and Mr. and Mrs. LEACH. An effective orchestra, with the organ of the Tabernacle, accompanied the choruses, and the effect was really sublime; the chorus, "Unto us a child is born," was encored. The soloists sang very well, but with the exception of Mrs. Jamieson's exquisite rendering of "He was despised," call for no special remark; this air, however, was indeed a gem, and I do not remember ever hearing more pathos and expression thrown into it before; it was an intellectual as well as a musical performance. In the air, "The trumpet shall sound," the trumpet obligato was taken by one of the DODWORTHS.

Mr. GUIDI, who is, I believe, recently from Boston, has pitched his tent in the city of Gotham, and is a very valuable addition to our resident musical talent. He is a perfect polyglot to begin with, singing English, German, Italian, French, and I don't know what else, with equal facility. He is engaged as first tenor at Grace Church, in place of Mr. FRAZER, and his performance of the Christmas music, especially of a duet with Mrs. BODSTEIN, at that fashionable church on Christmas morning, was the theme of much commendatory remark. In concerts, oratorios, and operas, he will be very valuable, for, as the advertisements of the mercantile clerks say, he "is willing to make himself generally useful." One good feature of his performance is, that he appears to fully appreciate the sentiment of the words he sings, as was exemplified in his rendering of the touching air, "Behold and see," at the Christmas oratorio.

The GERMAN OPERA COMPANY made their debut at the Broadway Theatre last evening in Beethoven's Fidelio, with fair success. They were assisted in the choruses by several German singing societies, and the famous "Prisoner's Chorus" was the feature of the opera. I must retain any extended notice of the opera until—I hear it.

Through a private letter, some touching incidents respecting the death of Mr. WARREN, organist of the English Cathedral at Montreal, have been brought to my notice. You undoubtedly have read of the recent destruction by fire of this church edifice, one of the oldest of that quaint old city, and around which the memories of several generations have clustered. I well remember the first and only time I visited it, some four years ago. Arriving at Montreal on a Saturday night, I strolled out the next morning, and after listening to the orchestral music and witnessing the gorgeous ceremonies of High Mass at the Catholic Cathedral of Notre Dame, entered into a large, old-fashioned church, the Anglican Cathedral of Montreal. It was not the hour for regular morning service, and at the door I was interrupted by a beadle (the first specimen of the species I had ever seen), who, ushering me into the body of the building, deposited me in a great pew, furnished like a pew, with doors and sides so high that at prayers the occupants of other pews were quite lost to sight. After the prayers were read, the tips of heads emerged into view in various parts of the church, like figures on a stage coming up through trap-doors. The hymn was given out, and soon from the middle aisle arose the gaily dressed members of a military band, and the choral tones of a Gregorian chant, rolled up from the brazen orchestra through the arches of the old church. It was what is called a "Soldier's Service," the military only being present, and singing the church music to the accompaniment of their own band. The effect of the gaudy uniforms and the crashing sound of trumpet and trombone, in that quiet, dusty old cathedral, was singular indeed, and when the music ceased and the red and white soldiers, with their bright brazen instruments, subsided into their pews, out of the range of my vision, it seemed like some startling, incongruous dream, an effect only heightened by the subdued tone of the clergyman, as he slowly repeated the words, "The Lord be with you," while from the invisible occupants of the roomy pews faintly rose up the whispered response, "And with thy spirit." Climbing upon a seat and peering above the walls of my pew-prison, I saw in the gallery a large organ, with its gilded pipes and quaintly-carved ornaments set off to great advantage by its case of dark colored wood. After service, the beadle, whom I approached with reverential awe, informed me that "Mr. Warren" was the organist who revelled in the harmonic luxuries that the musician could draw from that old organ.

A few weeks ago I read in the papers of the destruction of the Cathedral—how the flames burst out of the windows, and how they devoured the old organ—how they crept to the spire, and silenced the chimes forever, while the clock, paralyzed by fervent heat, helplessly dropped its hands and awaited its fate; and how the next morning blackened walls alone marked the site of the church, in which so many infant innocents had been marked with the sign of the cross—in which so many youthful couples had been united—along whose aisles had so often trailed the sable pall that tells of Death, and which had for years been one of the holiest and most beloved of places to the citizens of Montreal.

A few days after this a letter from a friend announced the death of Mr. Warren, caused chiefly by grief at the destruction of the organ, over which he had presided so many years. He could not survive the loss of this inanimate friend, who had spoken to him so often in Music's sweetest tone. I do not think that any one but an organist can fully appreciate an attachment like this. In our cities the constant change of organists from church to church prevents the formation of any attachment for a particular instrument; but where, as in England and Canada, the profession of an organist is really a profession, and where he is called to a church with the intention of being a permanent incumbent of his position, like the clergyman, it is very different. As years roll on and his hand still glides over the familiar key-board, as his touch yet evokes the same strains of choral harmony that he has heard and played long, long since, his mind recalls the many incidents in his life in which his organ-friend has so largely figured, and his affection for it increases day by day. As Prospero with a wave of his magic wand called up the light, ethereal spirits, so, at the pressure of the hand upon the keys, there float before his memory many dear forms and loved scenes which have long ago departed. This chant he has played some happy Christmas morn in years past, when the old church was gay with evergreens, and this hymn he remembers when sung by those at whose funeral his organ has since wailed a sad requiem. It is not always mere music that the organist hears when seated before his organ; for with the earthly harmony are mingled dreamy echoes of the past, and oftentimes sweet voices that whisper faintly of the future. TROVATOR.

A Moravian Christmas Eve.

NAZARETH, PA., Dec. 28. Having already promised something of the kind, I owe you a sketch of our Christmas Eve and the glad cheer of life and solemnity it brought with it.

The snow-clad earth was not here at this time to add to the geniality of the occasion, but the bright stars above added strength to the recollections of an event which young and old had assembled to commemorate.

The Eve of Christmas in all our Moravian villages is ushered in within the walls of the church, where appropriate decorations are frequently added to enliven and enhance the interest of the festivity. At Nazareth the green festoons of the Jubilee were still suspended, and were well adapted to grace the beautiful solemnities of Christmas.

During the night when this august ceremony comes off, a large portion of the surrounding rural population flock hither to witness the scene, gaze at the paraphernalia, and listen to the music. This has been a time-honored custom, and has always presented a singular contrast between the staid devotion of the Moravian himself and the boisterous merriment of the yeomanry, who are generously allowed free access to all these festive meetings. Within the chapel, however, the greatest order and quiet are observed, and no molestation is offered to mar the designs of the festival.

The performances of the evening worship opened with the reading of the second chapter of St. Luke, one of the most poetical records of all Holy Writ, where the memorable passage is introduced: "And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night. And lo, the Angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not; for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord."

After this simple recital, the short discourse follows, and the musical rites open with an anthem, performed by full chorus and orchestra alternately with the chorals of the whole congregation. During the performance the love-feast is partaken of, consisting of cakes and coffee, distributed among all present, who on the evening I have reference to, numbered nearly one thousand.

During this enjoyment, where both the sense and the spiritual emotion are appealed to, a portion of BEETHOVEN's Mass was performed and the German words sung:

Sei willkommen,
Schöner Stern in hell'ger Nacht!
Gans von Andacht hingenommen,
Schau' ich deine stille Pracht.
Hosanna! gelobet sey Der da kommt
Im Namen des Herrn, &c.
(Be thou welcome,
Beautiful Star in the holy night!
All transported by devotion,
I behold thy quiet lustre.
Hosanna! praised be
He who cometh, &c.)

The singing on this, as on all liturgic occasions, is alternated between the male and female, the youth and the adult portion of the congregation, who from time to time are relieved by the choir. In connection with their old Christmas Eve rituals, there is still an ancient vestige of the dramatic remaining, savoring somewhat of Catholicism, yet so endearing by its simplicity and its strong affinity to those child-like interpretations of Christianity on which the heart delights to dwell, that the cold age of new things has not yet been able to obliterate it.

I allude to the introduction of wax tapers. When the choir sing: "Mache dich auf, es werde Licht! Denn dein Licht kommt, und die Herrlichkeit des Herrn geht auf über dir," ("Arise! shine! for thy Light cometh," &c.), large trays of lighted wax tapers are brought in from the eastern side of the chapel, and carried through the assembly and distributed among all the smaller children. To the aged this sudden light appears in its true typical import, and the poetical scene is not undervalued by those who can read the mysteries of religious solemnities. But among the juvenile portion every face becomes radiant with joy at the appearance of this expected light, owing more to the general excitement of the moment than to the inspiration which the symbol should produce. The rural guests are particularly attentive during this scene, and seem to observe with intense delight the brilliant display of hundreds of wax lights held before the smiling faces of the children. The tapers are blown out in gradual succession, the wings are gathered and carried away, the music wanes, and the last tones of the organ fall upon the ears of the retiring multitude as they emerge into the frigid atmosphere of a December night.

This is but the outline of the church ceremonial, the scenes at the altar at the opening of the festive week. The genial solemnity in our smaller villages is still preserved in its pristine purity and simplicity, but in the larger towns, such as Bethlehem, there are too many mixed elements of population for the enjoyment of the simpler rites. Throughout the homes of the village other scenes of like tendency are enacted.

During the whole of the preceding week the young men may be seen upon the bleak hills, where the moss is yet verdant, and the hemlock and laurel are always cheerful and grow luxuriantly where nothing else will thrive, gathering in huge piles and loading upon wagons these well-known Christmas greens. Long evenings are spent in weaving the wreaths, preparing inscriptions and transparencies in harmony with the cheerful occasion.

Each house in which childhood yet constitutes a portion of the fireside group, contributes its share to these manifestations, and a succession of visitors is seen passing from door to door, to examine and discuss the merits of the "decoration." Inscriptions, referring to the Nativity, are generally placed in the background of the picture, which is lighted up in the evening, to which are often added figures and pictures illustrative of the Christmas subject.

The venerable Hall is during this eventful week nearly deserted of its hundred occupants, and but a score of pupils remain behind. These, however, have been very assiduously engaged in preparing their evergreen demonstrations of Merry Christmas, which are left on exhibition until New Year's morning, and Wisdom, under the garb of Mentor, re-conducts them to their books. In the "stone cottage," where the elder boys reside, the most classic decorations were shown us, and the few young men under whose auspices they were designed, and who had been left behind to make the best of Christmas and solitude, seemed delighted with the work of their hands and the encomiums of complaisant guests.

In the Hall, where a couple of groups of little boys remained, two rooms exhibited Christmas trees lighted up with innumerable wax tapers, and many heterogeneous devices, such as caverns, grottoes, birds, animals of all climes associating together. In spite of science and poetry, however, of the laws of unity, of Aristotle, of Burke on the Beautiful, or Longinus on the sublime, the boys were perfectly satisfied and happy. They burned their tapers, set fire to the trees, and exhausted the whole supply of wax to be found far and near.

The Christmas week, with its rejoicings, as they are presented to the eye, the ear, and thence sent back into the soul, forms but a single phase of the Moravian year.

Like most other festivals peculiar to this people, it is rendered affecting by the purity of thought and feeling that characterizes every passage of this living poetry.

The elements of the naive and the simple still remain in ample force to sustain the old German festival and the choral; but when these shall have been swallowed up by the refinements of wealth, and the heartlessness of that species of culture which is its off-spring, and which the world prescribes, then the days of sincere, profound and poetical feeling are over. The beautiful poem of Rückert: "Des fremden Kindes heiliger Christ," would no doubt meet with a kind reception in a good English translation, such as we might look for from your valued translator of German poetry. It breathes the pure emotion of a German Christmas, the artlessness of childhood, with all of the heavenly that poet and painter can draw from the theme.

J. H.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 3, 1857.

The "Messiah" at Christmas.

An immense assemblage listened on Sunday evening (as is the annual custom) to Handel's sublime Oratorio, in the Boston Music Hall. The scene and stir, before the orchestra commences, are of themselves refreshing always upon this occasion. The old HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY were out in full force, and we know not that we ever heard the choruses, almost without exception, rendered with more spirit, euphony, precision and excellent balance of voices. Indeed, in this last particular the society, thanks to Mr. ZERRAHN's indefatigable training, have at length achieved a very important victory over past years. All the singers not only seemed, but were heard, to sing; the soprani did not timidly wait one another's movements, but attacked the note en masse, and gave out a smooth, musical body of tone, instead of that thin, shrill outline by a few voices, which it has been so common to hear. The contralti were uncommonly rich and full; the tenors effective without bawling, and the basses superbly grand and satisfactory, as of old. We need not particularize where every chorus went so well, even to the difficult concluding "Worthy is the Lamb" and "Amen," which was only disturbed by the thoughtless cloaking and going out of the impatient ones among the audience.

If we have any criticism to make it is on the score of the omission of one or two choruses, which certainly are among the best and most important in the whole work; especially did we miss that touching one which should follow the air: "He was despised," namely: "And with his stripes," &c. One could have better spared one or two of the almost impracticable solos which were attempted; for instance: "Thou shalt dash them," for which we have no tenor at all adequate in strength and grandeur. It requires a Braham.

Of the solo-singing we cannot speak with the same satisfaction as of the choruses. Nor was it to be expected; after the familiarity of our public with the world's greatest singers, and in music which so taxes the very highest powers, that the efforts of native singers, mostly amateurs, could be entirely satisfactory. Yet there was much to praise, and everything to be thankful for. Far better hear the "Messiah" so than not at all. Mrs. LONG did herself great credit in the principal soprano songs. She was in uncommonly good voice, which told in the strong and jubilant passages with great effect. Very beautiful were some of her high sustained notes in the annunciation music. In "Rejoice greatly" she displayed great flexibility and freedom. We are not sure that it has ever been done better by any of our resident sopranos; but it takes a sparkling, fountain-like nature, like Jenny Lind's, to render all its life. In the "I know that my Redeemer liveth," she really surprised us by one of the best performances we have ever heard save from the most famous singers. Mrs. HARWOOD has a fresh, rich mezzo soprano voice, of a peculiarly sympathetic quality, which was much relished in the contralto airs. The first: "O, thou that tellest," needed a little more life, to be sure, and runs below her effective range of tones; but "He shall feed his flock" was beautifully given (the second portion being taken by Mrs. Long.) In "He was despised" she was only second to Miss Phillippis. It was a pity to leave out the second part of that song, which is so beautiful and touching. In the duet: "O Death, where is thy sting," her voice and style were very pleasing; but she was feebly seconded by Mr. DRAPER, who seemed to have been overtaxed by previous efforts. This gentleman has a pleasing tenor, but of small power for the music Hall or for Handel's music; yet he sang the opening: "Comfort ye," &c., in good, chaste style, with less of that questionable ornament than we usually hear. For a first, or nearly a first appearance with orchestra, the effort was highly promising. Mr. C. R. ADAMS has often attracted us by the sweetness and clearness of his tenor voice. We have not before heard him in this music. He has not expression enough (very few tenors have, and those only of the most finely cultivated) for such recitative and melody as: "Thy rebuke" and "Behold and see if there be any sorrow," &c. Yet the effort was creditable, and the voice sweet to listen to. For "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron," we have already said he lacks iron strength, and in this was no worse off than nearly every singer who has undertaken it. Mr. THOMAS BALL sang the bass solos precisely as of old; there was want of life and elasticity about it, and a tendency of the ponderous voice to droop away from true pitch. Evidently he has been moulding beauty out of marble more than out of tones these two years past in Florence. Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra filled in the rich accompaniments with fine effect, and Mr. MULLER made the organ—what there is of it—speak to good advantage in parts where it was needed.

Chamber Concerts.

CONCERT OF THE "GERMAN TRIO."—The first of the third season of Chamber Concerts by Messrs. GARTNER, HAUSE and JUNGnickel, drew a respectable audience to Chickering's on Saturday evening, Dec. 20th, in spite of the storm. The programme consisted of one part light and two parts solid, as follows:

- PART I.
1—Grand Trio, Op. 97, for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, L. van Beethoven
- PART II.
2—Quartet: "A Voice from the Lake,".....Theo. Eisfeld.
3—Fantasia for Violoncello (Lucia di Lammermoor).....Plattl.
4—Piano Solo: (Favorite American Airs).....Hause.
5—Violin Solo: Souvenir de Haydn.
6—Quartet: "Ye Spotted Snakes,".....Bishop.
- PART III.
7—Trio, Op. 15, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, Rubinstein. Allegro con fuoco—Adagio—Presto—Allegro.

Beethoven's Trio, the great Trio in B flat, is always a luxury to refresh one's mind withal. It still holds place as at once the most brilliant and most profoundly significant and soul-searching of compositions in that form. Mr. Hause played the piano part with all his wonderful freedom, precision and firmness of execution; only we lacked here and there the sympathetic touch which such tone-poems require so much more than mere bravura pieces. The violin and 'cello bore their parts ably and effectively, of course. Mr. Gärtner's violin is always admirable, unsurpassed, in passages; but there will come ever and anon those unlucky exaggerations of emphasis or pianissimo which break the charm.

Rubinstein's Trio we found more interesting than the Quartets which we have had by him. In this there was much vigor, brilliancy and freshness, especially the first Allegro and the Presto. Yet we do not find the second Beethoven in him that has been talked about. The Trio was performed with great spirit.

Of the pieces in the Second Part, a sort of "popular" intermezzo, we were most pleased with the vocal quartets, which were sung without accompaniment with fine ensemble and expression by Mrs. MOZART, Miss TWICHELL, Mr. C. R. ADAMS and Mr. MOZART; especially the piece by Bishop. Mr. Eisfeld's Quartet is a pleasing composition, although the unaccompanied unisono had a strange sound for an opening. The violoncello fantasia was a skilful piece of show-playing, but the composition execrable. We have little faith in fantasias on opera airs generally; but to hear Edgardo twist his death-song into such fantastic flummery must either torture or provoke to laughter. Yet it bears the name of the first violoncellist in London, who figures in all the classical concerts, &c. The "American Airs" were omitted, wisely, we doubt not. Mr. Gärtner's solo was a rhapsody with variations on Haydn's "God save the Emperor," a skilfully fantastic piece of virtuosity. It was vehemently encored, whereby was elicited one of those marvellous "impromptus" which great violinists always seem to keep in reserve for such emergencies.

GUSTAV SATTER's first "Philharmonic Soirée" drew a crowded and delighted audience to the saloon of Messrs. Hallett, Davis & Co., last Saturday evening. In a conflict of engagements we signally failed in our attempt to be in two or three places at once, and so lost a large part of the concert. But we can't speak of the two most important novelties of the programme (given in our last). The Piano Quartet by WILLMERS interested us much more than we had expected from the concert pieces we had heard of that composer-pianist. There is much life and beauty, with now and then a wild Northern vein (somewhat like Gade) in the first and last movements. The slow movement has a beautiful theme, classically wrought, and followed by curious and pleasing variations. The Minuet is less original or striking. Mr. SATTER plays the difficult piano part with wonderful ease and finish, doing full justice to each shade of expression, and Messrs. SCHULTZE, ECKHARDT and JUNGnickel make up with him one of the most satisfactory quartets to which it has been our fortune to listen.

Forced to lose the smaller piano pieces composed and played by Mr. SATTER, the songs by Mrs. LITTLE, the diableries (from "Robert") by Liszt, and the "Kreutzer Sonata," which we hear was admirably played by Messrs. Satter and Schultze, we were more fortunate with the exquisite Trio (piano, violin and 'cello) by HUMMEL; a posthumous work we believe, and one of the most elegant and artistic of that never strikingly original, but always charming master. It was played to a charm, too.

MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB.—The fourth concert took place on Tuesday evening, with the following programme:

- PART I.
1. Quintette in D, (dedicated to the Mendelssohn Quintette Club,).....C. C. Perkins.
Introduction and Allegro—Scherzo—Andante Sostenuto—Finale, Presto.
2. Piano Quintette in E flat, op. 87.....Hummel.
Allegro e risoluto assai—Minuetto—Allegro con fuoco—Largo, and Finale, Allegro agitato.
- PART II.
3. Adagio and Scherzo, from the Quartette in E minor, op. 44.....Mendelssohn.
4. Grand Polonaise for Piano and 'Cello.....Chopin.
Messrs. Parker and Walf Fries.
5. Quartette in G, No. 2, op. 18.....Beethoven.
Allegro—Adagio cantabile—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro molto.

We must be very brief. Mr. PERKINS shrinks from no task, however formidable, in musical composition, a Quintet being certainly one of the most so. It is praise for an amateur not to have entirely failed. His work is very elaborate, for the most part ingenious, and often pleasing. The character on the whole is light and graceful. But there were modulations of questionable boldness, and workings-up more elaborate (it seemed to us) than the ideas justified. We could not clear away the sense of vagueness, which clings about so many amateur attempts:—we mean, regarding the progress of the whole work. This was the more perceptible by contrast, when one came to listen to that Quintet by HUMMEL, (which was played next). Its euphony and richness, to be sure, were wonderful enhanced by the piano and the double-bass with its deep ground-swell lifting all up. But there was such clearness, positiveness and rounded completeness in the composition itself, as made it most refreshing to listen to.

The MENDELSSOHN movements were welcome old friends; but we have heard the Club play the Scherzo more smoothly. It seemed to us that the instruments did not get their usual inspiring start in the first Quintet, and we asked ourselves whether the middle of the programme were not the best place for the trial of a new composition. Mr. PARKER played Chopin's brilliant Polonaise (one of his very earliest and least Chopin-like productions) very finely, and the violoncello finely co-operated. Next to the Hummel piece, the Beethoven Quartet was the most satisfactory in the rendering, and it is needless to say how delightful it was.

To-night we have embarras des richesses in the way of music. Mr. ZERRAHN's Orchestral Concerts, long longed for, commence this evening at the Melodeon. He is disappointed with regard to OLE BULL, who is unfortunately ill in New York, but announces in his place Herr SCHREIBER, a very distinguished virtuoso on the trumpet, not surpassed, it is said, by KOENIG. For more solid fare he offers Beethoven's lovely fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's Nocturne from "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Tell" Overture, and "Pilgrim Chorus," sung by male voices. Certainly a most attractive prospect!....We are only sorry that THALBERG's advent happens on the same evening. Of course all the music-lovers are eager to listen to the great pianist, and we doubt not large audiences will attend both concerts. Besides his own wonderful pianism, Thalberg offers us Mme. D'ANGRI, one of the very first contraltos of the age, and Sig. MORELLI, the admired baritone. Thalberg's second concert will be on Thursday evening....The AFTERNOON CONCERTS, it will be seen, are postponed one week to Jan. 14....The second concert of the GERMAN TRIO took place last evening....The MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY held a private musical soiree at Hallett & Davis's rooms on Tuesday evening....The German "ORPHEUS" held a musical and social festival to welcome in the New Year, when a large silver goblet, of very artistic design and workmanship was presented by the members to their esteemed leader and teacher, Mr. AUGUST KREISSMANN. The first concert of the "Orpheus" is fixed for Saturday evening, the 17th inst.

CROWDED OUT.—Letters from Springfield, from Germany, &c.; Musical Intelligence, foreign and domestic; conclusion of "Daisy's" article, and much more, which will appear next week.

Advertisements.

MELODEON.

The FIRST of the FOUR PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS will be given on SATURDAY EVENING, January 3, with the highly valuable assistance of

Herr LOUIS SCHREIBER,

Solo Trumpet-player to the King of Hanover.

Among the principal pieces will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony; Overture to Goethe's Faust, by Richard Wagner (first time); the Pilgrim Chorus (sung by a select Choir) from Taubhäuser (first time); and the Overture to "William Tell." Tickets for subscribers are now ready at Russell & Richardson's, Wade's, and Ditson's Music Stores. Packages of four Tickets, $3; single Ticket, $1.

For particulars see programmes.
Doors open at 6½: Concert to commence at 7¼ o'clock.
CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

Advertisements.

THALBERG'S FIRST CONCERT.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1867.

MADAME D'ANGRI

(Cantatrice & Camera to the Emperor of Austria, and PRIMO CONTRALTO ASSOLUTO from the Italian Opera, Paris, Her Majesty's Theatre and Covent Garden, London,) will make her first appearance in Boston jointly with M. THALBERG.

M. THALBERG

will play Fantasias on "Don Giovanni," "Mazaniello," and "L'Elisir d'Amore," La Barcarole and the Serenade from "Don Pasquale."

MADAME D'ANGRI

will sing Arias from "Gilda," "Semiramide," "Il Barbiere," Rondo from "Cenerentola."

SIGNOR MORELLI

will sing Arias from "Gemma di Vergy," the "Largo al factotum," and "Amor funesto."

CONDUCTOR.....SIGNOR ABELLA.

THE PRICES OF ADMISSION FOR RESERVED SEATS will be the same as in New York and Philadelphia, ONE DOLLAR AND FIFTY CENTS, AND ONE DOLLAR, according to location.

THE ONLY AUTHORIZED TICKET OFFICE is at Russell & Richardson's, No. 252 Washington street.

THE SALE OF RESERVED SEATS will commence on Thursday, Jan. 1, at 9 o'clock A. M.

ORDER OF THE SALE.

On Thursday and Friday will be sold the $1.50 reserved seats only. On Saturday the $1 and remaining $1.50 seats. All seats unsold may be had in the evening at the door.

NOTICE. With both the $1.50 and the $1 Tickets will be given checks entitling the holder to a reserved seat.

No orders can be received in advance, and the day and hour of the commencement of the sale of tickets for each of M. Thalberg's Concerts will be duly announced.

Tickets may likewise be had on the evening at the door. Doors open at 7½; to commence at 8.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1867. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians, with Mr. CARL ZAMBAHN as Conductor. Further particulars hereafter.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

MR JOHN C. HAYNES is admitted as a partner in my house from this date. The style of the firm will be OLIVER DITSON & CO.
BOSTON, JAN. 1, 1867.

OLIVER DITSON.

ONE OF A THOUSAND

OF THE FAVORABLE OPINIONS RESPECTING THE GOLDEN WREATH.

An Eminent Teacher of Music at the West writes as follows: "I think the Golden Wreath a treasure, and am sanguine of having it introduced in the public schools of this city. I shall distribute a dozen for inspection, and in the mean time dispose of One Hundred copies to my select classes, which please send me," &c. &c.

The Tenth Thousand is now ready. Price, 30 cents. $3 per dozen
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co. 115 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.
Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices.
THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Kimbault, a few copies.
Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—(Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 12. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 68
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 68
- " 3. Fêtes on Choir and Chorus Singing.....38
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Cattel's Treatise on Harmony.....68
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction. Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 62

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 56 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,

(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

17

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 88 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. [Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payment required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 249.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 15.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
O. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 806 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

(Continued from page 106.)

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Gleaned from HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

THE HAUTOBOY OR OBOE.

The hautboy is especially a melodial instrument: it has a pastoral character, full of tenderness—nay, I would even say of timidity. It is nevertheless always written for, in the tutti parts, without paying attention to the expression in its quality of tone, because there it is lost in the aggregate whole, and the peculiarity of this expression cannot be distinguished. It is the same thing—let it be at once understood—with all other wind instruments. The only exception is with those the sonorousness of which is excessive, or the quality of tone too marked in its originality. It is in fact impossible, without trampling under foot both Art and good sense, to employ such instruments as those as simple instruments of harmony. Among them may be ranked trombones, ophicleides, double bassoons, and, in many instances, trumpets and cornets. Candor, artless grace, soft joy, or the grief of a fragile being, suits the hautboy's accents; it expresses them admirably in its cantabile.

A certain degree of agitation is also within its powers of expression; but care should be taken not to urge it into utterances of passion—the rash outburst of anger, threat or heroism; for then its small, acid-sweet voice becomes ineffectual and absolutely grotesque. Some great masters—Mozart among others—have not escaped this error. In their scores passages are to be found, the impassioned meaning and martial accent of which contrast strangely with the sound of the hautboy that executes them; and thence result, not only effects missed, but startling disparities between stage and orchestra, melody and instrumentation. The theme of a march, however manly, grand or noble, loses its manliness, its grandeur, and its nobleness, if hautboys deliver it; it has a chance of preserving something of its character if given to flutes, and loses scarcely anything by being assigned to clarinets. Where—in order to give more weight and body to the harmony, and more force to the group of wind instruments employed—hautboys are absolutely needful in a piece such as I have just described, they should be written in such a way that their quality of tone (not suited to this particular style) shall become completely covered by the other instruments, and blend with the mass so as no longer to be recognized. The lower sounds of the hautboys, ungraceful when displayed, may agree with certain wild and lamenting harmonies, united to the low notes of the clarinets, and to the low D, E, F and G of the flutes and corni inglesi.

Gluck and Beethoven understood marvellously well the use of this valuable instrument; to it they both owe the profound emotions excited by several of their finest pages. I have only to quote, from Gluck, the hautboy solo of Agamemnon's air in Iphigenia in Aulide: "Peuvent ils, &c." ("Can the harsh Fates.") These complaints of an innocent voice, these continued supplications ever more and more appealing—what instrument could they suit so well as a hautboy? And the celebrated burden of the air of Iphigenia in Tauride: "O malheureuse, Iphigénie." And again, that child-like cry of the orchestra, when Alceste, in the midst of her enthusiasm and heroic self-devotion, struck by the recollection of her young sons, abruptly interrupts the phrase of the theme: "Eh pourrai-je vivre sans toi," to respond to this touching instrumental appeal, with the heart-rending exclamation: "O mes enfans!" And then the discord of the minor second in Armida's air with the words: "Sauvez moi de l'amour," ("Save my weak heart from love"). All this is sublime, not only in dramatic thought, in the profound expression, in the grandeur and beauty of the melody; but also in the instrumentation, and the admirable choice made by the author of the hautboys from amidst the throng of other instruments, either inadequate or incapable of producing such impressions.

Beethoven has demanded more from the joyous accent of the hautboys. Witness the solo of the scherzo of the Pastoral Symphony; that of the scherzo of the Choral Symphony; that of the first movement of the Symphony in B flat, &c. But he has no less felicitously succeeded in assigning them sad or forlorn passages. This may be seen in the minor solo of the second return of the first movement of the Symphony in A, in the episodic andante of the finale to the Eroica Symphony, and, above all, in the air of Fidelio, where Florestan, starving with hunger, believes himself, in his delirious agony, surrounded by his weeping family, and mingles his tears of anguish with the broken sobs of the hautboy.

THE CORNO INGLESE.

This instrument is, so to speak, the alto of the hautboy, with which it possesses equal compass. It is written on the G clef, like a hautboy in F below, and, consequently a fifth above its real sound.

What has just been said upon the difficulties of fingering for the hautboy, in certain encounters of sharpened or flattened notes, applies also to the corno inglese. Rapid passages upon it have a still worse effect; its quality of tone, less piercing, more veiled, and deeper than that of the hautboy, does not so well as the latter lend itself to the gayety of rustic strains. Nor could it give utterance to anguished complainings; accents of keen grief are almost interdicted to its powers. It is a melancholy, dreamy, and rather noble voice, of which the sonorousness has something of vague, of remote, which renders it superior to all others in exciting regret, and reviving images and sentiments of the past, when the composer desires to awaken the secret echo of tender memories. M. Halevy has with extreme felicity employed two corni inglesi in the ritornello of Eleazar's air in the fourth act of The Jewess.

In the Adagio of one of my own symphonies, the corno inglese, after having repeated in the bass octave the phrases of a hautboy—as the voice of a youth might reply to that of a young girl in a pastoral dialogue—reiterates fragments of them (at the close of the movement) with a dull accompaniment of four kettle-drums, during the silence of all the rest of the orchestra. The feelings of absence, of forgetfulness, of sorrowful loneliness, which arise in the bosoms of the audience on hearing this forsaken melody, would lack half their power if played by any other instrument than the corno inglese.

The mixture of the low sounds of the corno inglese with the bass notes of the clarinets and horns, during a tremolo of double-basses, gives a sonorousness as peculiar as it is novel, and well suited to imbue with its menacing impression those musical ideas where fear and solicitude predominate. This effect was unknown either to Mozart, Weber, or Beethoven. A magnificent example of it is to be found in the duet in the fourth act of the Huguenots; and I think M. Meyerbeer is the first who caused it to be heard on the stage.

In compositions where the prevailing impression is that of melancholy, the frequent use of the corno inglese hidden in the midst of the great mass of instruments, is perfectly suited. Then, only one hautboy part need be written; replacing the second by that of the corno inglese. Gluck has employed this instrument in his Italian opera of Telemaco, and Orfeo; but without manifest intention, and without deducing much effect. He never introduced it in his French scores. Neither Mozart, Beethoven, nor Weber, have used it; wherefore, I know not.

THE BASSOON.

The bassoon is the bass of the hautboy; it has a compass of more than three octaves.

This instrument leaves much to desire on the score of precision of intonation; and would gain perhaps more than any other wind instrument, from being constructed according to Böhm's system.

The bassoon is of the greatest use in the orchestra on numerous occasions. Its sonorousness is not very great, and its quality of tone, absolutely devoid of brilliancy or nobleness, has a tendency towards the grotesque—which should be always kept in mind, when bringing it forward into prominence. Its low notes form excellent basses to the whole group of wooden wind instruments. The bassoon is ordinarily written in two parts; but large orchestras being always provided with four bassoons, it can then be without inconvenience written in four real parts; or, still better, in three,—the lowest part being doubled an octave below, to strengthen the bass. The character of their high notes is somewhat painful, suffering—even, I would say, miserable,—which may be sometimes introduced into either a slow melody, or passages of accompaniment, with most surprising effect. Thus the odd little cluckings heard in the Scherzo of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, towards the close of the decrescendo, are solely produced by the somewhat forced sound of the A♭, and the high G of the bassoons in unison.

When M. Meyerbeer, in his resurrection of the Nuns, wished to find a pale, cold, cadaverous sound, he, on the contrary, obtained it from the weak middle notes of the bassoon.

Rapid passages of bound notes may be successfully employed; they come out well when they are written in the favorite keys of the instrument, such as D, G, C, F, B♭, E♭, A, and their relative minors.

THE DOUBLE-BASSOON.

This instrument is to the bassoon, what the double-bass is to the violoncello. That is to say, its sound is an octave lower than the written note.

It is needless to add that this very ponderous instrument is only suitable for grand effects of harmony, and to basses of a moderate degree of speed. Beethoven has used it in the finale of his Symphony in C minor; and in that of his Choral Symphony. It is very valuable for large wind instrument bands; nevertheless, few players care to learn it. Occasionally, the attempt is made to replace it by the ophicleide, the sound of which has not the same depth; since it is in unison with the usual bassoon, and not with the octave below; and the quality of tone of which has no analogy of character with that of the double-bassoon. I think therefore, in the majority of cases, it is better to do without this instrument, than to replace it thus.

[To be continued.]

Hector Berlioz.

[Concluded.]

When he reached Paris, he remembered that he owed the acquaintance I have mentioned 1,200*fr.* for the execution of his mass. The miserable sum of money he received from his father, forbade his hoping to discharge that debt by an economical administration of his allowance. He, therefore, resorted to other means; he rented a garret at fifteen francs a month, resolved never to spend more than eight sous a meal, (sixteen sous a day,) and succeeded in paying 600 francs in four months. This probity reached his father's ear: Dr. Berlioz paid the remaining 600*fr.* but he gave Hector no more money until the sum allowed him had extinguished this advance. His secret motive to this was to constrain his son to return home. Hector detected the snare: he expended still less money for his meals, gave more lessons, and in this way contrived to live without receiving any aid from his family. A young man of talents brought Berlioz the "book" of an opera entitled "Les Francs Juges;" he found the subject very poetical, and composed the score with enthusiasm. The Grand Opera rejected the "book," and all his labor was lost: the overture of "Les Francs Juges" is still preserved, and those who are acquainted with it declare it a master piece.

It would almost seem as if some genius of evil had heard Berlioz's mother's anathema, and determined to execute it. Failing the performance of "Les Francs Juges," he sought to obtain the concert-room of the Conservatoire, to execute there the overture of that rejected opera. It was denied him. He lost several pupils in music. Gaunt Poverty clutched him in its iron claws. Some fore-runner of Maretzek was engaging an orchestra for New York. He sought to obtain the place of flutist; he applied too late—all the places were filled. In his despair, he entered a concours for choristers at the Opera Comique; his competitors were a chorister of some church, a carpenter, a blacksmith and a weaver. He was successful, and Fortune seemed to relax her frowns—new pupils came. An old friend, a student of pharmacy, gave him a portion of his chamber, and prepared for him a succulent supper on the furnace where he distilled. Once a week the two friends contrived to go to the Grand Opera. Berlioz, who knew all the great scores by heart, was always indignant whenever the orchestra made any changes in the opera they were executing, and invariably bawled his opinion from his seat in the pit to the leader of the orchestra; but generally the only effect he produced was on himself; the police would put him out of the door! One evening, however, he was more fortunate. As usual, he cried out to the musicians, "What are ye about? You omit something! There is a solo! Read the score!" The pit took up the cry—"The solo! the solo! the solo!" The orchestra was obstinate. The pit yelled again. The orchestra still pretended not to hear. The whole pit—Berlioz at their head—then leaped over the orchestra—the musicians fled—the curtain fell—and the melo-maniacs broke all the instruments to atoms! Since I am in the way of telling stories, here is another of Hector's youth, which may prove interesting. At a representation of Antigone a person sitting near young Berlioz accompanied the music with ejaculations of admiration, to the great annoyance of his neighbors and despite their repeated "Pst! Pst!" At last our hero, overcome by this irritation, and his nervous sensibility excited by the music, buried his face in his handkerchief and sobbed. The man, whose interjections had so greatly annoyed him, perceiving his emotion, caught him in his arms, pressed him to his breast, and kissed him on both cheeks, exclaiming, "Ah! you do understand music—That's a noble fellow! Pleurons! Pleurons!" Hector's tears ceased to flow, and the pit roared!

About this period of his life Mr. Macready and Miss Smithson brought over an English company to Paris, and introduced the French to Shakspeare. They effected a great revolution here: they inspired M. Victor Hugo, M. Alexandre Dumas, M. Casimir Delavigne with their best dramas, and M. Paul Delaroche and M. Eugene Delacroix with the subjects of some of their best paintings. They turned M. Berlioz's head and heart. He fell desperately in love with Miss Smithson, the charming Juliet and Desdemona of the company. Every night she played he was at the theatre, and his only object, his only desire was to attract her attention. He determined to give a concert composed exclusively of his compositions: the overture to the "Francs Juges," the overture to "Waverley," a Greek heroic scene: and the "Death of Orpheus." Everything was ready for the concert, but Cherubini refused the Conservatoire concert-room. M. Berlioz appealed to the Superintendent of Fine Arts, and obtained the concert-room. The concert was given, but the orchestra was hostile to him, and the whole proved a fiasco. Nothing discouraged, M. Berlioz wrote Miss Smithson letters upon letters written in the style of a lunatic. The English "star" was alarmed at such declarations, she looked on the writer as mad and refused to receive his letters. M. Berlioz determined to give another concert. He gave it in the theatre where the English actors played, on one of the "off nights;" the orchestra was faithful, and the critics applauded him lustily. Miss Smithson was not touched by this success, and in a day or two afterwards, she, with the rest of the English company, were on their way home.

M. Berlioz was almost heart-broken. He could not work. He could think of nothing. A German pianist introduced him to an actress on the Boulevard, whose likeness to Miss Smithson was wonderfully close. M. Berlioz gratified his love for Miss Smithson by proxy, and his heart ceased to throb. He worked hard again, and soon carried off the first prize at the Conservatoire for his cantata, "La Mort de Sardanapale;" but, when it came to be executed, some perfidious hand mixed the score, and the most frightful discord reigned in the orchestra. A week afterwards, the cantata was performed with success. At the same time, he brought out a Symphonie Fantastique (which was greatly admired and greatly abused,) and wrote scores for Gerard de Nerval's translations of Faust. The first prize at the Conservatoire entitled him to live in Italy for two years, at the expense of the Government. He ruptured the silken chains which bound him to Miss Smithson's image, and he went to Italy. He was scarcely installed in the palace, devoted by France to its school at Rome by M. Horace Vernet, then its director, when he received a letter from the mother of the actress with whom he had so long been intimate, in which she announced the approaching marriage of her daughter, and reproached our hero with having come near (these French! these French!) dishonoring her daughter by seducing her.

Young Berlioz was furious. He bought four pistols, one for the actress, one for her husband, one for her mother, and one for himself, and filled his pockets with violent poisons, determined that if his pistol failed him, he would end his existence by more certain means. To make sure of gaining an entrance into the actress's house, he purchased a woman's costume, and abruptly quitted Rome for France. On the eve of embarking at Genoa, he determined to devote twenty-four hours to correct his Symphonie Fantastique, that at least he might leave behind him a composition (which he looks upon as his masterpiece) without faults. While working at this score, he thought of what fame he might acquire, and he wept; tears cooled his murderous thoughts, or rather changed them into ideas of suicide; he ran to the sea and leaped into it. Some sailors observed him and rescued him. Ashamed of his despair, he wrote the next day, the following letter to M. Horace Vernet. This letter obtained publicity at the sale of the celebrated collection of autographs belonging to the late Baron de Tremont:

Monsieur—A hideous crime, a betrayal of confidence of which I am a victim, has made me rave with madness, from Florence to this place. I flew to France to execute the justest and most terrible of vengeance. At Genoa, a moment of vertigo, a moment of the most inconceivable weakness, destroyed my determination. I abandoned myself to childish despair, but I escaped with several draughts of salt water, with being harpooned like a salmon, lying fifteen minutes for dead in the sun, and puking violently above an hour. I do not know who took me out of the sea; they believe I fell accidentally from the city's ramparts. Mais enfin, I'm still alive; I must live for two sisters whose death I would have caused had I died. I must live for my art.

Diana Marina, 18 April, 1831.

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

I quote you only the principal passages in his letter, for it fills two quarto pages. His heart returned to Miss Smithson. When his period of travel had expired, and he once more reached Paris, he found to his great delight Miss Smithson managing an English theatre here. He organized a concert of his own compositions, foremost among which stood his Symphonie Fantastique. One of his friends promised to bring Miss Smithson to the concert. M. Berlioz was madly applauded, and she could easily discover in the cries of pain and love with which the score was filled, how earnestly she was loved. The next day she allowed Berlioz to be introduced to her. He addressed her, and was accepted. But their parents opposed the marriage—Berlioz's family especially, for they looked upon the marriage of their son to an actress as a blur upon the family escutcheon! During their engagement, the English theatre proved bankrupt; and all of Miss Smithson's fortune was lost. They were married, however, in 1833, and the celebrated Miss Smithson became Mme. Berlioz. Her husband's evil genius still pursued him: the week after she was married she broke her leg. The day he was married he had not three hundred francs in his pocket, and Miss Smithson had even less: he gave concert after concert, paid her creditors an instalment of their debts, paid his surgeon's bill, and managed to live.

He composed "Harold en Italie," which was loudly applauded, especially by Paganini, whose commendations engaged the Minister of the Interior to command a "requiem," in memory of Gen. Damremont and the soldiers who fell at the storming of Constantine, which was celebrated in the chapel of the Invalides. Here Berlioz came very near being ruined by a dishonorable trick of Habeneck, the leader of the orchestra. The Tuba mirum required on the part of the leader of the orchestra redoubled vigor and energy: when Habeneck reached it, he quietly laid down his bâton, and took a pinch of snuff. M. Berlioz had all along entertained suspicions of Habeneck. He seized the bâton, led the orchestra, and saved the "Requiem," which was very successful. The Government had promised M. Berlioz 3,000*fr.* for this piece; when he asked for his money, he was offered the ribbon of the Legion of Honor instead of it; he refused, and insisted on his money, for he owed nearly all of it to his musicians; it was not until he menaced the Minister with a lawsuit, that he obtained it.

He now obtained the place of musical critic in the Gazette Musicale, and afterwards in Le Correspondant, and much later in Le Journal des Debats. His style is fantastic; sometimes it sinks into buffoonery, but it is almost always interesting and original. He has raised himself a great many enemies by his pen and tongue, for they are both intemperate and frequently unjust. He spoke in these terms of Rossini's "Faith, Hope and Charity;" "His hope deceives ours; his faith cannot transport mountains; and as for his charity, it will not ruin him." In another feuilleton he made M. Panzeron the laughing stock of Paris. This professor at the Conservatoire published a prospectus offering his services to all amateur composers as a corrector of their compositions, his charge being only 100*fr.* for each piece; it was written in the style of a quack's card. M. Berlioz inserted it at length in his feuilleton in the Debats, writing over it: "Cabinet de Consultations pour les Melodies Secretes."

M. Berlioz's next composition was "Benvenuto Cellini," a grand opera, which fell in Paris amid great hissing, but which is admired in Germany with frenzy, where it is frequently performed. Paganini, who had become an intimate friend of Berlioz, never forgave France the downfall of this piece; he wrote to one of his friends at Genoa that the French had been guilty of an act of vandalism, and when the opera disappeared from the bills of the opera, he wrote this letter to M. Berlioz: "My dear friend, Beethoven dead, none but Berlioz could make him live again, and I, who have frequently enjoyed your divine composition—worthy of a genius like yours—feel it my duty to beg you to be good enough to accept as an homage from me 20,000 francs, which will be paid to you by Baron de Rothschild, on the presentation of the enclosed. Believe me always yours, Nicolo Paganini." A month before Paganini died, (and when his voice had gone forever,) he was at one of Berlioz's concerts. Unable to express his admiration by words, he fell on his knees in the concert-room, before all the spectators, and kissed Berlioz's hands. With these 20,000 francs he labored for fourteen months on "Romeo and Juliet," and expended the sum which remained of Paganini's generous gift in executing it. After Berlioz lays down his bâton, the concert ended, he is obliged to be carried home and put to bed, so exhausted is he by emotion: his clothes are wringing wet.

In 1841 he went to Germany where he had great success; he is far more popular there than he is here. During his tour he gave concerts with Mendelssohn. They would invariably be called out; and at a grand festival given by them they embraced each other on the stage, and exchanged their bâtons, amid loud applause. In 1845 he visited Russia, where he made a good deal of money—three concerts fetched him $8,000. On the eve of his departure he gave at the Grand Theatre of St. Petersburg his symphony—"Romeo et Juliette"—before the Emperor, Empress and all the Court. He was recalled four times and obliged to remain on the stage ten minutes each time until the applause ceased. At the end of this concert, exhausted by fatigue and emotion, he fell on a chair in the green-room, and sobbed like a child.

On his return to France, his pleasure was clouded by the deaths of his father, mother and sister, who died within a short time of each other. His marriage with Miss Smithson proved an unhappy match. It could not have been otherwise. That custom of domination and other masculine habits women acquire on the stage, altogether unfit them for that submissive part of wife required by matrimony. Miss Smithson became jealous; and, from what you now know of the character of M. Berlioz, you may well imagine this ardent, nervous, sensitive, restless being was ill-calculated to make a home happy. They ceased to live together. * * * However, all relation did not cease between the husband and the wife, and during the long sickness (paralysis) which carried Henrietta Smithson to her grave, Hector Berlioz made her as comfortable as man could do.

These domestic misfortunes, and the virulent persecutions of his enemies seemed to give M. Berlioz a sort of torpor. For years he was silent. L'Enfance du Christ was the first work he composed after his return from Russia, and that I gave a full account of when it appeared last year. He was elected a member of the Institute last June.

His face is handsome; he has an aquiline nose, a fine intellectual mouth, a prominent chin; his eyes are somewhat sunken, and are occasionally full of fire and brilliancy and occasionally covered with a melancholy, languid cloud. His hair is wavy, his forehead is covered with wrinkles, which attest the storm which has tossed his life. His conversation is unequal, brusque emportée, sometimes expansive, more frequently cold and reserved. According to the humor he happens to be in, it arouses in his hearer a lively curiosity, or a warm sympathy. GAMMA.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music Teachers.

BY DAISY.

(Concluded from number before the last.)

There is a great difference of opinion among amateurs as to what constitutes musical talent. I once knew a lady who could execute some of the most difficult pieces of music upon the piano-forte, following every note, and adhering to the marks of expression with the utmost precision. Yet another might play the same music after she left the instrument, and she would not know that she had ever heard it before. She said she merely learned to play for the gratification of her friends.

Now it is evident that this lady had no musical talent whatever; for it is not playing every note according to its real value and keeping good time alone that proves the musician; the voice of music speaks through the soul, and by that rule it is easy to discern the true artist.

In a late number of the Journal it was suggested by a correspondent that a school for music teachers should be established, and that no one be allowed a certificate without a thorough examination by musicians. Such a school, if conducted upon right principles, would undoubtedly be a great aid in the cultivation of musical science in our country. There would at least be fewer chances for deception on the part of our music teachers, and a corresponding increase of good performers among the pupils in our schools and seminaries.

It is time that a line should be drawn between the one who really applies himself to the art, and only aspires to merit the title of Teacher of Music, and the one who merely teaches for a little recreation, "just to see how it seems."

In our country towns especially, once or twice a year, half a column of the village paper is devoted to a flaming advertisement, announcing that the celebrated Prof. B—, pupil of the distinguished Mr. —, is prepared to give a course of twelve lessons in music to the youth in the vicinity, &c. The public immediately concludes that any one who is so confident of his own abilities must be worth something; and all the young ladies are eager to say they have taken lessons of a fashionable teacher, and for twelve hours (one a week) they practice upon his "new and beautiful instrument," and then bid adieu to music till the next "Professor" comes round.

In saying all this, I have not the slightest wish to exaggerate nor to detract from the merit of all who come among us in the capacity of music teachers. I only present a few suggestions to the music-loving portion of the community. In this, as in every other art, let all things be tried and proved in the beginning, while music is yet in its infancy in this country, and we may yet reap glorious results.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Jan. 5.—I have no musical intelligence to give you this week; but I must needs utter a complaint against your printers or proof-readers for making me say in my last, that Mrs. JAMIESON sang out of tune, instead of time, as I had written. The lady's singing was excellent in every other respect; she has a fine, true voice, knows how to use it, and sings with feeling, but in the point above mentioned she was so very inaccurate, that I wondered how the orchestra could keep pace with her. I hear, moreover, that this is a fault with her which is well-known to the public.

Will "Trovator" allow me to inquire what had happened to his eyes and ears and musical discrimination when he took the Trio of Spohr, played at Einfeld's last concert, for one of Beethoven's? They must all have played him very false, for the programme told us distinctly that the Trio was by Spohr, and the last Quartet (which, though the gem of the evening, he does not mention at all) by Beethoven; and the two composers are so exceedingly unlike, that it seems hardly possible to mistake the one for the other. I have, however, no doubt that Mr. GOLDBECK could "grasp the full meaning of even Beethoven's compositions," should he interpret any of them in public, for in our high opinion of his merits, "Trovator" and I agree better than in some other respects.

NEW YORK, Jan. 6.—There were very few enjoyed the musical welcome with which the New Year was greeted in this city. For who, indeed, at midnight would be wandering among the gloomy streets of lower New York, when at that hour they are entirely deserted, save by some solitary watchman trampling his lonely beat, and guarding the treasures that are enclosed in those massy walls of brick and stone, that tower dimly up on every side? Who could foretell, that in that silent region could be heard the happy tones of welcome that sang the advent of another year?

It was a sweet, mild night, that of the 31st of December, 1856, and it seemed as if the old year had spent all its rage and fury, and was about to die in peace. The white snow fell soft and silently, and everything was quiet, as the last few moments of the dying year were throbbing on to eternity. High up in the dark night loomed the tower and spire of Trinity Church, which the snow was quietly dressing in a robe of spotless white, hiding the carefully carved inequalities, and transforming the huge mass into a blanched and ghostly figure, that stood out in the midnight with fearful distinctness. At the appointed time the clock clanged out the hour of twelve, and the past year had fled away forever. For a moment all is still. But hark! what is that sweet music that fills the air, and drops down as beautifully as snow-flakes and far more musically? Louder and louder it sounds, and soon peals out in the snowy night, the sweet, familiar tones of "Home, sweet home." Up in the belfry of Trinity, the chimes are ringing out their welcome to Eighteen Hundred and Fifty-seven, and their first song is one of home. Let us stand there in front of the church and listen; all is still save that sweet music. Down Wall Street a few dim lamps are glimmering through the falling snow, and these are all that mark that famous avenue, which in a few hours will be thronged by thousands. Up and down Broadway the scene is much the same; a watchman only is standing on the opposite corner, and he and ourselves are the only ones that we know are listening to the music from the belfry, as it sings of "Home,"—of homes that during the past year have been broken up forever—of home circles where, on this happy morning, will intrude sad thoughts of absent ones, that went down to the sea in ships and never more returned—of homes from which some dear form has been carried away with closed eyes, pale face and folded hands—of a home where the lost ones will be found, the closed eyes again opened, and the folded hands again clasped in dear embrace.

But soon, like a dissolving view, the melody changes, and the "Sicilian Mariner's Hymn" rings out more gladly, and other thoughts, of churches where we have sung that hymn, allied to words of promise and consolation, come upon the memory. But even these fade, as with wild joy the belfry chimes ring out merrily the Brindisi from Lucrezia, and banish all sad thoughts, drive back the starting tear, bring a smile upon the cheek, and reminds us of the many happy, as well as sad moments, the past year has brought us, and of the many happy plans we have formed for the New Year. And as we slowly stroll up Broadway, the chimes fall fainter and fainter, but merry still. Other melodies can be distinguished, and for an hour the heavenly music drops from the unseen belfry as if showered down by angels, or as if every snow-flake as it fell was chanting a little song of joy. And that's how the chimes of Trinity Church welcomed in the New Year.

"Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light;
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

Ring out the old, ring in the new!
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going—let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor;
Ring in redress to all mankind.

Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife;
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.

Ring out old shapes of foul disease,
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold,
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Ring in the valiant men and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the CHRIST that is to be."

* * * * *

We have the prospect of many delicious musical treats during the coming season. The German Opera company are tolerably successful, and have produced an opera by Anber, called the "Mason and the Locksmith"—an opera that contains some pretty melodies, but is inferior to Auber's more familiar productions. The principal theme is an air sung by the tenor in the first act, and it is worked up in the following portions of the opera, very much like a similar tenor air in Traviata. There is a pretty duet for bass and tenor, which the locksmith and mason sing to the accompaniment of their own anvils, though what a mason has to do with an anvil is not exactly obvious. The plot is complicated and quite impossible to be grasped without a libretto; there is a curious conglomeration of Turks, and Christians, and villagers, and scolding wives, with a Greek girl, and a noble lover, dressed in a white mantle, like a ghost. The mason and blacksmith, each possess in their respective wives a perfect Xanthippe, and each are feloniously abstracted to a brigand's cave, where the Greek girl sings a love song. While the mason, apparently under compulsion, builds a stone wall by the novel process of grasping the top of it with his hands, and gradually pulling it up as it were from the bowels of the earth. The feature of the last act is a scolding duet between the wife of the mason and a prying old maid who indulges in snuff. The opera was well received, but can have no permanent success. The next new opera will be Lortzing's "Czar and Zimmermann."

The Academy of Music will re-open next Monday for the presentation of Italian Opera, by PARODI, TIBERINI, ANGRI, and MORELLI. But twelve performances will be given, and it is said that no operas will be produced that do not afford Parodi and D'Angri an opportunity of appearing together. Certainly it will be a treat to hear these two splendid artists in Semiramide or Lucrezia. Mr. STRAKOSCH is to be the director of the company, and will perhaps produce his own opera, Giovanni di Napoli, which was written for Parodi, and performed years ago at the old Astor Place Opera House.

TROVATORE.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Jan. 1.—Springfield has just had the honor of listening to a concert from THALBERG and Mme. DE WILHORST. My friend Jones and myself were there. Jones is a plain-spoken fellow, has quite an ear for music, "opera music" in particular. He generally attends all the first concerts that stop here, and has acquired a little critical knowledge of "tone," "timbre," etc., etc. I give you the benefit of a few of his criticisms below.

The concert opened with an aria sung by Mme. De Wilhorst. She is exceedingly pretty; has an independence of manner on the stage "quite charming," as a fellow at our elbow suggested. As to her voice, we think as Jones does—"excellent for an amateur's attempt at the marvellous—rather thin on some of the low notes—a little too brilliant on some of her high notes—powerful, a little more so at times than is pleasant."

The applause being over, the audience (which by the way filled the hall) were breathless in anticipation of the debut of the immortal Thalberg in Springfield. He came. Instead of Don Giovanni (as advertised), he gave us his transcription of Mosé in Egitto. The audience was wild with enthusiasm. He did not answer the encore. His second fantasia, "Masaniello," produced more cause for enthusiasm, and the audience insisted on having an encore, which he answered by his melodious rendering of "Sweet Home." Truly his command of his hands is most wonderful. His left hand wanders among the mazes of Arpeggio harmonies with an ease and grace that is perfectly seducing. One has not his senses. Jones contained himself during the first part, and uttered not a word till the last strain of "Sweet Home" had ceased, when, with an enthusiasm more worthy of an insane person, he exclaimed, with his face beaming with delight and wonder:

"By Jove! his thumbs are all fingers. Really, I thought Mason, Gottschalk, Strakosch and those tall players did the piano well, but I am just as much in the fog as to what piano perfection is, as when I first heard cousin Jane thump out 'Home' as a waltz on our forty dollar concern. This man plays a few notes of the melody in the middle of the piano with his right hand; at the same time his left, full of 'muttering wrath,' crawls up and attacks the melody, and then the right steals way up to high C, sees what's to be seen, and then softly tumbles back just in time to carry on the melody, while the left hand leaves for the lower regions on an excursion for 'diminished sevenths,' 'flat ninths,' curious tenths, and all them sort of things, and gets back in the region of middle C in time to relieve the right hand of the melody, to cut up its pranks in the upper octaves. Really, I believe the next great player who comes here will play a part at each end of the instrument, while he plays an obligato accompaniment inside on the wires!"

In the second part Mme. De Wilhorst was encored after singing an aria from "Trovatore." She sang the "Last Rose of Summer." My friend suggests a query as to the reason why great singers, when they sing airs familiar as household words, embellish them with that eternal tremolo. True it is that tastes differ, yet if singers did but know it, "home airs" sound best when sung in mellow organ tones, each word and syllable distinctly uttered, yet so joined together that an even flow of melody charms the hearer, and frees his ear from violent sforzandos and nervous tremblings, now too common among public singers.

The concert was a great success, and with a full house at a dollar admission, we may presume that it was a success to the managers.

I have not time to speak of our own musical matters. Will do so in my next. Thalberg gives a concert in Hartford to-night (1st). More anon.

AD LIBITUM.

BRESLAU, NOV. 30, 1856.—My Dear Dwight: I have not forgotten the rash promise I made you as I shook your hand at parting, on a certain mellow day in October.

They say of us in New England that we have no Spring; and I have heard it remarked of Germany, it has no Fall. Now I believe it. I came upon the Rhine a few weeks since, just in the vintage time, rejoicing in summer attire; and here I am on the banks of the frozen Oder, with the thermometer at zero, and not yet clear of the skirts of autumn. You should see me toggled out in a coat of Russia dog, reaching to my heels, rough seal skin boots, and head gear to match. Such a rig is indispensable. Here let me note, in a Pickwickian way, a remarkable incident that fell under my observation while crossing the bridge of the Oder this afternoon. A score of half-famished crows, blacker than cats, were torturing a huge rat, which had by some means got upon the ice in the middle of the stream. A crowd soon collected to witness the fight. The excitement became intense. A squad of soldiers seemed particularly to enjoy it. It was a novel battle, and curiously fought, now in the air, now in the water, and anon upon the smooth surface of the ice. With Rat it was for life or death, and the odds were fearfully against him. At last he escaped miraculously by taking to the crevasses, where, for aught I know, he remains to this day. Mem: that on the frozen confines of Germany and Poland the rats and crows are ever at deadly feud. Haec fabula docet, &c.

But in the way of music. I think I sent you the programme of a recent Philharmonic Concert at Hamburg, which I was fortunate in being present to hear. This was the first of the series of four for the winter, and was dedicated to the memory of the lamented SCHUMANN, whose works were mainly performed on the occasion. By referring to the programme, you will see that JOACHIM and BRAHMS were the soloists. The cordial greeting with which these young artists were received by both orchestra and audience, showed the high appreciation in which they are held. An ode was spoken during the evening in eulogy of the gifted composer.

A like commemoration is shortly to be held in Dresden, and will be followed, I doubt not, in the other cities of Germany; for, however much Schumann was ridiculed and carped at while living, the mourning for him now is sincere and heartfelt.

Berlin promises to be particularly brilliant in opera this winter. The star ascendant is JOANNA WAGNER, as usual. Perhaps you will say I am wanting in good taste if I confess I did not like either the quality of her voice or her method of singing. But to me it seemed hard and unfeeling, lacking that sympathetic quality which is possessed in so eminent a degree by the great artists we have heard. Indeed, I am inclined to generalize this opinion, and apply it in the broadest sense to German solo-singing. Can there be any truth in a remark I find in a recent Medical Journal bearing on this point? (I had cut out and laid aside this paragraph for your special benefit, but have mislaid it.) It refers to the omni-prevalent habit of beer-drinking, to which the Germans as a nation are addicted, and attributes the degradation of their tenor voices, in particular, (so says Medicus,) to its deleterious effect. Such voices he styles the beer-barrel voice. It may be all a libel, but really I think I have recognized this beer-barrel voice not unfrequently of late.

While in the Dresden Gallery a few days since, my sense of hearing was suddenly aroused by the triumphant strains of a full military band in front of the guard house, on the opposite side of the street. You know I have somewhat of a fondness for good music of this nature. So I quitted the gallery and its gems of Art, for a time, for a nearer chance at the band. It numbered about sixty performers, and was composed wholly of brass, but had nevertheless a pleasing and mellow effect, not unusual in combinations of purely brazen ingredients. A nearer inspection explained the cause; for amongst the innumerable family of the Sax tribe I counted twelve French horns, half a dozen Kent bugles, and as many trombones, thus mollifying in no small degree the ordinary ensemble of our modern collection of crackling brass.

The treasures of the Dresden Gallery are seen to much greater advantage in the new building than was formerly the case. In particular, one is gratified that the incomparable San Sisto is now placed in a separate apartment, with due regard to the proper disposition of the picture and the comfort of the spectators. In the flood of light that can now be thrown upon the painting, it still retains, to all appearance, its original freshness and bloom. Miracle of Art indeed! The other most important works are likewise better placed than formerly.

LEIPZIG, Dec. 5.—This is the anniversary of MOZART's death, and the occasion is celebrated by the representation of Don Giovanni, as originally scored. Of course it was interesting and enjoyable, although the cast was indifferent; but I could not help thinking the Requiem would have been more appropriate. The orchestration was faultless. Could it be otherwise in Leipzig? The subscription lists to the Gewandhaus Concerts are as usual more than filled, and the casual visitor is fortunate if he obtains a foothold in the hall. The series for this season is to consist of twenty concerts, to be given weekly. This is in a town of 60,000 inhabitants—a condition of things which the "Athens" of the West would do well to imitate.

A brief interview with MOSCHELES was one of the pleasant things connected with my stay in Leipzig. Moscheles is now a man of some sixty-five or seventy years of age, cordial in his bearing and genial in disposition, as he is ripe in reputation and renown. His conversation very naturally soon turned upon BEETHOVEN. He spoke with enthusiasm of the great work of CRAWFORD in the Boston Music Hall, and of the liberality which could prompt an individual to bestow upon a public institution so priceless a gift. He showed me in his Album a well executed drawing of this statue, which he had placed among the cherished memorials of the great master. Of the work itself he spoke in terms of highest praise. As a likeness, so far as he could judge, it was satisfactory and correct—a little idealized in height, and in the form of the head, perhaps, but grandly expressive of the character and genius of the man. A bust of Beethoven, taken a couple of years before his death, was standing on a table hard by. In this and in our own statue, the stamp of the features is clearly the same. Of the odd little pen and ink sketch, so familiar to us at home, which Moscheles has also in his album, he remarked, it was too short and stumpy, and almost a caricature, though it still bears (as he thinks) a recognizable resemblance to the manner and figure of Beethoven as he walked the streets. But I have already exceeded the allotted limits of a letter. *

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 10, 1857.

First Philharmonic Concert.

In spite of the cold and driving snow-storm, and of the rival attraction of THALBERG at the Music Hall, Mr. CARL ZERRAHN's orchestra drew to the Melodeon about as many people as it could hold. The hall had indeed been "renovated" and made as clean and light as paint and gas could make it; and the familiar old place, scene of so many oratorios and concerts, had a right comfortable and cozy look. All the six hundred season subscribers were there, and we should think as many more. These persons reasoned, probably, as we did: much as they wished to hear Thalberg, they felt their first duty to be here. Not that they loved Thalberg less, but Beethoven more. We had made so many fruitless efforts to secure orchestral concerts, and only now at this late moment, thanks to Carl Zerrahn, had we the prize within our grasp: would it be fair, would it be loyal to the Art we honor, to desert him now? Besides, a Symphony concert, one of a regular winter's series, ranks among the indispensables, and should, and would in every truly musical city in the world, take precedence of any virtuoso solo concert, by whomsoever given.

But what Santa Claus miracle is this? We have breasted the wind and snow, and on presenting our tickets at the door, have them politely returned to us, as "good also for next time," while we are ushered in to await the explanation of the mystery. Pleasant rumors are afloat over the gay and crowded hall, and we sit in pleased expectation, till the well known faces of the orchestra are ranged before us, and Herr Conductor ZERRAHN advances amid hearty greetings to his desk. He waits till all is still and reads a little speech. He has been disappointed with regard to the solo attractions who had been announced with not a little rustling of newspapers; first OLE BULL, who was sick, and then the famous trumpeter, Herr SCHREIBER; (there was nothing there that wore the look of disappointment, we must say); he was at a loss to account for this defection, and rather than appear to have promised what he did not mean to fulfil, he would present this concert as complimentary to his subscribers, and let them retain their tickets for the regular series of four, commencing on the 24th. Meanwhile the place of Herr Schreiber's solos would be supplied by the overture to Freischütz and a violin solo of De Beriot kindly volunteered by Mr. SCHULTZE. This was indeed doing the handsome thing. By it Mr. Zerrahn sacrifices some four hundred dollars out of his own pocket, to establish his honor as a gentleman. But he places himself in so fine a position before the public, that, if that public knows how to be grateful, he cannot be a loser in the end. And what a bargain for us! exclaimed nine-tenths of the pleased subscribers; the noble Freischütz overture for a mere trumpet, with Schultze and De Beriot to boot! We give the programme, as amended:

- PART I.
1. Symphony No. 4 in B flat,..... Beethoven.
1. Adagio and Allegro molto.—2. Adagio.—3. Scherzo.—
4. Allegro ma non troppo.
2. Overture to "Freyschütz,"..... von Weber.

- PART II.
3. Grand Overture to Goethe's "Faust,"..... R. Wagner.
(First time in this country.)
Motto.

The God who dwells within my soul
Can heave its depths at any hour;
Who holds o'er all my faultless control
Has o'er the outer world no power;
Existence lies a load upon my breast,
Life is a curse, and death a long'd-for rest.

Brooks's translation.

4. Nocturne from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.
5. Chorus of Pilgrims from "Tannhäuser,"..... R. Wagner.
(First time in this city.)

Sung by a select choir of male voices.
Once more, dear home, I with rapture behold thee,
And greet the fields that so sweetly enfold thee!
Thou, pilgrim staff, may rest thee now,
Since I to God have fulfilled my vow.
By penance sore I have atoned,
And God's pure law my heart hath owned;
My pains hath He with blessing crowned:
To God my song shall aye resound!

His mercy shines on our weary probation;
Our souls shall share in the joys of salvation;
No fear have we of hell and death,
We'll praise our God while we have breath.
Hallelujah! hallelujah! forevermore, forevermore.

Once more, dear home, I with rapture behold thee, &c.

6. Solo for Violin,..... De Beriot.
By William Schultze.

7. Overture to "William Tell,"..... Rossini.

The concert went off with great spirit, and was highly relished. The orchestra numbered about thirty-five performers. The first violins comprised the six best artists in our city (viz: Messrs. SCHULTZE, SUCK, FRIES, MEISEL, GAERTNER, and ECKHARDT). This was a fine and effective body, almost too telling for that hall, and needing (as it seemed to us) to be balanced by a greater mass of middle strings. The violas were only three; the second violins four; the 'celli and double-basses three each. But Mr. Zerrahn had taken his pick, throughout, of the best players of their several instruments in Boston. We cannot say it was the best performance we have ever had here of the fourth Symphony; but it was on the whole a very good one—one of the best. It sounded exceedingly rich and clear, but needed larger space to subdue and blend the fresh tone-coloring more sweetly. For this is the sweetest, as well as the most love-impassioned, restless of Beethoven's symphonies. The melancholy, ruminating introduction, so full of profound feeling, and the fiery decision of the plunge into the Allegro, were brought out admirably. A little more of delicate shading on the part of the wind instruments, especially the brass, was all that the rest required. The Adagio was perhaps a trifle not slow enough; but how exquisitely it made its beauty felt, in spite of little blemishes; it was a great blemish, however, when it came the turn of the tympani to take up the throbbing figure which forms all along the groundwork of the melody; they were in no tune. The Scherzo needed more rehearsal to ensure perfection in the passages begun by one set of instruments and concluded by others; yet it had life and spirit; but the glorious wild freedom of the Finale was well preserved, with all its wealth of beauties. The old Freyschütz overture was finely performed, and after our long fasting of the orchestral appetite, keenly approved itself as still one of the matchless overtures.

WAGNER's "Faust" overture interested us far more deeply than we had anticipated. If we may peak from a single hearing, it is profound in sentiment, original in conception, logical in treatment, euphonious as well as bold in instrumentation, and marvellously interesting to the end, in spite of its sombre, restless monotony of feeling. It is not a dramatic overture; does not attempt to portray in contrasted themes the characters of Faust and Margaret and Mephistopheles, but confines itself to the illustration of a single passage in the poem, taken from Faust's second interview with Mephistopheles, in which, however, the key-note of the poem may be found; to-wit that feeling of the emptiness of life, that restless and unsatisfied yearning for the infinite, bordering on despair, of which Goethe makes his Faust the type, and which is expressed in the lines above cited as a motto, as well as in all the first part of the poem. The overture was originally written in Wagner's earlier days, in Paris, January 1840, and was re-wrought and published, at the suggestion of Liszt, in Zurich, his present place of exile, in 1855. In the preface to his three opera poems, Wagner refers to it as having been intended "to form only the first movement of a grand Faust symphony;" but nevertheless he has now published it as a Faust overture, complete in itself. We will not, without further hearing, attempt any minute description of the music. It seemed to fully satisfy its end; it spoke of the restless mood, the baffled aspiration, the painful, tragic feeling of the infinite amid the petty, changing limitations of this world, which every soul has felt too keenly, just in proportion to the depth and intensity of its own life, and its breadth of culture. Never did music seem more truly working in its own sphere, except when it presents the heavenly solution and sings all of harmony and peace. The overture suggests analogy, in tone and spirit, with such works as the Allegro of the 3rd minor Symphony, and that of the Choral Symphony, the overture to Coriolanus, &c., of Beethoven; there is something of the same sublime struggle of the soul with destiny. That Wagner's "Faust" can bear comparison in point of true imaginative genius, we will not venture to suggest. Such a work needs several hearings. The interpretation by the orchestra was certainly successful. We trust it will not at once be laid upon the shelf.

The Mendelssohn Notturmo, that delicious bit of rewin music, had lost nothing of its charm. It could pass for an intermezzo, remote enough in character, between the Faust yearnings and desires, and the Tannhäuser chorus of the Pilgrims who had found rest, and whose song therefore reathes the pure joy and satisfaction of the soul that has found God. We were all familiar with the strain as introduced in the beginning and conclusion of the overture. Here it is first sung (to words above) by male voices in the same rich four-part harmony, followed by hallelujahs, and then repeated in unison fortissimo, with the tremendous accompaniment of violin figures, as in the overture. It was finely sung by a select choir of about forty of our best male voices, which formed a very rich and musical body of tone, and achieved a decided triumph, being most eagerly encored.—Mr. Schultze's solo, and the "Tell" overture we were obliged to lose, to catch a few strains of THALBERG.

Thalberg in Boston.

We have at length our turn of the triumphal procession of "New School" pianism, now ripened and mellowed by somewhat of age, in the person of its first creator and exponent, into a thing of quiet and delicious beauty, as contrasted with the painful prodigies with which we have been dazzled by his imitators. The Pope himself, and not his simulacrum, rides in this carriage. So, in spite of the great snow-storm, all the world turned out to see and hear; and we entered the Boston Music Hall at a late hour, to find it filled from floor to ceiling with a gay, delighted looking crowd, many hundreds of whom, it was plain to see, were indebted to their Santa Claus too for free safe conduct through the snow to such a palace of light and warmth and melody. We entered just in time to catch the last strains of Madame D'ANGRI's third piece, (from Semiramide) and be surprised by a contralto voice, the richest, strongest, and most even in its quality, that we have heard since ALBONI'S. As we listened further, in her Cenrentola piece: Nacqui all'affanno and Non piu mesta, we were pleasantly aware of a singularly beautiful individuality of color in her (not the lowest) contralto tones—a quality that wooed attention irresistibly. The very low notes were more dry and juiceless than Alboni's; we never like them much in any one, and it is one little sign of an improving taste that these vocal monstrosities are not so sure to "bring the house down" as they once were. All her middle register is beautiful and rich and even, of remarkable volume; but on the confines of soprano the voice becomes hard and likes not to sustain a note. The execution was marvellously smooth and finished. Since Alboni, we have had no such passage singing by a contralto as those rapid variations of Non piu mesta. The slow cantabile, too, was full of expression. The whole style was large and generous, in keeping with the abundant figure and genial, good-natured, bright face of the singer. The coarse shout in the Spanish piece (in answer to the encore) somewhat broke the charm.

Then THALBERG came. That modest, quiet, self-possessed, well-bred, middle-aged English-looking gentleman, making his way across the stage as quietly as if he were the stillest retired scholar in the audience seeking his way to a seat, was he. If he can advance so quietly to do all that has been told of him, it is pretty certain he can do it. He had already played some three of his Fantasias on operatic themes—his peculiar specialité—and now touched a few chords of his Erard by way of prelude to his Barcarole, one of his most graceful pieces, which was followed by the Serenade from Don Pasquale, the everlasting sugar and watery serenade, to which we always pay the penalty of listening (as we do to bores) by having it come back and haunt us afterward involuntarily. But in Thalberg's playing the stale melody was refined to crystal clearness, and one enjoyed the pure beauty of sound without much thought of meaning. His graceful arabesque became the work of art that claimed attention and rewarded it, in spite of the subject which it played around. Sig. MORELLI, the fine baritone, sang once, and THALBERG closed the evening with variations upon L'Elisir d'Amore, a very brilliant piece, in which octaves with one hand ran as smoothly and easily as single scales. In all these things the execution was so perfect that the mind did not begin to analyze, or hardly ask itself what it was hearing; it might break the charm to ask a question. There was a singular completeness about it. The execution was perfect tion, the like of which we had not heard before. Each piece told its story so perfectly, that you forgot to ask how much it was all worth, as music—how many such it would take to weigh down a Beethoven Adagio, a Mendelssohn "Song without Words," a tone-reverie of Chopin, &c.; let all that go! Enough for the day is the beauty thereof, and here was a thing of exquisite beauty, which we will weigh when we have leisure, and when the spirit says we must. To Thalberg we could but be all ear, all sense of magical beauty of sound. It was enough to watch the sparkling combinations, without criticism, without thought of ulterior purpose, as we do rippling waters or the wheat-field running in waves before the wind. Those sometimes are profitable moments, though you can give no account of them. How long such charm may last we do not ask here. We were thankful for a new and exquisite sensation; and that it was to hear at last fully, perfectly done, and by the master of them all, what we have seen so many sweat and strain themselves to do but passably.

Now as the sensation was, of Thalberg there can nothing new be said. What first strikes you is the ease and quiet of his playing; it is the character of the whole man to his fingers' ends. The greatest difficulties are done so easily, you only know that they are difficult because you have heard others try them. The sense of difficulty is forgotten; Art has lifted you to its sphere of Freedom.

Next, the purity of the whole rendering, not disturbed by any show of effect. The composition is before you, pure and clear, without alloy of matter or machinery, as a musician hears it in his mind in reading it from notes. The engraving and the impression are alike perfect. There is nothing that you can criticize about the picture, unless it be the design itself.

Thirdly, perfect symmetry and proportion in everything; exquisite gradation of force; such crescendo and diminuendo as only the wind in the tree, or the surf on the beach has taught us; such masterly working up of climaxes, such continuity of form and beauty, such sure, decided, startling answer to each call for strong and bold effects, such artistic subduing and toning down of the whole, with only increase of power and freshness. And so on.

Next, let us say, thorough command of his instrument, perfect pianism. There stood the most perfect of piano-fortes, and there sat he, for when it had waited, and to whom it had grown, to bring out all its resources. Have we ever known a touch like his? Were not the fingers predestined to the keys? Have we ever heard such tone, wooed, coaxed, or struck out?—due to the player as well as the maker. Have we heard such crisp, cleanly cut, decisive chords, and almost of orchestral breadth? such absolute distinction between chords arpeggiated and chords struck at once! Or such liquid, even runs? or such consummate command of the pedals, winning beauties and excluding blurs,—an art which very, very few pianists quite possess? And so on through the whole chapter.

It is hardly necessary to speak of expression. How the theme, the melody stands out pronounced and personal in the midst of whatsoever whirl and complication of accompanying ornament! It sings itself in the middle, or at the top of the instrument as veritable soprano, tenor or baritone. The setting and illustration of the theme, are equally harmonious and well-conceived; but here we touch the peculiar province of Thalberg, the operatic Fantasia, the form of modern concert music which he has created and turned all the heads of young pianists with, at the same time that he has developed ideas and resources of pianism, which must dominate more or less henceforth in all the music written for that instrument. But we must postpone what we have to say of it, until we have room to speak of the second equally successful and almost equally crowded concert, of Thursday evening, when he played his Son-nambula, Don Giovanni and Lucrezia fantasias, besides his exquisitely, feverishly delicate, delirious Turanta-tella.

This evening Mr. Thalberg will appear also as an interpreter of classical music, and will play Beethoven's C minor Concerto, with the aid of Mr. Zerrahn's orchestra, besides a rich programme otherwise. His fourth and fifth concerts in Boston will be on Tuesday and Friday evenings next. He will play twice also before the children of the public schools, and is giving concerts nearly every evening in neighboring cities. On Sunday evening, the 18th inst., he proposes, with the aid of the Handel and Haydn Society, to give a Sacred Concert in the Music Hall, and produce Mozart's "Requiem"; Mmes. DEWILHORST and D'ANGRI, Sig. MORELLI, and a tenor (not yet named), to sing the solos.

Beethoven's Early Sonatas.

An esteemed correspondent expresses surprise that in our recent article "A. W. T." mentions but three Sonatas as composed in Beethoven's boyhood. There are six, he says, that the great composer wrote before the publication of his Trios, Op. 1, though he is unable to say that they are all embraced in the dedication to the Prince Bishop. "A. W. T." writes us upon this point as follows:

"You will see that the title which I translated says expressly, 'Three Sonatas,' &c., and three is the number in the original publication, which I have examined. That Beethoven wrote much music before the publication of the Trios Op. 1 is well known; it is also well known that but little of this music ever saw the light. Instead of rushing into print, he, at the age of 22, began at the very beginning, and went through an entire course of musical study anew with Albrechtsberger, before publishing his Opus 1, suppressing his youthful works.

"If your correspondent can produce more three youthful sonatas it would be a great gratification to me to know what they are and when composed. I have supposed that Wegeler's phrase, 'the sonatas copied into the Speiersche Blumenlese,' referred to the three with the dedication to the Elector. One early work, dedicated to Eleanore von Breuning, was left unfinished at the composer's death, and Ries wrote the conclusion.

"In the Thematic Catalogue, a valuable and very correct work, the three others, of which your correspondent speaks, are not given. If I can get a clue to something that has thus far escaped my inquiries, it will be gratefully acknowledged."

Musical Intelligence.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.—One of our exchanges speaks thus highly of a soirée given at the close of the term of the "Mendelssohn Musical Institute," established last year by Mr. EDWARD B. OLIVER:

The pieces, both vocal and instrumental, were exceedingly well executed, and the pupils displayed that thorough scholarship and classical taste which Mr. Oliver's style of teaching is so sure to produce. There was no extraordinary preparation for this occasion, nor any attempt at showing off, but just that mode of exhibition which shows what the pupil can do as an ordinary thing. We are glad to learn that the success of the institute more than fulfills the most sanguine expectations of its founders, and that it may be regarded as established on the firmest foundation. The novel plan of a school designed for the cultivation of music as the prominent study with the other elegant arts, the language and literature as accessories, seems to fill a place before vacant; and the superior manner in which the plan is executed, reflects much credit upon Mr. and Mrs. Oliver and their accomplished relative and assistant, Miss Merrill.

Sonatas by Beethoven and Mozart, songs by Mendelssohn, and Schubert, &c., formed part of the programme.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The Spy speaks of a forthcoming series of concerts, by Gustav Satter and the Boston "Quartet Club." What that club may be I know not with certainty. Although good singing is always acceptable, we may be allowed to wish that the types had erred for once, and that the club was the Quintette Club, to whom we used to listen in our more musical days, before "hard times" had frozen our hearts and tightened our purse-strings.—Palladium.

Foreign.

LONDON.—The Amateur Musical Society has entered upon its eleventh season. The first concert took place at the Hanover Square Rooms Dec. 1st. The News says of it:

Mr. Henry Leslie is the conductor of the orchestra. The strength of the orchestra is very great; no less than seventy-two stringed instruments, of which forty are violins alone; with a full complement of wind and brass, the whole amounting to ninety-five—a number much exceeding that of the bands of the Philharmonic Society or the Royal Italian Opera. In our opinion the violins are too numerous.

The concert of last night was made up of excellent materials, as will be seen by the following programme:

PART I.
Symphony in D. Beethoven.
Madrigal, "Hard by a fountain," A. D. 1550, Hubert Waelrent.
Part-song, "I saw lovely Phillis," R. L. Pea-sall.
By Mr. Henry Leslie's choir.
Overture (The Son and Stranger). Mendelssohn.
PART II.
Concerto in D minor, for piano-forte, Mozart.
Mr. S. W. Waley.
Song: "Within the Convent Garden," Thalberg.
Mr. Arthur D. Coleridge.
Madrigal: "In going to my lonely bed," A. D. 1550, Richard Edwardes.
Part-song: "Departure," Mendelssohn.
By Mr. Henry Leslie's choir.
Overture: (La Fille du Régiment), Donizetti.

This was a most agreeable mixture of ancient and modern, vocal and instrumental; and the performance was not less pleasant than the selection.

M. JULLIENS CONCERTS.—There is nothing particular to record in the past week's doings, except the Mendelssohn Festival, which took place last night. Miss Juliana May continues to sing "Ernani involami," and the scene from Betty, varied with other popularities from the Italian repertory. The Traviata selection has been alternated with the Travatore. The capital quadrille from Pietro il Grande has been revived, and various changes have taken place in the solo performances. The programme of the Mendelssohn Festival comprised the overture to Ruy Blas; "Song of Night," Miss Dolby; First Piano-forte Concerto, Miss Arabella Goddard; Symphony in A minor; Violin Concerto, M. Le Hon; and Wedding March from A Midsummer Night's Dream.

On Wednesday Sig. Andreoli, the Italian pianist, and pupil of the late Fumigalli, performed twice with great applause. His first piece was Thalberg's Elisir, which being encored, Sig. Andreoli played his eternal and by no means brilliant study for the left hand alone. In the second part he "had a shy" at Léopold de Meyer's Marche Marocaine; but his own polka, which was substituted on his being recalled, flows much more easily under the supple fingers of Sig. Andreoli.—Mus. World, Dec. 6.

DRURY LANE THEATRE, (From the Times, Dec. 3.)—Last night Beethoven's Fidelio was given, and, in spite of a vast many deficiencies, excited a degree of interest which, with an audience to whom fine music signifies something more than "tinkling cymbal," can be raised by no other opera except Don Giovanni.

On the present occasion, the execution of Fidelio was anything but perfect. Nevertheless, there was really so much to commend that to miss it would have been to miss a genuine treat. This praise, however, applies almost exclusively to the three principal performers:—Madame Rüdersdorff (Fidelio), Herr Reichardt (Florestan), and Herr Formes (Rocco). All three are versed in the pure German traditions, and consequently follow as closely as possible the recorded intentions of the composer. Besides which, all three are artists, both in a musical and histrionic sense, and artists as conscientious as they are able.

The other four personages we have seen better represented than last night. The ensemble, except in the concerted music of the prison scene, where Leonora, Florestan, and Rocco are prominent, was rarely satisfactory; the band—though cleverly conducted by Herr Anschuetz, and containing in a large measure the elements of efficiency—was seldom exactly what could have been wished in an opera like Fidelio; the chorus still more seldom. The impressive invocation of the prisoners was, to use a very homely word, "muddled;" and, though some passages of the magnificent finale went far better and produced a far greater effect, others were anything but perfect. The opera was played with dialogue (as composed), the principal singers using the German tongue, the chorus a language of their own.

HAMBURG.—A friend, who was present, sends us the programme of "the one hundred and eleventh Philharmonic Private Concert," (first of a series of four this winter,) given in the Wörner'schen Concertsaale, on the evening of Saturday, Nov. 22, in memory of the lamented ROBERT SCHUMANN. There was an orchestra of fifty, and a chorus of sixty or eighty voices. The soprani were all dressed in black, and the front of the stage hung with festoons of white lace on a black ground. The selections were mostly from Schumann's compositions:

PART I.
1—Chorus from Handel's "Judas Macabæus."
2—Eulogy, by Robert Heller, spoken by Herr Jauner.
3—Overture to "Manfred," by Schumann.
4—Chaconne, for the violin, by J. S. Bach, played by Concert-master Joachim.
5—Piano Concerto of Schumann, in A minor, played by Herr Brahms.

PART II.
1—Requiem for Mignon, by Schumann.
2—Fantasia for Violin, with Orchestra, by Schumann, performed by Herr Joachim.
3—Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven.

FRANKFORT AM MAIN.—On the 10th of Dec. was given the second and last Soirée of the Parisian Quintet Society, formed six years since for the performance of Beethoven's posthumous Quartets. It consists of Messrs. MAURIN (1st violin) SABATIER (2d do.) MAS (alto), and CHEVILLARD (violin-cello), all members of the imperial chapel. Herr A. BUHL assisted as pianist. The programme consisted of three works of Beethoven, viz: Quartet in C minor, op. 131; Trio for Piano, violin and 'cello, in D major; and Quartet in C major, op. 69, No. 3. The hall in which the soirée was given is one of the large hotels of Frankfort (Holländische Hof), which holds 300 to 400 persons, and is, by accident or design, a most excellent music room. On this occasion it was filled to overflowing with a delighted audience.

Advertisements.

THALBERG'S CONCERTS.

CARD OF THE MANAGEMENT.—It has been the intention of the Management to give in Boston only FIVE Concerts, (two of which have already taken place,) and to play on the off nights in the neighboring cities. The fatigue, however, accruing to the artists from daily travel in such an unpropitious season, as well as the uncertainty of their arriving at the requisite time, have induced the following change. The series has been extended to FOUR MORE CONCERTS, instead of three, which will take place in rapid succession, viz: The Third on SATURDAY, January 10; the Fourth on TUESDAY, Jan. 13; the Fifth on FRIDAY, Jan. 16; the Sixth (Sacred) on SUNDAY, Jan. 18. In consequence of which the price of admission has been put at ONE DOLLAR to all parts of the Hall. Seats secured without any extra charge. In addition to the above Concerts Mr. Thalberg will give TWO FREE CONCERTS to the Pupils of the Public Schools on Monday Jan. 12, and Saturday Jan. 17.

On SATURDAY, January 10, THALBERG and D'ANGRI'S third appearance. An engagement has been entered into with Mr. Zerrahn and his Orchestra, from the Philharmonic Concerts, which will enable Mr. Thalberg to perform, with full Orchestral accompaniments, Beethoven's Concerto in C Minor on one of Chickering & Sons' Grand Piano Fortes. In addition to which he will play his Fantasia on Maianello and the Prayer of Moses. Madame D'Angri will sing selections from Don Giovanni, The Marriage of Figaro, Scmiramida, and Cenerentola. The Orchestra will play Overtures from Der Freischütz, William Tell, and March from the Prophète, and the Andante from Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. Admission to all parts of the Hall, $1. Seats may be secured without any extra charge, at Russell & Richardson's, 232 Washington street, on Friday and Saturday. All seats unsold may be had in the evening at the door.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's FIFTH CONCERT

Will take place on TUESDAY, Jan. 12, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms, assisted by Mrs. J. H. LONG, Vocalist.
Mozart's Clarinet Quintette.—a new Quartette by Haydn, and other One works, for which see programme.
Half package of Four Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $2.50; Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

PHILHARMONIC COIRÉES.

GUSTAVE SATTER'S SECOND SOIRÉE will take place at the Rooms of Messrs. HALL, DAVIS & CO., No. 409 Washington St., On WEDNESDAY EVENING, Jan. 21st, When he will be assisted by Mr. WILLIAM MASON, the eminent pianist, and other distinguished artists.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE SECOND CONCERT, being the first of the regular series of four, will be given on Saturday Evening, Jan. 24, 1857. Subscription Lists may be found at the principal music stores, where also tickets can be obtained. Packages of 4 tickets, $3; single ticket $1.
CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

NOTICE.

THE members of the ORPHEUS Glee Club respectfully inform their friends and subscribers, that their FIRST Concert of the Series of Three, will take place at

Mercantile Hall, 16 Summer street,

On SATURDAY, Jan. 17, 1867,

on which occasion they will be kindly assisted by

Miss LUCY A. DOANE,

Mr. HUGO LEONHARD, pianist, and

Mr. WILLIAM SCHULTZE, Violinist.

AUGUST KREISSMANN, DIRECTOR.

Single Tickets, to be had at the door on the evening, 50 cts. Concert to commence at 7 1/4 o'clock precisely.

NEW MUSIC.—The following compositions for the Piano-Forte, by Herr R. GOLDBECK, have just been received, and are offered for sale by C. BREUSING, No. 701 Broadway.

R. GOLDBECK—'Souvenir de Faverolles,' Mélodie Etude. op. 11

'L'Amazone,' Mazourka. op. 12

'Galop de Jeanne.' op. 16

'AQUARELLES'—12 pensées musicales. op. 18

1. Souvenir de Cheshwick.

2. Souvenir de Brighton.

3. Ma Barque.

4. Tendresse.

5. Nocturne élégiaque.

6. Jours passés.

7. Pleurs et soupirs d'amour.

8. Mélancolie, Prière, Rêve de bonheur.

9. Barcarolle.

10. Ma chanson.

11. Promenade sous les châtaigniers.

12. Une nuit étoilée.

'La cavalcade'—Etude de bravoure. op. 19

'Myocotis'—Méditation musicale. op. 20

'Veneria'—Scène de Lagunes. op. 21

'La Prophète'—Grand Fantaisie de Concert (Hommage à Fr. Liszt). op. 22

'Il Trovatore'—Fantaisie dramatique. op. 23

'L'abandonné'—Morceau de Fantaisie. op. 25

'Overture to his OPERA COMIQUE THE 'SOLDIER'S RETURN' (arranged for the piano by the author himself). op. 26

'Scène sur le lac de Genève'—..... op. 27

'Chant de jeune fille'—..... op. 28

'Souvenir d'Appony'—Polka Masourka. op. 29

'Valse interrompue'—..... op. 30

'Lille'—Polka Masourka. op. 31

'Day-Dream'—Impromptu. op. 32

'La Complainte'—Mélodie russe. op. 33

'Dans les montagnes'—..... op. 34

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,

At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1867. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians, with Mr. CARL ZERNER as Conductor. Further particulars hereafter.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

MR. JOHN C. HAYNES is admitted as a partner in my house from this date. The style of the firm will be OLIVER DITSON & CO.

Boston, Jan. 1, 1867.

OLIVER DITSON.

ONE OF A THOUSAND
OF THE FAVORABLE OPINIONS RESPECTING
THE GOLDEN WREATH.

An Eminent Teacher of Music at the West writes as follows: "I think the Golden Wreath a treasure, and am sanguine of having it introduced in the public schools of this city. I shall distribute a dozen for inspection, and in the mean time dispose of One Hundred copies to my select classes, which please send me," &c. &c.

The Tenth Thousand is now ready. Price, 30 cents. $3 per dozen.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co. 115 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.

Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices.

THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbault, a few copies.

Just received, a small invoice of MAYER FLUTES.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,

Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—(Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 18. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue. $1 68

" 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction. 1 68

" 3. Fête on Choir and Chorus Singing. 88

" 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School. 21

" 5. Crotch's Treatise on Harmony. 68

" 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough

Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction.

Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents.

Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards. 2 68

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church,)

ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.

ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,

(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 88 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,

ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO-FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

NEW'S

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION

PIANO-FORTE,

Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.

NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line. 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line. 5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion. $12.00
do each subsequent. $6.00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 250.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 16.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Mozart's Requiem.

[The following account of the origin of the "Requiem" was contributed to Novello's Musical Times, (London,) by Mr. E. HOLMES, the author of the excellent English Life of Mozart. As we have not before published any version of the familiar story, and as we are now about to have the Requiem performed in Boston, (thanks to Mr. TRALBERG,) we have no doubt that it will interest our readers. There is no better version of the story, and the accompanying remarks will help prepare the listener for a right understanding of the music. This, however, is but the introductory chapter to an extended critical analysis of the whole composition, which we may perhaps find reason to transfer to our columns hereafter.]

During the twelve years which Mozart spent at Vienna, on his removal from Salzburg, his genius had borne the fruits of these preparatory studies (his earlier Masses) principally in secular music, for the stage, the orchestra, and the chamber; and, except the Mass in C minor, composed the year after his marriage, which now forms the ground work of Davidde Penitente, he had rendered no tribute to the church—though this nursing mother, who had brought him up to maturity under her especial care, maintained his interest and affection. On the vicissitudes of his public life at Vienna we might still think with some degree of indignation and grief, were it not better to

Let determined things
To destiny hold unbewailed their way.

Without the antecedents of such a career, we could not have possessed the Requiem, which owes its chief peculiarities and impassioned style to the circumstances under which it was produced; the mind bright and unimpaired, the body wasting,—the hand of death tracing notes in which the composer fully believed he was celebrating his own obsequies, and bidding final adieu to earth and its concerns.

The history of the composition of the Requiem is too familiar to be repeated: we all know what tender domestic scenes and embarrassments it occasioned—how Mozart worked at it sometimes to swooning—how often the score was taken from him by his wife, and again, at his earnest solicitation, returned, to be finally completed by the time when he took to his death-bed; his imagination being through the whole period filled with fatal presentiments and images of the other world—that he had received a supernatural commission—that his health was undermined by poison—with other 'sick men's dreams.' He appears to have been surprised by the sudden summons; he thought how young he was to die, estimating life by years rather than by sensations—forgetting that he had compressed in thought, feeling, and action, three lives into one—forgetting the nine hundred works which he had composed—the night how often turned into day by him, for business or pleasure—the masquerades, the balls, and the occasional convivial excesses in which he had shared with the actors; for all which, as it may have been too much on either side, the laws of our mechanical being demand a reckoning, and even the favored Mozart could claim no exemption. Preoccupied with the effort to understand his own genius, and with the desire to accomplish what seemed open to him in music, he seems in his personal conduct to have acted at times with an indifference to consequences, which the enthusiasm of youth and the abstract character of his pursuits may alone explain, if not quite excuse.

It was in the autumn of 1791, when his health had suffered a serious change, though it at first occasioned no ground for alarm, that he received a commission from some unknown hand to compose a Requiem, which was to be in his best manner, and entirely in the style which he himself approved. For what purpose the original possessor of the work treated for it in the manner he did, making no restrictions on him from retaining a score, or even publishing it when he thought fit, remains to this day a mystery. We have heard a Count Wallsegg named as this individual 'stranger.' Desiring to celebrate the anniversary of the decease of a lady whom he had tenderly loved, by the performance of a Requiem exclusively his own, he procured this; some say that he wished it to pass as his own composition—a dangerous fraud if he had done nothing, and still more if the contrary: but to this story we give no heed, for his first business in such an attempt should have been to destroy all traces of Mozart's handwriting; and even then his secret must have remained in jeopardy, from the free intercourse with his friends and family which the composer always maintained while writing. Instead of finding base and unworthy motives for the instigator of the Requiem—accusations which bear with them their own refutation—we can only express the obligation of the world to him, and wish that Mozart had earlier found so discerning a patron.

The composer himself innocently founded the tale of mystery which has circulated with his Requiem—the origin of which may be distinctly traced to the excited and gloomy imagination which accompanied his sickness. That a rich and tasteful nobleman who knew Mozart's power of writing in the most elevated style of sacred music, should wish to possess a Requiem by him was not wonderful; but that, in treating for it, he concealed his name, paid handsomely beforehand and transacted the whole affair through the agency of one who seemed to watch Mozart and to come upon him at unexpected times and places, was strange, and appeared to the composer almost supernatural. He was haunted from time to time by the presence of a man whose sole care seemed to be the Requiem; and this mysterious figure approached him just as he was stepping into the carriage which conveyed him to Prague, to compose La Clemenza di Tito. With his head and heart full of the beautiful melodies which distinguish that opera, the disagreeable effect of such an apparition—the train of ideas called up by it—may be imagined. "Who can it be that is thus earnest on this ghastly funeral theme? Certainly a messenger from the other world, and he foretells my death." Thus reasoned on false grounds the sick Mozart, and he arrived at a right conclusion by the instinct which is beyond reason.

Another circumstance brought to this application for the Requiem a kind of supernatural interest. Mozart had all his life been secretly wishing for the opportunity of composing one, and now it occurred almost miraculously, and just as he could have desired. The subject coincided exactly with his frame of mind in failing health, and the composer, who had been educated among theologians, and in the strictest observances of his community, was eager for the opportunity of once more doing honor to that church of which he had been of late a lax and somewhat pardonable member.* He knew that the first privilege of composing for the church is independence of the public and freedom from the prejudices of taste and fashion; and to be able to write his best without fear or hesitation was, to him who had sacrificed himself continually to others, a rare and much desired opportunity. Possibly, also, he thought with humility that his good works might deserve the favor of heaven—that voca me cum benedictis, the humble prayer of his music, might be fulfilled on his own behalf, and that at the general consummation he might himself, though unworthy, be admitted to nestle among the wings of the angels. The composition breathes these feelings; though suppliant and religious, it is full of human passion,—it casts a longing, lingering look at the past, amidst the terrors of the future,—it is, in fact, Mozart revolving his experience of life, and lost in a dream of the final Judgment, with feelings which he was the first to express in the mysterious language of music.

All the incidents of the fatal autumn which put a period to Mozart were deeply impressed on the memory of his widow and her sister; and when, in the early part of the present century, the score was published, the story of the 'stranger,' drawn out in form and detail, and adapted to the popular taste, circulated with it. Advantage was taken of the mystery to excite the public to an interest in a work whose intrinsic merit needed no adventitious aid. The taste for music and the fame of Mozart were not, however, general enough at this period to support the expensive publication of a great score. And now came a matter tending more to embarrass opinion and involve the origin of the work in obscurity. A claim was put in by another hand to a share in the composition. A musician in habits of intimacy with Mozart, and who assisted him in filling up the accompaniments of some of his later scores—a man named Süßmayer, who had accompanied him to Prague to perform this office for La Clemenza di Tito, which was dispatched in a fortnight—presented himself as the author of a part, from the Sanctus to the end. Unreasonable as these pretensions to some of the greatest beauties of the work appeared, from a composer known only by one obscure opera, called The Mirror of Arcadia, there was no one to contradict them. A work had been published complete, of which only two fragments of the score were known to exist in the composer's handwriting—one possessed by the Abbé Stadler, and the other by Eybler. Mozart's widow confirmed, according to the best of her recollection, the statement of Süßmayer, and believed that he completed the score of the Requiem which was delivered to the 'stranger'; and it must be pardoned in her, if, in her distracted condition respecting her husband, she was not very attentive to, or not very accurately informed respecting, his works.

* In the records preserved by Rochlitz of Mozart's conversations at Leipzig, amidst familiar friends, on his northern tour, about three years before his death, his attachment to the Catholic religion is strongly manifested. Had he lived to enter upon the office of Kapellmeister of St. Stephen, we should most probably have received from him a new collection of Masses with complete orchestral accompaniment.

The Requiem began to be known in England to musicians soon after the first introduction of Don Giovanni, when Mozart became an object of general curiosity and interest. It came over to us with its full quota of rumors. Mozart was believed to have died during the composition, and some, indulging their speculations on this head, would fain point out the chord at which the pen dropped from his hand. To confirm this idea of death having overtaken the composer at his task, we have been shown the last movement made out of the materials, and nearly a repetition of the opening—whence it was argued that a man so full of ideas would not have resorted to that expedient had he possessed his usual powers and free-will. But in this opinion a common habit of Mozart's of connecting the end with the beginning of compositions—since become of great authority in music—is overlooked. That this was done by him with deliberation and choice, we have since had proof.

No one in England gave credit to Süßmayer's claim to have composed the Sanctus. There were his words of assertion on the one side, and Mozart's notes to confront them on the other—an overwhelming evidence. Who could believe that the sublimity of the Sanctus, or the sweetness and elevation of the Benedictus—although this last is newly and most unusually scored—could have any origin but in the mind of Mozart? And yet there were Germans who until within these few years affected to believe the truth of Süßmayer, and to doubt the authenticity of the Requiem as a genuine work of Mozart, from the secular taste of the melody displayed in some of its movements—in the close of the Tuba Mirum, for example—for which it was affirmed that any other composer than Mozart would have received the castigation of criticism. The beginning of Handel's Funeral Anthem for Queen Caroline, as also the subject of a fugue from Joshua, were quoted to show that the subjects of the introduction and fugue were not quite original. There certainly is a slight—possibly an accidental similarity. While musicians were enjoying the beauties of the Requiem, the musical critics of Germany, with the late M. Gottfried Weber at their head, were engaged in a long profitless discussion concerning its genuineness, on which one little fact has since rendered all their reasonings nugatory. The discovery of a full score of the Requiem, in Mozart's handwriting, was notified in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, No. 5, for Jan. 1839, with the promise of a dissertation on the same from Herr Hofrath von Mosel.* This fortunate event silenced all question as to its authenticity, and reduced the contention of those who would still dispute to a mere point of taste. It was one thing to maintain that the work was not genuine, because no complete score existed—another to contend that Mozart had failed in parts confessed to have been written by him. A secular character in some of the melodies was chiefly blamed; and, by implication, Beethoven even seems to cast a slur on this work, when, in writing to Cherubini, he observes, that should he compose a Requiem, his design of composition would be the one he should adopt. That Cherubini's Requiem, founded on the old church music, is more gothic, passionless, and ecclesiastical, cannot be denied—but this same quality, in as far as it is imitative, rendering the work rather one of combination and study than of original power, detracts from its merit. Productions in Art take their standing through the force of invention which gave them birth; whatever has been once magnificently done cannot be repeated, and all works formed on acknowledged models and styles bear a feeble existence.

* See Journal of Music, No. 10, Vol. IX., for this dissertation.

Let us, in endeavouring to appreciate the Requiem, try to approach it from the composer's point of view. That the models of the severe church style are here in part superseded, is at once confessed. To have kept within the limits of custom and authority, would have been to have surrendered the opportunity; and, as all the later productions of Mozart—operas, symphonies, &c., are memorable commencements in different styles of music, in which he, as pioneer of the art, opened paths of unexplored novelty and effect, he was naturally desirous to carry this on into church music. All his boyish studies in fugue and canon—all that art of counterpoint which had been growing stronger in him from year to year at Vienna, but which only broke out occasionally in his operas, being there held in subjection to melody and dramatic effect—flourished in the Requiem as in a fitting soil. Handel's art of double counterpoint is even outdone; we have the same depth of learning—the same elaborate contrivance, with more refinement and effect. As a fugue writer, Mozart was by nature so strong, that, had he lived in the time of Sebastian Bach, he might have been his rival. His part writing shows the natural clearness of his mind, and profound insight into the problems of harmony. He knew his strength, and rejoiced in it.

At Vienna, Van Swieten and other patrons of Mozart carried the taste for Handel and Bach's counterpoint to the court; and the writings of Mozart at this period were greatly modified and influenced by these scientific predilections. He quitted now the method he had pursued in his Salzburg Masses, and sought out subjects which could be treated in double fugue, and inverted above or below according to the received methods. His first sacred production written at Vienna, David's Penitence, exhibits this change, and the ascendancy of learned counterpoint. The opening chorus, if we remember, has subjects which invert three several times, and there is one duet wholly in canon.

The contrapuntal and profoundly scientific forms of the movements of the Requiem form a very striking feature of that production. Had these, however, exhibited merely new combinations of the old art of counterpoint, they would not have satisfied Mozart. He blended the severe old style with what was new and beautiful in the art of modern times, and made both in the highest degree subservient to expression. The melodies are so flowing and so natural, even when they move in canon, that the ear is unconscious of the restraint of rule. Hundreds receive delight from the symmetry, which they perceive in the construction of the movements of the Requiem, who cannot trace the cause of their pleasure in the scientific forms of composition employed. One of the most wonderful qualities of Mozart's mind was certainly his power of fusion. He could melt the old into the new—he could be Handel or Bach at will, and show his own lineaments blended with theirs. The peculiar instrumentation of the Requiem, in which solemn and sombre wind instruments alone are used, affords another interesting aspect of the science of the composer. But science and taste in combination merely contribute towards the poetical design. The Requiem may be considered as a kind of tragic drama, the action and scenery of which are left to the imagination. It combines the old church music, with the dramatic effect of the serious opera, and has introduced into music a perfectly new creation.

(Continued from page 114.)

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Gleaned from HAZOT'S BELLIOUS.)

THE CLARINET.

Simple reed instruments, such as the clarinet, and the corno di bassetto, form a family, whose connection with that of the hautboy, is not so near as might be thought. That which distinguishes it especially, is the nature of its sound. The middle notes of the clarinet are more limpid, more full, more pure than those of double reed instruments, the sound of which is never exempt from a certain tartness or harshness, more or less concealed by the player's skill. The high sounds of the last octave, commencing with the C above the staff, partake only a little of the tartness of the hautboy's loud sounds; while the character of the lower sounds approach, by the roughness of their vibrations, to that of certain notes on the bassoon.

Four registers are reckoned on the clarinet: the low, the chalumeau, the medium, and the high.

The first comprises this part of the scale:

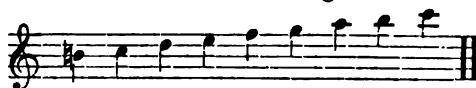

The second, this:

These notes are generally dull.

The third contains the following notes:—

And the fourth is found in the remainder of the scale up to the highest D.

The small clarinet in F (high), which was formerly employed in military music, has been almost abandoned for that in E♭, which is found, and with reason, to be less screaming, and quite sufficient for the keys ordinarily used in wind instrument pieces. Clarinets have proportionally less purity, sweetness, and clearness, as their key is more and more removed above that of B♭, which is one of the finest on the instrument. The clarinet in C is harder than that in B♭, and its voice has much less charm. The small clarinet in E♭ has piercing tones, which it is very easy to render mean, beginning from the A above the staff. Accordingly it has been employed, in a modern symphony, in order to parody, degrade, and blackguardize (if I may be pardoned the expression) a melody; the dramatic intention of the work requiring this strange transformation. The small clarinet in F has a still more marked tendency of the same kind. In proportion as the instrument becomes lower, on the contrary, it produces sounds more veiled and more melancholy.

It has been said that the clarinet has four registers; each of these registers has also a distinct quality of tone. That of the high register is somewhat tearing, which should be used only in the fortissimo of the orchestra (some very high notes may nevertheless be sustained piano, when the effect of the sound has been properly prepared); or in the bold passages of a brilliant solo. Those of the chalumeau and medium registers are suited to melodies, to arpeggios, and to smooth passages; and the low register is appropriate—particularly in the holding notes—to those coldly threatening effects, those dark accents of motionless rage, which Weber so ingeniously invented. If it be desired to employ with salient effect those piercing cries of the extreme upper notes, and if it be dreaded for the performer a too sudden advent of the dangerous note, this introduction of the clarinet should be hidden beneath a loud chord from the whole of the orchestra; which,—interrupting itself the moment the sound has had time to settle firmly and become clear,—leaves it then fully displayed without danger.

The character of the sounds of the medium register, imbued with a kind of loftiness tempering a noble tenderness, renders them favorable for the expression of sentiments and ideas the most poetic. A frivolous gaiety, and even an artless joy, seem alone unsuited to them. The clarinet is little appropriate to the Idyl; it is an epic instrument, like horns, trumpets, and trombones. Its voice is that of heroic love: and if masses of brass instruments, in grand military symphonies, awaken the idea of a warlike troop covered with glittering armour marching to glory or death, numerous unisons of clarinets, heard at the same time, seem to represent the beloved women, the loving heroines, with their proud eyes, and deep affection, whom the sound of arms exalts; who sing while fighting, and who crown the victors, or die with the defeated. I have never been able to hear military music from afar, without being profoundly moved by that feminine quality of tone in the clarinets, and struck by images of this nature, as after the perusal of ancient epic poems. This beautiful soprano instrument, so ringing, so rich in penetrating accents, when employed in masses, — gains, as a solo, in delicacy, evanescent shadowings, and mysterious tenderness, what it loses in force and powerful brilliancy. Nothing so virginal, so pure, as the tint imparted to certain melodies by the tone of a clarinet played in the medium by a skilful performer.

It is the one of all the wind instruments, which can best breathe forth, swell, diminish, and die away its sound. Thence the precious faculty of producing distance, echo, an echo of echo, and a twilight sound. What more admirable example could I quote of the application of some of these shadowings, than the dreamy phrase of the clarinet, accompanied by a tremolo of stringed instruments, in the midst of the Allegro of the overture to Freischütz? Does it not depict the lonely maiden, the forester's fair betrothed, who, raising her eyes to heaven, mingles her tender lament with the noise of the dark woods agitated by the storm?—O Weber!!

Beethoven, bearing in mind the melancholy and noble character of the melody in A major of the immortal Andante in his 7th Symphony, and in order the better to render all that this phrase contains at the same time of passionate regret, has not failed to consign it to the medium of the clarinet. Gluck, for the ritornello of Alceste's air, "Ah, malgré moi, &c.," had at first written a flute; but perceiving, doubtless, that the quality of tone of this instrument was too weak, and lacked the nobleness necessary to the delivery of a theme imbued with so much desolation and mournful grandeur, gave it to the clarinet. It is still the clarinets which play simultaneously with the voice, that other air of Alceste replete with sorrowful resignation, "Ah, divinités implacables."

An effect of another kind results from three slow notes of the clarinets in thirds in the air of Œdipus, "Votre cour devient mon azile." It is after the conclusion of the theme, that Polynice, before beginning his air, turns towards the daughter of Theseus, and adds, as he looks at her, "Je connus, &c." These two clarinets in thirds, descending softly previous to the commencement of the voice part, at the moment when the two lovers interchange a tender regard, have an excellent dramatic meaning, and produce an exquisite musical result. The two instrumental voices are here an emblem of love and purity. One fancies, in listening to them, that one beholds Eryphile modestly casting down her eyes. It is admirable!

Neither Sacchini, nor Gluck, nor any of the great masters of that time availed themselves of the low notes of the instrument. I cannot guess the reason. Mozart appears to be the first who brought them into use, for accompaniments of a serious character such as that of the trio of masks, in Don Giovanni. It was reserved for Weber to discover all that there is of terrible in the quality of tone of these low sounds, when employed in sustaining sinister harmonies. It is better, in such a case, to write them in two parts, than to place the clarinets in unison or in octave. The more, then, that the notes of the harmony are numerous, the more striking will be the effect.

THE BASS CLARINET.

Lower still than the preceding, is an octave below the clarinet in B \flat ; there is another in C, however (an octave below the clarinet in C); but that in B \flat is much more usual. As it is always the same instrument,—constructed on larger dimensions,—as the ordinary clarinet, its compass remains much the same. Its reed is a little weaker and more covered than that of the other clarinets. The bass clarinet is evidently not destined to replace in the upper notes the high clarinets; but, certainly, to extend their compass below. Nevertheless, very beautiful effects result from doubling, in the octave below, the high notes of the B \flat clarinet, by a bass clarinet.

According to the manner of writing it, and the talent of the performer, this instrument may borrow that wild quality of tone which distinguishes the bass notes of the ordinary clarinet, or that calm, solemn, and sacerdotal accent belonging to certain registers of the organ. It is therefore of frequent and fine application; and moreover, if four or five be employed in unison, it gives a rich, excellent sonorosity to the orchestral basses of the wind instruments.

THE CORNO DI BASSETTO.

Would not otherwise differ from the alto clarinet in F (low) than by the little brass bell mouth which elongates its lower extremity, were it not that it has besides the faculty of descending chromatically as far as the C, a third below the lowest note of the clarinet.

Like those of the bass-clarinet, the low notes of the corno di bassetto are the finest and the most marked in character.

Mozart has used this fine instrument in two parts for darkening the coloring of his harmonies in his Requiem; and has assigned to it some important solos in his opera of La Clemenza di Tito.

[To be continued.]

A Protest against Bad Manners.

To the Editor of the New York Tribune.

SIR—I am a quiet, middle-aged person, with a love of music, but of late I have kept away from the Philharmonic Concerts on account of the difficulty of quietly enjoying the excellent entertainment offered there. On Saturday night, however, having heard that efforts would be made to preserve order, I went again. The crowd was great, and I was glad to see it; such concerts ought to draw together a multitude. But I am sorry to say that the behavior of the people in the vicinity of the seat where ill fortune placed me was quite indecent. A group of young men and women, dressed expensively, and, to all appearance, supposing themselves to belong to good society, persisted in chattering aloud or in noisy whispers during the performance. Every one near them was disturbed, and an indignant gentleman, who seemed to be a foreigner, angrily hissed at them once or twice, which for a moment arrested their ill behavior. What they deserved was, to be taken at once to the Police Station and punished in a way to teach them better. For one, I can't conceive of worse breeding than is manifested by a great proportion of our young New Yorkers of both sexes on such occasions. Silly, noisy, impertinent and careless of others, they are only fit to be shut up in barrels, as Carlyle recommends for such nuisances, or spanked and sent to bed. The door-keepers of places of public amusement should never allow them to enter, or there should be a sufficient police force present to make them conduct properly. The worst manners I ever suffered from I have had to endure at the Philharmonic Concerts and at the opera, from people who plume themselves on their gentility, and yet take the very time when a piece of music is being performed which everybody wants to hear, to talk and laugh in a way to disturb and provoke all within the sound of their voices. If they go to these places merely because it is fashionable, can't they at least have the decency to keep still while those who go for the music are listening to it? Your obedient servant,

AN INDIGNANT AMATEUR.

Mozart and Wagner.

From Mr. FRY's criticism in the Tribune on the last New York Philharmonic concert we copy the following characteristic observations:

The first piece last night was Mozart's symphony, called Jupiter. The dominant good sense and good taste of the composer are shown in this work. His Italian vocal studies—his melodic training in setting music to Italian metres, which every composer must do in a thousand ways to arrive at the ineffable grace of the school, and the only school of singing, whether of the voice or its mimic, the orchestra—these all are beautifully displayed in this so-called Jupiter symphony. To the aspirant for musical reputation as composers in this country, we would give a word of advice, as we receive in the course of the year evidences of the awakening talent in that direction. We would say, if they wish to arrive at the mode of constructing musical phrases, of making a vocal statement, whether for the singer or for a performer on an instrument, let them study the Italian school of vocality, as exhibited in the most successful writers, whether for voices or instruments. Thalberg said to us the other day: "As a beginning for playing the piano and composing, I studied Italian singing for five years." It is the want of this vocal training, and the want of a transcendental acquaintance with the manner in which Italian poetry determines the graceful, uninterrupted flow of vocal melody by reason of its syllabification, its caesural pauses, and its metrical softness, which makes the average compositions for voices and instruments so stiff and disjointed. But Mozart, trained in writing operas to Italian words, had probed this secret of melodic continuity, and possessed it in a perfection, or with an unbroken certainty and habit not found in the most original, and to us greatest purely German dramatic composer, Von Weber, and still less in the operatic work of Beethoven, Fidelio, or in his Mass. This want of lovely flowing melody is felt in the latest expression of the German school, and of its precursor, the French school, of which the great instrumentalist and orchestrator, Hector Berlioz, is the acknowledged chief. As for pooh-poohing down the claims, the aspirations, or even the short-comings of such men as Wagner, Berlioz and others, it is simply ridiculous. They are delvers and divers for pearls beneath the surface, and good comes of such daring; but they are on a wrong track, so far as they neglect the spontaneity of melody. The composer should respect his once child-like aspirations—the early times when a love-melody made him reach the empyrean of ecstasy, and find therein that one of the highest, if not the highest, element of music is the sensuous, or the erotic principle. The Greeks understood it when they made Apollo—the procreant sun—the god of music. Now music is to be intellectual. Mercury, the god of mathematicians as well as thieves, is enthroned as the deity. "Intellectual music," so called, is vaunted above the diamonds of melody, the heart's first gush of lyrical joy and affection. In this under-estimate of the superior claim of melody we are reminded of the fable of the fox without a tail; no composer who can make a melody refrains from doing so. The alliance of the most beautiful melody with the most romantic, unearthly, spiritual, religious, or what-not expression, is not only perfectly compatible, but gives us a special interest. Weber has proved it.

The instrumental pieces performed on Saturday evening, Mozart's Symphony and Wagner's Overture to "Faust," were in strong contrast, as representatives of the old and new schools. The new school must connect more of the beautiful with its emotional aspirations, if it wishes to be popular. People will like, for example, the smoothly fluent and continuously wrought-out slow movement of Mozart's "Jupiter" in preference to the wild unrest and calculated melodic phrases—melodies we cannot call them—of Wagner. A melody worth the name can be utterly dissociated from chords or instrumental accompaniment, and be sung and remembered; and we find nothing of the kind in the newly-imported pieces the Philharmonic Society gives us. Hence such pieces will not please a fresh, true ear for music, though they may one which is jaded, biased, calculating. In speaking thus, we do not wish to be understood as warring against the new school, or as considering the old inimitably fine. But if musical composition take any direction in this country, it should steer clear of fanaticism for either. At present, however, there is no danger of any polemical war on the subject such as has raged in Germany; for we will do our public the justice to say, that they are absolutely indifferent to all artistic discussion of this kind.

The New Organ in the Minster at Ulm.

(Translated from the Niederrheinische Musik Zeitung.)

The long-desired moment when the organ in the Minster should be completed, has arrived. Walcker, of Ludwigsburg, the celebrated organ-builder, delivered it into the hands of the authorities of the Kirchenstiftung for trial, and on the 12th of October it was solemnly consecrated. This organ, one of the largest ever built, boasted of a long history before it was even completed. Walcker's first plan and estimate date as far back as the year 1838. About the end of 1845, he prepared a third plan for 80 registers, the price of which he calculated at 23,000 florins. In the beginning of 1846, he sent in his fourth scheme, with 94 registers, at an estimated cost of 28,000 florins; this was adopted, but the deliberations concerning the location of the instrument lasted so long, that it was not until the 30th November, 1848, that a definite resolution was adopted, and the agreement with Walcker finally signed, on the 11th January, 1849. The period between the 22nd January and the 17th March, 1849, was employed in removing the old organ, with its sub-structure, the foundation of the new superstructure being commenced on the 26th August, 1850. In the Month of May, 1854, Walcker was enabled to begin the erection of the new organ, and in September, 1856, it was finished; it took, consequently, two years and four months to erect it, while from the signing of the contract to the completion of the organ seven years and nine months elapsed. The instrument has four manuals and two pedals, in all ninety-four sounding voices, with 6,286 pipes, eighteen pairs of bellows, &c. All the technical improvements calculated to raise the work to the highest excellence in organ building have been introduced; and, which is the principal feature, the endless and rich variety of voices and keys is united to such purity and beauty, that the builder has really raised himself, in this work, a lasting monument. On the 13th October, a concert of organ music was given to inaugurate the instrument. In obedience to the public invitation of the consistory, several hundred people streamed in from the adjacent country, and even from the most remote districts, to hear the organ. All were on the tiptoe of expectation, but few were satisfied. We will not take into consideration temporary drawbacks, but there is in the organ itself one defect, which was first noticed by the assembled crowd, and which is attended with irremediable disadvantages. Its position was, from the moment of its selection, condemned in an architectural point of view, but was defended on acoustic reasons; but it is now evident that the latter are false. The organ can only be seen jammed in between the pillars of the tower, and being covered by the profile projection of the large arch between the space under the tower and the middle aisle, is not exhibited at any one point as a whole. Its sound is also considerably obstructed and thrown back by the res-sault of the arch, for acoustic and catophonic laws are, in this instance, nearly allied. In addition to this, the masses of finer tones, which are situated behind the foremost large pipes, cannot be developed to their full value for the ear of the persons listening below in the church, or be fully appreciated: they are weighed down by the objects around them. These disadvantages, inseparable from the position and arrangements of the organ, and which the builder, by the raising of the eighty registers as at first projected, to ninety-four, himself admitted and endeavored partially to obviate, it was his duty, by the choice of some other site, to avoid. It remains a matter of doubt whether his work, in other respects so artistic, does not, in its present position, suffer so much from the currents of air and the temperature, that a considerable portion of the expenses incurred will be thrown away.—Lond. Mus. World.

Musical Correspondence.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Jan. 13.—At the suggestion of certain persons, a few of our best amateurs gave a concert at the North Church for the benefit of the funds of that society. The programme comprised selections from Haydn's third Mass, "Stabat Mater," "Moses in Egypt," and sundry light operas. For the benefit of the audience and the singers, a stage was built in front of the pulpit.

The concert opened with an organ voluntary by Mr. FITZHUGH, director. It was rather rough in execution, having none of those delicate shadings which an organ under skilful hands can give to any extempore performance. For loud organ playing a fugue is more to be preferred than a piano-forte fantasia, executed with all the registers and couplers drawn!

The principal solos were taken by Miss HELEN PENNIMANN and Mrs. WELLS; they were charmingly sung, and showed the culture and taste of both performers. The choruses were not quite in time, those from the third Mass in particular. A few more rehearsals would have benefited them.

A duet on themes from Belshazzar, for two pianos, performed by Mr. Fitzhugh and sister, was an excellent affair, though we do not think that the selection was at all appropriate to the sanctity of the place over which they were played.

The concert was a success; some $300 or more were raised. The church was well filled with a delighted audience, though my friend Jones remarked, as we were returning to our lodgings, that "some of the old fogies stayed away because they thought if the singers began to desecrate the pulpit with operatic performances without a rebuke from them, the purity of the place would soon be gone."

It is a fact that, though advertised to be a sacred concert, all the solos were from light operas, such as La Favorita, etc. Not a single gem from the "Messiah," "Creation," or "Elijah."

In my last I promised to give you some account of the doings of the musical portion of our citizens. We have a very flourishing society, bearing the name of "Springfield Musical Institute." Mr. EDWARD INGERSOLL, President, T. G. SHAW musical director and leader, ALBERT ALLIN, pianist. The society contemplates giving a concert very soon. It has in active rehearsal such choruses as "The heavens are telling," "Glory to God," (Messiah) etc. and under the admirable leadership of Mr. Shaw is making rapid progress. The old "Philharmonic" orchestra disbanded some months ago, on account of reasons best known to themselves; a few of them, however, still rehearse together, and will furnish instrumental accompaniment to some of the choruses at the concert of the Institute. More anon.

AD LIBITUM.

HARTFORD, Jan. 10.—It is not unfrequently complained that the American people have very little musical taste and appreciation as compared with those of other lands; but it is a consolation that they are all the while rapidly progressing in their love for the beautiful art.

In this thrifty little city we have had of late substantial evidence of this in the erection of two fine organs, concerning which I propose to give you a short sketch. The first has just been erected, in and for the Pearl Street Church, of this city, by Henry Erben, of New York. The instrument has 3 manuals, each extending from CC to G², and also 27 pedal keys, and registers some 50 stops. The swell organ extends through its entire manual. This instrument has been pronounced by musicians in New York, familiar with Mr. Erben's organs to be superior to anything he has before produced. It was admirably exhibited by Wm. A. King on its erection.

A much greater curiosity than this, however, is the immense parlor organ recently erected for Mr. J. C. Cady, of this place, by Richard M. Ferris & Co., of New York. It is the largest parlor organ ever owned or built in this country, and has two manuals of five complete octaves each, from CC to C⁴ in the altissimo, 27 pedal keys, and registers thirty stops, as follows:

- | | |
|---|--|
| Great Organ. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Open Diapason. 2. Viol d' Amour. 3. Melodia. 4. Stop Diapason, Bass. 5. Stop Diapason, Ten. 6. Principal. 7. Rohr Flute. 8. Twelfth. 9. Fifteenth. 10. Clarinet. 11. Bassoon. 12. Trumpet. Swell Organ. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 13. Bourdon. 14. Open Diapason. 15. Stopped Diapason. 16. Dulciana. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 17. Violiana. 18. Fifteenth. 19. Cornet. 20. Hautboy. Swell Bass. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 21. Bourdon—16 ft. 22. Dulciana—metal 8 ft. Pedals. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 23. Sub-bass—16 ft. Couplers, &c. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 24. Great and Swell. 25. Great and Swell 8va. 26. Pedals and Great. 27. Pedals and Swell. 28. Pedals at octaves. 29. Pedal Check. 30. Tremula. |
|---|--|

The swell box includes the pipes connected with the upper manual from tenor C upwards.

The stops of this instrument are charmingly voiced, many of them exceeding in delicacy anything of the kind I have ever heard; and what is noticeable, every stop is remarkably characteristic, evincing excellent taste and judgment. The various stops are also so finely balanced that the listener does not hear one part above and distinguished from the rest, but all blend together, forming one full, rich, resonant, and compact body of sound. The mechanism of the instrument is of, as choice material and workmanship as the finest piano-forte; the action works easily and perfectly noiselessly. This organ cost about $2,500, and nobody doubts but that Mr. Cady has received the full value of his money. It certainly must be a very pleasure-yielding investment.

Yours, &c.,

DIAPASON.

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—The second PHILHARMONIC Concert, on Saturday last, was full as crowded as the first. In fact, almost immediately after the doors were opened; the house presented quite a respectable appearance. The orchestral pieces were MOZART'S C major Symphony, WAGNER'S Overture to "Faust," and another by SCHINDLERMEISSER, to Gutzkow's drama of "Uriel Acosta." The "Jupiter" Symphony was exceedingly well performed, and seemed more beautiful than ever to me on this occasion, from the preparatory study of it which I had enjoyed at the rehearsals and the piano. I never before thoroughly understood or appreciated either the Andante or the Finale (that masterpiece of fuguing,) in all their parts.

You have yourself spared me the task of saying anything to characterize the "Faust" Overture by your analysis of it in your last number. Yet my opinion differs slightly from yours, inasmuch as I do not yet know exactly what to make of this work of "The Future," and can hardly tell whether I like it or not, in spite of having heard it more frequently than you. The three first hearings, however, can hardly be counted, for the composition is so immensely difficult, that it was most tantalizingly broken up at all but the last rehearsal. One could recognize Wagner throughout in those upward flights of the violins, the peculiar modulations and strange, startling harmonies, and now and then a snatch of melody was very beautiful; but the impression I have received is still too disconnected to be very

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 17, 1857.

M. Thalberg's Concerts.

The second concert (Thursday evening, Jan. 8) was about as fully attended as the first. It seems at first a strange sight to see two or three thousand people gathered for a piano-forte concert. Celebrity and novelty still carry the day, reversing the intrinsic order; Thalberg fills the Music Hall, while orchestra and symphony shrink to the measure of the Melodeon. We do not complain, for it is worth one's while to witness for once the best of its kind. And Thalberg, if we mistake not, has given us all a new idea of possible perfection in executive art, besides enabling us to judge fairly and allow full weight to a certain brilliant, ornamental school of composition, which has occupied a large share of public attention since he called it into being, and set all the young pianists on a chase after its Jack-o'-lantern glory.

Mr. Thalberg's selections this time, as before, were chiefly in his own peculiar form of music—the Fantasia on operatic themes, and enabled us to appreciate more closely this his speciality as a composer. Thalberg is emphatically a pianist. His music is the joint product of the piano and of Thalberg. To his pianism, his playing, as the perfection of executive art, we confined ourselves almost exclusively in our notice of the first concert. Now a few words of the way in which his instrument and he have as it were grown up and developed naturally and together; that is to say, of his compositions, by which is to be understood first of all his operatic Fantasias. We fancy to ourselves the first germ of his art in the boy's love of the tones of the piano. We fancy in him, too, a natural sense of beauty in the sphere of sound, of euphony, as well as of symmetry and elegance of form, fine appreciation of accent, &c.; in short, all that leads one to cultivate and refine upon the purely sensuous charm of music. Add, too, an Italian's love of melody, more, however, for the grace than for the passion thereof. He lays his ear closely, fondly to his instrument, this cabinet of hidden tones; he woos its keys with gentle or fierce touch, and draws from it and builds out from it all that it can do towards illustrating with utmost euphony and utmost wealth and brilliancy of ornament, such musical themes—say melodies—as impress themselves most strongly on his own musical temperament and please the general ear. For so far as he has a theory, it is that the aim of music is to please; one scarcely fancies his young soul as big with swelling thoughts and aspirations, like a young Beethoven, which must find utterance through or in spite of the best instrument that comes to hand. To make a music which should illustrate the possibilities of the piano, in a way to strike and astonish, but above all to please the general ear of music lovers, was the end for which he wrought. To weave into a beautiful, symmetrical, extraordinary arabesque of tone all the melodic passages and figures, the Aurora Borealis flame-gauze arpeggios, the wide-spread harmonies, the almost orchestrally broad combinations, the wind-like sweeps and swells, the rushing, surging basses, and Æolian tremolos, which he had reduced in detail to such certainty of precise manipulation; to construct all these technical feats into a pleasing and connected artistic whole, as dancers weave their pas into some Ballet of more or less poetic significance: this seems to have been the end and motive of the operatic Fantasias.

Now this is a very different genesis, a very different method from that whereby the master-works of musical genius have commonly been created. It is not in fact the method of inspired creative genius. It is not the method of a soul teeming with inspired musical ideas, which it proceeds with devout earnest, and yet with a young Bacchus joy to develop from within, by their intrinsic logic and the grace of sympathizing gods, until the necessity for utterance is satisfied in a complete, vital, glowing work of Art. How different this Fantasia from a Sonata or Symphony, or even from the freer tone-poems of a Chopin! How different from all the forms that had been held classic! (And yet it is not so much the form as it is the inspiration, that makes a work classic; though inspiration necessarily leaves organic beauties as the record of its visit, and hence classical forms, imitated afterwards without inspiration.) They are essentially virtuoso compositions—music written for the player and his instrument. The nearest stepping-stone afforded to it in the old classical forms was in the Concerto, in which the display of the performer was made an end, as well as the expression of a thought. We shall see below how Thalberg himself has marked and signalized this stepping-stone in his performance of a Beethoven Concerto.

Enough here to point out this difference. And now let us own that, after hearing Thalberg himself play them, these Fantasias do seem to us a much more genuine thing than formerly; under his hands they justify themselves. Perhaps it would be not far from the truth to say that they are "compositions" in somewhat the same sense that we speak of ornamental compositions in the arts of pictorial design. These luxuriate in a certain freedom of technical execution, yet preserve a unity and symmetry throughout; and while their end is ornament, they yet admit of almost unlimited richness, variety and beauty of invention. They may show feeling, soul withal; though sense of beauty and ingenious calculation are the main ingredients. Always a subordinate branch of Art, compared with a great painting, statue, or architectural monument, but yet legitimately Art. So the Thalberg Fantasia in music. The arabesque designer chooses a figure to work up and multiply and vary through infinity of changes. So the pianist takes a well known theme, a melody, for principal figure and subject in his complex musical pattern. He preludes to it by cunning and insensible approaches, charming the ear by what seems a delicate impromptu of his own, in which he hints ever and anon the coming theme, catches the shine of its coming afar off, sports with the piano (as if for the satisfaction of the fingers,) and with the latent theme at the same time, or lets the fingers run awhile their own way, knowing how to recall them gracefully and aptly as the business approaches. Then comes the theme, a vocal melody perhaps from Norma or Lucia, or sometimes a concerted movement, a whole scene. The voice (or voices) sings itself firmly, clearly and connectedly in the firm and deep. I hardly think this work will ever be as popular as the Tannhäuser overture. Schindeldeisser's musical preface to "Uriel Acosta" is very finely instrumented and full of pleasing melodies, but without great depth. Did space admit of it, I would send you the synopsis of it which was distributed with the programmes; yet, unless you were to hear the music, it would hardly interest you. Mme. JOHANSEN, (or SCHREIER-JOHANSEN, as she now calls herself, having got married since her arrival in this country) sang the "Non più di fiore," from Mozart's Titus, an exquisite thing, and a bravura aria by Pacini, in which latter she was encored. This lady has a very fine, sympathetic voice; and though I cannot exactly admire her school, I think her the best German opera singer we have ever had here. The remaining two numbers presented the name of Mr. GOTTSCHALK. He first played a movement of HENSEL's grand Concerto in F minor for piano and orchestra—an extremely difficult, but not proportionately pleasing cheval de bataille for his instrument. Its effect was, however, spoilt by the orchestra playing too loudly for the piano, and Mr. Gottschalk not loudly enough for the house. His second piece was one of his inevitable own compositions, a "Morceau de Concert," on themes from Il Trovatore, for two pianos, in which he was most ably sustained by a young brother pianist, Mr. EMILE GUXON, who has just entered upon our musical world, and whose very unassuming demeanor must have won him the favorable notice of many listeners. Gottschalk played with wonderful execution, as he always does. Whenever I hear him I regret anew that such high powers should be thrown away upon the music (music indeed!) to which he almost entirely confines himself. — t —

BALTIMORE, Jan. 12.—Prof. ALLEN's Soirée, the third in order, came off last Monday week, and the following is the programme:

PART I.

1. Overture, "Figaro,".....Mozart
2. Solo Alto: Horn Obligato,.....Rigoletti
3. Piano Solo: { a. "Danse des Sylphes," Godfroid.
b. Etude in A minor,.....Thalberg.
4. Basso Solo: "I praise," &c., and chorus, St. Paul,.....Mendelssohn.

PART II.

1. Quintet, Part 1st,.....Mendelssohn.
2. Quartet,.....Rigoletti.
3. Quintet, Part 3rd,.....Mendelssohn.
4. Alma Virgo; Solo and Chorus,.....Hummel.

I have learned that the "tinsel clink of compliment" is light coin to those most deserving of it, and therefore I avoid bestowing praise where it is so justly due, the more readily, as the affair is considered rather "private and confidential," and the performers, being mostly amateurs, have the good taste to value music more than praise. I assure you it is truly refreshing to meet such a company of devoted, conscientious musicians; and, confidentially, their performance would do honor to those of more pretensions.

There was much good music in the churches here on Christmas day, which I was prevented from hearing. At the Cathedral BEETHOVEN's Mass in C was sung with full orchestra.

PARODI and her company appeared at the Assembly Rooms Friday evening; quite a thin and cool audience welcomed them. One must forgo seeing to in any degree enjoy Parodi's singing; her grimaces are frightful. TIBERINI was well received; he looked the sentimental and ogled the girls disgustingly. Little PAUL (though in long coat) continues to delight all with his magical tones.

I hear rumors of an Italian Opera in Baltimore—LAGRANGE, &c. 'Tis most too good to be true, though Baltimore is good game, and a few representations at a high figure pay well. TRUMPET.

middle of the instrument (the thumbs taking much of this duty on themselves), while the harmonic foundation is laid out broadly below, and the other fingers of the right hand are free to weave in and over all a web of delicate and flowery embellishments. Then come variations and transformations, and new forms of illustration and embellishment; perhaps also some more illustrations out of the same opera; and then one of these themes is made the ornament and covering to another, which takes turn as principal. The whole grows onward with a remarkable unity and symmetry; there are splendid climaxes of gathering force, great basses rolling up and breaking in bright treble showers of diamonds, &c., and broad harmonies spread out underneath to lift all up and make what is delicate seem all the airier, and so forth, and so forth:—why describe what is so familiar to our readers! What strikes you in these compositions of Thalberg, apart from the playing, is first a certain winning grace and delicacy in the preluding and connecting parts, in which he discloses a vein of his own, a something that is peculiarly Thalberg, an atmosphere breathed over all from his own mind, and which you recognize again in those smaller works of his which are more purely his own compositions, like his Andante, his Etudes, &c. Secondly the distinctness and expressive personality with which the theme stands out the whole time,* wearing the dress for fuller self-assertion, and not obscured or smothered in it, or made ludicrous. Thirdly, the grace and splendor of the ornamentation. Then the all-pervading taste and sense of fitness everywhere, making beauty paramount and miracle subordinate, though clearly present. And finally the symmetry, the architectural balance and completeness of the whole work. This is what it is, and what we are compelled to enjoy in it, without asking ourselves what it is not, and whether it can satisfy the passion for undying beauty that torments deep natures. Go to Beethoven for that. Accept this in its way—until you shall grow tired of it.

Mr. Thalberg's Fantasias, however, are not equal in point of unity. This time he played his "Sonnambula," his "Don Giovanni," and his "Lucrezia Borgia." The first was a charming abstract of the spirit of Bellini's opera. The second was wonderful for the treatment of the selected themes, the Minuet and the Serenade, the latter of which was given with the accompanying orchestral melody, and a wealth of illustrating, recalling all that passes on the stage, while each part keeps itself marvellously distinct and sets the other in a clearer light. It was the perfection of clear statement. But the long introductory portion of the Fantasia was not at all in the Don Juan vein; we should sooner have expected a theme from Weber's "Oberon" after it. The "Lucrezia Borgia" is one of his grandest, working up the well-known Trio with a superb climax.

But more than with the Fantasias, were we charmed with Thalberg's Tarantella, the marvellous rapidity, delicacy and delirious ecstasy of which, as he plays it, surpassed all the Tarantellas we have heard. Will he not some night let us hear some of his Nocturnes and Etudes; and especially his Andante (just published by Russell and Richardson), or his Andante Tremolo—compositions to which we owe a partiality. There is a certain grace and flavor to these little things of Thalberg's own, which, though not indicating a great creative genius, yet place him amongst the minor poets of the piano.

We must say a few words of the singing at this concert. Mme. D'ANGRI confirmed the impression of her exceedingly rich and powerful contralto, and of her rare execution as a genuine Rossini singer. Her middle voice is certainly one of the most beautiful we ever heard. The very low tones gain in roundness as we hear her, but we are not partial to them. The high notes sound hard and common. Her greatest triumph was again in Non più mesta. In the duet from "The Barber," her first tones: Dunque io sono, &c., were delicious, and the whole was charmingly sung and acted. Sig. MORELLI too supplied the Figaro with fine tact and effect. D'Angri sang also an air from "Betly," and the Brindisi from Lucrezia; the latter in a dashing and voluptuous style, which stirred up most listeners, but not with that truth to the melody or fine poetic fervor which we could desire, if we desired anything just now of so hacknied an affair.

THIRD CONCERT (Saturday evening, Jan. 10.) There was no question this time, as there was the previous Saturday, between THALBERG and BEETHOVEN; for we had them both united. The mountain came to Mahomet; Mr. ZERRAHN and all his orchestra to the great pianist, helping him to bring out one of Beethoven's Concertos, besides contributing of their best stores purely orchestral. And they seemed inspired to do their best. All did their best; the programme was uncommonly good, the Music Hall crowded, the audience enthusiastic (far more than at the first two concerts), and altogether there was left the impression of a most delightful concert. We must record the programme:

- PART I.
1. Overture: Der Freyschütz,.....Weber
Orchestra of the Philharmonic Concerts.
 2. Aria: Semiramis,.....Rossini
Mme. D'Angri.
 3. Concerto in C minor,.....Beethoven
S. Thalberg.
 4. "Batti, Batti," Don Giovanni,.....Mozart
Mme. D'Angri.
 5. Andante of Fourth Symphony,.....Beethoven
- PART II.
6. Overture: William Tell,.....Rossini
 7. Voi che sapete, Marriage of Figaro,.....Mozart
Mme. D'Angri.
 8. Fantasia: Prayer of Moses,.....Thalberg
S. Thalberg.
 9. Rondo: Cenerentola,.....Rossini
Mme. D'Angri.
 10. Fantasia: Masaniello,.....Thalberg
S. Thalberg.
 11. March: Le Prophète,.....Meyerbeer

The orchestra sounded better in the Music Hall than in the Melodeon, the sounds being better fused and softened, without loss of resonance or freshness. And yet, as before, one felt the need of more seconds and violas to offset the powerful first violins. (Of course a much larger orchestra every way is still the desideratum with us.) The overtures were finely played; the finale to the "William Tell" with rare precision and brilliancy, which of course warmed the multitude to an encore. The Andante to the Fourth Symphony, too, fully renewed its delightful impression of beauty and of tenderest, deepest feeling. It was played better than before. But the memorable feature of the concert was the Beethoven Concerto, played right under the statue of the composer, by one of the world's two first pianists, and with full orchestral accompaniments. And yet it was a cruel disappointment to be cut short with only the first movement of the Concerto in C minor, after the whole had been announced, and after that first movement had proved so wondrously beautiful, that it was hard to tear oneself from the enjoyment of so pure a work of Art, especially as such a chance of perfect interpretation on the pianist's part might never come again. But Thalberg's execution was a miracle of perfection. The orchestra seemed to feel that it must be, and that it must not be spoiled, to judge by the unity and delicacy with which they played the long introduction, and the accompaniment throughout. And what a masterpiece the composition is! To say nothing of its ideas and spirit, worthy of Beethoven, how admirably the instruments are made to lead and blend into the sounds of the piano, what exquisite contrasts and minglings of strings and reeds! Thalberg played it not only with the utmost precision, force and clearness, but with the finest light and shade, bringing out with exquisite feeling and accent all those little melodic phrases which in Beethoven's music melt out of the tone mass, like passing smiles of a celestial meaning and beauty which ever and anon light up a grand and earnest face. The ease with which it was done, too, showed to what excellent account this new power of pianism may be turned in qualifying the player for expressive interpretation of the master compositions. But what held the audience in breathless delight for some minutes was the long and elaborate cadence introduced by Thalberg at the orchestral pause near the end. It was marvellously ingenious and beautiful, an abstract, in fact, of the entire movement, as if it had caught its own image in miniature in a distant mirror. Right knowingly had the pianist seized upon this transition point between the old school and the new, between music as music, and music as illustration, and shown his best art where he had the noblest subject. Now one could not but ask why, interesting as it is in those Fantasias above discussed, this wonderful pianism does not see for itself a higher and more glorious calling in subordinating itself more frequently and as a chief duty to the unfolding of the beauties of inspired works like those of Beethoven. For, although the Sonatas, Concertos, &c., present comparatively fewer difficulties to the fingers than the modern music, yet there is no possible perfection of skill in execution which would be thrown away in the rendering of them. Can the simplest lines of Shakespeare find too great an actor? Certainly it was clearly settled that evening that Thalberg can appreciate and can play Beethoven.

For Fantasias this time he gave us two of his very best; the "Prayer from Moses" and the "Masaniello." The former we have always thought about the first of his works in this kind. There is perfect unity of spirit and of structure throughout. It grows and builds itself up symmetrically, and does not descend to the patchwork character which may be charged on some of these pieces. The opening is in the most delicate, fresh vein of Thalberg, clear as crystal, leading you on from one happy surprise to another, through the light dance themes of the opera, till the harmony broadens and the Prayer follows as of necessity, and is amplified into majestic proportions. We had always felt its power, but found that we did not half realize it until we had heard him play it

* Read the preface to his L'Art du Chant Appliqué au Piano, published by O. Ditson & Co.

Mme. D'ANGRI's selections were excellent. The two from Rossini, being in her own peculiar school, exhibited both voice and execution to the best advantage. Between the two from Mozart there was great difference in the rendering. Batti, batti suffered; an orchestral accompaniment, to no song more essential, would perhaps have imparted more of its true spirit to the singer. And there stood the orchestra: why were they not used? But Voi che sapete was most beautifully sung, in pure, sustained cantabile style, and in her best voice. With these tones the delicious melody sounded as it ought to sound. All wished to hear it repeated, and it did a violence to the pure feeling generally excited to have the demand answered by so incongruous a thing as the Lucrezia Drinking Song.

FOURTH CONCERT, (Tuesday evening). Another Concerto (i. e. a first movement) of Beethoven: that in E♭. As a composition it warmed us even more than the C minor. The quaint conciseness and boldness of the leading theme, the joyous, elated young Bacchus tread and rhythm of the whole thing, approaching once the ecstasy of the Ninth Symphony, were such as Beethoven only has expressed. Mr. Thalberg played it in the same chaste classical style as the other; only perhaps a little less carefully; and there was no marvellous cadenza to astound the general audience. The orchestra had shrunk to a thin shadow—only two first violins—the effect of sickness and other accidents. Of course this lent a chill to it. The other orchestral selections were accordingly inferior; the weak humdrum overture to Martha, another empty one by Kalliwoda, and an "Alexander March." Thalberg played his Semiramide Fantasia, chiefly founded on the ghost scene, his Lucia Finale and Serenade from Don Pasquale and his most sparkling Elisir d'Amore. D'ANGRI executed "Variations di Bravura," written for her by Rossini, very admirably; also an Aria from Mercadante's Saffo, another from L'Italiana in Algieri, and a Cavatina from Donizetti's "Romeo and Juliet." MORELLI made a great hit with Rossini's Tarantella, and sang Amor funesto in his uniformly artistic manner. His voice seemed somewhat hard, but resonant and telling.

[The following came too late to take its place under "Correspondence"; as it is, a portion of the letter has to be deferred.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 14. Last Tuesday week, Mr. APTOMMAS gave the second of his Harp Soirées at Dodworth's saloon, assisted by Madame SPACZEK, a lady pianist, and by the MOLLENHAUER brothers. Mme. Von BERKEL, from the German Opera Company, had promised to sing, but failing to be present, Mr. OTTO FEDER, volunteered his services, and gave a couple of songs. The feature of the evening was the attempt of Mr. Aptommas to play classical music upon the harp, an instrument wholly incapable of taking the place of a piano-forte. The trio selected was one by ONGLOW; and though Mr. Aptommas played with great skill and correctness, yet the Trio fell rather heavily upon the audience. But in its own peculiar province the harp is most delicious to listen to, and in such pieces as GOTTSCHALK's Marche de Nuit, and in familiar melodies, with their variations, I know of no instrument that, under the hands of a master, discourses sweeter music. There is an indescribable dreaminess about it, a perfect enjoyability, that to my ear no other instrument possesses. Perhaps one reason why the harp is such an agreeable instrument is, that it is the most graceful of any to perform on, and is connected with so many romantic associations. Old Ossian, with his streaming white hair floating upon the wind, sang the song of other days, while his trembling fingers wandered along the chords of his rude harp. King David, when his pious heart broke out into song, cried out, "Awake thou, my lute and harp," and praised the Lord "upon an instrument of ten strings, and upon the harp." In our fancies of the other world we see angels with golden harps in their hands, and the idea is beautiful indeed. But how different the effect were any other instrument introduced into the celestial regions! Imagine, for instance, a cherub playing on the violin, a seraph piercing the air with the tones of a flageolet, angels puffing away at ophicleides and French horns, while St. Cecilia is sitting on an adjacent cloud, thrumming on one of Erard's "Grands"!

GOTTSCHALK, who has for some time past been making farewell appearances, previous to departures for Europe, and who, like PAUL JULIEN, seems determined never to leave the country, gave another grand concert d'adieu last evening, and announces another one in Brooklyn in a few days. Herr GOLDBECK, the young pianist, whom I have previously mentioned, intends giving a series of piano-forte recitals at the residence of a gentleman in 23d street. Though given at a private house, these matinées will be accessible to the public, the price of subscription to the three concerts being two dollars. Mr. Goldbeck will be assisted by Mme. JOHANNSEN and Mr. DOEBLER, a violinist connected with the English Opera orchestra.

Mr. EMILE GUYON, a pianist and pupil of THALBERG, is rash enough to announce a concert for Saturday evening.

The German Opera Company are in trouble, the prima donna, Mme. JOHANNSEN, not having appeared for several evenings. An indifferent substitute has been found in the person of Miss CRONFELD, a young lady, with a voice of limited power and cultivation. LORTZING's comic opera, Czar and Zimmerman, has been produced with this lady in the chief role.

An inexcusable blunder of mine, in my last letter, in which I failed to render unto Spohr the things that are Spohr's, has excited the just and awful indignation of my worthy colleague, Mr. — t —, the Typographical Sphinx. Perhaps he may remember, in the opera of Trovatore, where the Count de Luna hears the serenade of the Troubadour, and overcome with inexpressible fear, cries out: "Io tremo": so when I see Mr. Typographical Sphinx amiably exhorting me in his New York letter, "Io tremo," and I wring my hands, beat my breast, tear my hair, put sackcloth and ashes on my head, and have scarcely enough strength left to sign myself, a la Micawber.]

"The Remains of a Fallen Tower,"

TROVATORE.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The first of the Wednesday Afternoon Concerts (the joint enterprise of the members of the orchestra, with CARL ZERRAHN for leader) drew a large audience to the Music Hall, and passed off successfully. The programme ministered to the refined and to the simple appetite in happy proportions. For the former, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the overture to "Oberon" were a rich allowance. The lighter pieces were quite good in their way. The performance was worthy of the orchestra, which numbered very nearly all who play in the Philharmonic Concerts. A novelty was the first public performance of Master CARLYLE PETERSILMA, a young pianist of about twelve years. He played with orchestra Hummel's difficult Rondo Brillant in a way that vouched for diligent practice. It was very well played, for a boy; but whether it was well that the boy should play, is another question.

Rare genius (and what so rare!) may justify it sometimes, but as a rule it is better for the boy, the art, the public, and for all concerned, that he be not stirred up to much haste about self exhibition.

Musical Chat-Chat.

To-morrow evening Mr. THALBERG and his artists, with Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra, and the Handel and Haydn Society, give us "Mozart's Requiem," in the Music Hall. We have never had this great work adequately done here, and only once or twice, a long time since, attempted. It will be the musical event of the season. Mme. D'ANGRI takes the contralto solos, Mrs. LONG the soprano, (Mme. DE WILHORST having joined the Strakosch opera in New York,) Mr. ARTHURSON the tenor, and Sig. MORELLI the bass. In the second part Thalberg will play his "Prayer of Moses," and other pieces, and also for this time only on the Orgue Alexandre, besides vocal selections. This is Mr. Thalberg's last performance in Boston, as he proceeds at once to Hartford, New Haven, Troy and Albany.... This evening the "ORPHEUS" Glee Club, composed of Germans, who have long enjoyed weekly practice under the lead of Mr. AUGUST KREISSMANN, give the first of three subscription concerts at Mercantile Hall. The Club will sing some of the best part-songs by Mendelssohn, Lenz, Maurer, &c., and the chorus: O Isis and Osiris, from the "Magic Flute." Miss LUCY A. DOANE will sing: Thou that killest the prophets, from "St. Paul." Mozart's Vedrai carino, and with Mr. Kreissmann a duet from Le Nozze di Figaro; and there will be sung a "Nightingale Duet" by tenor and bass. Mr. SCHULTZE contributes a violin solo, and Mr. LEONHARD, the pianist, a "Song without Words" by Mendelssohn, and a Polonaise by Chopin. Truly a beautiful programme.

Mr. SATTER, it will be seen, offers an inviting programme, and a novel one, for his second Soirée next Wednesday evening. WILLIAM MASON will assist him. A Piano Trio founded upon Byron's "Sardanapalus" must at least pique curiosity, and Liszt's two-piano "Preludes" are reputed among his best works.... The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, having been absorbed into Thalberg's orchestra last Tuesday night, postpone the concert of that evening until Tuesday after next.... CARL ZERRAHN's second Philharmonic will come off next Saturday evening. The Programme will include Beethoven's Second Symphony (in D), Berlioz's overture, Le Carnaval Romain (first time), Andante from Mendelssohn's "Song of Praise," a Romanza for French Horn, overture to Zampa, and more, of which we are not yet informed.... Do not forget the Wednesday Afternoon Concert at the Music Hall.

Advertisements.

Music Hall, Sunday, Jan. 18th.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY

THALBERG'S, D'ANGRI'S AND MORELLI'S
Farewell Appearance in Boston.

First performance for many years of the whole of MOZART'S IMMORTAL REQUIEM, on a scale of unprecedented splendor and grandeur.

All the Solos will be sung by

MME. D'ANGRI, MRS. LONG,
SIG. MORELLI, MR. ARTHURSON.

Choruses by the full force of the Handel and Haydn Society,
Mr. ZERRAHN and his complete Orchestra of 35.

ORGANIST.....MR. MUELLER.

To be followed by a

GRAND SACRED CONCERT,

in which Mr. THALBERG will make his last appearance, and in which Mme. D'ANGRI, Signor MORELLI, and HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, and the ORCHESTRA, will take part.

Admission, One Dollar,

Seats (without extra charge) to be had at Russell & Richardson's on Friday and Saturday, and on Sunday at the Tremont House and at the door.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE SECOND CONCERT, being the first of the regular series of four, will be given on Saturday Evening, Jan. 24, 1857. Subscription Lists may be found at the principal music stores, where also tickets can be obtained. Packages of 4 tickets, $3; single ticket $1.

CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

Advertisements.

NOTICE.

THE members of the ORPHEUS Glee Club respectfully inform their friends and subscribers, that their FIRST Concert of the Series of Three, will take place at

Mercantile Hall, 16 Summer street,

On SATURDAY, Jan. 17, 1887;

on which occasion they will be kindly assisted by

Miss LUCY A. DOANE,

Mr. HUGO L'FONHARD, pianist, and

Mr. WILLIAM SCHULTZE, Violinist.

AUGUST KREISSMANN, DIRECTOR.

Single Tickets, to be had at the door on the evening, 50 cts. Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock precisely.

GUSTAVE SATTER'S SECOND PHILHARMONIC SOIRÉE

Will be given at the

ROOMS OF MESSRS. HALLET, DAVIS & Co., No. 409
Washington Street,

On WEDNESDAY EVENING, Jan. 21, 1887.

ASSISTING ARTISTS.—Miss Emma Davis, Vocalist:
Wm. Mason, the eminent Pianist: Wm. Schultze,
Violinist: H. Jungnickel, Violoncellist: B. J. Lang, Pianist.

PROGRAMME.

1.—Sonata: (A flat) op. 28,.....Beethoven.
Gustave Satter.

2.—Grand Trio: (B flat),.....Satter.
1. Allegro molto—2. Romance—3. Scherzo—4. Finale.
Messrs. Schultze, Jungnickel and Satter.

3.—Scene and Air: "Freischütz,".....Weber.
Miss Emma Davis.

4.—Les Preludes: Poésie Symphonique, (for two pianos,) Liszt.
Messrs. Mason and Satter.

Both Satter's Trio and Liszt's Preludes are performed on this occasion for the first time.

The composition of the Trio is based on Byron's "Sardanapalus."—The composition of the Preludes is based on Lamartine's "Méditations Poétiques."

Tickets for the Series, admitting two persons, $3.50: one person, $2: or one admission to a single concert, $1.
Commences precisely at 7½ o'clock.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday,
the 14th of January, 1887. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians, with Mr. CARL ZAM-BAHN as Conductor. Further particulars hereafter.

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING: An Analytical, Physiological and Practical System for the Cultivation of the Voice.
By CARLO BASSINI. Edited by R. BRONNA WILLIAMS. Price $4.

The special attention of Teachers and all persons interested in the study and practice of vocal music, is respectfully called to this new and valuable work.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

Kreutzer's 40 Studies for the Violin.

JUST PUBLISHED,.....PRICE $1.50.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pineknay Street.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.
Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices.

THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbault, a few copies.
Just received, a small invoice of MAYN FLORES.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY
FOR THE DIFFUSION OF
MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY: VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text.
The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—
(Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 12. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 68
" 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 68
" 3. Fête on Oboe and Chorus Singing.....38
" 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
" 5. Crotch's Treatise on Harmony.....68
" 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough
Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction.
Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents.
Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 68

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF
Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,
(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 33 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,
GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO FORTE,
and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts,
Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of
New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements,
quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 251.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 17.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOBBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

(Continued from page 123.)

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Changed from Hæroa Bæroa.)

THE FLUTE.

The sound of this instrument is sweet in the medium, rather piercing in the high notes, and very characteristic in the low ones. The quality of tone of the medium, and of that of the high portion, has not a very special or decided expression. They may be employed in melodies, or accents of varied character; but without equalling either the artless gaiety of the hautboy, or the noble tenderness of the clarinet. It should seem then, that the flute is an instrument well-nigh devoid of expression, which may be introduced anywhere and everywhere, on account of its facility in executing groups of rapid notes, and in sustaining high sounds useful in the orchestra for adding fullness to the upper harmonies. Generally speaking, this is true; nevertheless, on studying the instrument carefully, there may be discovered an expression peculiar to it, and an aptitude for rendering certain sentiments, in which no other instrument can compete with it. If, for instance, it were requisite to give to a sad air an accent of desolation, but of humility and resignation at the same time, the feeble sounds of the flute's medium, in the keys of C minor and D minor especially, would certainly produce the desired effect. One master only seems to me to have known how to avail himself of this pale coloring; and he is Gluck. On listening to the melodramatic movement in D minor which he has placed in the Elysian fields scene of Orfeo, it will be at once seen that a flute only could fittingly be made to utter this melody. A hautboy would have been too puerile, and its voice would not have seemed sufficiently pure; the corno inglese is too low; a clarinet would doubtless have answered better; but certain sounds would have been too powerful—none of its softest notes could have reduced themselves to the feeble, faint, veiled sound of the F natural of the medium, and of the first B \flat above the lines, which imparts so much sadness to the flute in this key of D minor, where these notes frequently occur. In short, neither the violin, the viola, nor the violoncello used in solo or in masses, would serve to express this very sublime lament of a suffering and despairing departed spirit; it required precisely the instrument selected by the author. And Gluck's melody is conceived in such a way that the flute lends itself to all the uneasy writhings of this eternal grief, still imbued with the passions of earthly life. It is at first a voice scarcely audible, which seems to fear being overheard; then it laments softly, rising into the accent of reproach, then into that of profound woe, the cry of a heart torn by incurable wounds, falling little by little into complaint, regret, and the sorrowing murmur of a resigned soul. What a poet!

An effect remarkable for its sweetness, is that of two flutes playing in the medium successions of thirds in E \flat or in A \flat —both keys extremely favorable to the velvet sounds of this instrument. Beautiful examples of this are to be found in the chorus of Priests in the first act of Edipus: "O vous, que l'innocence mème," and in the cavatina of the duet in the Vestale: "Les Dieux prendront pitié." The notes, B \flat , A \flat , G, F, and E \flat , in flutes have, thus grouped, something of the sonorousness of the harmonica. Birds of hautboys, corni inglesi, or clarinets, do not resemble them.

The low sounds of the flute are seldom or else ill employed by the majority of composers. Weber, in numerous passages of the Freischütz, and, before him, Gluck, in the religious march of Alceste, have nevertheless shown what may be done with it in harmonies imbued with sonorousness and thought. These bass notes,—as I have already said,—mingle admirably with the low sounds of corni inglesi and clarinets; they give the softened shade of a dark coloring.

Another instance of this, occurs in the example quoted from Weber's Freischütz (page 35). There is something ineffably dreamy in these low holding notes of the two flutes, during the melancholy prayer of Agatha, as she contemplates the summits of the trees, silvered by the rays of the night planet.

In general, the modern masters keep their flutes too constantly in the high range; they seem afraid that these instruments shall not be sufficiently distinguished amidst the mass of the orchestra. It hence results that they predominate, instead of blending in with the whole; and thus the instrumentation becomes hard and piercing rather than sonorous and harmonious.

Flutes form a family of themselves—like hautboys and clarinets; and are quite as numerous. The large flute—of which mention has just been made—is the most used. For ordinary orchestras, no more than two large flute parts are written; nevertheless, soft chords held on by three flutes would often have an excellent effect. A charming sonorousness is obtained from the association of a single flute above, with four violins, sustaining a high harmony in five parts. Notwithstanding the prevailing custom,—for which there is reason, however,—which has always given to the first flute the highest notes of the harmony, there are many occasions, in which a contrary plan might be pursued with success.

THE PICCOLO FLUTE.

Piccolo flutes are strangely abused now-a-days—as is the case with all instruments whose vibrations thrill, pierce, or flash forth. In pieces of a joyous character, the sounds of the second octave may be very suitable, in all their gradations; while the upper notes, are excellent (fortissimo) for violent and tearing effects: in a storm, for instance, or in a scene of fierce or infernal character. Thus, the piccolo flute figures incomparably in the fourth movement of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony—now alone and displayed, above the low tremolo of violas and basses, imitating the whistlings of a tempest whose full force is not yet unchained—now on the higher notes still, together with the entire mass of the orchestra. Gluck, in the tempest of Iphigenia in Tauride, has known how to make the high sounds of the piccolo flutes in unison grate still more roughly, by writing them in a succession of sixths, a fourth above the first violins. The sound of the piccolo flutes, issuing out in the upper octave, produces therefore a succession of elevenths with the first violins, the harshness of which is here of the very best effect.

In the chorus of Scythians, in the same opera, the two piccolo flutes double in the octave the little grouped passages of the violins; these whistling notes, mingled with the ravings of the savage troop, with the measured and incessant din of the cymbals and tambourine, make one shiver.

Everyone has remarked the diabolic sneer of the two piccolo flutes in thirds, in the drinking song of the Freischütz. It is one of Weber's happiest orchestral inventions:—

Spontini, in his magnificent bacchanalian strain in the Danabdes (since become an orgy chorus in Nurmahal) first conceived the idea of uniting a short piercing cry of the piccolo flutes to a stroke of the cymbals. The singular sympathy which is thus created between these very dissimilar instruments, had not been thought of before. It cuts and rends instantaneously, like the stab of a poignard. This effect is very characteristic—even when employing only the two instruments mentioned; but its force is augmented by an abrupt stroke of the kettle-drums, joined to a brief chord of all the other instruments.

These different examples, and yet others that I could cite, appear to me admirable in every respect. Beethoven, Gluck, Weber, and Spontini have thus made ingenious use—no less original than rational—of the piccolo flute. But when I hear this instrument employed in doubling in triple octave the air of a baritone, or casting its squeaking voice into the midst of a religious harmony, or strengthening and sharpening—for the sake of noise only—the high part of the orchestra, from beginning to end of the act of an opera, I cannot help feeling this mode of instrumentation to be of a platitude and stupidity worthy, generally, of the musical style to which it belongs.

The piccolo flute may have a very happy effect in soft passages; and it is mere prejudice to think that it should only be played loud. Sometimes it serves to continue the high scale of the large flute, by following up the latter at the moment when it reaches high notes beyond its command.

The passing from one instrument to the other, may then be easily managed by the composer; in such a way as to make it appear that there is only one flute of extraordinary compass.

[To be continued.]

[From the Lond. Mus. World, Dec. 20th, 1866.]

Handel's Autograph Scores—New Life of Handel.

It is not so much the Sacred Harmonic Society as the British Museum that deserves rating for having allowed the fair copies made from the autograph scores of Handel's oratorios to pass into the hands of a Frenchman. From these copies Handel himself conducted, and Smith, his amanuensis, after him. That alone should have made them desirable, as heirlooms, to a British institution. But they must further contain numberless indications in the handwriting of the composer, not only interesting of themselves, but precious as land-marks. We are always talking of Handel's "traditions;" well, here, in all probability, are many of them, stamped indelibly on paper. Here may be obtained hints as to how Handel would himself have curtailed such pieces as required curtailing. Possibly, too, marks of expression may be found; and these would be invaluable—for more reasons than one. Among other things the question might be set at rest as to how the opening of the chorus, "For unto us a child is born"—up to the fortissimo, on the words "Wonderful—Counsellor, &c."—should be read. Highly as we esteem the judgment of Mr. Costa, we cannot agree with him in this matter. The long-sustained pianissimo appears to us neither more nor less than a contresens, and the fortissimo, when it arrives, an effect of no greater sublimity than the celebrated thump in Haydn's "Surprise," which everyone must be aware was intended by the fine old master as a jeu-d'esprit, nothing more—an ingenious contrivance for awaking certain of his patrons who invariably went to sleep during the slow movements of his symphonies. Handel surely meant something higher than this—to say nothing of the evident irrelevancy of disclosing the great news of the birth of Christ as though it were a secret, treasonable, and dangerous to utter, instead of the announcement of salvation to mankind. If, in the scores possessed by M. Schœlcher, any information can be obtained upon this point, it will be a subject for gratulation. The question concerns not only the peculiar opinion entertained by the eminent chef-d'orchestre of the Sacred Harmonic Society, but Handel himself—since the new reading might otherwise pass into a tradition, and be ultimately defended upon the presumed strength of Handel's own authority.

The history of the discovery of the scores from which the composer of "The Messiah" directed the performance of his oratorios, is worth narrating. Handel died in 1759, and left all his manuscript music, by will, to John Christopher Smith, his friend and amanuensis. Smith, who had conducted the oratorio performances during the period of Handel's blindness, continued them for 12 years after the great musician's death. George III. patronized them constantly, and moreover conferred an annual pension of £200 on Smith. In return for these acts of kindness and munificence, Smith presented the autograph scores of Handel to His Majesty—in all 86 volumes, which have remained in possession of the Royal Family of England, and are now, as every one knows, in the library of Buckingham Palace, where they can be inspected with much more preliminary trouble than would have been the case had they been deposited in the British Museum.

The remainder of Handel's manuscripts, including among other things the fair copies from the autograph scores prepared for his own use in the concert-room, were kept by Smith, who subsequently married the widow of Dr. Coxe (a well-known physician practising at Bath). To the daughter of Widow Coxe (Mrs. Smith) by her first husband, and consequently the step-daughter of Smith, the manuscripts were bequeathed. Miss Coxe, in her turn, married the Rev. Sir Something Rivers, by whom she had issue. The two sons of the Rev. Sir Rivers dying childless, during his lifetime, his property and estate devolved to the Rev. Sir Henry Rivers, of Martyr Worthy, Hampshire, in the neighborhood of Winchester, who himself demised in 1851. A year or so after the death of the last named Rivers, by order of a decree in Chancery, the manuscripts which once were Handel's (altogether about 200 volumes) were knocked down by the hammer of the auctioneer at a price something less than what would have been fetched by the same quantity of waste paper. The lucky purchaser was a Mr. Kuslake, who carried on the business of second-hand bookseller, at Bristol. Mr. Kuslake, after holding possession for some years, advertised the volumes for sale, in his catalogue, at the sum of 45 guineas. The fact came under notice, as we are informed, of the Sacred Harmonic Society, "who at once offered to purchase." The Society was nevertheless, too late. How so? Of course, it was not to be expected that the British Museum, which declined to lay out 200 guineas for the autograph manuscript of Mozart's Don Giovanni,* would afford even the price of waste paper for these interesting relics of Handel; but we are surprised at the apparent dilatoriness of the Sacred Harmonic Society. More especially have we reason to be astonished, since a French gentleman, M. Victor Schœlcher, who had probably never heard of Handel until he came to this country, was aware of the advertisement in Mr. Kuslake's catalogue, went, or sent, to Bristol, and brought away, or caused to be brought away, the manuscripts. It is true that M. Schœlcher, (a distinguished French patriot, author of the Crimes de Décembre and other remarkable political treatises,) has been now for some years gathering materials for a life of Handel. This work he has long contemplated, and intends to be achieved. The task he has set himself no doubt stimulates curiosity, and sharpens his sense of perception, when anything of interest relating to his hero comes within reach. Thus, before the Sacred Harmonic Society heard of these copies of Handel's scores being for sale at a second-hand bookseller's at Bristol, M. Schœlcher had divined it; and when the fact "came under the notice" of the Exeter Hall Committee, the manuscripts were already in M. Schœlcher's possession. The Sacred Harmonic Society, we hear, regrets the loss of what would have been so useful an addition to its library, but acknowledges the readiness with which M. Schœlcher has offered to place the scores at the disposal of the committee, whenever they may be required for any occasion of importance. M. Schœlcher, having outwitted the Sacred Harmonic Society and shamed the British Museum, can afford to be generous.

To conclude, the fair copies from which Handel conducted will be consulted and used at the forthcoming Handel Festival, to be held in the Crystal Palace. In spite of this, however, and all the rest of the advantages likely to be derived from the courtesy of an enlightened foreigner, it is a humiliation to us that Handel's "fair copies" should not have been retained, like Handel's autographs, for England.

* Mad. Pauline Viardot Garcia was more sensible of the value of this precious relic, and gave the price demanded.

Beethoven's Ballet: "The Men of Prometheus."

(Translated from the Niederrheinische Musik Zeitung.)

An opinion—based upon what grounds we cannot say—has prevailed in various quarters, that the above composition by Beethoven was never produced. The totally unfounded opinion is refuted by Dr. Leopold Sonnleithner, in the Vienna Blätter für Musik. We reprint the article as an interesting addition to the history of Beethoven's works:

"The ballet, Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus was first produced at the Imperial Hof-Burgtheatre, in Vienna, on the 28th of March, 1801, as is proved by the subjoined play-bill, which is given entire, because it contains the names of the actors and the substance of the plot, for the better understanding of the music. The ballet was favorably received, and given tolerably often in the years 1801 and 1802. It then disappeared for many years from the Viennese stage. It was not until the 18th of November, 1843, that the management of the Kärntnerthor Theatre, in Vienna, produced Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, a mythological ballet in two acts and six parts, invented and put on the stage by Augustus Hns, ballet-master of this theatre, with music by Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn. This ballet is quite different from the older one, but the most interesting pieces in Beethoven's music were used in it. In this form, also, Prometheus pleased the public, being frequently represented in the years 1843 and 1844, while from the 1st of October, 1845, it was revived, with a new mise en scene. In subsequent years it has not been repeated.

"The overture and several separate pieces of the music in Prometheus used to be frequently performed in the Imperial Hof-Burgtheatre, before plays and between the acts.

"On the 22d May, 1843, the management of La Scala, in Milan, produced Prometeo, ballo mitologico in 6 atti, inventato e posto sulle scene dal Sig. Salvatore Viganò. The plot and treatment differ essentially from the first Viennese version, as the existing programme proves. Beethoven's music was used, but several pieces by Joseph Haydn and other masters were introduced.

The first time this music was performed in a concert was at Vienna, the 4th of March, 1841, in the Concert Spirituel, on which occasion the introduction and explanation, written by Herr J. G. Seidl, were spoken by Mad. Rettich, of the Imperial Theatres. The Society of the Friends of Music, of the Austrian empire, also performed the work at their concert in the Imperial Redouten-Saal, on the 20th of February, 1853, when Mad. Mitter-Weissbach spoke the connecting poem. Such is a list of the various occasions on which the work was publicly performed, as far as the writer of the present article is aware.

DR. LEOPOLD SONNLEITHNER."

The following is a literal copy of the play-bill in question:

"In the Imperial Hof-Theatre, nachst der Burg will be produced by the Imperial Court Operasingers, on Saturday, the 28th of March, 1801,

"For the benefit of Mdle. Casentini,
"DER DORFBARBIER,
"An Operetta in 1 Act. Founded on the farce of the same name.

"Afterwards, for the first time,
"DIE GESCHÖPFE DES PROMETHEUS,
"An heroico-allegorical Ballet in 2 Acts. Invented and produced by Herr Salvatore Viganò.

"Dramatis Personæ.

Prometheus,	Herr Cesari.
Children,	Madlle. Casentini.
Bacchus,	Herr Ferd. Girja.
Pan,	Herr Aichinger.
Terpsichore,	Mad. Brendi.
Thalia,	Mad. Cesari.
Melpomene,	Mad. Reuth.
Apollo,
Amfione,
Arione,
Orpheus,

"Subject: This allegorical ballet is founded on the fable of Prometheus.

"The philosophers of Greece, to whom he was known, explain the fable as an attempt to portray him as a person of elevated mind, who found the men of his time in a state of ignorance, and refined them by arts and sciences, and instructed them in morals.

"Proceeding from this basis, in the present ballet two statues, which become animated, are represented, and, by the power of harmony are rendered susceptible of all the passions of human life.

"Prometheus conducts them up to Parnassus, in order that they may receive instruction from Apollo, the god of the Fine Arts. Apollo orders Amphion, Arione and Orpheus to teach them music—Melpomene and Thalia to teach them tragedy and comedy—Terpsichore and Pan to teach them the most recently invented pastoral dances, and Bacchus to teach them the heroic dance, of which he was the originator.

"The music is by Herr van Beethoven.

"The scenery is by Herr Platzer, Imperial Court-chamber painter and scenic artist of the Imperial Theatre. The performances commence at half-past six o'clock."

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

SPRINGFIELD, Jan. 21, 1857.

MR. EDITOR—Noticing in your Journal of the 17th a communication from this city, bearing the signature of "Ad Libitum," in which appears some statements that are not true, and its whole tone extremely unfair, permit me to occupy a space in your columns in reply to your correspondent.

The concert was not advertised as a sacred one, but as an "Amateur Concert," nor was it ever designed that the selections should be other than miscellaneous. The charge against Mr. Fitzhugh, that he executed the voluntary on the organ in a rough and unskilful manner is not true; we were agreeably surprised at the artistic skill and dexterity shown; the most intricate harmonies were played with the left hand, and were accompanied by an admirable execution of rapid chromatics with the right, and the pedals well used; we deemed the whole an excellent display of rapid and exquisitely varied harmonies, each succeeding the other in beautiful progression. As a piano-forte fantasia it would have been absurd.

We next observe that "Ad Libitum" deems the sanctity of the place desecrated by the playing of the Duo for two pianos on the theme, "Se il Fratello," from Belisario. We had (ignorantly perhaps) considered all true music as an emanation from the Sublime Author of melody and harmony, and that because at times are found in secular opera themes of exquisite beauty and tenderness, they should be rejected, or played and sung only in the opera, is ridiculously absurd. Why does not "Ad Libitum" speak rather of the desecration of our churches Sunday after Sunday by many of our organists, his own friends, who are in the constant practice of preparing us for the solemn worship of Jehovah by playing as voluntaries such songs as "Old Dog Tray," "Sleeping I dream, love," and sentimental airs from blasphemous operas? We would conclude this remark by referring "Ad Libitum" to the wise saying of Him who spake as never man spake: "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone."

Again, the time in which the selections from the third Mass were performed is declared faulty. We have often heard the same movements performed by professional artists in Europe, but never with a nicer regard to time or precision. The soft passages were delicately rendered, and the Tutti with boldness and vigor. Surely Springfield ought to be proud that so goodly an array of talent was developed, and of so successful a performance. Amateurs can have but little leisure to devote to rehearsal, and it is unkind in the extreme to criticize them as though they were professionals. We do know that Springfield does appreciate the music performed, and on every hand praise is awarded.

Shame it is that "Ad Libitum" should allow lynx-eyed "Envy" to so dim his perceptions that he cannot appreciate the modest attempt to introduce music which will ultimately drive such trash as has hitherto been sung in our midst into that oblivion it so richly deserves.

At the earnest request of many the concert is to be repeated on Friday evening. MUSICUS.

Uriel Acosta.

At the last concert of the New York Philharmonic Society was performed an overture, by SCHINDELMEISSER, to "Uriel Acosta," which appears to have met with general favor. The programme contained the following synopsis of it, from the pen of Mr. C. B. Burkhardt, editor of the Dispatch.

URIEL ACOSTA.—The historical incidents upon which Carl Gutzkow's admirable tragedy is founded, (to which tragedy the present is a highly descriptive overture,) are not generally known, and a brief synopsis of them may materially assist a due understanding and appreciation of Schindelmeisser's descriptive music.

Uriel Acosta was born in Portugal, of Jewish parents, who by the inquisition had been forced to embrace Christianity. Their son Uriel was baptized, received the Christian name of Gabriel, and was instructed in the Christian faith. He subsequently studied jurisprudence, but being a deep thinker and ardent Bible student, he refused to consider the Roman church as the only true one, and held Judaism as the sole saving religion, since it alone taught the doctrine of only one God. These views he impressed upon his mother and brothers, and the family secretly fled to Amsterdam, where they could openly adhere to the Jewish faith. Here he again assumed the name of Uriel.

His theological studies and researches, however, soon imbued Uriel's mind with dogmas and principles at variance with the learned Rabbis, and the laws of the synagogue. To defend them, he published in 1624, a work entitled "Examen das tradicoes Pharisaeas conferidas con a ley escripta," in the Portuguese language, and this led to the most bitter persecutions. His property was confiscated, he was excommunicated, and in the public synagogue, the curses and anathema of the Rabbis were solemnly pronounced against him. At length wearied of all the indignities and sufferings, not only inflicted upon himself but upon those related to him, and also to obtain the hand of her he loved, and who was his disciple, he consented to recant, to denounce his own teachings, and to do the most humble penance. He publicly received lashes, and prostrated himself at the threshold of the Synagogue, that all the people might walk over him. In this position, a relative of his own, (and his seemingly successful rival for the fair Hebrew maiden's hand,) heaped additional indignities upon him; whereat, in the midst of his half finished penance, he suddenly withdrew his recantation in bitter rage, repeated the words of Galileo "E pur si muove," and at once re-asserted the truths of his teachings. He next attempted to shoot his rival and bitterest enemy, but failing in this he committed suicide. (1647.)

Gutzkow in the tragedy, has closely followed the above incidents. In this tragedy, however, the beloved of Acosta, who is betrothed to his enemy, marries that enemy to save her father from ruin, and immediately after the ceremony takes poison, which scene in the dénouement is quickly followed by the suicide of the hero.

At the very beginning of the overture, in the allegro movement, the repeatedly interwoven call of the rams' horns, (which are always sounded at high and solemn Hebrew rites,) indicates the ceremony of pronouncing the anathema, and also the subsequent recantation before the tribunal of the Rabbi. This allegro is followed by an andante maestoso for wind instruments, pronouncing a sort of a religious chorale, which is repeated by the stringed instruments (con sordini). An allegro vivace which follows, seems descriptive of the struggle in Uriel's heart, when against his solemn conviction, he is forced to recant and recall what he has written. The close is similar to the beginning; the sounds of the horn seem to indicate that fanaticism and persecution have triumphed, and that the lives of two noble beings have been sacrificed at the altar of bigotry. C. B. B.

LOVE.

BY W. W. STORY.

When daffodils began to blow,
And apple-blossoms thick to snow
Upon the brown and breaking mould—
'Twas in the spring—we kissed and sighed,
And loved, and heaven and earth defied,
We were so young and bold.

The fluttering bob-link dropped his song,
The first young swallow curved along,
The daisy stared in sturdy pride,
When loitering on we plucked the flowers,
But dared not own those thoughts of ours,
Which yet we could not hide.

Tiptoe you bent the lilac spray,
And shook its rain of dew away,
And reached it to me with a smile:
"Smell that, how full of spring it is!"—
"Tis now as full of memories
As 'twas of dew erewhile.

Your hand I took to help you down
The broken wall, from stone to stone,

Across the shallow bubbling brook.
Ah! what a thrill went from that palm,
That would not let my blood be calm,
And through my pulses shook.

Often our eyes met as we turned,
And both our cheeks with passion burned,
And both our hearts grew riotous,
Till, as we sat beneath the grove,
I kissed you—whispering "we love!"—
And thus I do—and thus.

When passion had found utterance
Our frightened hearts began to glance
Into the future's every day;
And how shall we our love conceal,
Or dare our passion to reveal;
"We are too young," they'll say,

Alas! we are not now too young,
Yet love to us hath safely clung,
Despite of sorrow, years and care—
But ah! we have not what we had,
We cannot be so free, so glad,
So foolish as we were.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Old Hundred.

The long disputed question whether Purcell or Handel was the author of the grand music of the Old Hundredth has been set at rest by a discovery made a few days since in Lincoln Cathedral library. Purcell died in 1695, and Handel in 1759, but in the Cathedral library a French psalter, printed in 1546, contains the music of the Old Hundredth, exactly as it is now sung, so that it could not be the production of either of the great musicians to whom it had been attributed.—Telegraph.

Who ever attributed "Old Hundred" to Purcell? Who to Handel? There is hardly a library to be found in the country, which makes any pretensions to a department of biblical works, which cannot show a copy of Marot and Beza's Psalms, or some old English Psalter, two or three hundred years old, with the tune in it. At Cambridge, for instance, there are some half a dozen copies or more of the tune, as shown long since in the pages of this Journal, printed before the year 1600. Of course the paragraph above is sheer nonsense save in one statement, which we are very sure is false—viz: that a French psalter of 1546 has the tune. Still this is possible, and if so is a very interesting fact to quite a number of persons, and to no one more so than to one who has sought this tune in many of the largest libraries in Germany, and has never found it, "exactly as now sung," in any earlier printed work than a psalter of 1559. Where is the original from which the above paragraph is made? T.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—On Saturday last Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK gave the first of a series of "Morning Recitals," (solve the riddle of this name who can) at a private house, the residence of a gentleman well known in the literary and philanthropic line. There was quite a select audience assembled (though the admission was general to all who purchased tickets), and the small, but most tastefully arranged rooms, filled with Art-remembrances of every kind, shed a very home-like atmosphere over the whole affair, which was also most satisfactory in a musical point of view. Mr. Goldbeck gains a firmer footing with the public at every appearance before them. He proves himself more and more an artist of sterling worth, free from all humbug and trickery, and full of earnest purpose. He has been remarkably prolific for one so young, (he having behind him only the third part of man's allotted years), and, to judge from the specimens which he gave us on this occasion, his creations may be placed in a high rank. He gave us two of a series of smaller pieces, denominated "Aquarelles," in which, according to his own expression, he has endeavored to represent in music an element analogous to that of the same name in painting. Whoever is familiar with the lovely little Aquarelles of the Düsseldorf painters, and of the beautiful late English water color pictures, will understand his intention, and be able to understand what these writings of Mr. Goldbeck are. Two or three other of his own compositions, which he introduced to us, were also full of merit; in them all there was not the least straining after effect, and a great deal of quiet dignity, united with all the freshness and spirit of youth. They were very refreshing, I can assure you, after some very modern piano compositions which are often inflicted upon us now-a-days, and which I fear are destined still to be more "the rage" than these more quiet ones.

In another thing, too, Mr. Goldbeck differs materially from other young pianists; he not only plays his own compositions very beautifully, but enters fully into the spirit of older and higher masters, as proved by his exquisite performance of Beethoven's Piano-forte Sonata, Op. 29, in D minor. He carried his whole audience away with him; I would not wish to hear the Adagio better played. There was a largeness, a depth of feeling in his rendering of it, that could hardly be surpassed. Mendelssohn's Sonata in F minor for piano-forte and violin, was also admirably played on Mr. Goldbeck's part, though Mr. DOEHLE, who took the violin, did not appear to as great advantage in this (probably from nervousness) as in a solo by Schubert, and Gounod's "Meditation sur la premiere Prelude de Bach," which he afterwards played. This young artist has great sweetness of tone and much skill.

These instrumental performances were relieved by some vocal pieces from Mme. JOHANNSEN. "Una voce" was rather too loud and elaborate for the locality, and was somewhat marred too, by a slight veil over the lady's voice. But she fully redeemed her credit by her admirable rendering of Schubert's "Au fenthal" and "Barcarolle." These just suited her really fine voice, and were sung with an ease and spirit which showed that the lady felt completely at home in them. Nor must I omit to mention her remarkably distinct enunciation, which of course greatly enhanced, to those who understood the language, the pleasure in her singing, and which is so rare a merit in singers of every class, that it cannot be praised enough where it does occur.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—All musical enthusiasm, as well as commercial enterprise, has been temporarily frozen by the excessive cold and buried under the falling snow. The opening of the Italian opera season at the Academy of Music, has been postponed by the storm until Wednesday.

I have to record the failure of two operatic speculations—the German Company at the Broadway Theatre, and the English Company at Niblo's; the result in each case being unavoidable from the wretched management of the respective troupes.

The German company includes some very good singers. Mme. SCHEERER JOHANNSEN, the prima donna, is a fair singer of the German school, but full of whims and caprices, constantly subject to stage "indispositions," and addicted to a pleasing little custom of declining to sing on the shortest possible notice. Mr. FROKANEER, the tenor, is a very young, pains-taking artist, and the basso, Mr. WEINLICH, and basso-buffo, Mr. OERHLIN, are passable. The company are competent to produce operas in good style, but during the past few weeks there has been a series of disappointments—operas postponed, indifferent singers substituted, and everything done to disgust the opera-going public. Consequently the season has failed to pay expenses, and the troupe leave next week for Philadelphia.

The English company has but one singer—LOUISA PYNE. The orchestra is wretched, the chorus microscopic, the opera hacknied, and it is only to be wondered at that they should draw as good houses as they have. Mr. Niblo engaged the Pyne and Harrison Troupe for a month, expecting to renew the engagement if they were successful. The month expires next Saturday and the company are not re-engaged; they have failed to draw paying houses, and the result is by no means to be wondered at.

THALBERG is expected to return to New York shortly, and OLE BULL will appear with him at the next series of concerts. Ole Bull has been for some weeks staying at the Prescott House with his family, and talks about returning to his Scandinavian home to spend the remainder of his life, for he is an enthusiastic Norwegian, and thinks there is no place like cold, bleak Norway. He has made a fortune in this country, though it is somewhat impaired by the losses consequent on his unfortunate operatic speculations.

The opening of the Italian opera by STRAKOSCH will be the great musical event of the week. His company is as yet rather weak, the cast of the opening opera, Lucrezia, embracing the names of two good singers, PARODI and TIBERINI, and two poor ones, D'ORMY and MORINO. Next week Mme. DE WILHORST, who has left the Thalberg concert troupe, will make her debut in opera as Lucia. It is probable that D'ANGRI will be also engaged by Mr. Strakosch, who, should this season be successful, will lease the Academy for a year, with intention of establishing a permanent opera here.

TROVATOR.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 24, 1857.

Thalberg's Last Concert.

The great pianist gave the fifth and last of the concerts in his own name—his piano concerts—on Friday evening. The Music Hall was packed as full as it could hold; we found a seat with hundreds on the stage. The programme was sufficiently heterogeneous and fragmentary for so more than musical an audience; the vocal distractions occupying eight parts to four of Thalberg—thus:

PART I.

1. Aria: La Favorita,.....Donizetti
Signor Morelli.
2. Aria: Azema di Granada,.....Mercadante
Mme. D'Angri.
3. Tarantella,.....Thalberg
S. Thalberg.
4. Aria: Sonnambula,.....Bellini
Mme. De Wilhorst.
5. Fantasia: Norma,.....Thalberg
Wm. Mason and S. Thalberg.
6. Duet: Semiramis,.....Rossini
Mme. D'Angri and Mme. De Wilhorst.

PART II.

7. Duet: L'Italiana in Algeri,.....Rossini
Mme. D'Angri and Sig. Morelli.
8. Septet: Scherzo, Andante with Variations, and Finale,.....Hummel
Flute, Mr. Krebs; Oboe, Mr. De Ribas; French
Horn, Mr. Hamann; Alto, Mr. Gärtner; Violoncello, Mr. Jungnickel; Basso, Mr. Stein.
9. Aria: La Fille du Regiment,.....Donizetti
Mme. De Wilhorst.
10. Soirées Musicales,.....Rossini
Sig. Morelli.
11. Rondo: Cenerentola,.....Rossini
Mme. D'Angri.
12. Fantasia: Lucrezia Borgia,.....Thalberg
S. Thalberg.

It may be shrewdly planned to catch the multitude, but to a frequent concert-goer these unconnected, for the most part, common-places of Italian opera, interspersed so largely between the real points of interest in a concert, and apropos to nothing, get to be somewhat tedious. There is a great sameness about it all; the Thalberg Fantasias are themselves hashes of Italian operas; for contrast and relief a little singing is quite welcome; but why continue hashing up the same meat (sweetmeat) vocally? Yet in justice to the artists we must say, that this time their selections were not so hacknied as these things usually are, except in style. The Non più mesta, to be sure, seems to be an invariable item of Mme. D'ANGRI's duties; but commend us to Rossini of them all; the comic duet from L'Italiana, the stately one from Semiramide, and any of the Soirées Musicales, are pleasant things to hear, and have not here been heard too often. Of the quality of the singing much of course might be said in praise; but the enjoyment of it was not a little impaired to one seated there behind the singers, with a cold air douche on him from the organ screen. The sounds were thinned and deadened; it was the wrong side of the tapestries. Of D'ANGRI and MORELLI we can say nothing new. Mme. DE WILHORST's bright, soaring, flexible, bird-like soprano, springing from her petite ladyship, had a certain hardness and coldness in it when she sang here first some months ago. This quality was now aggravated either by our unfavorable position, or by something else. She has a great deal of execution, chiefly of the hard, bright, glittering order, and she flings herself out with a bird-like kind of earnestness, not indicative, however, of much depth. The eagerness to hit a high mark sometimes made the note false. In calibre and color, what two voices could be more unlike than her's and D'Angri's! Yet they blended not badly in the Semiramis duet.

The most important feature of the evening, and a rare one in such concerts, was the Septet by HUMMEL (minus the first movement, and commencing with the Scherzo.) Those who heard this splendid composition four years since in OTTO DRESEL's Chamber Concerts, as played first by SCHARFENBERG, and afterwards by JAEHL, heard it to far better advantage than it could be heard now. Of course the principal instrument was played with that perfection of skill, united to full comprehension of the piece, in which THALBERG surpasses all others. It was feast enough to listen to the piano-forte alone; but the piece as a whole, as a concerted piece, was well nigh lost in the great Music Hall; it must be taken nearer home to us to be appreciated. The accompanying instruments—especially from where we sat—sounded dead and mean. The flute and oboe began out of tune, coming, no doubt, from a room of different temperature; the horn, with its all-penetrating sweetness, told better; but that delicious passage in the Trio where it sustains a final note and leads back with a happy surprise into the theme, was ineffective, from the poor blending of the half-starved tones; and the alto, in leading off the fugue theme afterwards, was ludicrously weak and scratchy. No one blames the artists, but the place. What a treat it would be to hear Thalberg in this Septet in a room like Chickering's!

The next most striking feature was the Fantasia for two pianos—not intrinsically for the composition, but as a display of virtuosity. The distribution of the harmonies, to be sure, the alternation of theme and accompaniment from instrument to instrument, the connecting passages, and the contrivance of sparkling tours de force, were as ingenious as the themes were hack-nied. Wonderfully well was the whole thing executed, the younger pianist bearing his banner proudly side by side with the winner of a thousand battles. The difficulties were about equally shared between them, and the ensemble was quite perfect. Yet on Thalberg's side there was the still finer touch, and what was clear before, stood out all the clearer and the bolder when his fingers took their turn. Once a rapid chromatic run, the whole length of the key-board, was executed by each in turn. MASON drew it fine, but THALBERG drew it finer. It was the fine line of Apelles, or whoever was the Greek painter who thus proved his skill against all comers.

The Tarantella, in which we had hoped to hear again that beautiful one of Thalberg's own, turned out to be his Fantasia upon Masaniello, in the course of which there is a Tarantella from that opera—one of his most pleasing Fantasias, and exquisitely played of course. The Lucrezia Borgia we could not stop to hear.

Mozart's Requiem—Thalberg and the Handel and Haydn Society.

In spite of the great snow storm following as the resolution of the ugliest and coldest "spell" for years, the Music Hall was filled last Sunday evening. Many were drawn by Mozart's "Requiem," and many by THALBERG and the miscellaneous "sacred" programme of the second part.

To make its full impression the Requiem must be heard many times, as it was almost entirely new to the larger part of the audience. We might go further, and say it should be heard in a cathedral, amid the solemn ceremonies of the service for the dead, with the inward preparation of a Catholic's literal idea of the last judgment, and predisposition to all the terror with which its images are made present by the sublime music of one who composed it as if for the peace of his own soul. Yet was the impression truly grand, as it was. Considering the short time allowed for rehearsals, we were agreeably surprised by the effective manner in which it was presented. The choruses went better than the solo quartets. The latter were not well balanced as to power and quality of voices. Mme. D'ANGRI's large contralto told most admirably in parts, but she appeared indifferent to the music. Sig. MORELLI lacked the deep basso profundo for the opening solo of the Tuba mirum. Both were quite out of time in the commencement, one after the other, of that delicate and beautiful piece of counterpoint, the Recordare. Mr. ARTHURSON, who possessed the style and spirit of the music better than any of them, lacked more than ever power of voice. Mrs. LONG was perfectly sure and correct in her music, and though not in her best voice, did much to redeem the whole. Yet the beauty of these exquisite quartets and solos was by no means entirely lost. The Benedictus, which is one of the loveliest and the least sombre of them all, gave deep and general pleasure; so did the opening of the Lachrymosa, which was sung as quartet, although by no means perfectly.

The chorus seats were unusually full, and the singers had made the most of their few rehearsals under their energetic conductor, CARL ZERBAHN. The principal defect was the failure now and then to come in all at once at the commencement of a piece. This of course is a difficult matter for so large a choir of amateurs, where the movements succeed each other sometimes with sudden change of key, without orchestral symphony or prelude. Trained musicians might do it, but under the circumstances would it not be well to count a bar or two between one movement and another, and allow time for all to find the pitch? The voices, however, were rich and full and musically blended, and the effect in most of the choruses very imposing and solemn. The grave and stately Adagio of the opening sentence: Requiem eternam dona eis, poured in its slow and sombre waves upon the orchestral introduction with truly religious effect, preparing the mind for grand and solemn thoughts to follow; and the burst of light upon Et lux perpetua luceat illis, excited the imagination to the highest degree. Then the flowing counterpoint, led in with the tenor solo: Te decet hymnus, and finally the difficult and complicated fugue of the Kyrie eleison, all were sung better than we should have thought it possible, and formed an introduction as poetically sublime as it was marvellously skilful in point of musical composition. The orchestra, too, did its work well throughout, for so small a number of strings; and the instrumentation is wonderful. Only the more sombre of the wind instruments are employed. There are no flutes, no oboes, no horns even. Besides the quartet of strings, there are only two bassoons, two corni di bassetto (for which the low tones of the clarinet were here made to serve), two trumpets, confined almost wholly to their lower tones, and occasionally three trombones and drums. The latter told with superb effect in certain choruses. This sombre coloring runs through the entire instrumentation.

The Dies iræ (Day of Wrath) chorus, with its wild, hurried agitato accompaniment, like wind-borne flames, was tremendous; one almost shuddered at the stern accent of the phrase: Quantus tremor est futurus! So of the Rex tremendæ majestatis, with its massive, ponderous movement. Again, with wild, agitated accompaniment of the double basses, as it were the stirring up of flames from the bottomless depths and terror from the deeper depths of the soul, the Confutatis maledictis spoke most powerfully to the imagination; and how heavenly the change, where suddenly the stormy tumult ceases, and ushered by a lovely violin figure, the sopranis alone, like a streak of pure amber sky opening through the tempest in the west, pour in a soft golden flood of sustained and sweetest harmony at Voca me cum benedictis, which gives way again to the darker harmony of the full choir. This and the Lachrymosa are perhaps the most beautiful things in the whole Requiem. The Sanctus is a sublime piece of simple, solid, church-like harmony, massive and Handelian in character. The Agnus Dei, with its wailing melodic accompaniment, is profoundly beautiful and touching; and the return of that solemn opening movement and fugue for the concluding sentence (which has been so stupidly used as an argument to prove that Mozart did not himself complete the Requiem) is precisely what the mind, so first awakened, and then wrought upon by strains of alternate loveliness and terrible grandeur, now requires.

Upon the whole it was a very successful performance, and there is a very general and earnest desire felt to hear the Requiem again, and more than once. There is reason to hope that this wish will be gratified when Thalberg, D'Angri, and the rest return to us a month hence.

And now for Part Second. After the "Requiem," how secular, how superficial, mean and showy sounded that Stabat Mater business, which we had served up to us first in the shape of Mercadante's overture, composed of motives of the work cleverly dove-tailed together! Rossini's sparkling, voluptuous, sensuous genius still, no matter what the subject. The overture was finely played; and Sig. MORELLI sang the Pro peccatis, not as BADIALLI sings it, yet in an effective and artistic manner. Who could care to hear it, ever so well sung, after Mozart's "Requiem"! Mme. D'ANGRI sang admirably the Figlio mio from the "sacred" opera of the Prophète, and had to sing it twice, THALBERG did not play upon the Orgue Alexandre, as had been once announced, but he did play two of his "sacred" Fantasias. The first, played on his Erard piano, was that founded on the Chorale and other motives from the Huguenots; the grandest, as well as most difficult, of his fantasias; what immense masses of tone were rolled out in the full chords of that hymn! It seems as if, in some of these swelling, magnificent climaxes, he created tone, developed it out of the instrument where it hardly existed before, it comes so bigger and bigger at his call and never disappoints you. The other, played on the Chickering piano, was on "Moses in Egypt." This we had thought his greatest fantasia, until we heard the Huguenots. On being recalled he played a portion of his beautiful "Andante."

What shall we say of the piano-fortes? In all his concerts since the first, Mr. Thalberg has played more upon the Chickering Grands than upon the Erard, and has appeared abundantly satisfied with such a medium for the interpretation of his music. This does not prove, to be sure, that he esteems the Erard beaten; but it is quite evident that he regards the Chickering instruments as the most formidable rivals, and pays them practically the highest compliment. To our ear there is still a purely musical quality in the Erard tones, which has not quite been reached by others. Forced to loudest effects, they sound a little antique and metallic, particularly in the middle treble octave; yet is the quality still musical, the altissimo tones exquisitely so, the bass magnificently rich. The Chickering tones are rounder, mellower throughout the whole compass, but they come upon the ear less distinct, as if the tone were not yet refined to its purely musical element. Perhaps there is a point where these two shall meet (and who more plainly in the way to find it than the Chickering?) which will solve the problem of a perfect piano tone. It is said the Chickering instruments stand in tune the best.

The Orpheus Glee Club.

One of the most enjoyable concerts we have had for a long while was that given by the members of our German Männerchor, the "Orpheus," on Saturday evening, as the first of a subscription series of three. Mercantile Hall was completely filled with a most animated looking audience, to the number, we should judge, of some four hundred persons. Perhaps one half of these were Germans; the rest were of our most musically cultivated native population, who are most in sympathy with German music. Better listeners or heartier applauders are seldom seen assembled. Decidedly a genial and a happy spirit reigned. The programme was felicitous:

- PART I.
1. Praise of Song.....Maurer
 2. Fantasia on Viollo, from "Lucia di Lammermoor,"...Artot
Mr. Schultze.
 3. Duet: "Le Nozze di Figaro,".....Mozart
Miss Doane and Mr. Kreissmann.
 4. Serenade.....Marschner
(From the works of the celebrated German Minstrel, "Wolkenstainer," who lived in the Fifteenth Century.)
 5. Air: "Jerusalem, thou that kildest the Prophets,"
From St. Paul.....Mendelssohn
Miss Doane.
 6. Chorus of Priests. From the "Magic Flute,".....Mozart
- PART II.
1. The Cheerful Wanderer.....Mendelssohn
 - 2 { a Song without Words.....Mendelssohn
b. Polonaise.....Chopin
Mr. Leonhard.
 3. Duet: "The Two Nightingales,".....Hackel
Messrs. R. Langerfeldt and C. Schraubstaedter.
 4. The Wanderer's Night Song.....Lenz
 5. Air: "Vedrai Carino." From "Don Giovanni,".....Mozart
Miss Doane.
 6. Hunter's Joy.....Astholz

The part-songs were beautifully sung by about thirty select voices from the Orpheus. Indeed we have never listened to better singing by male voices. The parts were well balanced and well blended; the tenors sweet and the basses full and rich, as heard collectively. They stood close together, like so many organ-pipes, in the little arched recess of the stage, and their leader, Mr. KREISSMANN, face to face with his attentive, sympathetic band, so that, what with previous careful drilling, there was no lack of unity. The expression of the various pieces was well rendered. All were pleasing in their way, and some truly beautiful. Marschner's music to the old Minnesinger Serenade was impressive by its depth of feeling and its mystical modulations. The "Wanderer's Night-Song" is the very music of the pines, and admirably conveys the quiet sentiment of Goethe's Unter allen Gipseln ist Ruh. There is a religious wholesome cheer in the piece by Mendelssohn, and the first and last choruses sounded jubilant and inspiring,—the last a little droll with its tra-la-la accompaniment of voices imitating instruments. The bits of solo occurring in some of the pieces were quite satisfactory. But of all the choruses, that simple and grand old piece of harmony from the "Magic Flute": O Isis and Osiris, was the most rich and satisfying, and was extremely well done.

The solo selections were equally choice. The Figaro duet was sung delightfully, with true delicacy of style and humor. It is rarely that we hear anything of Mozart so well rendered. Miss DOANE was equally fortunate in the noble aria from "St. Paul," and in Vedrai carino. She was encored twice after the last, and sung in answer a couple of English ballads with a grace and truth of style which we much doubt if any singer now in this country could surpass. This lady's voice should be more often heard in oratorios and concerts.

"The Two Nightingales," sung by a pleasing tenor and bass voice, (the latter dragged a little out of its native element,) was delightfully pathetic, and elicited an imperative encore. As to that, however, the programme was nearly doubled by the encores of almost every piece: a vicious habit of our public, although quite natural in so social a concert as this.

Mr. SCHULTZE's violin solo was played with his usual fine taste and expression. Edgardo died again, and Mr. OTTO DRESEL, who kindly accompanied on the piano, did it with an unction, being of course deeply affected by the undying melody.

Mr. LEONHARD's contributions, too, were highly relished, especially the "Song without Words," a swift whirling prestissimo movement, one of the last of the series.

THALBERG'S MATINEES.—At the earnest suggestion of many who wished to hear the great pianist in a smaller room, and in a more private, social way, a subscription was formed for a couple of Matinées at the Messrs. Chickering's Rooms.

These were given on Saturday and Tuesday last. A hundred or more ladies and gentlemen were present. This was the true way to hear him; here, after all, one seemed to hear him for the first time, for he played as if he were at home, with only sympathetic listeners. The selections, too, were choicer and more varied than would serve the ends of a concert before two thousand people. On Saturday, besides his Don Giovanni and L'Elisir fantasias, he gave two of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," namely, the Volkslied and the "Spring Song," and played them exquisitely; also of his own compositions, the entire Andante, (of which he gave a part on Sunday evening,) and his Etude in A, (with repeated notes,) which struck us as the most poetical and delicate of his productions that we have yet heard.

On Tuesday he played the "Huguenots" fantasia, with prodigious effect; also the fantasias on "Masaniello," "Sonnambula," and "Norma," (for two pianos,) with WILLIAM MASON. All these were astonishing. But his transcription of Beethoven's "Adelaide," and of the Quartet from I Puritani, (simply played from his book: L'Art du Chant appliqué au Piano), gave us the most unalloyed delight. It was the perfect transfer of a vocal melody (without any of the personal drawbacks) to the strings of an instrument. We fear we shall never wish to hear "Adelaide" sung again, for it never sang itself so purely, so tenderly and sweetly as under Thalberg's fingers. On both occasions he added a set of his own sparkling waltzes.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS.—The second concert of the "Orchestral Union," on Wednesday afternoon, drew a large audience. The great feature was the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart, which was very finely played, not excepting the complicated fugue finale with four subjects. We were amused a few days since by an attempt of a New York critic to trace the "Jupiter" interpretation through the symphony, whereby much ingenious pains were lost; since the name "Jupiter" was never dreamed of by its author or the Germans. Some member of an orchestra in London, after a rehearsal of this symphony, at a time when it was indeed the last word of Symphony, exclaimed: "This is the Jupiter of symphonies"; that is to say, the beat-all, the king of symphonies; and by that name has it gone in England to this day. Yet the critic found some justification for his poem in the kingly glorious, "cloud-compelling" tone of the composition, which is all joy and majesty and happy sense of power, except the Adagio, which is exquisitely tender and pathetic, and at times awfully tragic.

The Freyshutz overture was played again, and splendidly—the fourth time in these two weeks. A luscious set of Strauss waltzes (Wiener Punschlieder), and Mr. ZERRAHN's "Polka Redowa," on Rigoletto, gave great pleasure. Master PETERSILEA played transcriptions of two of Schubert's songs; the Ave Maria and L'Adieu, not the prodigious ones by Liszt, but less ambitious, yet by no means easy ones, by E. Wolff. These were very good selections for such an occasion, and the rendering showed talent in the lad, though such melodies, to sing themselves on the piano, demand that expression which could not be expected in a player of his age. The Coronation March from "The Prophet" closed the entertainment.

Musical Chat-Chat.

This evening the PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS make a new beginning. The first was anything but a failure; to the public it was a failure in name, in theory, but a remarkable success in fact. Mr. ZERRAHN alone had reason to feel disappointed, and he magnanimously bore the burden, and was the only sufferer; nine out of ten, at least, of his subscribers thought the extra orchestral pieces more than a compensation for the non-appearance of a solo virtuoso. At his own severe expense Mr. Zerrahn made that concert, a gift complimentary to his subscribers, and commences the subscription series to-night. Surely he has a claim upon all interested in orchestral music. Furthermore this time his soloist, Herr SCHREIBER, will appear, his failure to do so before having been satisfactorily explained by accident beyond the control of either party. Herr S. will play a couple of remarkable trumpet solos. So much by way of "attraction." Then, in the way of substantial orchestral poetry of music, he offers us the grand old C minor Symphony and a favorite piece from Mendelssohn's Symphony-Cantata: "Song of Praise;" for notable novelty the Carnival of Rome translated into an overture by HECTOR BERLIOZ; and for make-weight, the "Zampa" overture and a Romanza with solos for Corno Inglese and Flute. May the Melodeon be so crowded as to send us to the Music Hall the next time!

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB announce their fifth concert for next Tuesday evening. Mrs. J. H. Long will sing for them a Cavatina from Lucia, and Mr. Parker's "Maud" serenade. The Club will play a Quartet by Haydn for the first time, the Quintet, with clarinet, by Mozart, and several choice movements from Mendelssohn's Posthumous Quartet in E, and from a Quintet by Onslow.

A more beautiful sight is not often seen than the Boston Music Hall, filled as it was on Monday last week by three thousand happy children from our Grammar Schools, listening to the strains of THALBERG, D'ANGRI and MORELLI. The graceful kindness will be long appreciated. The entire floor was one wide dense flower-garden of girls, with boys packed in the aisles, as well as in the upper galleries. The selections were of the most appropriate, and Mr. Thalberg was as much the artist before his young audience as he is always. But of course it was too fine to excite them much. The singing, especially the comic pieces from "The Barber," stirred up the multitudinous applause most, and so sharp was the look-out for fun that the whole hall laughed out more than once at some of the singer's flourishes that were never meant for fun. The Rev. S. K. LOTHROP, who presided, made a graceful little speech of thanks to the artists in the name of the committee, and the children, led by their teacher, Mr. BUTLER, returned theirs by singing "Sweet Home," (yet the sound seemed to come from a small portion of them.) It was a sight to warm one's heart with gratitude, for our free schools, for such a hall in which to show their pride, for Art and generous artists.—On Saturday morning the scene was repeated, with a difference, for the benefit of other schools not represented. The crowd and the enthusiasm were even greater than before. The children rose in their seats, waved their handkerchiefs and hurraed for Thalberg, D'Angri and Morelli for five minutes. Young girls loaded the artists with flowers, and the children this time really joined in singing, under their teacher, Mr. SOUTHARD, "Hail Columbia," with exhilarating effect. The eleven thousand free school children have not yet all had their turn, and Mr. Thalberg announces his design to sing to the rest, when he returns.

NATIONAL SONGS.—The Royal Academy of Belgium has offered a prize of a gold medal of the value of 600*fr.*, for the best treatise on the following subject: "What affinity exists in various countries between popular songs? and the origin of religious songs since the establishment of Christianity? Prove that affinity by monuments, the authenticity of which cannot be denied." The competitors are to send in their productions, written in Latin, French, or Flemish, before the 1st June, 1857.

A "Vocal Association" has been formed in London on the plan of the German Liedertafel. It numbers two hundred subscribers, and Mr. JULES BENEDICT is the conductor. The object is to attain, with a large mass of voices, a high degree of excellence and refinement in the execution of such choral music as requires little or no instrumental assistance. Great stores of music are open to the society for this purpose, by the older Italian, the older and modern German, and the English composers.

It is reported in the French papers that the voice of the celebrated tenor, DUPREZ, has changed to a baritone, and that in consequence he has been induced to accept an engagement with the Théâtre Lyrique, and to make his first appearance as Verdi's Rigoletto....Mme. CLARA SCHUMANN has been playing at Copenhagen, before the Dowager Queen, at the concerts of the Société de Musique, and at several soirées....SCHULHOFF, the pianist, is at Milan....Mme. PLEYEL, the pianist, has just finished a triumphant tour in Switzerland, whence she goes to Italy....An Englishman, HENRY HUGO PIERSON by name, author of the oratorio "Jerusalem," has composed and published a bulky volume of "Music to the Second Part of Goethe's Faust." The Athenæum says: "Jerusalem was obscure and grim enough to satisfy the wildest of that singular coterie, which believes that music can exist without continuous phrase or intelligible form; but the setting of the second part of Faust leaves Jerusalem far in the rear."

The New Orleans Picayune speaking of theatricals and music in Australia, says:

MISKA HAUSER, he with the "Bird on a tree," had also had a concert, introducing a sextuor, composed by Mayseder, and a quartetto with variations on "God Save the Queen," composed by Onslow, both of which were performed for the first time in New South Wales. His own variations on the national English anthem were greatly praised. "Of his solo playing," says a local critic, "it is unnecessary to offer comment; his perfect tone, the liquid notes which he produces, combined with an extraordinary memory, stamp him as a violinist of the first order." He had announced three Clinical Member concerts, promising to produce in perfection the quintets, quartets, trios, duets, &c., &c., of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Onslow, Hummel, and other great lights of art, who, by their genius, have irradiated the family circle, and whose honored names are "household words" in all climes. He was to be assisted by our other old friend, Mr. George Loder, who had arrived at Sidney in the second week of August. The subscription was to be one guinea for the three concerts, and a brilliant success was anticipated.

By "Clinical Member concerts," in the above, are we to understand Classical Chamber Concerts? We wish Miska Hauser a safe delivery.

A Parisian journalist, giving a sketch of the artistic career of Mlle. PICCOLOMINI, mentions an anecdote too good not to be repeated. He tells us that her debut took place in Florence before she was sixteen years of age, and that the role selected, of all others, for the occasion was the terrible Lucrezia Borgia! Her appearance, at present extremely juvenile, was then infinitely more so; but, notwithstanding this invraisemblance, the opera went off with the greatest applause, until her dispute with the duke, where Lucrezia exclaims, "Tremble! Duke Alfonso! Thou art my fourth husband; and I am Borgia!" This passage, in the mouth of a child, so completely overthrew the gravity of the audience that an uncontrollable burst of laughter issued from every part of the Theatre, mixed with plaudits for her talent. The unsuitable nature of the character to her age and appearance did not, however, prevent her having an extraordinary amount of success, which never abandoned her, and she soon after became the idol of Florence and other cities of Italy.

We had to omit from "Trovatore's" last letter the following, which is too good to lose. But our friend evidently does not know the estimation in which ADELAIDE PHILLIPS is deservedly held in Boston, which is more familiar with the charge of being very proud of her:

"From Havana we hear of the great hit of Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, in Trovatore, and I am rejoiced to learn that this delightful and promising young singer is appreciated, as she should be. You must acknowledge that the Bostonians treated this lady with most ungallant coolness, for though LA GRANGE, in her benefit at the Boston Theatre, was rewarded with expensive jewelry, yet Adelaide Phillips, a Boston girl, at her benefit, received not even the empty compliment of a bouquet. Yet she is a very pleasing singer, and promises to become a first-class one. Her voice is deliciously fresh, and she has one note particularly (the G, above the staff, I think) which is enough to set an enthusiastic lover of singing quite crazy with delight. It is a vocal pearl, for which even La Grange could well afford to change some of her vocal and jewel diamonds, and be the gainer. I have no doubt that if Miss Phillips gains a reputation elsewhere, the very critics who treated her so coldly, will be the first to suddenly strike up loud psalms in her praise. Critics are like sheep: let some leading bell-wether start on a certain track, and they all follow blindly, scarce knowing where they go; and let the same bell-wether lead them back on the same track, and they turn around and follow with the most sheepish air imaginable."

☞ A notice of Mr. SATTEN's Concert is unavoidably deferred till next week.

Musical Intelligence.

MANCHESTER, N. H. (From the American, Dec. 31.)—The last of Stratton's brilliant concerts came off last night to an overflowing house. There was a great rush for best seats, there being hundreds around the doors long before they were opened; those that came late took their stand around the back part of the hall. Mrs. Long was in good voice, and sung in her usual good taste and style, and was loudly applauded. She is a fine singer, and we regret we cannot hear her more this season. The German Trio were up to the mark again, and performed as only the German Trio can perform. The Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Stratton sustained their high reputation in every respect, on this occasion. Are we not to hear them again this season? Why not organize, and have a Philharmonic Society, or something of the kind? We think there is every encouragement for a resident musician to keep the ball rolling, so well put in motion by Mr. Stratton, and have an Orchestra firmly established, with Mr. Stratton as conductor. We think they would be well supported.

ALBANY, N. Y.—George Wm. Warren, the warm-hearted and enthusiastic artist, gave his second annual Concert for the Poor at the Clinton Square Church on Thursday evening. He was assisted by his pupils, including his singing classes, numbering eighty voices, with solos by Misses Hinkley and Palmer, an amateur tenor, and others. The music opened with a charity hymn to old "St. Ann's," and closed with a burlesque potpourri à la Jullien. Taubert's "Lullaby," selections from Trovatore and Traviata, Warren's "Christmas Carol," and "Jack Frost Gallop" (for piano), a solo on the Organ Melodion (Alexandre), and all sorts of things sentimental, bright and funny, made up the programme. (Much obliged for invitation; but we have not learned the art of setting this terrible Jack Frost to music!)

PHILADELPHIA.—The splendid new opera house, or "Academy of Music," was to be inaugurated on Tuesday evening by a promenade concert and ball. In a few weeks Mr. E. A. Marshall, the lessee of the building, will commence Dramatic performances in it. Opera, we presume, will be an occasional guest there, as it is at our Boston Theatre.—Fitzgerald says:

Our ladies are all in extacies about the weekly concerts now given by the Germania Band, and the Musical Fund Hall is sometimes filled on Saturday afternoon by a bevy of fair faces, who laugh and chat and applaud as if they supposed that it all is intended for their benefit alone. The gentlemen, however, have determined that the fair creatures shall not have all the pleasure to themselves, and are beginning to muster in considerable strength. Happy fellows, those Germanians, to be surrounded by such a collection of beautiful faces; but they deserve it, for a better corps of musicians, we don't desire to listen to.

NEW ORLEANS.—We clip some items from the Picayune, to serve as specimens of what is continually going on in the way of opera.

THEATRE D'ORLEANS, (Jan. 3).—We are having good times at the opera, now-a-days. This evening, "Robert le Diable" is to be performed again, with the same great cast as before. On New Year's night, there was a jam, to see the "Child of the Regiment," which was performed admirably. The comic strength of the company is now very great. Nor is that of the grand side of the troupe less so. On Monday evening, M'mes Colson and Bourgeois, and Messrs. Lagrave, Junca, Magne, &c., appear in "Huguenots."

Mr. Boudousquie gives us, for our Eighth of January entertainment, this evening, Verdi's great opera of "Jerusalem," or "The Lombards." M'lle Muller, and Messrs. Moulin, Junca and Magne have the leading parts in this opera, which has not yet been given this season. We may look for a fine house on this occasion, as the opera is ever a great favorite, and the cast a new and a very strong one.

(Jan. 10).—This evening the ever favorite grand opera of Meyerbeer, "Les Huguenots," is to be performed with a superior cast. To-morrow the new drama by Dumas, Jr., author of "Dame aux Camelias," will be presented. It is called "Le Demi-Monde." Monday the fine opera "Si j'étais Roi," by Adam, will be given by Colson and Latouche, Delagrave, Guillot and Magne.

(From the same, Dec. 28).—The musical taste of New Orleans, our friend Dwight thinks, is quite a remarkable reflex of that of Paris. He is partly right and partly wrong in this opinion.

Our French Opera House is situated in the old, or French, part of the city, and there it has been situated for nearly, if not quite, half a century. Every year the habitués of the Opera are solicited to engage the loges and balcony-seats, lattice boxes and parquet chairs for the season of five months, for two nights in each week—Fridays and Saturdays, which are the regular subscription, and, of course, the fashionable nights. Besides these, there are performances on Sunday (dramatic), Monday and Thursday evenings, or, as we call them, "the off-nights." On these the visitors go in comparative deshabille, and the auditorium, in consequence, does not present the brilliant appearance it wears on the subscription nights. But it is on those that we get the first taste of a new débutant, or a new opera—the subscribing patrons being, perforce, content with the second cut at these luxuries.

Now, it is a fact that will make itself apparent to any one who will observe, that the French Opera is in a very great degree, if not in the larger, supported by the people who reside or sojourn out of and above the French section of the city. Among the season subscribers there will be found, we think, a preponderance, even, of this part of the population; and certainly, if the opera were to be altogether deprived of the support of that portion of the community, it could hardly be a profitable concern to its conductor.

True it is, we get most of our operas and all our singers from France, but we are not ready to admit that we import our musical taste from its capital: certainly not all of it, nor even in any such degree as to strike an understanding observer as remarkable. A very considerable portion of our population here is German, and we had a proof, the other evening, on the occasion of the concert of our "Athenée" association, that there is such a thing in New Orleans as a decided taste for German music; while English and Italian opera, oratorio and concert singing are received with a degree of favor, and an appreciativeness, that show the existence of something besides a French musical taste in our midst.

We should like to have an opportunity of showing the accomplished and able editor of the Journal what we are doing and can do in the musical way in New Orleans. It is very pleasant and gay here, just now; cannot be run down, and pass a few weeks with us?

LOUISVILLE, Ky.—The concert given on Wednesday evening for the benefit of the Orphans' Home, was well attended, and gave very general satisfaction to the audience. Some of the amateurs gave evidence of good natural abilities and careful training, and they may appropriate to their own use very considerable praise. Next Tuesday evening the Orpheus Society will give its first public concert. This society has been formed since the demise of the old Mozart, and bids fair to rival that in the estimation of the public. The Orpheus is composed of German musicians mostly, if not entirely and will discourse most eloquent music. On Tuesday evening they will be assisted by some of the best amateur talent in the city, and produce the best choruses of Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Abt. E. W. Gunter, director, and G. Zoller, pianist.—Democrat.

Advertisements.

MELODEON.

THE SECOND OF THE
PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,
(Being the FIRST of the regular series of four) will be given on SATURDAY EVENING, Jan. 24, 1867, at the MELODEON with the assistance of

HERR LOUIS SCHREIBER,
Solo Trumpet-player to the King of Hanover.

The principal pieces will be: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Overture "Le Carnaval Romain," by Hector Berlioz (1st time); TWO GRAND SOLOS on the cornet-a-piston by Herr SCHREIBER, the Overture to "Zampa" by Herold, etc. etc.

Subscription Lists may be found at the principal music stores, where also tickets can be obtained. Packages of 4 tickets, $3; single ticket $1.

Doors open at 6½; Concert to commence at 7¼ o'clock.
CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's FIFTH CONCERT

Will take place on Tuesday, Jan. 27, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms, assisted by Mrs. J. H. LONG, Vocalist.

Mozart's Clarinette Quartette, a new Quartette by Haydn, and other fine works, for which see programme.

Half package of four Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $3.50; Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1867. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERRAHN, Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.

Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts. To be had at the music stores of E. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.

Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 3 o'clock.

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING: An Analytical, Physiological and Practical System for the Cultivation of the Voice. By CARLO BASSINI. Edited by R. STORRS WILLIS. Price $4.

The special attention of Teachers and all persons interested in the study and practice of vocal music, is respectfully called to this new and valuable work.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

Krentzer's 40 Studies for the Violin.

JUST PUBLISHED, PRICE $1.50.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

TREMONT-TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO.
Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices.
THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbaud, a few copies.
Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,

Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, .

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—(Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 18. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue. $1 68
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction. 1 68
- " 3. Fête on Choir and Chorus Singing. 88
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School. 21
- " 5. Cate's Treatise on Harmony. 68
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction. Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards. 2 68

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church,)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,

(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 38 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,

ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,

Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.

NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 55 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. F. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line. 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line. 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion. $12.00
Do do each subsequent. $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 252.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 18.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 12 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

Mozart's Requiem.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

There exist two works of Mozart, an Opera and a Mass for the dead, in which the phenomenon of his moral individuality and his mission as a musician announce themselves with a wonderful evidence for the critic as well as for the biographer. We have seen under what auspices Don Juan, the opera of operas, saw the light. Mozart wrote it in his finest days, in the midst of enjoyments, surrounded by glory and in a state of health, and yet the great voice of death sometimes reached him in the midst of these thousands of enchanting voices; it spoke every night to him. Don Juan thus appears as the result of an equal conflict, or as the equilibrium of two contrary influences. The Requiem announces the decisive victory of one of them. The opera is the whole problem of life laid before our eyes; the Mass for the dead is its solution; one leaves off with the grave, the other begins there. While the investigation instigated by Godfrey Weber has disturbed the air of miracle or the romantic coloring which attached to the historical origin of the Requiem, it has at the same time formally confirmed the really marvellous thing about it; I mean the moral relation between the work and its author. It has completely established two main points: first, that the Requiem was the last work of Mozart; secondly, that Mozart, when he wrote it, thought he wrote it for himself. * * * Mozart, keenly occupied with the thought of his near death, thinks he finds a hint from Heaven in the order he has just received. Such an impression is extremely natural, and one cannot see why it should have operated with more or less power on the mind of the sick man, had the work been ordered by one of his acquaintances instead of by an unknown person. But perhaps he took Count Walsegg or his messenger to be a supernatural being or the angel of death in person! We leave these fancies to the poets, who have celebrated the last moments of Mozart; they can find no place in a biography, from which, as my readers already know, they are excluded by several accredited and rather prosaic facts; for instance, the ducats paid beforehand, the confessed delay, the offer of increased compensation. One may believe in a hint from another world, without having to imagine that the person or the circumstance, which serve as a premonition, are themselves initiated into the mysteries of fate. Have we not seen sick persons turn pale at the scream of an owl, and others make their will when they have heard a dog howl beneath their window? Surely an individual who orders a funeral mass of a musician who feels himself on the brink of the grave, seems a much more significant and trustworthy omen of death than a four-footed beast, that howls, or a bird that shrieks out in the gloom of night. * * * It is for us a want of the heart and a duty of the writer to recur to particulars already related in the form of a simple biography.

It will be remembered that Mozart in tears embraced his friends in Prague, whom he did not hope to see again. As soon as he gets home he completes what he has still left to do upon the Zauberflöte; he directs in person the first representations of this opera. And now he is pressed to fulfil his obligations and finally to employ in a work of some extent the high church style, which he so greatly loved, and to which he had devoted the most persevering studies, of which the labors of his childhood and youth, as for instance, his Misericordias Domini and his Davidde penitente, the extracts from Handel which he preserved in his portfolios, and finally his Ave verum corpus and the Chorale in the Zauberflöte, prove. Mozart sets himself to work to commence the Requiem, when a thought, which had without doubt seized upon his soul from the day of the order, illumined his dawning conception like a flash of lightning. Terrible light! This grave, for which harmonious tears are asked of him, is his own. No doubt, no hope more—he must die! Every moment this depressing thought gains more consistency, and fixes itself more firmly in the sick man's mind; but the inspiration which he draws from it, lends him thus far unknown immeasurable, supernatural powers. He writes, and all else is forgotten. Henceforth the night may follow the day, or the day the night; for the minstrel of eternity there is no time more. The light, which once more rises, without bringing hope to him, the darkness which envelops the earth, without lapping him in repose, leave him and find him always in the same place, thinking, writing, without any cessation. An inexpressible interest, a painful inspiration, chains him to this labor, which is his last business in this world; and yet he sees death at the end of his labor; he sees him opposite himself—as he moves, approaches nearer and nearer, with his hollow eyes and hideous skeleton grin. He sees him, and the fear of not being able to bring the sublime hymn to an end, drives him to more and more strenuous toil. The pages of the Requiem are filled, and the life of the inspired singer melts away like the remains of a wax candle, which burns before the image of the Savior, and which, as in tears of devotion, consumes drop by drop its last existence.

But hasten as the musician would, the inexorable phantom was quicker than he was; he could not complete the work.

Scarcely had Mozart laid himself upon his death-bed, when we see a sudden and happy change take place in his fortunes. Already has the popular success of the Zauberflöte taught all Germany to speak his name with pride; already all contemporary celebrities begin to pale before his wonderful star; yet a few years and this star would with its immeasurableness and its splendor, have filled the whole musical horizon of Europe. Even fortune, tired out, and ashamed to persecute the great man longer, reached out to him the hand of reconciliation. They had given him an honorable position; orders poured in on all sides. And when at last the path of success, of glory and of independence seemed to open before him, which everything had prophesied for him from his cradle, which musicians without a future had traversed before his eyes with rapid and triumphant steps; when finally fortune seemed disposed to shower her favors over him, ah, then it was too late! God called the laborer to himself at the moment when he was about to grasp the reward for all his earthly toil! Is there anything finer and more dramatic in the infinite drama of human destiny, than this development, which coincides with the catastrophe? than this young man, who called himself Mozart, and for whom the tardy justice of contemporaries is nothing but the first homage of posterity?—this crowned and dying wrestler, who in the bitterness of his heart exclaims: And now must I go away, just when I might live quietly! now leave my Art, when, no more the slave of fashion, no longer chained by speculators, I might follow the impulse of my feelings, and write freely and independently just what my heart inspires me! Now must I forsake my family, my poor children, in the very 'moment when I should have been in a condition to provide better for their welfare!

Thus he spake, and this so touching speech, so calculated to draw tears, was after all but a mistake in the lips of the predestined man. No—Mozart was neither the slave of fashion nor the foot-ball of speculators; but the instrument of Providence. If he was not free in the choice of his labors, it was because his free choice in the future would not have served the cause of music so well as the fatality of circumstances, which he obeyed against his will. He was obliged to go, because his mission was at an end; he had to leave his Art, but not before he had attained its highest summit. What should he have made after Don Juan, after his last Symphonies, after the overture to the Zauberflöte, and after the Requiem? He must have ceased to live while yet a young man, because his vital powers were exhausted (so to say) by the production of super-human works; a genius growing old would have been incapable of these; the condition and the price of such was necessarily an early end. He left his wife and children nothing; but the inheritance of a name ever dear and glorious in the memory of nations must have shaped itself fruitfully in the hands of Providence. The widow's was an honorable lot, the orphans received a good education. Ah, if our hero could have thought more cheerfully or more resignedly, in these fearful moments, upon something else than his approaching death and those strongest, sweetest ties of nature, which it threatened to sunder; if it had been possible for him to cast a calmer look backwards, and to recapitulate that wonderful life, which in ten years included more than a century; if the most glorious annals of Art which are found registered in the catalogue of his works could have unfolded themselves before the eyes of the dying man in a long perspective of imperishable harmonies, then Mozart would have understood his destiny; complaint would have grown dumb upon his lips, and he would have left the earth as the Christian victor leaves the battle-field, commending his actions to the heavenly mercy.

[To be continued.]

(Continued from page 130.)

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Gleaned from HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

THE FRENCH HORN.

The horn is a noble and melancholy instrument; the expression of its quality of tone, and of its sonorousness, are, nevertheless, not those which unfit it for figuring in any kind of piece. It blends easily with the general harmony; and the composer—even the least skilful—may, if he choose, either make it play an important part, or a useful but subordinate one. No master, in my opinion, has ever known how to avail himself of its powers more originally, more poetically, and at the same time more completely, than Weber. In his three finest works, Oberon, Euryanthe, and Der Freischütz, he causes the horn to speak a language as admirable as it is novel; a language which Méhul and Beethoven alone seem to have comprehended before him, and of which Meyerbeer, better than any one, has maintained the purity. The horn is, of all orchestral instruments, that which Gluck wrote least well for; the simple inspection of one of his works suffices to lay bare his want of skill in this respect. We must however quote, as a stroke of genius, those three notes of the horn imitating the couch of Charon in the air from Alceste: "Charon now calls thee!"

They are middle C₂, given in unison by two horns in D; but the author having conceived the idea of causing the bells of each to be closed, it follows that the two instruments serve mutually as a sordine, and the sounds, interclashing, assume a distant accent, and a cavernous quality of tone, of the most strange and dramatic effect.

Rossini, in the hunting-strain of the second act of Guillaume Tell, conceived the idea of causing a diatonic phrase to be executed by four E₂ horns in unison. It is very original. When four horns are thus united, either in a sustained air, or in a rapid passage which requires the use of closed sounds and open sounds, it is far better (unless the idea be based on this very variety and inequality of sounds) to put them all in different keys; the open sounds on some, thus compensating the small sonorousness of the corresponding closed sounds on others, preserve the balance, and give to the scale of the four combined horns a kind of homogeneity. Thus, while the horn in C gives the E₂ (closed), if the horn in E₂ gives the C (open), the horn in F the B₂ (open), and a horn in B₂ the F (closed), there results from these four different qualities a quadruple E₂ of a very beautiful tone; and, evidently, it is nearly the same with all the others.

I have said that the horn is a noble and melancholy instrument, notwithstanding those jocund hunting flourishes so often quoted. In fact, the gaiety of these strains arises rather from the melody itself, than from the quality of tone of the horns; hunting flourishes are only really jocund when played on trumpets,—an instrument little musical, whose piercing sound, even in the open air, bears no resemblance to the chaste and reserved voice of the horn. By forcing in a particular way the emission of the air from the tube of a horn, it is brought, however, to resemble that of the trumpet; which is called making the sounds brassy.

This may sometimes be done with excellent effect, even on closed notes. When there is need to force the open notes, composers generally require the performers—in order to give the sound all possible roughness—to take off the bells of their instruments; and they then indicate the condition of the horns by these words:—"Bells off." A magnificent example of the employment of this means is to be found in the final outburst of the duet in Méhul's Euphrosyne et Coradin:—"Gardez vous de la jalousie." Still under the influence of this fearful yell of the horns, Grétry one day answered somebody who asked him his opinion of this tempestuous duet:—"It is enough to split the roof of the theatre with the skulls of the audience!"

THE TRUMPET.

The quality of tone of the trumpet is noble and brilliant; it suits with warlike ideas, with cries of fury and of vengeance, as with songs of triumph; it lends itself to the expression of all energetic, lofty, and grand sentiments, and to the majority of tragic accents. It may even figure in a jocund piece; provided the joy assume a character of impulse or of pomp and grandeur.

Notwithstanding the real loftiness and distinguished nature of its quality in tone, there are few instruments that have been more degraded than the trumpet. Even including Beethoven and Weber, every composer—not excepting Mozart—has persisted in either confining it to the unworthy limits of fillings-up, or in causing it to sound two or three commonplace rhythmical formulæ; as vapid and ridiculous, as they are incompatible, very often, with the character of the pieces in which they occur. This detestable practice is at last abandoned; all composers, now-a-days, of any merit and style, make accord with their melodical designs, with their form of accompaniment, and with the trumpet's powers of sound, all the latitude, the variety, and independence which the nature of the instrument affords. It has needed almost a century for the attainment of this much.

Trumpets with pistons and with cylinders have the advantage of being able, like the horns with pistons, to give all the intervals of the chromatic scale. They have lost nothing of the quality of the ordinary trumpet, by the super-addition of these facilities; and their correctness of intonation is satisfactory. The trumpets with cylinders are the best: they will soon come into general use.

Keyed trumpets, still employed in some Italian orchestras, cannot be compared to them in this respect.

THE CORNET A PISTONS.

The cornet a pistons is very much the fashion in France at present, particularly in a certain musical world where elevation and purity of style are not considered essential qualities; and it has thus become the indispensable solo instrument for quadrilles, galops, airs with variations, and other second-rate compositions. The habit which exists now-a-days of hearing in ball orchestras melodies devoid of all originality and distinction executed on this instrument, together with the character of its quality of tone, which has neither the nobleness of the horn, nor the loftiness of the trumpet, renders the introduction of the cornet a pistons into the high melodical style a matter of great difficulty. It may figure there with advantage, however; but very rarely, and on condition of its playing only phrases of large construction and of indisputable dignity. Thus, the ritornello of the trio in Robert le Diable, "O my son," &c., suits well with the cornet a pistons.

Jocund melodies will always have to fear from this instrument a loss of a portion of their nobleness, if they have any, or, if they have none—an additional triviality. A phrase which might appear tolerable, played on violins, or on wooden wind instruments, would become poor and detestably vulgar, if brought out by the snapping, noisy, bold sound of the cornet a pistons. This danger is obviated if the phrase be of such a nature that it can be played at the same time by one or more trombones; the grand sound of which then covers and ennobles that of the cornet. Employed in harmony, it blends extremely well with the general mass of brass instruments; it serves to complete the chords of the trumpets, and to contribute to the orchestra those diatonic or chromatic groups of notes, which, on account of their rapidity, suit neither the trombones nor the horns.

[To be continued.]

Herr Dorn's New Opera.

(Translated for the Lond. Mus. World, from the "Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.")

A new opera is an event for every theatre, especially for one of the first rank. It was, therefore, natural that the most general interest should be manifested in the production of a new opera by the Capellmeister, Herr Dorn. This interest was necessarily more lively in Berlin, as, from the position of the composer, and the extraordinary success of his last opera, Die Nibelungen, public expectation was raised to the highest pitch. The opera is called Ein Tag in Russland (A Day in Russia), the text being taken from the French by that skilful libretto writer, Herr Grünbaum, who has portioned out his subject into three acts, of which the last is, properly speaking, to be considered only as a ballet conclusion of the whole, and is, therefore, not to be included in it. But the two acts alone are, perhaps too long and circumstantial for the subject, because the action is really not sufficiently great to be limited to a few dramatic scenes, if it is intended to excite any interest. A noble Russian discovers, immediately after his marriage, that his young bride is far from possessing amiable qualities, and determines to cure her in a peculiar manner. He sets out for St. Petersburg, and proceeds to a joiner, adopting measures for the carriage, in which his young bride is travelling, to break down in the neighborhood, so that the lady is compelled to seek refuge in the house of the joiner, while the latter mends the vehicle. She here finds her husband as a workman, and is not a little astonished at a noble countess, like herself, being married to such a person. The deception practised by her husband excites her anger to the highest pitch. After the most decided efforts have been made in the joiner's work-shop, on the part of the youthful wife, to strike fear into the whole plebeian set, and on the part of the latter to behave in the best possible manner towards their visitor, the authorities make their appearance, and carry off the entire company. The scene is now transported to the castle of the Count, and the latter's sister espouses so far the cause of the youthful wife as to manifest her willingness to aid her in obtaining a separation from the joiner's journeyman. The lady, who, in the meantime, feels more and more disposed to love her husband, regrets this, and, while she is still hesitating what resolution to adopt, the supposed journeyman enters, and the question of a divorce is thus quashed of itself. The concluding ballet ends the whole most pleasingly. The explanation afterwards is very simple, and contains no really comic motives. Whatever comic element there may be in the book consists merely in the delineation and treatment of separate traits and situations. The most piquant scene of this description occurs at the beginning of the second act, where the baroness draws a picture of the effect which will be produced, at the Court of St. Petersburg, by so strange a marriage. She calls to mind a Lord Chamberlain, an equerry, and a general's wife, who speaks broken German or French. This is a species of comicality which is merely external, but, when rendered by so talented and delicate a dramatic artist as Mlle. Johanna Wagner, it produces a decided effect, and obtained an extraordinary degree of success during the whole representation. The composer, whose skill in expressing musically comic situations of this kind is universally acknowledged, employs the musical means at his disposal very effectively in this instance also. Out of the grand air, likewise, sung by the Baroness previous to this scene, and in which she draws a picture of the brilliant round of parties and balls in Paris (for in the Baroness we have to fancy a character in which a certain amount of good nature is united to a partiality for external magnificence, and an aristocratic, social mode of life), the composer has produced an interesting whole. The whole composition, and not alone its first arrangement and plan, forms a tastefully finished piece of music. We must especially acknowledge the skill with which entire passages from Weber, Mozart, Spohr, Meyerbeer, etc., are interwoven in the author's intentions (for the Baroness has even to dance in this air, which task, à la Pepita, Mlle. Wagner executes with the best possible taste, by implying rather than actually carrying it out). Although this is an ornamentation composed of borrowed plumes, and imparts to the music the stamp of a pleasing pot-pourri, we must prominently notice the technical skill which has, notwithstanding, produced one whole out of this scene. Whether such a style of treatment is one to be artistically justified, and whether it ought to be adopted in opera, even in comic opera, is another question. The Inspector's "Knutenlied" (Knout-song), also, is very cleverly worked out, painting and portraying the situation in the most lively fashion. Whether it will produce a comic impression on every audience is a question we will leave undecided, for this would, perhaps, depend on the manner in which the entire libretto was received. Should it, however, find a cold reception, people would scarcely be inclined impartially and justly to appreciate the musical talent contained in the composition. As it appears to us, the principal fault of the work is that the composer should have employed his talent and his art on a subject which may, possibly, produce at the very outset an unfavorable impression. Still, it is not beyond the limits of possibility that, by omitting certain portions, these drawbacks might be surmounted, and a more favorable result assured to the whole. We were very agreeably impressed with a ballet fugue, which begins the third act. It is, at any rate, something now to write a complete fugue for a dance. True it is, that for the perfect success of this piece we require as excellent a corps-de-ballet as that which we possess, and as admirable a maître-de-ballet as M. Taglioni. But, however this may be, the effect of the ensemble is, in the highest degree, attractive. The dances of the third act are, in consequence, of a very pleasing character. The first act, which must be improved by curtailments in the music, contains detached passages, which are attractive and musically pleasing, but weakened by want of interest in the story, which contains too little action. There is not the slightest doubt that, when it has received the necessary alterations, the work will gain on the public. We must, however, leave it to the composer to display the proper tact under such circumstances. As the Baroness stands out prominently in the foreground, and as Mlle. Wagner is a most admirable representative of the part, to her belongs a principal share of the manifestations of applause with which the work was greeted. The other parts, which, also, were well supported (Madame Herrenburg-Tuczek, the Countess Poleska; Herr Formes, the Count—and joiner's journeyman; Herr Krause, the master-joiner; Herr Bost, the inspector; and Mlle. Guy, the joiner's daughter) possess animation, when regarded separately; they contain, also, many pleasing and happy musical effects, and will come out more strongly when the whole is more concentrated. May the composer find some happy hours for this purpose. The audience received the opera favorably; the composer was called on after the first act, and considerable applause bestowed on the artists.—Berlin, Dec. 28.

THE GAMUT OF ODORS.—Scents appear to influence the smelling nerves in certain definite degrees. There is as it were an octave of odours, like an octave in music. Certain odours blend in unison like the notes of an instrument. For instance almond, heliotrope, vanilla, and orange blossom blend together, each producing different degrees of a nearly similar impression. Again, we have citron, lemon, verbena, and orange peel, forming a higher octave of smells, which blend in a similar manner. The figure is completed by what are called semi-odours, such as rose and rose-geranium for the half-note; petty-gain, the note; neroly, a black key, or half-note; followed by fleur d'orange, a full note. Then we have patchouly, sandal-wood, and vitiver, with many others running into each other.—Piesse's Art of Perfumery, 2nd Edition.

The New Grand Opera House in Philadelphia.

(Special Correspondence of the New York Tribune.)

Philadelphia. Monday, Jan. 26, 1857.

It is now about sixteen years since the project of erecting a grand opera house in Philadelphia was agitated. The time was unpropitious, as well on account of the immaturity of that city in population, wealth and musical culture, as of the financial embarrassment commencing in 1837, and which had then (in 1840) prostrated credit and enterprise all over the country. In face, however, of these disadvantages, our Quaker neighbors were the first community in America to entertain seriously the scheme of a lyrical and dramatic institution comparable in all points to the largest and most complete in Europe, and to this end the attempt so far prospered that an adequate lot was secured, and subscriptions for the building made to the amount of about two hundred thousand dollars.

At this point, owing to the difficulties referred to, the effort was abandoned. To the architectural, economical, moral and artistic features of that enterprise, however, is due whatever has since been achieved in the same direction in our City of New York and elsewhere in the United States.

The Philadelphia Academy of Music, which is inaugurated to-night by the greatest ball ever given in the city, is a most honorable approximation to the reality of the original project which I have just mentioned. The Academy faces eastward on Broad street—a noble avenue one hundred and twenty feet wide, bisecting the old city-plot between the Delaware and Schuylkill rivers, at the distance of about a mile from each. The northern flank of the house is on Locust street, and the southern on ground reserved for the purpose, so as to insulate it by a court of adequate width. Chestnut street, where fashionable shops, and Walnut, where fashionable dwellings, predominate, are respectively only seven and five hundred feet distant. The building is one hundred and forty feet front, one hundred and fifty feet in the rear, and two hundred and thirty-eight feet deep. The material of the first story is brown stone, the superior walls of the finest pressed brick, the cornice of iron, sanded to correspond with the basement, and the roof of plates of galvanized iron.

The style of architecture is simple and imposing, and judiciously adapted to the mixed material. The front has five high arched doors extending along a projection of ninety feet, and one grand window at each extremity. Over the doors is a solid stone balcony. The openings of the second story—the external appearance of the house being only two stories—correspond with those of the first. On the side streets, there are thirteen similar openings to each story, five of them being doors in the first, protected also by a stone balcony. The height of the building is apparently about seventy feet. It is altogether exceedingly well conceived.

Access to the interior is provided by five doors, each ten feet wide on the Broad-street front, and an equal number on each side street, making the total openings in the clear 150 feet—distributing the audience by its exits in different directions, and insuring the clearing of a full house in a very few minutes. The front doors extend along a line of 73 feet, giving admission to a vestibule of the same length and ten feet deep. At each side of the vestibule are ticket-offices, communicating respectively with the managers' and directors' rooms, about 25 feet square, which occupy the two front corners of the building. These rooms are provided with fire-proofs of the best description, and have private doors communicating with other departments of the building. A ticket-office on Locust street, for the upper tiers of boxes, also opens directly into the manager's room, thus bringing two of the receivers under his immediate supervision.

Passing through the front vestibule by arched doors, corresponding in number and size with those of the exterior, the grand vestibule is reached—a noble apartment, ninety feet wide and thirty feet deep. It is flanked by two grand stairways, each thirteen feet wide, and rising right and left parallel to the front of the house. The inner wall of this hall is pierced by doors opposite to those in front, also corresponding in proportions with them. Between the doors are pilasters. These and the walls are frescoed in imitation of various fine marbles, and the ceiling is relieved by deep and enriched panels. The newel-posts of the stairways are very massive, of carved walnut, forming the base of stands of the same material, which support elegant gilt candelabras, topped by bronze Mercuries. A handsome chandelier decorates the centre of the hall. Proceeding inward on the same floor the lobby of the parquet circle is entered, which compasses the auditorium. It is thirty feet wide, except at the extremities, where it approaches the stage department, narrowing there to nine feet. On one side of the house this lobby communicates with a ladies' retiring-room, and on the other with a gentleman's. A handsome elliptical staircase affords interior communication with the first and second tiers of boxes, and under the grand front stairways access is had to the gentlemen's refreshment room in the basement, which is eighty by forty feet.

From the lobby, thus described, admission is had to the parquet-circle, and to the parquet, by several doors and corresponding aisles at convenient distances. The lobbies of the other tiers are of the same proportions as the lower. That of the next or principal floor connects with the dress-circle, and on the front with the Foyer or grand saloon. This is a very beautiful apartment born in proportions and style. It is over the entrance and grand vestibules, 90 feet long and 40 feet wide, with a groined ceiling 35 feet high. It is lighted by five great arched casement windows 16 feet wide each over the front doors, and opening upon the stone balcony above described. At each extremity it communicates with large and elegant lounging or refreshment rooms, and also with the main stairways. Throughout its length on both sides are sixteen Roman Ionic columns in full relief upon pilasters and surmounted by ornate entablature. Ten brilliant glass chandeliers depend from the spring of the arches in the ceiling, and between the arched doors at either extremity are very large mirrors. The walls of this sumptuous room are white, but will be frescoed when sufficiently seasoned. On the same floor, and pertaining to the dress-circle lobby are ladies' and gentlemen's private retiring-room, also of simple dimensions. Each upper story is similarly provided. These suites of rooms with their ante-rooms are on the north and south sides of the building—the ante-rooms having large high doors corresponding with the side windows—the doors when shut serving to exclude perfectly the noise of the street, or when open in Summer to admit the outer air. At each extremity of the lobbies adjacent to the stage-department, and at each angle of them adjacent to the front of the house are stairways (other than those already mentioned) seven feet wide. These make in all seven stairways in the audience department of about 50 feet gross width, distributed around its entire periphery, and all at their respective bases within 10 or 15 feet of the exit doors. The steps of the stairs are heavy and plank, the ballusters oak, and the rails massive walnut. The walls are frescoed to resemble blocks of Sienna marble. The lobby walls are tastefully paneled, and also frescoed to represent various delicate marbles. They are further decorated by Ionic columns at the head of the stair-halls, and lighted by chandeliers of novel and appropriate designs.

(Conclusion next week.)

The Encore Swindle.

[From Punch.]

Mr. Punch cannot recognize more than a single view, upon the subject of an encore. But his own preternatural wisdom and rectitude—he admits the fact with due humiliation—sometimes prevent his making allowances for the ignorance and injustice of others. He will therefore condescend upon the present occasion, to explain how the matter in question stands. He is moved thereto by a variety of correspondence which has been addressed to him, and by an article in the Musical World, in which some ridiculous provincial censures upon Mr. Sims Reeves, the vocalist, are disposed of by a reply so unanswerable that it has already excited the wrath of the illogical. For it is in imperfectly educated nature to begin to revile when it ceases to reason.

Complaints were made, and what in the provinces passes for sarcasm was let fly against the singer we have named, for his excusing himself, on the ground of indisposition, from fulfilling a certain engagement. Now Mr. Punch has occasionally had his good-humored joke with Mr. Reeves on this subject, and begs to premise that nothing herein contained will bar Mr. Punch of his right to say just what he likes to Mr. Reeves or anybody else. Nor, again, will Mr. Punch's condescending to joke upon the subject, in any manner prevent his recognition of Mr. Reeves as one of the most admirable artists in the world. Nunc tunc, as Virgil might have said, if he had chosen.

The answer to these complaints is, that British audiences consist of swindlers. It is shown that Mr. Reeves, in common with many other artists, is compelled by a dishonest British public to do double the work which he contracts to do. It is set forth by extracts from the newspapers, detailing a long provincial tour (during which Mr. Reeves has not once failed to appear when due,) that the audiences have always exacted from him precisely twice the quantity of music which they were entitled to ask. They have habitually encored every thing. And when an exhausted singer has ventured to substitute something else for the fatiguing air which is dishonestly demanded, they have encored the substitution. The consequence of this selfish injustice was that Reeves, lacking the courage of Alboni and Mario, who will seldom "take" an encore, got knocked up, not being a mere singing machine, and had to give his throat and lungs a few days' holiday. This brought out provincial censure and sarcasm, completely met, as it appears to Mr. Punch and every honest person, by the Musical World.

By what right, we beg to ask, does an auditor cheat and rob an artist by encoring? A play bill announces that if you will pay a specific sum you shall have a specific song. You pay the money, (or go with an order,) and you demand twice the music you have bargained for. Do you serve anybody else so except an artist? If you buy a pair of trousers, and they please you, do you encore those trousers, that is, require the tailor to give you another pair? Do you encore a dozen of oysters, asking the second lot for nothing because the first were sweet and succulent? Do you encore a portrait, and because a painter has succeeded admirably in taking your likeness, do you clap and stamp about his studio until he paints you another copy for nothing?

But "O!" says John Bull and Mrs. Bull, with their usual vulgarity, "these are real things, with a value, while a song's nothing but air (hair, very likely, Mrs. Bull calls it) coming out of a man's mouth; and it has no value, and he ought to be very proud that we are pleased with him."

Get out of the theatre, you old idiots! Get out, you dishonest old ignorant wretches, and go to Mr. Spurgeon, or a police magistrate, or somebody, and learn your duty to your neighbor! Get out, we tell you!

And yet why should Mr. Punch be wrath with you! Your fathers thought in the same way about books, and wondered at an author's impudence in calling mere words by the sacred name of property. And the notion is not quite extinct yet. There, we retract, we feel compassion for you, you old creatures, not anger. You may stay. But mind this. You have no right to steal music. If your housemaid stole your snub-nosed Patty's dog's-eared copy of the "Troubadour" from the pianoforte, you would call that housemaid a thief, and send for a policeman. What are you, that steal four songs in one evening? Take that hint to heart, and when next you are delighted with an effort that it has cost an artist years of expensive and laborious study to bring to the perfection that enchants you, and you feel disposed to cheat him out of it again, remember snub-nosed Patty and her dog's-eared music.

Were Mr. Punch a manager, he would borrow a hint from the omnibus, and write across the curtain—All Encores must be paid for—and the money-taker should go round, attended by a detective, to require a second payment of the price of admission. On the other hand, if it could be shown that singers, or music-sellers, or friends with orders, had caused the encore, (for all sorts of tricks are resorted to in order to puff up indifferent wares,) the night's salary of the singer supposed to be benefited should be forfeited to the General Theatrical Fund. As Mr. Punch is not a manager, he obligingly makes a present of these suggestions to the editor of the Musical World.

A Letter from Mr. Satter.

Boston, Jan. 24, 1857.

To the Editor of the Journal of Music:

DEAR SIR—You ask an explanation of the motive which prompted me to call my Trio "Sardanapalus." Before I give you the reason, let me say a word about the motive which induced me to write a trio at all.

Pianists, as a general thing, have to contend with a prejudice, which denies them the capability of writing anything but the trashy hobbies of display, with which they sometimes enrich their publishers, and most always hurt the influence of good music. Fesca, Litolf, Liszt, Willmers, Charles Meyer and Rubinstein have never been supposed to write anything but easy, tickling, sentimental titbits, clad in gorgeous and brilliant array. Each of these men, however, has proved by one or two compositions, that they have got the faculty of writing something good, let the treatment of this very faculty be ever so poor. I do not mean to say by that, and cannot affirm as a true musician, that any of the six above mentioned pianists has created a sterling and standard composition, whose themes and working up of themes may astonish future generations, and throw a magic glance upon the musical era of pianists comprising the years 1830 to 1850. But the will is, in a moral point of view, as good as the deed, and it must give satisfaction to the spirits of Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn (I omit the name of Haydn, as his delicious simplicity of style has never found any lucky imitator) to know that the dazzling radiance of their atmosphere has attracted hosts of lesser spirits, who considered it a privilege to hover round and bask in this region of incontestable genius.

The writer of these lines, being unfortunately a public performer, has of course spoiled a good many sheets of music paper in order to apprise the public, first, that he could write music, and secondly, that he could play it. He has had his run; his compositions have very deservedly had none. One day last summer, when in Newburyport, and after having dreamt a month of the frailty and trickery of earthly sayings and doings, a congenial friend advised him to read Dickens. It did for a while, but it would not do. Extremes meet; so let us read Byron. Byron found his way to the U. S. Hotel in Boston, and the tragedy of "Sardanapalus" was relished with a most profound appetite. Not that there is any peculiar depth or even moral in this poem; but the sublime, "let-go manner" of the Eastern king, and the idea of extinguishing a flame with flames had something so gloriously eccentric in the eyes of the musician, that he involuntarily thought of his equally eccentric friend, Berlioz, in Paris, and he thought, thought, and thought over the thing, till he came to the conclusion, that if Berlioz, Esq. had burnt his Sardanapalus, he, Satter, could probably do the same if nobody had any objections; so "here goes."

The Trio was born. It was not made for show; neither was it destined to hold a place in musical libraries. The ideas came; the ideas were written down. Two notes were extended to Schultze and Jungnickel, inviting them to try it; three rehearsals were held. I said it did not answer my expectations; they said it did theirs (although that was possibly anything but a compliment). I spoke about backing out; they said I was a fool; I said I was not; so we had a pitched battle until the memorable 21st came, when this great Trio was performed, to the delight of both friends and enemies, and to the especial delight of a painfully strict reporter, who must have left Ordway Hall or a nigger barber shop, as he detected a melody in the last movement of the Trio, which made him laugh right out. Next day, one paper was delighted with the Trio (thank you!) another paper said I spoil the third movement by beating stunningly; another said that imaginative powers were required for composition—that I had strong imaginative powers, but I'd better stop; and the Evening Gazette seasoned my breakfast with the intelligent news that I had talent for nigger melodies, and that both the themes and their working up were very bad. I wish to give my best thanks to all these gentlemen for the trouble which they took, and feel inclined to tell them two little stories.

1. Beethoven was considered a fool until he died.

2. A blind man was considered a fool because he judged of colors.

And to the public and to you, who would certainly not like to form an opinion without being responsible for it, I take the liberty to announce, that at my next concert (heedless of storms and clouds blackened with printer's ink) I shall repeat this very Trio, at the unanimous request of my subscribers, and give them, as an additional matter of interest, a new Quartet in four movements, consecrated to the memory of Kosciusko, the unfortunate attempter of Poland's liberation.

By publishing this silly act of self-defence you will confer as great a favor upon me as you will by hearing the Trio with its "nigger movement" once more, and carefully attending the first rehearsal of the Quartet, when I hope to hear from you truth, and nothing but truth. Yours respectfully,

GUSTAV SATTER.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 27.—It is at present the fashion to be charitable. It is considered "the thing" to patronize "Women's Hospitals," and "Children's Nurseries." Wealthy dowagers sit around like so many Mrs. Pardiggles, visiting poor people, and giving them sound advice, and red flannel. Elegant young ladies spend their time in making dolls for charity fairs, and really much good is done to the poor. The excellent benefactors are fully aware of the extent of their efforts, and are willing that other people shall know them too; for with all their charitable feelings and charitable actions, they sometimes forget that charity vaunteth not itself, and is not puffed up.

One of the most popular and prevalent modes of being charitable, is by calling in the aid of music, and giving what are termed "Amateur Charitable Soirées." Probably the most pretentious of these kind of affairs came off one evening last week, and being present, I have thought a brief description of the entertainment might not be uninteresting.

It took place in one of the most superb mansions that can be found in New York, and may altogether be considered the most recherché affair of the season. Indeed, I was informed that the company comprised the élite of the city, that the bon ton was out in force, that everything was comme il faut, and I actually began to think that an entire French phrase book had been gotten up expressly for this occasion. I was also told that no one was invited who was not "one of us," which information was of course vastly agreeable. For you must know that, though a public affair, and the tickets duly sold at two dollars each, yet the proposed concert had not been allowed to be announced in the papers, for the dile, and the bon ton, et cetera, were particularly desirous that the soirée should be exceedingly recherché and comme il faut, et cetera, and that the verve and empressment, et cetera, which the performers were expected to throw into their arias and cavatinas and romanzas, et cetera, should be by no means diminished by the fears of the critiques and resumés, et cetera, of the daily papers.

The singers were mostly young lady amateurs of this city, assisted by a few professionals—Mr. AP- TOMMAS, the harpist, Mr. KYLE, the flutist, and Mr. GUIDI, the tenor. Programmes were printed with the names of the performers, of which I annex a copy:

PART I.

Trio—Te sol questa anima—Attilla.Verdi.
Mrs. Riggs, Mr. Van Zandt, and Sig. Guidi.
Solo—Piano-forte.Mr. Boker.
Cavatina—Anch'io dischiuso sin giorno—Nabuco.Verdi.
Miss Randolph.
Duo—Da quel—Linda di Chamounix.Donizetti.
Miss Herndon and Sig. Guidi.
Solo—Flute—Cavatina—Sans Parole.Clinton.
Mr. Kyle.
Aria—O luce di questa anima—Linda.Donizetti.
Mrs. Riggs.
Grand Etude Galop—For Piano-Forte.Alfred Jaell.
Miss Cholley.
Scena ed Aria—Der Freischütz.von Weber.
Miss De Roode.
Quatuor—A te o cara—I Puritani.Bellini.
Mrs. Riggs, Mr. Van Zandt, Mr. Hewitt, and Sig. Guidi.

PART II.

Solo—Piano-forte.Mr. Boker.
Duetto Buffo—Dunque lo son—Il Barbiere.Rossini.
Mrs. Riggs and Mr. Van Zandt.
Swiss Song—written for Sontag—"Mein einz'ger Schatz"Eckert.
Harp Accompaniment—By Mr. Aptommas.
Miss Randolph.
Duetto—Parigi o cara—La Traviata.Verdi.
Miss Chase and Sig. Guidi.
Cavatina—Allor—Attilla.Verdi.
Miss Herndon.
Harp Solo—Fantasia from Lucresia Borgia.Alvares.
Mr. Aptommas.
Aria—La poupée de Nuremberg.Adam.
Miss De Roode.
Quatuor—Chi mi frena—Lucia.Donizetti.
Miss Randolph, Mr. Van Zandt, Mr. Hewitt, and Sig. Guidi.
Accompaniments by Messrs. Millet and Albites.

I believe I before mentioned that the soirée took place in a splendid up-town mansion, the use of which had been kindly proffered by the owner, a gentleman who, if I may use a poetical license, has soared aloft to fame and wealth on the wings of a Sarsaparilla bottle. It is considered, I think, the most palatial of New York residences, and never exhibited a more brilliant appearance than on the evening of the 22d. If I were able to do it up like the fashionable reporters, I might tell you of the splendor of the chandeliers, the magnificence of the ladies' dresses, the height of the arched hall, the expense of the bouquets, the price of the carpets, the suavity of the gentlemanly host, the general effect of the tout ensemble and coup d'œil, et cetera. All this appeared in a few papers of the following day, with an additional item relating to a "table bountifully spread with edibles," which to my poignant grief I did not discover at the time.

But I have chiefly to do with the musical portion of the entertainment, and I must say that it was much better than most amateur attempts. Of the professional performers it is wholly unnecessary to speak—they did as well as could be expected, considering that but very few took the trouble to listen to them. The other singers, though amateurs, have still challenged criticism by having their names printed on the programme; yet one cannot feel privileged to point out their defects as freely as if they were public singers, for the nervousness of a first appearance prevented them from appearing to as great advantage as they might on other occasions.

The performer who appeared to create the most favorable impression was Miss Randolph; this young lady is the step-daughter of a prominent city editor, and has enjoyed in Paris the privilege of being a pupil of Rubini. Her voice is very rich and pleasant, with some splendid lower notes, and her execution is fair. Excessive timidity had its effect upon her performance, and greatly marred the more elaborate passages of her first aria, and she did not wholly recover her self-possession during the entire evening. Yet enough was shown to prove that Miss Randolph has sufficient talent to take a high rank among amateur singers, and even, with practice, rival many professionals.

With an inferior voice, but better execution, Miss Herndon, a daughter of Lient. Herndon of the U. S. N., created also a very favorable impression. She rendered the cavatina from "Linda" very brilliantly, but she does not sing with expression.

Mrs. Riggs has the same musical virtues and faults as Miss H. With a facility of execution I have rarely heard equalled off the stage, she pleases, but does not enthuse (as R. S. Willis says) her hearers. The music she attempted was too high for her voice. In the duet from Il Barbiere, a selection which requires no expression, she sang admirably.

Miss Chase is, I think, a Boston lady, and though she sang in but one piece, the duet from Traviata, evinced considerable musical talent. It would be impossible to speak more definitely without hearing the lady in a solo, which should have been assigned to her.

But the finest singer of the evening was a German lady, Miss De Roode, who has been in this country but a short time; she has evidently been under the best instruction, and sings like an artiste—a "full-fledged prima donna," as the critic of one of the city papers terms her. It is very seldom that the aria from Freyshütz has been given with more sweetness and taste, though the effect was greatly marred by the incessant chatter that was kept up by a portion of the audience. The second selection of Miss Roode was a poor one, and did not give satisfaction, though extremely well performed. Of the lady pianists, I can only say that they played very well, and of the gentlemen singers, that they were "tolerable, and"—you know the rest of the quotation.

The programme was long, and many of the audience dropped away before it was finished, the last piece being listened to with a sense of relief. Indeed, I very much doubt whether these charity concerts really please any one excepting the performers, for the singers cannot be expected to equal those we hear in the public concert room; however, their friends come to hear them, and they are listened to with a bland fortitude, that fully bears out St. Paul's maxim, that "Charity endureth all things."

While all this music was going on inside, and the illuminated and heated mansion was thronged with gay guests, there was a very different scene taking place outside the door. The night was the coldest of the season, the mercury an incredible distance below zero, a biting wind blowing, the snow lying on the ground, and exposed to all this inclemency were over two hundred coachmen, shivering and freezing, and awaiting the departure of their masters and mistresses. It may have been very improper, but I could not help thinking, that it was a pity that with all the charity represented inside, none could be spared for these freezing unfortunates, who had to wait in the cold the beck and bidding of the charitable patrons of the grand charity concert, and in my ignorance I wondered whether this was a fair exemplification of that blessed quality of which St. Paul speaks, where he says, "Charity is patient, is kind." As I passed out of the door into the dark, gloomy night, and saw these men, waiting, and paralyzed with cold, it seemed to me that the fashionable music, floating from the other end of the noble hall, sounded very much like sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. But I may be mistaken.

The opera season has fairly commenced, with PARODI as prima donna, and STRAKOSCH as conductor. The company, with the exception of Parodi and TIBERINI, is formed of very inferior artistes, and the season has not been remarkably successful as yet. Mme. DE WILHORST will appear as Lucia on Wednesday night, and it is said D'ANGRI will shortly join the troupe. It certainly needs some such accession.

Mr. Ullmann, Mr. THALBERG's agent, is in town, and Thalberg himself is expected here about the 14th inst.

The PYNE and HARRISON troupe give a grand farewell performance to-night, and then they depart—where is not known—perhaps to the "land of the White Rabbit," or of the "northwest wind, Kee-waydin." TROVATOR.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., JAN. 24.—Last evening the amateur concert of the 12th was repeated at the North Church. Owing to the severe cold out of doors, the attendance was somewhat less than at the first concert. It was an excellent affair, and several encores testified to the delight of the audience.

Among the pieces worthy of notice was a trio, "Te sol quest' anima," from Attilla, sung by Mrs. WELLS and Messrs. HOLLAND and CHAPIN. Though taken a little too slow, it was admirably performed. Mr. Holland has a very sweet tenor voice, clear and equal in its upper register. Mr. Chapin's voice did not "tell" so well in the trio as in the duet from La Favorita with Miss FITZHUUGH. The trio and duet were the gems of the single pieces of the evening. The choruses were more accurately sung, and consequently more effectively rendered, though the soprano was weakened by the absence of Miss PENNIMAN's powerful voice.

The music of Haydn's third Mass is somewhat new to a Springfield audience. A week's thought on the concert of the 12th but made the repetition of the same music more appreciated and more enjoyable. This shows the truth of a certain writer's remark, that "a discriminating ear can be formed only by listening to classical music, rendered by true tone-artists,"—by the way, not all professional singers are such—"by studying to appreciate the why and wherefore of certain progressions, which at first displease the undisciplined ear." It is a notable fact that some people will yawn, stretch, and sit uneasily during the singing of a solo from a favorite opera by a Sontag, Alboni, Parodi, or Lagrange; but when the trills, cadenzas, and clap-trap of the voice strikes their ear, when a high C is reached, they turn to their neighbors and look wise; if Mr. So-and-So applauds, they are uproarious in their delight, and think, as they prepare for the next number on the programme, that they do appreciate music.

I think, as does my friend Jones, that the appreciation of an audience is not to be measured by uproarious applause, but by the eyes, "windows of the soul." If they glisten, as the theme and working up of a composition gradually unfolds itself to the minds of the hearers under the inspiration of the performer, then rest assured that both composer and artist are not superficially appreciated.

* Musicians please take notice. Travelling musicians are the ones referred to.

The "Institute" has a concert in preparation for the 4th of February.

Mr. BLAISDEL, from the South, is here, and intends giving Root's "Flower Queen" very soon, with the assistance of some of our public schools.

AD LIBITUM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

BERLIN, Dec. 30, 1856.—This winter, as the last, Berlin has a perfect flood of concerts. If the public here is hardly in a condition to enjoy the fulness of what is offered, yet in comparison with other centres of Art, as Paris, Leipzig, Vienna, there is really so much that is classical performed, and for the most part in so worthy a manner, that it is perhaps not presumptuous to declare Berlin now the first metropolis of Art.

So much the more is it to be lamented that the very institution, which, as regards its means of achieving something important, ought to take the lead of every other enterprise and set an excellent example—I mean the Royal Opera—falls altogether short of what it once did in the earlier period of its bloom, under men like C. M. von Weber and Spontini, under intendants like Count Redern and especially Count Brühl, and naturally short of the urgent demands of the present time. It must be considered, however, that the earlier kings were much more partial to the opera, and gave it larger subsidies, while at present a narrowing pressure from above is quite perceptible, and the present intendent, in his now far less independent position, is induced to be as economical as possible. Formerly the king's private chest was regularly opened to meet the annual deficit. There is no mistaking the good will of Herr von Hülsen, the present intendent, nor his leaning to a more sound direction in Art; but he lets himself be led too much by the two royal kapellmeisters, DORN and TAUBERT, and in so one-sided a manner, that since the appointment of these two gentlemen, not a single novelty has been produced upon the Berlin stage except their own productions.

As regards the strength of the company, there is a superfluity, often of three or four fold, of every class of voices, not reckoning the many Gast-roles (star performers). Yet among all these singers you will scarcely find artists of the first rank, or even of such rank as the theatres of most great cities have to show. Since the singers, on retiring from the stage, receive a very high pension, they are cautious how they allow a once highly prized but now passed artist to retire; and hence most of the performances naturally make the impression of an Invalids' institution, which principally excites recollections of a past period of bloom. In spite of so many principal voices in each part, the leading rôles are very inadequately, very partially and arbitrarily filled, and intrigue or vanity on the part of the older members surely has its share of influence in the matter. The most important, or at least the most esteemed, are still JOHANNA WAGNER, by her ever powerful voice and by the irresistible fire of her dramatic delivery; FRAU KOESTER, in tender, feminine characters; and FRAU HERRENBURG-TUCZEK, who is distinguished by the bell-like purity of her voice and by her natural gracefulness and ease. Some of the gentlemen have much that is good about them, but taken collectively they are deficient.

As for concerts, the most successful and most brilliant are those of STERN'S Orchestral Union, in connection with his singing society of some 500 for the most part very clever dilettanti. These performances, under their distinguished director, one of the ablest, certainly, that now exists, are rehearsed with the minutest care; all the finer nuances are admirably brought out. Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht especially has met again universally with the warmest reception.

The "Sing-academie," devoutly founded by FASCH, about a hundred years ago, for the exclusive practice of religious music, is no longer in the flourishing condition that it was thirty years since under the united zeal of such fostering spirits as ZELTER, MENDELSSOHN, MARX and DEVRIENT. Yet within the last year it has aroused itself again, and the performance of Haydn's "Seasons" may be called a particularly successful one; it was followed with the liveliest applause by the enthusiastic public, whose numbers the hall was far from being able to contain.

The "Opera Academy," founded a few years by the exertions of Dr. ZOPFF, for the cultivation of dramatic song and the performance of comparatively unknown operas, has during the short time of its rapid growth not only raised up a number of very able singers and teachers of singing, by means of its vocal conservatoire, under the direction of the well-known Dr. PYLLEMAN, but by the concerts, which it has again arranged this season, has justified the hope that an important future lies before this institution, under such earnest, indefatigable and talented direction.

The royal Dom Choir, composed of paid singers (the soprano and alto being sung by boys), under the direction of the very careful Musik-director NEIDHARDT, has become so famous throughout Europe, that several courts have followed its example in establishing similar liturgical institutions. It still keeps up its old fame by concerts in the hall or the cathedral. Yet a large portion of the public have been gradually coming to the conclusion that it is not best to listen too long or too often, since the very carefulness of the rehearsals often runs into a soon fatiguing monotony, and in its continual piano occasionally reminds one of the forte of the Russian horn music.

The Symphony Soirées of the military kapellmeister, LIEBIG, exert here a great influence in the ennobling of taste and sentiment. With singular persistency this man with his military kapelle has worked his way up to one of the most considerable orchestral associations, and the throng to his concerts, in which he gives almost exclusively classical music, especially Beethoven's and Haydn's Symphonies, is far greater than to similar soirées of the Royal Chapel. The comparatively very small price of admission to these concerts enables the middle classes in Berlin, who are very industrious and animated by the best spirit, to educate themselves by the hearing of these truly edifying and ennobling master-works, and, what is a real blessing, draws this extremely important portion of society away from the trivial recreations and the low, sensual indulgencies, which have hitherto alone been accessible to our industrial public by their cheapness.

Among the concerts given here by individual resources, the Trio Soirées of Baron von BÜLOW, together with Concert-meister LAUB and the Kammer-musikus WOHLERS, have been particularly distinguished. Baron von Bülow, confessedly Liszt's greatest pupil, and the first teacher in the Berlin Conservatoire, unites with a singularly finished technique in piano-playing, an equally intelligent and profound conception of classical and modern works, and by his performance of several works which are almost never heard (on account of their impracticable demands for the host of untalented virtuosos), particularly of Beethoven's remarkable thirty-three variations on a very feeble waltz by Diabelli, has won our especial gratitude.

Berlin is almost too rich in clever Trio and Quartet Societies; the public has a special fondness for them. The entire literature of chamber music from Haydn and Beethoven, nay, from Sebastian Bach to Schumann, is here brought to hearing, and the same works, like old acquaintances, are gladly again and again greeted by the lovers of this class of music.

ff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 31, 1857.

Concerts of the Week.

GUSTAVE SATTER gave his second "Philharmonic Soirée" at the piano rooms of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., on Wednesday evening of last week. The room was filled with listeners. The programme was decidedly novel, and consisted of just four pieces. Although three of these were of considerable length, the whole was agreeably shorter than most concerts.

First came the piano Sonata in A flat (Op. 26) by BEETHOVEN. It is that beautiful and well-known one, which commences with the Andante and variations, and has for its third movement the wonderful funeral march (Marcia sulla morte d'un eroe). Of course Mr. Satter is too accomplished a pianist, and is too well acquainted as a German with these most familiar sonatas of Beethoven, not to have played it in some respects admirably. But it struck us that there was considerable exaggeration of the forte and fortissimo parts, especially in giving such abrupt and startling accent to the full chords which occur ever and anon in the exquisitely light and sportive melody of the finale. In a tendency to too great loudness and too great rapidity, indeed, we missed the character which we have fondly associated with most of the movements. Must we say that there seemed to be more execution than sympathetic feeling of the music. It struck us as a less serious effort than the young pianist has shown himself capable of in connection with such music in times gone by.

Next came Mr. Satter's Grand Trio, for piano, violin and cello, the composition of which is based, as the programme informed us, upon Byron's "Sardanapalus." We certainly were at a loss to trace any connection between its musical ideas and movements and that poem. But the author himself has come to our rescue in a characteristic letter, which will be found in another column, explaining under what promptings and in what spirit he composed the work. The letter is amusingly frank, and proves that Mr. Satter, whether he have musical genius or not, has a decided gift for language. Verily there was enough of the "let-go manner," of the reckless, devil-may-care character of the oriental monarch about it, without much hint, that we could trace, of the finer qualities with which Byron makes him so attractive; nothing, for instance, of that lottier and lovelier element which he embodies in the Greek slave, Myrrha. But we are promised another hearing. Meanwhile we can only say, that the first movement (Allegro molto), apart from any thought of poetic interpretation, interested us not a little by its well contrasted, well worked themes; the second (a Romance) still more so, having ideas that struck us as somewhat original. But the Scherzo and the Finale were noisy and grotesque, a monotonous succession of dashing Bacchanalian passages, now thundering in the bass, now striking out sparks in the topmost octave, like noisy, fire-like piccolos in some new-school orchestral production, where all is sacrificed to brilliancy. It certainly displayed the brilliant virtuosity of the player; and Messrs. SCHULTZE and JUNGNIKKEL bore well their parts, the latter having some good singing passages for his violoncello.

Miss EMMA DAVIS is quite a young lady, with a voice of rare natural power and richness; but she lacks school and style as a singer, as well as general cultivation, too much to do justice to such a piece of music as the scena and aria from the Freyshütz.

What shall we say of "Les Preludes," a Poesie Symphonique by LISZT, for two pianos, performed by Messrs. WILLIAM MASON and SATTER? This also purports to have been reared on a poetic basis, to-wit, Lamartine's "Meditations Poétiques." The poetry we listened for in vain. It was lost as it were in the smoke and stunning tumult of a battle-field. There were here and there brief, flitting fragments of something delicate and sweet to ear and mind, but these were quickly swallowed up in one long, monotonous, fatiguing melée of convulsive, crashing, startling masses of tone, flung back and forth as if in rivalry from instrument to instrument. We must have been very stupid listeners; but we felt after it as if we had been stoned, and beaten, and trampled under foot, and in all ways evilly entreated.

What did Liszt mean by such a work? We fear that we shall have to join the London Athenæum, Musical World, &c., in their crusade against the "Music of the Future," if we have no other specimens. The two pianists were each abundantly equal to the great difficulties of the piece, but in this case we can hardly blame Mr. Satter for playing as if to drown difficulties and dangers out of sight and hearing. We find we speak the general impression, or we might hesitate about confessing all of our experience in the matter of this famous work by Liszt.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.—The second (first of the regular series) nearly filled the Melodeon, and doubtless would have quite filled it in any other than that most Arctic week. As it was, it was the most musical audience of Boston; the right faces were there, and we trusted Mr. CARL ZERRAHN was not quite unrewarded for the generous spirit he has shown regarding these concerts. Here is the programme:

- PART I.
1. Symphony No. 5, C minor, Beethoven.
 2. Solo: Cornet-a-Piston. Grand Fantasia from "The Huguenots," introducing some beautiful echoes, Meyerbeer.
- Louis Schreiber.
3. Second Part, (Allegretto un poco agitato,) from the Symphony-Cantata, "Hymn of Praise," Mendelssohn.
- PART II.
4. Grand Overture: "Le Carneval Romain," (first time in Boston,) Hector Berlioz.
 5. Solo: Cornet-a-Piston. Fantasia on "I would I were a boy again," arranged with Variations, by Louis Schreiber.
 6. Romanza from the opera "L'Eclair," Halévy.
- With Solos for English Horn and Flute, by Mr. De Ribas and Herr Koppitz.
7. Overture: "Zampa," Herold.

We cannot say it was so good a programme as one covets, when he thinks how few such concerts are vouchsafed us in a winter. The second part adds little to one's store of rich remembrances. The overture to Zampa is hacknied and makes merely a dashing conclusion. No one cherishes it in his soul as music. The Romanza from "L'Eclair" was decidedly a pleasing thing for the moment, and Messrs. RIBAS and KOPFITZ played their solos charmingly. From the "Carnival" overture of BERLIOZ we hoped more than we found. It is an ingenious, amusing compound of fun and grotesque frolic, full of singularly bold and odd and sometimes beautiful combinations of instruments, and sometimes made us think of Mr. FRY'S "Christmas Symphony." It is masterly in its way, but belongs apparently to the grotesque in Art. Then as to Herr SCHREIBER'S trumpet solos, we can only say that they were most skilfully played, with faultless intonation, purity and richness of tone, and sure command alike of cantabile melody and rapid florid passages. But it does seem child's play to hear a sentimental English ballad discoursed on a noble instrument like the trumpet, and still more to hear the same instrument go so far out of its way, and so smooth away its character as to warble rapid variations as if in rivalry with a flute.—All of this was excellent in its way, but it is the way that we complain of. We pass to pleasanter things;—the pleasantest last, although it came first.

The glorious old C minor Symphony was played with admirable spirit and precision. Nothing was wanting but a larger orchestra, in a larger hall, to enhance and freshen the impression of a work, which glorious as it is, has grown to be far more familiar to our public than any other Symphony. But so much the more were the public able to appreciate the excellent rendering. Almost equal satisfaction did we derive, under the circumstances, from that beautiful movement from Mendelssohn's Symphony-Cantata: "Hymn of Praise"; the alternation of the choral strains of the brass with the sweet and pensive melody of the softer instruments was made finely effective.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The fifth (postponed) Concert took place on Tuesday evening, with the following programme:

- PART I.
- 1.—Quartet, No. 68, in G, (first time,) Haydn.
- Allegro moderato—Adagio—Minuetto, Presto—Finale, Presto.
- 2.—Cavatina from "Lucia," Donizetti.
- Mrs. J. H. Long.
- 3.—Andantino and Scherzo from 24th Quintette, Onslow.
- PART II.
- 4.—Andante con moto and Scherzo from the posthumous Quartet, op. 81, in E, Mendelssohn.
 - 5.—Serenade, from Tennyson's "Maud," J. C. D. Parker.
- Mrs. J. H. Long.
- 6.—Clarinet Quintet, in A, op. 106, Mozart.
- Allegro moderato—Larghetto—Minuetto—Finale, tema con variazioni.

Mr. AUGUST FRIES was at his post again, after an illness of some weeks. The night was a most unfavorable one for getting through the streets—a warm January thaw with rain, after intense cold, and all the ways mountainous with snow. Yet there was a goodly audience. Still more unpropitious was the dull, steamy atmosphere to musical strings, so that the violins in the first Quartet sounded uncommonly scratchy; (the evil, however, was in a great measure overcome in the following pieces.) Besides, that No. 63 of Father HAYDN did not impress us as one of his most interesting works; the Minuetto, however, was quite bright and genial. The two movements from ONSLOW'S innumerable Quintets are among his best productions, and gave great pleasure as they always do, especially that striking staccato passage in the bass. Very characteristic and beautiful were the posthumous Andante and Scherzo from MENDELSSOHN; in the Scherzo we had his fine fairy vein in one of its freshest sounding varieties; and it was finely played. MOZART'S Clarinet Quintet was delicious; it always brings refreshment amid things less spontaneous and less simple, yet not more full of genius. The tones of the clarinet are in themselves refreshing, and Mr. RYAN played his part delightfully.

The Cavatina from Lucia (a piece not usually given in the opera, but which DONIZETTI wrote, as it is said, for Mme. BOSIO) was sung with remarkable finish and delicacy by Mrs. LONG. Her rendering, too, of Mr. PARKER'S graceful "Come into the garden, Maud," was received with great delight, and the song had to be repeated.

On Tuesday evening next (Feb. 3) the Club invite their subscribers to an extra concert, commemorative of the birth-day of Mendelssohn.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The GERMAN TRIO give their third concert to-night. A novelty in the classical form will be a Trio by THALBERG, (for piano, violin and 'cello.) There will also be a string Quartet by SPOHR, songs by Miss TWICHELL, and solos by Messrs. HAUSE, GABRIELER, and JUNGNIKKEL. The ORCHESTRAL UNION, we are glad to hear, are quite encouraged by the success of their Wednesday Afternoon Concerts, and will continue them until further notice. Next time they will play the C minor Symphony. Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and the "Egmont Overture" were given last time, but we were not able to attend. The excellence of the concerts fully justifies a large attendance.

Next Tuesday is the anniversary of MENDELSSOHN'S birth-day, (born Feb. 3, 1809; died Nov. 6, 1847). The evening will be celebrated in Boston by two separate Concerts by the Societies which bear his name. By the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, at Chickering's Rooms, (subscribers to their Concerts receiving complimentary invitations. The music will be all by Mendelssohn, consisting of Quartets, Quintets, piano pieces played by Messrs. PERKINS and PARKER, and songs by Mrs. WANTWORTH. By the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, at the Rooms of Hallet, Davis & Co. Their programme will consist of three parts: the first, extracts from "St. Paul," choruses, arias, chorale, &c.; Part second, miscellaneous—piano solos, part-songs for male voices, songs, anthems, &c.; Part third, arias and choruses from "Elijah." The fine chorus of this Society, and the aid of solo artists, with such choice selections, will make this a very attractive concert. We only regret that two such feasts should come at the same hour; for we would not willingly lose either.

CROWDED OUT.—A letter from New York, about Elfield's Concert, an account of a delightful private Concert by the Club under the direction of Otto Dressel; a Chapter on "Bells"; notices of new music; Musical Intelligence; Notices of the "School of Design," &c. &c. Most of it will appear next week.

WORCESTER, MASS.—From the Palladium, Jan. 12. Another of those delightful soirées which are beginning to create a sensation in circles other than what are called strictly "musical," took place on Friday evening at Allen's music rooms. The programme was well made up of the following choice materials: Beethoven's Sonata in A, Op. 12; two part-songs—"Oh! that we were Maying!" by B. D. Allen, and Mendelssohn's Evening Song; Chopin's Funeral March; Beethoven's "Adelaide," Schubert's Polonaises, Op. 167, Nos. 4, 5, and 6; Adagio from the Beethoven Sonata in A, Op. 30; a Barcarolle by Schubert; Piano Solo by Mendelssohn; "Su l'Aria," from Le Nozze di Figaro; and four piano-forte duets by Schumann. The first number was finely performed by Messrs. Allen and Burt, the violin of the latter bringing out the richness of the Andante movement with singular purity and truth. More sympathetic playing than was evinced in the performance of this, as well as of the very beautiful Adagio which opened the second part of the programme, one seldom hears. It left nothing to be desired. Mr. Allen's performance of the Funeral March well interpreted its massive grandeur; while the selection from Mendelssohn was given with remarkable brilliancy and power, showing the rare command which this gentleman has over his instrument. The Schubert Polonaises were played with grace and spirit by Mr. Allen and Mrs. A. S. Allen; and the concluding number of the programme gave us some choice specimens of the genius of the lamented Robert Schumann, viz: the dainty "Garland Weaving," the wild, Hungarian-like "March of Croats," the placid and spiritual "Dream," and the bubbling, sparkling piece, "By the Fountain," all of which were well performed by Mr. and Mrs. Allen, to the former of whom we have been indebted for more than one glance at the works of this composer. The vocal performers were Mrs. Allen and Miss Fiske. The former's rendering of the "Adelaide" was true to its rare beauty; while Miss Fiske's singing of the Barcarolle was pretty and tasteful. The Mozart duet, and the two-part songs, were very well sung by both ladies. These soirées are doing faithful service in the cause of Art in our vicinity. They are educating those who are favored with the privilege of attendance upon them, up to a recognition of the highest standards, and are doing for music what a well selected gallery of paintings or statuary does for its sister arts.

Advertisements.

Mendelssohn's Birth-Day Festival.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB will give a Concert in honor of the Birth of Mendelssohn, on TUESDAY EVENING, Feb. 8d, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms.—The following artists have kindly volunteered their services, Mrs. M. A. WENTWORTH, Messrs J. C. D. PARKER, and C. U. PERKINS. The programme will be composed of Mendelssohn's most characteristic works, for which see programme.

Tickets, One Dollar each, may be had at the usual places. Subscribers, not having received their complimentary tickets before Tuesday, will receive them by calling at Richardson's music store.

Commences precisely at 7½ o'clock.

Mendelssohn's Birth-Day Festival.

THE MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY will give a Musical entertainment in commemoration of the birth of Mendelssohn, consisting entirely of selected a from his works, at the Piano Forte Warerooms of Messrs. Hallett, Davis & Co., No 409 Washington street, on TUESDAY EVENING, February 8, commencing at 7½ o'clock.

A limited number of Tickets, at 50 cents each, may be obtained at the Music stores, and of the Secretary, at 350 Washington street.

WILLIAM STUTSON, JR., SECRETARY.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting will be held at the REVERA HOUSE, on MONDAY, the 16th day of February, at 7 o'clock, P. M.

H. WARE, Recording Secretary.

Boston, Feb. 1, 1867.

MELODEON.

THE THIRD OF THE

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,

(Being the SECOND of the regular series of four) will be given on SATURDAY EVENING, Feb. 7, at the MELODEON.

Particulars hereafter.

CARL ZERRAUN, Director and Conductor.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS, At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1867. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERRAUN,.....Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.

Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts. To be had at the music stores of E. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.

Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 3 o'clock.

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING: An Analytical, Physiological and Practical System for the Cultivation of the Voice. By CARLO BASSINI. Edited by R. STORRS WILLIS. Price $4.

The special attention of Teachers and all persons interested in the study and practice of vocal music, is respectfully called to this new and valuable work.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

Kreutzer's 40 Studies for the Violin.

JUST PUBLISHED,.....PRICE $1.50.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pineknay Street.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE.

WHITE BROTHERS, Agents for G. ANDRÉ & CO. Foreign Classic Music, at the reduced prices. THE ORGAN, by Hopkins and Rimbaud, a few copies. Just received, a small invoice of MEYER FLUTES.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,

Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text.

The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—

(Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 13. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 63
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 63
- " 3. Fétils on Choir and Chorus Singing.....88
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Catel's Treatise on Harmony.....63
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction. Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 63

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 65 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church,)

ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.

ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,

(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 33 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12 00
Do do each subsequent.....$6 00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 253.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 19.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 283 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" O. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 806 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

Mozart's Requiem.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

(Continued from p. 188.)

In recalling the last days and moments of the composer, we have at the same time commenced the critical examination of his last work. Biographical facts not only control the entire analysis, but they form the most important part of the analysis itself; they alone can explain the work and its effect, which (judging from myself) resembles nothing else, and which in fact surpasses all that music has produced, if I may judge from the number of listeners upon whom it has worked with irresistible power, independently of the place in which they have heard it, of religious faith, and even, to a certain extent, quite independent of their own degree of musical culture. I have heard the Requiem performed at different periods of my life, in church, in concert halls, and even in private dwellings, and everywhere did certain pieces of it produce on every one the same impression. Few musical tragedies, written in the most dramatic style, and sung and played with the highest talent, will compare with the Requiem, even when the sublime act for which it is intended does not lie before one's eyes, nor the majesty of the temple, the sight of the grave, the solemn procession of the mourners, and at times too the spectacle of a real and deep grief make the minds of the hearers more susceptible. I have seen persons grow pale and tremble on hearing the Confutatis and the Lacrymosa, who understood nothing of music, and whose ears had never been accustomed to the smooth Italian style. The Requiem, however, in its ensemble is far more learned music than that of any opera. We have elsewhere remarked that a hearer, who is totally incompetent to judge of a church composition as a work of Art, may nevertheless feel it in the truth of its Christian expression; a remark applicable above all and in the highest degree to Mozart's Requiem. No one mistakes the meaning of this music: God, death, judgment, eternity! One does not need to be a Catholic, nor to understand Latin.

Before Herr Weber, it was a pretty general conviction that a work of this character, which is understood by all who believe in God and the necessity of dying, could only, independently of the genius of the musician, be the result of a prolonged moral and material death struggle. A German writer, whose name I am not permitted to mention, expresses himself about it in the following words: "During the last years of his life Mozart had reached the point of comprehending Art in its extremes, and of seizing and reproducing with equal perfection all that music can express. But experience has too clearly taught us that extraordinary intellectual powers are seldom compatible with the conditions on which the duration of human life depends, since they can only be exercised and developed at the expense of the physical powers. . . . When Mozart felt his end approaching, he fell into a sort of melancholy, which entirely served to disturb the relations on which the co-existence of the two principles of our nature depend. One might say that already he no longer lived while he composed the Requiem, and that his work was the superhuman effort of a spirit, which had half broken through its mortal hull. Only in this way could Mozart compose just such a Requiem as his was. Had he written under other circumstances, with less protracted sickly exertion and enthusiasm, and had he not spent the greatest part of the nights upon this labor, he never would have bequeathed the like thereof to the admiration of posterity."

It has been said that the style of the Requiem seems to date back more than a hundred years, compared with that which reigned in the church music of Mozart's time, and which he himself had used in the Masses written for the Archbishop of Salzburg. To justify the remark, it must be considerably limited, since it neither applies to the ensemble of the work, nor to the totality of any one piece, nor above all to the instrumentation of the Requiem. It only concerns the character and form of several vocal melodies, which, proceeding from the Catholic choral song, remind one of the masters of the seventeenth, and those at the end of the sixteenth century. And even in this regard several pieces of it belong altogether to the modern music. Yet the use of a melodic style, approaching the Oratorio and the Drama, seems to be but an exception in the Requiem, suggested by the nature of certain texts, as we shall see below. In general the coloring of the work is antique. It is very important to remark, then, that Mozart, who had lent an entirely new aspect to the lyric drama, who, together with Haydn, had reformed, or rather say, created the Symphony, the violin Quartet and Quintet, the whole instrumental music—that Mozart, when he had to write in the high church style, knew of nothing better he could do but to reach into the past, and in regard to melody go back to the seventeenth and the first half of the eighteenth century, that is, to Bach and Handel, so far as fugued choruses and fugues were concerned.

In my review of the history of music I have indicated the epochs of transition or of preparation, and the definite results to which the Art in some of its branches had attained. These results, by which we mean the forms and creations which had retained vitality in music ever since it had begun to exist, were in sacred music: 1) the Choral Song of Palestrina and his followers; the alla capella style. 2) The perfected instrumented fugue of Bach and Handel, founded on the modern scale. Church music, therefore, was the only kind that was definitely constituted before Mozart; and for this reason the great reformer, in several numbers of the Requiem which we shall indicate below, would neither use the melody of his time, as being too rich in phrases and of a too worldly elegance for the church, nor the secular fugue, such as he had himself employed in the finales to the Quartet in G, and to the Symphony in C, and in the Zauberflöte overture. Thus it is demonstrated that for him the high church style was synonymous with the old church style.

Truth occupies the mean between two extremes. Nowhere is this important mean so seldom found as in the sphere of music. We have too many exclusives among us. One likes only the old music; the other shows a profound indifference, if not an uncommon contempt, for all before the eighteenth century. While on the one hand Mozart was reproached with a too conscientious cleaving to the traditions of the Catholic church; while Herr Weber, no particular admirer of the old music, wanted to bring a sort of criminal suit against him for rendering certain texts of the Requiem too faithfully; other critics on the contrary, who carried the worship of this music to fanaticism, maintained that Mozart had overstepped the limits of the sacred style; that the true church music admits no melody except psalmody and the choral song, or something like it; that it admits neither orchestra nor any sort of instrumentation, not even the organ. According to them, the Masses of Haydn and Cherubini are no Masses; still less those of Beethoven. In Mozart's works they say that there is nothing church-like but the Requiem (i. e., those parts of it which are treated in the old style); but that the Catholic church must reject the musical intentions of the Dies iræ, the Tuba mirum, and the Confutatis.

As these are the very numbers (to which we must add also the Lacrymosa) in which Mozart more or less has not entirely departed from the church style proper, and since they are the ones in which he has employed victorious, impassioned, lively melody, we must first of all examine their texts. What do we find? A sort of epic and descriptive poetry, in which are sketched the most terrible pictures which imagination can suggest; the day of wrath, which will be for all the world the last of days: Dies iræ, dies illa; the trump whose call sets all the bones in motion and breaks open all the graves: Tuba mirum spargens sonum; Death stupefied with terror at the thought of giving back en masse his booty: Mors stupebit; the book, which contains all that has been done, said, felt and thought since the creation, opens and shows to every one that is to be judged the page concerning him: Liber scriptus proferetur; the condemned are plunged into the flames of hell: Flammis acerbis addictis; the elect take possession of an unspeakable and endless bliss: Voca me cum benedictis. We must confess that, if there is an art which is capable of lending a sort of reality to such pictures—at least so far as it is possible within the too narrow frame of human reason and imagination—it is music.

I ask now in the first place if there is any kind of vocal music which forbids the composer to write in the spirit of the words, or which even leaves him free to do the contrary. Then again I ask any one who has the slightest idea of the difference in styles of composition and their respective means of performance, whether there were any means of translating the texts just cited into the form of the old church style.

[To be continued.]

(From the New York Tribune.)

The New Grand Opera House in Philadelphia.

(Concluded from p. 140.)

THE AUDITORIUM.

It is this part of the Philadelphia Academy of Music which, in respect to its adaptation to the purposes of sight, sound and comfort, claims special notice. Its form, or horizontal section, as indicated by the box fronts, is that of a segment apparently of about one third of a circle, continued by the tangents, and extending, as the distance widens between them, to their contact with the proscenium. The depth of this area from its front wall to the proscenium line, is 90 feet, and the transverse measure of that line the same. The proscenium is 13 feet deep, thus making the depth of the auditorium, including the stage boxes, 103 feet. The parquet floor, from its level behind the orchestra, rises, with what railroad engineers call a heavier gradient than is usual in theatres. This secures to the rows of seats, as they retreat from the stage, an elevation which prevents any obstruction of the view. The level of the parquet-circle is somewhat higher, and instead of an inclined floor is a series of platforms—such as box-tiers usually have. The dress-circle (actually the second tier) has the same bounds as the first. The third tier has its front retreating three feet within the vertical line of the next below; and the fourth tier is similarly reduced. Thus, the aspect of the auditorium, determined by lines touching the boxfronts, from the highest down to the parquet, is amphitheatrical, enlarging as it ascends, and hence more graceful, airy, and at the same time imposing in its display of the audience. From the parquet floor to the ceiling the height is seventy feet.

In the decorative features of this part of the house substantial elegance seems to have been more studied than superficial gorgeousness. The sweep (or rake, as a sailor would term it) of the tiers of boxes is exceedingly graceful. Each tier is sustained by a series of 14 fluted iron columns, placed not on the front line, but about 10 feet within that of the lower tier. They are finished with a capital, Corinthian in expression, although not in detail; in advance of them extend modillions, while between them spring elliptical arches, from the topmost course of which rises the dome. The proscenium is flanked by six massive columns, about 35 feet high. Between two of these, standing obliquely on each side, are the tiers of proscenium-boxes; and over their entablature, following the line of the columns, are Atlantes—gigantic figures, bending beneath the crowning entablature and pediments, from which springs the wide ellipse spanning the stage in front of the curtain. The two other columns on each side of the proscenium stand against the edges of the curtain and sustain the architrave behind which it depends.

Such is briefly the size and the form of the auditorium. It contains 1,700 permanent seats in the parquet and in the parquet-circle and dress-circle, and about 650 in each of the upper tiers, making 3,000 in all; beside places for about 400 moveable seats. The stationary seats are sofas of black walnut, upholstered with springs and curled hair, covered with plush, and divided by arms for each person, except in the upper tier, the construction of which is less costly. The space allotted to each sitter, is 22 by 36 inches, being, as I think, full three inches each way more than is allotted to the choicest parts of our New-York Academy of Music, but yet not wide enough by two inches. Had the other proportions, however, of the Philadelphia seats been as liberal as the space allotted to them, reasonable fault could not be found. But most unfortunately, the depth of each seat, from the front to the inside line of the back, is only 16 inches—a depth, as fair experiment proves, entirely insufficient for comfort during one, two or three hours' sitting. The leg of the sitter lacks support under the knee, and a bolt-upright position is also necessitated by the height of the seat, which is 22 inches from the floor, full two inches too much. Now, if the Directors wish to do justice as well to the public as to their own repute for knowledge of ordinary comfort—luxury out of the question—they will reform these seats altogether. They are a sad incongruity in a house preëminent in the advantages of its construction.

As regards facility of vision, from every place in the house, the highest and the lowest, those immediately next the proscenium walls, and those most remote against the front wall, the stage is fairly in view, from the footlights to the flies. Of course, on the extreme flank, a part of either adjacent range of wings must be lost—but not the ordinary scenes of action. In this respect the radical shape of the auditorium, the inclination of the tiers of boxes, and the pitch of their floors, are indefinitely superior to any example of theatrical architecture with which I am familiar, either in this country or in Europe. It is difficult to conceive of a more perfect fulfilment of the requisitions of sight. Those of sound appear to have been not less thoroughly accomplished. I tested its acoustic properties at a time when only a few persons were present, by occupying different places in the highest and lowest tiers. From the remotest points a conversation was audible, held in a moderate whisper with a person standing behind the curtain line. This must be due in great part to the form of the house; but also to the fact that the walls of the auditorium are lined with wood (boards tongued and grooved and carefully fitted), with an interstice through the whole extent of about an inch between the lining and the solid wall. A wide well dug under the parquet, also makes its floor a great drum-head. The dome may aid the effect, being constructed entirely of ribs of iron to which stout wire gauze being attached, serves to receive and hold the plaster regularly through its whole extent. Another help is probably the lobby-doors, which are flush with the inner wall, and without prominent mouldings to break the even surface. While the sound is thus perfectly conveyed, there is no echo to confuse it, so far as my experiments were a test.

The aspect of the auditorium with reference to artistic effect is a proper medium between severe simplicity and excessive ornamentation. The fronts of the box-tiers are enriched by various devices carved in full relief. Those of the dress-circle consist of bold festoons of fruit and flowers, holding groups of musical instruments, alternated by counter-sunk panels with courses of mouldings above and below.

The prevailing color is a cream-white, with pink in the panels, and the carvings and mouldings burnished gold. The iron columns—fourteen in each tier, rising one on another of each series—are white with gilt fluting and capitals. They are specially noticeable. The six proscenium columns, which we have described, are elegantly designed and executed. The shaft of each, from about one third above the base, is embraced by acanthus leaves; the upper portion of it is fluted; the capitals, (if I observed rightly) are Corinthian; the entablature, etc., in keeping. The proscenium-box fronts project elliptically between the two columns, their heads being two arches separated by a pillar and set off by crimson satin curtains. The color and gildings of the whole correspond with the tiers of box-fronts. The pediment of one side of the proscenium has the city arms, and the other side the State arms sculptured, crowning the entablature supported by the colossal Atlantes above noticed.

The front arch over the curtain has a pediment adorned with reclining statues of Poetry and Music, resting on a medallion encircling a bust of Mozart. The audience seats are covered with crimson plush, and the wall of the auditorium with velvet paper of the same color. The ceilings of the box tiers are paneled and frescoed. The material of the dome is already described. Its decoration is elaborately elegant, consisting of four principal and twelve secondary panels. In the former are allegorical groups of three figures each, representing Music, Dancing, Comedy and Tragedy. Four other panels contain children typical of the seasons; and the remaining four artistic insignia. An arabesque border surrounds the dome. Its centre, with a diameter of about twenty feet, springs more suddenly upward, and is colored azure, studded with golden stars. The painting is in oil-colors, by Mr. C. Keyser, and the groups, &c., by Mr. C. Schmolze. The conception is chaste and appropriate, and the execution artistic. The house is lighted by a superb gilt and glass chandelier, 50 feet in circumference, depending from the centre of the dome, with 240 gas-burners, and by numerous beautiful brackets against the wall of each tier. These fixtures—as all those of the house—are the designs and work of the celebrated firm of Cornelius & Baker.

THE STAGE DEPARTMENT.

Whatever commendations I have deemed it just to bestow upon the parts of the Philadelphia Academy of Music, already described, I must award equal, if not greater praise to the Stage Department. Measured from the front of the stage, this occupies an area of 90 feet in depth by 150 in width. The opening of the curtain is 49 feet; and the height of the opening, at the apex of the proscenium arch, is 50 feet. The height above the stage is 70 feet, allowing the drop-scenes to be lifted clear of the flies. The stage floor is in numerous transverse sections, for the purpose of dropping scenes also below it, and of elevating by machinery portions of it, so as to form bridges, terraces, platforms, etc., without the necessity of building them up. The excavation under the stage is nearly 30 feet deep, with an intermediate sub-stage, if I may so term it, having traps corresponding with those of the upper floor, to admit of the dropping of scenery. On each side of the stage are stair-cases of easy ascent and neatly finished, and sundry apartments. Among them is the Green Room, 20 by 42 feet, spacious and handsome; the Stage Manager's Room, ample, also, for chorus rehearsals; the Property-man's Rooms, and several dressing-rooms. Under the Green Room is the Supernumeraries' Room, and near the orchestra the Musicians' Room. The upper stories on the stage sides are devoted to numerous dressing-rooms, all nicely and completely furnished; to wardrobes, carpenters' and scene-painters' rooms, etc., of the most ample dimensions.

CONSTRUCTION, WARMING, VENTILATING.

The walls are massive and solid throughout. The foundation walls are four feet thick—the inner as well as the outer walls—and some of them, the auditorium for instance, three feet at the top of the house.

The timbers match the walls in strength, and all the wood-work is of the most substantial material and proportions. The ornamentation, by the way, of the box-fronts, the proscenium, the saloons, etc., is all carved out of solid wood; the ordinary material of such decorations (papier maché and stucco) being wholly omitted. I have stated that the entire roof, as well as the frame of the dome is of iron. The timbers sustaining the floors of the box-tiers are bolted together with intermediate plates of boiler iron to stiffen them. In a word the structure is honestly reared for posterity—built long but built strong.

The heating of the house is effected entirely by steam—no less than six miles of pipes being used in it for the purpose. Two large boilers are placed outside the basement of the building. The warming of the house has been tested for several weeks, and during the recent severe weather, with the thermometer out of doors nearly at zero, the stage and auditorium and every room pertaining to both have been kept perfectly comfortable. This is an achievement worth mentioning. The ventilation is effected by numerous flues, with registers in the walls, all conducted to a central shaft over the dome. Fresh air may be also artificially propelled, in warm weather, by a fan, worked by a steam-engine in the basement, which also throws water into reservoirs on the top of the house.

The architects of this fine building are Messrs. Le Brun and Runge, the former a native of Philadelphia, the latter a German long resident there.

We have thus described the Philadelphia Academy of Music, because in the essential requirements of a great lyrical and dramatic edifice, it is the first in the United States to answer the demands of those arts: and its erection, therefore, is an era in their cis-Atlantic history. Not that in all particulars we approve of the internal aspect of the building. The devices on the box-fronts, for instance, might have been much more definite and varied. The paper—dark crimson on the auditorium wall—is a damask pattern with no freshness of design, and the color has nothin akin to the delicate tints—almost white—of the projecting box-tiers, their barriers, columns, modillions, &c.; but, as a correspondence with the covering of the seats, and as a back-ground for the relief of the light toilettes of ladies in the audience, it may be judiciously chosen. The proscenium, however, is very elegant, and I could not venture a suggestion of improvement. The same of the painting of the dome. On the whole, the effect of our own Academy of Music in Fourteenth Street—of its auditorium—is much more striking and gorgeous than that of the Philadelphia house, though unfortunately all our decorations of form—the caryatides and what not—are unsubstantial papier-mache or composition, instead of the solid, durable sculpture of the other. In point of extent, too, the latter has greatly the advantage.

The following figures compare the two.

	Area in square feet.	Area of Stage Department.	Area of Audience Department.
N. Y. Academy.	24,020	9,760	14,260
Phila. Academy.	34,000	13,000	21,000

The dimensions of the latter are certainly sufficient for all practical purposes, and in view of the economy of the divisions of the whole space and the actual floor room of all the stories, it compares favorably with the greatest houses in Europe. I estimate roughly the floor room of all the auditorium stories to be full 85,000 square feet, and of the whole stage department 45,000 feet. If real comforts of light, heat, ventilation, water, stairways, exits, and so forth, be taken into account, I have no hesitation in pronouncing it much in advance of any foreign theatre. The cost of this noble establishment is about $375,000 including the lot. The Directors are short about $25,000 of this amount—to meet which the Inauguration Concert and Ball were given.

Mendelssohn and his Music.

(From an English Review.)

In the early life of Mendelssohn not one favorable augury for a noble future was wanting. The very race from which he sprung was the primeval fountain of sacred melody. He held kinship to Miriam, and "the sweet singer of Israel." His more immediate genealogy was not undistinguished. His grandfather was Moses Mendelssohn, a kind of Hebrew German Plato; who, in the years when German literature was putting on its strength, stood with mild philosophic countenance by the side of Lessing, Wieland, and Klopstock, and was in no degree dwarfed by the stature of his contemporaries. To the dignified Theism of the grandfather the sacred music of the grandson seems to succeed in the same relative order as the new to the old dispensation. While, however, a great Jew philosopher was well enough for the penultimate link in Mendelssohn's ancestry, the ultimate was still better, for his father was a rich banker, possessing all resources to lavish upon the culture of the son, and an eye to see in him something worthy to tax them all. The genial banker occupied his proud intermediate position between Moses and Felix without sharing the genius of either; but that position was not to him the "point of indifference," for he showed a humorous appreciation of the honor in habitually saying, "When I was a boy people used to call me the son, and now they call me the father of the great Mendelssohn." Nor was there wanting to the early direction of the great composer's powers that blessed influence which has entered as a primary element into nearly all that is great in human deed—the fostering care of a tender and thoughtful mother. She was of a distinguished family of the name of Bartholdy, but it was her chief distinction and happiness that she gave to her son his last name and his first musical impressions.

Mendelssohn, the second of four children, was born in Hamburg on the 3d February, 1809, in a house behind the church of St. Michael, which house the author of the German "Memorial" takes care to inform us was left standing by the great fire of Hamburg—a circumstance which, in these degenerate days, we find it difficult to attribute to any remains of that musical susceptibility which the elements were wont to show in the days of Orpheus and "old Amphion." The child's leading taste displayed itself at an amazingly early age, and it was carefully nurtured, and every applause furnished for its development. No need in this case, as in poor little Handel's, for stealthy midnight interviews with a smuggled clavicord in a secret attic; nor, as in the case of Bach, for copying whole books of studies by moonlight for want of a candle, churlishly denied. Mendelssohn's childhood and youth present as fair a picture of healthy and liberal culture as educational records can show. A warm and discerning affection charged the atmosphere in which he grew up with every influence that could elicit and strengthen his latent capacities. About his third or fourth year the family removed to Berlin, and here, under the training of Berger, he acquired his mastery over the piano-forte, which in his eighth year he played with wonderful finish; while in the theory of music he had made so much progress under rough old Zelter—best known as the friend and correspondent of Goethe, that his tutor was fond of telling with a grim smile how the child had detected in a concerto of Bach six of those dread offences against the grammar of music—consecutive fifths. "The lad plays the piano like the devil," says Zelter to Goethe, amongst many other ejaculations of wonder at Mendelssohn's early musical development. Finally, in 1821, he brought his pupil on a visit to Goethe at Weimar, and with this event commenced the long standing friendship and correspondence between the composer and the poet. We find amongst Goethe's minor poems a stanza to Mendelssohn, commemorative of this visit, and inviting its repetition. It is to be presumed that at this period Goethe was interested in the boy chiefly as a musical prodigy, but he soon found in him points of closer intellectual contact with the circle of his own genius. The immense musical faculty of Mendelssohn had not been allowed to stunt and maim his other powers of mind. He was a good classical scholar, and in 1826 he drew warm praise from Goethe by a translation of the Andria of Terence. He was skilful, too, in drawing, and could afterwards fix his impressions of the Hebrides or the Alps in other forms than they assumed in his great pictorial symphonies. This became to him a great resource as a diversion to his mind in the intervals of his wonderful musical activity. In general Art-criticism he always displayed an insight and knowledge which might have done credit to the specialité of Waagen. Mendelssohn's mind was, indeed, as rich and facile in all departments of modern intellectual culture as if he had no specialité of his own. But whatever might be the sources of Goethe's regard for Mendelssohn, there is evidence enough of its strength. When the young composer, on his first visit to England, in 1829, was thrown from a gig in London and wounded in the knee, the poet wrote to Zelter thus: "I wish to learn if favorable news has been heard of the worthy Felix. I take the greatest interest in him, and am in the highest degree anxious that one who has done so much should not be hindered in his progress by a miserable accident. Say something to reassure me." And when, in 1830, Mendelssohn had spent a pleasant fortnight in Weimar, Goethe thus characteristically reported the results to himself of this visit:

"His presence was particularly beneficial to me, for I find my relation to music is ever the same; I hear it with pleasure, sympathy, and reflection, but I like most its history; for who understands any phenomenon if he is not master of the course of its development? It was therefore of the greatest importance to find that Felix possesses a commendable insight into this gradation, and fortunately his good memory brings before him the classics of every mode at pleasure. From the epoch of Bach downward he has brought to life again for me Haydn, Mozart, and Gluck; has given me adequate ideas of the great modern theorists; and finally, made me feel and reflect upon his own productions, and so is departed with my best blessings."

The original works thus mentioned may seem to be brought into perilous conjunction with the greatest names of the musical Pantheon, but to those who know them there will seem nothing anomalous in the association. "Although scarcely twenty years old," says Mr. Benedict, "he had at this period composed his Ottetto, three quartets for piano and stringed instruments, two sonatas, two symphonies, his first violin quartet, various operas, a great number of separate Lieder, or songs, and the immortal overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream." In some of these works there were the inevitable crudities of boyish ambition, for the wings of early genius are not equable in their very first movements. In most of them, however, and notably in the great Shakspearean overture, composed at the age of sixteen, there are all the splendid vigor and symmetry of the young eagle sunning his newly perfected pinions.

The rapid outburst of a fresh and consummate creative power, differing essentially from all its predecessors, is not to be lazily regarded as an event of ordinary evolution, nor are its results to be valued only for their novel gout upon a jaded mental palate. The unlikeness of genius in its essence to any other thing dreamt of in our philosophy is here realized almost to our very senses. An ardent and thoughtful boy—but one to whom leap-frog and cricket are by no means unfamiliar processes—takes his Wieland Shakspeare, and is caught away by the moonlit fantasy of the great fairy drama. He feels the beauty of the scene translating itself into exquisite rhythm in his brain, and, impelled by a resistless inspiration, he throws all the resources of his art into the process, until the trickiness of Puck, the delicate grace of Titania, and the elvish majesty of Oberon, are so made to alternate and to blend in the movement, that it forms a perfect tone-picture of the poet's dream, finally fading away in a few high, soft chords, like a dissolving view, at the first obtrusive ray of morning. Everywhere a genial and fluent fancy is apparent, but this by no means completes the wonder. The boy has that great cunning of his art so to control his melodic conceptions, and knit them up into strength by the use and distribution of modern orchestral resources that the science seems a portion of the inspiration, and the dream is the more dream-like that thoughts woven into its filmet tissue. And so the youthful hand jots the signs which fix and convey his ideas, and henceforth there is in the world a new pleasure of a new kind. It is unfortunately possible that some may see in all this only a fresh impulse to an already too strenuous catgut; but in the mature and masterly workmanship of the boy Mendelssohn we discern a clear pledge of a new endowment for the world, and see something of that stout fibre out of which is spun the thread of a great destiny. We now understand something of old Zelter's prophetic raptures.

It was the performance of this work in London which initiated Mendelssohn's great and ever increasing English reputation. Without taking up a permanent abode amongst us, he became after this so frequent a visitor in England, with such an accession of pleasure and repute on each occasion, that his name and fame seemed to become as steadily English as were those of the more thoroughly domiciled Handel in his day. Nine times (not seven only, as Mr. Benedict says) he came to England, finding in our scenery and society, and in the immense executive resources placed at his disposal, constant impulses towards new "heavens of inventions," which continually opened up before his daring intuition. It is true his life was spent mainly in the "Fatherland," and his journeys out of it were not always in the direction of this country. In Italy, for instance, he imbibed with intense enjoyment that air to which the artists of all lands go to see their own aims and outlines clearly. Rome was to him, as to all men of his temperament, at once a school and a shrine; and the society which he enjoyed there, of such men as Vernet, Bunsen, Liszt, and Berlioz, must have exerted a healthy and expansive influence upon his mind. But Italy could not supply the aliment needful for his earnest and active nature; and London and Birmingham were really more to Mendelssohn than Rome and Naples. In Paris, whither he went twice, he found nothing to induce a frequent recurrence of his visits. At Dusseldorf, Leipzig, and Berlin he spent fourteen active and chequered years, through which we cannot minutely follow him, holding various appointments, and producing a constant succession of works in every department of composition—the products of each year gaining in depth and grandeur until his genius and fame reached their culminating point in the marvellous inspiration of Elijah.

By social position, by the happy balance of his own cultivated nature, and by that greatest of mortal blessings, a thoroughly sympathetic marriage, Mendelssohn was sure in any place to find his enjoyment of life less influenced by local limitations than most men find it. He was comparatively exempt from that wretched class of incidents which has infused into the lives of so many great composers all the bitterness of Marah. But this exemption could not, in Germany, be entire. At Dusseldorf the joint management of the theatre bred a coolness and ultimate alienation between Mendelssohn and Immerman the poet, even after that sacred symbol of German friendship, the pronoun "du," had passed between them. Leipzig was enthusiastic, and Mendelssohn was its "favorite," but a composer like Schumann could be its favorite too, and it could yield to the arrogant dogma of Wagner that Mendelssohn was "mechanical;" and so, hardly was the "favorite" off the scene before Elijah was performed to a room half-filled. Berlin had its royal commissions for Mendelssohn, with some pleasure and much profit appended; but in the city of cliques and criticism, with its intellectual atmosphere rarefied to the last point of negation by Voltaireism and Hegelism, his genial nature must have felt as if in an exhausted receiver. We reflect with pride on the fact that the composer's connection with England was chequered with no such desagrémens. His love of this country struck root early, and the plant, when acclimated, grew as hardily as a native.

But our pride is not merely that Mendelssohn's genius linked itself to our highest literature by his Shakspearean music, nor to our scenery by his Ossianic Overture to the "Hebrides," and the Symphony in A minor, nor even that the grandest tones which have clothed the Christian verities since the "Messiah" was written, first awoke at his bidding in the noble hall of one of our great manufacturing towns. He gave England much, but from England he won no niggardly response. It is not mere insular complacency to assert that here all the greater works of Mendelssohn woke the echoes of the world. The sympathy which they elicited in London and in our festival cities was the electric current, and the British press was the conducting medium through which his fame was flashed over Europe. In this country the taste of the public had been kept faithfully true to the large and solid type. The masterworks of Handel and the "Creation" of Haydn had for many years been far more frequently produced in England than in any country in Europe. So familiar had the wonderful choral movements of these works become, that in many a country village the assembled peasants or artisans might be heard practising, with clear or cracked voice, the invocation to the "Everlasting Doors," or the ascription by the heavens of "Glory to God," while every plain and plastered conventicle was doubly consecrated in its turn by the sound of the one great Hallelujah. In our large towns these works were known to a great proportion of the people of all classes. It was a grateful change for the workmen to pass from the thunder of looms and jennies to the more harmonious resonance of Handel, while the shopkeeper gladly betook himself for a Christmas treat to his twentieth "Messiah"; and it is out of these circumstances that has arisen that singular vocal efficiency which has given to the Lancashire chorus so wide a fame. But this interest and efficiency arose from the very narrowness of the field within which, up to that period, they could be displayed. Handel was in oratorio not only supreme, but was almost alone. Besides Haydn, no other great composer took up an abiding position within the sacred circle of scriptural drama. Mozart had written no oratorios. One movement only of Beethoven's "Mount of Olives"—the Hallelujah—has ever seized upon the popular imagination, while the ingeniously modulated music of Spohr's "Crucifixion" and "Last Judgment" seems too thin and filmy to lodge within the common memory. It seemed indeed doubtful whether any composer could or would arise who might combine with the breadth and body of Handelian ideas all the wonderful uses which the orchestra has developed in the last hundred years. We almost imagined ourselves shut up to Handel for the form of our millennial praises whenever their predicted period should arrive.

The sway of Mendelssohn's baton dissipated this doubt. "St. Paul," "The Hymn of Praise," and "Elijah" appeared successively. They were felt to be emphatically new, yet great enough to be matched with the old. The special triumph of these works is that they met with their earliest and fullest acceptance in this country, where the stature of Handel was the inevitable standard applied to them. Here at last was music which neither asked for any reduction of the proportions of the temple of religious musical aspiration, nor set us to perform chamber devotions in a cathedral. Amidst all those qualities of fulness, freshness and finish which are more expressly elements of modern composition, was recognized that structural grandeur, both in the successive movements and in the total dramatic design, which was the attribute an older time. For such reasons these works were sure of a wider and heartier appreciation here than any musical compositions have ever or anywhere met with on their first presentation.

Enthusiastic ovations for the composer, on conducting his works, show how the faculty of the country had been unconsciously trained for their recognition. It had hungered and thirsted for music of this express order. We well remember the scene in the great hall of one of our provincial cities, when, in April of the fatal year 1847, Mendelssohn in person unrolled the great harmonies of his "Elijah" before six thousand people, to most of whom the name and genius of Handel were familiar. The interest, amounting indeed to excitement, everywhere displayed, was something curious and suggestive to one who could so far free himself from the same feeling as to become an observer. Every member of the executing force, from the "first ladies" in front to the agitator of tympani in the remotest rear, seemed bent with earnest devotion on realizing the great artistic will which gleamed with regal power and courtesy from the dark eyes and pale face of the composer. A motion of a hand drew the great composite choral unity through transitions and shades of tone which no nicety of the conductor's art or docility of the executive medium had ever produced in our hearing.

The whole vast area was charged with one emotion of wonder and delight. The dramatic interest of the scenes of drought and of rain seemed reproduced with a double significance. As regards sacred composition the heavens had long been "as brass" to our laments and invocations; but here at length were "the water-floods;" and the great chorus of "Thanks be to God," resounded as if in its own existence were sufficient motive for the grateful adoration it embodied.

But if in this sense Mendelssohn was the prophet who was instrumental in quenching so noble a thirst—the prophet, too, who, in the language addressed to him by Prince Albert in this very year, "when surrounded by the Baal-worship of corrupted Art, had been able by his genius and science to preserve faithfully the worship of true Art"—he was no less the prophet (and where, alas! is his mantle?) destined to be too soon caught up from the sphere of his earthly labors, to be followed with sorrowing looks along the shining track of his translation. From this last visit to England he went, worn and weary, back to Germany. In Frankfort he met news of the sudden death of his sister, Madame Hensel, to whom he had always been ardently attached. He fell to the ground with a shriek, and though he afterwards rallied and even labored hard, because, as he often said to his wife, "the time of rest was approaching for him too," the blow was already struck upon his fine nervous system which was to shatter and destroy it. In October he wrote his last composition, a solemn melody to a night song of Eichendorf, "Departed is the light of Day," and on the 4th of November he expired, in his thirty-ninth year.

(Conclusion next week.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From a Lecture on "Bells" by A. W. Thayer.

If we may rely upon the results to which the careful and minute researches of Hawkins and Burney led them, the bell has, from its introduction into use as a call to worship, been a "church-going bell." It belongs, then, to Christianity alone; and it is one of the pleasant associations which belong to it, that it owes its origin to and has been perfected by Christianity. The Pagan Constantine conquered under the sign of the cross, and adopted the religion of which that sign was typical. Paganism fell. Some space of time it struggled, but at length the Christian was victor. The church in Italy grew wealthy and powerful. No longer hiding herself in catacombs and secret places, she began to consecrate the temples of the Greek and Roman divinities to the true God, and to erect other temples of her own, adorned with every beauty of art. Paulinus about the year 400 was Bishop of Nola, a city in the rich copper-producing province of Campania, in the kingdom of Naples. He adorned the church of St. Felix with paintings, and put the finishing touch to the edifice by suspending thereon the first "church-going bell." How large it was, how constructed, what the exact uses to which it was put—of these we have no record. This we know—that the triumph of Christianity and the introduction of the church bell were nearly enough coincident to associate the events in our minds, and make us hear in the peals rung out in steeple and campanile, the voice of iron tongues shouting for joy over the long-contested and hardly won victory. Thus the associations of fourteen centuries, which cluster around the bell, are all in some form Christian.

Moore, in his well-known lines, "Those evening bells," refers only to childish associations with some particular chime; but when an American first treads European ground, and the deep, solemn tones of old bells, swinging high in cathedral towers, strike upon his ear, he listens to the voice of past ages, and a new and wondrous fount of feeling is touched. He walks the streets of Paris, and suddenly from some old belfry come down the tones which rang jubilant over the successes of Joan of Arc, and which sounded the tocsin on the awful night of St. Bartholomew. In Spanish cities bells which hailed the conquering Ferdinand and Isabella, and the returning Columbus, which tolled the knells of the Inquisition's victims, call to him with their deep voices. All through Europe, on the banks of the Thames, in the old cities of the Rhine and Danube, on the shores of the Swiss lakes and upon the hill-sides of the Hartz and the Black Forest, the same bells will call him to the same cathedrals, churches and chapels, that called knight and squire to the solemn services with which they consecrated themselves and vowed to fight the battles of the crusades. In the old cities of Saxony still hang the same bells that called Luther to the pulpit to utter his fiery words, or that called the people together to listen to the Bull of Leo X., which devoted the Reformer and all his followers to the eternal horrors of a world of woe.

Thus as we walk those old streets of European cities, and the pages of history unfold themselves to us as living realities—as we live in ages that are past, and people the streets in our imagination with the bustle of ancient traffic, the noise and confusion of the fair, the splendor of imperial coronations and royal progresses, the roar of sieges, the clash of arms and the shock of armies—above all and through all come sounding in the ear of fancy the deep tones of the bells.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 7, 1857.

Mendelssohn's Birth-day.

The practice of celebrating the birth-day of great musicians, artists, poets, is a good one and indicates advancing civilization. The time will come, unless the human race is doomed beyond a certain point of progress to sink back, when politics and trade will become secondary in importance, and the main interests of the whole social life be moral and artistic. Life is to be made a Fine Art; and they who inspire their race with high and beautiful ideals in those arts which keep alive the sense of divine beauty and perfection, and make us feel related to the Infinite, will be esteemed the world's best benefactors. Even if there were danger of excess in this direction, it were a wholesome and a hopeful symptom in a people so unartistic as ourselves.

Our two musical societies, who bear the name of MENDELSSOHN, could not do less than hold some festival commemorative of the birth-day of their patron saint. A great musician leaves us in his music just the most effective means of bringing himself back to us; in his music we have his essential life and influence. Nothing so fit, therefore, for such a festival as a performance of the great composer's works. Hence the programmes of the two concerts were entirely of the works of Mendelssohn.

Unfortunately both commenced at the same hour on Tuesday evening, Feb. 3. Not having heard the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY at all this winter, while we have enjoyed the QUINTETTE CLUB so often, we sought the former first, and found the saloon of Messrs. Hallet & Davis filled with a very interested audience. The programme was as follows:

PART I.—From the Oratorio of "St. Paul."

- 1—Chorus: Lord! thou alone art God.
- 2—Chorus: To God on high be thanks and praise.
- 3—Aria: Be thou faithful unto death.
- 4—Chorus: Happy and blest are they.
- 5—Aria: But the Lord is mindful of his own.
- 6—Recitative and Chorus: (O be gracious, ye immortals.)

PART II.—Miscellaneous Selections.

- 1—Piano-forte Solos:—a. Fantasia.—b. Songs without Words.
- 2—Four-part Song, for male voices: "Huntsmen's Farewell."
- 3—Song: "The first Violet."
- 4—Song: "Maid of Ganges."
- 5—Song: "Over the mountain."
- 6—Four-part Song, for male voices: "The Voyage."

PART III.—From the Oratorio of "Elijah."

- 1—Aria: Hear ye, Israel.
- 2—Chorus: Be not afraid.
- 3—Aria: O rest in the Lord.
- 4—Chorus: He, watching over Israel.
- 5—Aria: If with all your hearts.
- 6—Quartet: Cast thy burden upon the Lord.
- 7—Scene: Recitative, (Look down on us.)
Air and Choruses, (Thanks be to God.)

The Chorus numbered about 150 voices, with a fine fresh set of soprani and contralti, of a more youthful aspect than we have commonly seen in our oratorio societies. The parts were well balanced; the ensemble of tone remarkably pure and musical, and although too powerful for so small a room, we found it quite inspiring. The conductor, Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD, appears to have perfect control of his choir, and the rendering of the grand opening chorus and Chorale from "St. Paul," as well as of the more delicately shaded "Happy and blest" and "O be gracious," with such admirable precision and expression, proved that his drill had been most thorough. There was a pianissimo at the close of one of the choruses executed to a charm.

The songs and arias were mostly sung by amateurs, and are hardly fair subjects for criticism. Mrs. MOZART and Miss TWICHELL contributed in this department. We were struck by the rich and musical baritone of the gentleman who sang "Over the mountain." The four-part songs, sung by eight voices, were creditable specimens of male part-singing, but the style was somewhat too level, and lacked fine shading. The Fantasia and several "Songs without Words" were played quite tastefully by Mr. WM. R. BABCOCK, one of our best organists, who also played most of the accompaniments.

Leaving the selections from "Elijah," we repaired to Chickering's, in the vain hope of hearing the second part of the programme of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. We were just in time for the last piece, an exquisite quintet Adagio, and never did the strings blend to our ear with a more tantalizing sweetness. The room had a most home-like aspect; for there were they whose genial presence had become identified for years with chamber concerts of this classical character; and the room was unusually full. The bust of the composer, laurel-crowned, was placed in front of the artists' platform. The general report was enthusiastic, but some thought the selections averaged of too grave a character. Here is the list of them:

PART I.

1. Quintet in A, op. 18.
Allegro con moto—Intermezzo—Andante Sostenuto—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro vivace.
2. Air, from the 42d Psalm: "For my soul thirsteth."
Mrs. E. A. Wentworth.
3. Andante, Intermezzo and Finale, from the Piano Quartet in F minor, op. 7.
Messrs. Perkins, Meisel, Krebs, and W. Fries.

PART II.

4. Adagio Molto and Scherzo, from the Quartet in F minor, op. 80, of the Posthumous works.
5. Andante from the Sonata for Piano and Violoncello in B flat, op. 45. Messrs. Parker and W. Fries.
6. Air, from St. Paul: "Jerusalem, thou that killest the Prophets."
Mrs. E. A. Wentworth.
7. Adagio Molto from the Second Quintet in B flat, op. 87, No. 16, Posthumous works.

A PRIVATE CONCERT. The beautiful programme and performance of the Club of amateurs, who sang at the Messrs. Chickering's saloon on Monday evening of last week, must not pass without a record here. In these days, when we have more concerts than a man all ears and curiosity can keep the run of, but when it seems to be a settled thing withal that more or less of clap-trap has to enter into every one to make it pay, it is refreshing and encouraging to know that music is sometimes selected and performed, and what is more, enjoyed, purely for music's sake, and with a view to have the best. This is the Club whose members last year gave the complimentary concert to their director, OTTO DRESEL, under whose wise and careful teaching they have met every week in a private house for the past three winters, for the practice of the best German vocal music—compositions for the most part never heard here in our public concerts. The club consists of about twenty ladies and gentlemen, chiefly amateurs, with the addition of a few professional or semi-professional voices; and they together form an ensemble of voices of such purity and freshness and fine musical blending, as one may hear nowhere else. On this occasion their friends, to the number of some two hundred and fifty, were invited, and the Chickering room was crowded with the most refined and appreciative audience, to listen to the following programme:

PART I.

1. Kyrie Eleison, Chorus and Soli,.....R. Franz.
2. Oratorio of Christus,.....Mendelssohn.
Recitative—Trio for male voices: "Say, where is he born, the King of Judea, for we have seen his star and are come to adore him."
Chorus—"There shall a star from Jacob come forth and dash in pieces princes and nations."
Recitative—Chorus—"This man have we found perverting all the nation, and fobbing to render tribute to Cæsar," &c.
Recitative—Chorus—"He stirreth up the Jews by teaching them."
Recitative—Chorus—"Away with Jesus, and give Barabbas to us."
Recitative—Chorus—"Crucify him."
Recitative—Chorus—"We have a sacred law; guilty by that law, let him suffer."
Recitative—Chorus—"Daughters of Zion, weep for yourselves and your children."
Choral,.....J. S. Bach.
3. Selections from Orpheus,.....Gluck.
Dance of Furies.
Chorus—"What mortal dares enter these shades, guarded by Cerberus?"
Solo—Orpheus answered by Chorus of Furies.
Chorus—"Unhappy mortal, what brings thee hither?"
Solo—Orpheus—"Endless woes, unhappy shadows," &c.
Chorus—"Ah, by what magic does this mortal irretrievably sooth our fury?"
Solo—Orpheus—"Infernal Gods! pity my despair."
Chorus—"Let him enter the infernal gates."
Chorus—"Enter the abode of the blest, noble hero, faithful lover."
4. Two-part Song for Treble Voices: "Die allerhöchsten Schäfchen, die hat der goldne Mond,".....Otto Dresel.
Four-part Song: "Come let us roam the greenwood," and the "Vale of rest,".....Mendelssohn.

PART II.

5. Choral,.....Bach.
The Music to Racine's Athalie, for Chorus and Treble Solos,.....Mendelssohn.
Overture.
a. Tutti alternating with Soli.
b. Chorus—Recitative; Duet for two Sopranos with Chorus; Tutti alternating with Soli.
c. Double Chorus.
d. Tutti of Trebles and Chorus; Trio for Trebles with Chorus.
e. War March of the Priests.
f. Chorus—Tutti alternating with Treble Soli.
Choral,.....Bach.
6. Chorus of Sea-nymphs, from Oberon; and Chorus of Gipsies from Preciosa,.....Weber.

The only drawback in this programme was its length, and that only for a portion of the audience. Too much of Mendelssohn in one evening, rich and admirable as it all is in detail, is apt to cause a sense of sameness. The "Athalie" had been the club's winter's work, and therefore naturally claimed a place. It is a noble composition, with one of Mendelssohn's best overtures, which was very effectively played upon a Chickering Grand by Messrs. DRESEL and TRENKLE, with a march, too, which would be striking but for its family likeness to the "Wedding March"; and with fine alternations of chorus with solos, duets and trios for contralto voices, which were sung with rare taste and feeling. The whole performance was admirable; but the work is very long, and came after the mind had been tasked with the digestion of much other solid music. Had the Athalie come earlier it would have been heard with fresher appetite.

The exceedingly dramatic and impressive fragment of the "Christus," and those wonderful extracts from Gluck's "Orpheus" (when shall we hear such a work of Art upon our stage?) left such a memory last year that there was no omitting them. The impression was as delightful as ever; and all felt that such perfection of chorus singing, with solos rendered with such feeling and refinement, and accompanied so perfectly, were an event in one's musical experience. Among the solo-singers known to the public, who acquitted themselves to the great general satisfaction, we may mention Miss DOANE, Mrs. WENTWORTH, and Mr. ARTHURSON, who gave the recitatives in the "Christus" in a style worthy of all imitation.

In the solid church style we never listened to any music with more satisfaction than to that Kyrie by Franz, which grows with every hearing, and those grand Bach chorales. If we could hear them nearly as well sung by a great mass of voices, like our Handel and Haydn Society, we should count it a great privilege. The lighter pieces flung in their bits of dancing sunlight in a most cheering manner. The Mendelssohn part-songs were old favorites; but the two choruses from Weber, with their delicious and imaginative accompaniments, startled the wearied sense by their fresh beauty. Mr. Dresel's two-part song, too, sung by so many sweet, pure treble voices, was choice and delicate as it was brief.

What may not be done by one artist who is in earnest, with such a circle of earnest pupils round him!

A GOOD SUGGESTION.—The want of a little æsthetic foresight, so to speak, in the first laying out and subsequent "improvement" of our American cities, is felt by all persons of taste. In view of proposed improvements and adornments of old Boston, we are happy to present the following timely hint from an esteemed correspondent:

It seems to be determined at length that Boston is to have one of the most superb streets in the world, in case the architectural taste to be exhibited in its buildings should be found to correspond with the magnificence to be displayed in laying it out. We refer of course to the contemplated grand avenue across the lands between the milldam and Roxbury. When finished, nothing can be finer than the drive will be from the city to the rural loveliness of Brookline. But there should always be some point to such a drive, something to be looked for at the end of a ride, beyond the ordinary pleasure of passing by beautiful country residences, and catching glimpses of beautiful scenery from elevated points in the road, and from openings in orchards and groves. In the old world this is invariably cared for, and if an eminence rises in the neighborhood of a city, affording a good view, there is foresight enough to secure it and make it public property. Now, we venture to say that few cities in the world—save those lying in mountainous regions—can show more beautiful points of view from the highlands about them, than can our own city of Boston. Yet in most cases the hills which rise about us have already been cut up into house-lots and are no longer open to the public eye.

There is still one beautiful exception; one eminence is still free from the destructive "march of improvement," and one which offers a prospect of really extraordinary beauty. We refer to Corey's Hill in Brookline. We would suggest the propriety of securing if possible at least all the upper portion of that beautiful spot as public property forever, to be laid out in a suitable manner, with easy avenues of approach, and to be crowned with some appropriate building of granite, which may stand both as a monument of the taste of this generation, and as a point whence to enjoy one of the noblest prospects in the world.

Cannot this be done? If it can be it must be done soon, or it will be too late. Can a finer termination to a drive along the new avenue be found or even imagined?

T.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Jan. 26.—Wonderful to relate, the weather was good last Tuesday, and EISELDFELD'S Soirée was in consequence uncommonly well attended. The programme was a very attractive one. To begin with, we had a glorious Quartet by Beethoven, one of the Russian set, Op. 59 (not 19, as the programmes incorrectly had it). BERGMANN and his party gave us this work last winter at one of their Matinées, but in so unsatisfactory a manner that it was for the most part incomprehensible, and the hearing of it was only an aggravation. I remember wishing, at the time, that I might hear it played by Eisfeld's Quartet, and their rendering of it on this occasion fully justified my wish. Under their skilful hands it came out clear as sunshine, and stood forth distinctly in all its grandeur of conception, as well as beauty and originality of idea. My favorite still, as at the first hearing, is the Allegretto Scherzando (I think that is the heading), in which, under a superstructure of inimitable, rollicking humor, there runs an under-current of such mournful tendencies as to stir the inmost depths of one's heart. The Adagio, too, is one of Beethoven's loveliest, while in the Allegro and particularly the Finale, with its quaint Russian theme, all the eccentricities of the great master seem gathered together. In spite of the obviously great difficulties of the work, it was played with the greatest precision and correctness of both time and execution. The only drawback was the occasional roughness of the first violin. Setting that aside, I hardly think Europe can show a better instrumental quartet than this of Mr. Eisfeld. Their rendering of Haydn's Op. 63 was also admirable; the composition, however, though very beautiful, is not one of my favorites among the many of the old "father." GOTTSCHALK was announced to take the piano part in Carl Eckert's Trio, but he being confined to his bed by illness, Mr. RICHARD HOFFMANN had kindly volunteered to take his place; with which change I for one was entirely satisfied, as I have long considered Hoffmann as the best of our resident pianists. Without previous rehearsal, and at but very short notice, he performed his part to perfection on this occasion, doing full justice to Eckert's very pleasing and able work. In addition to the instrumental numbers I have mentioned, Mrs. BRINKERHOFF sang twice—a most exquisite aria from Gluck's Iphigenia en Tauride, and Beethoven's Freudvoll und leidvoll, from "Egmont." This lady sings with much feeling and appreciation of her subject; but her voice, though always true, is so piercingly sharp as to make it almost painful to listen to her, particularly as the extraordinary contortions of her face impress one with the idea that she herself suffers tortures while singing.

FEB. 3d.—Mr. GOLDBECK (or Herr Goldbeck as he calls himself,) gave his second Matinée yesterday, at the same place as the first. In point of agreeable outward influences, this occasion was as well favored as the last, but the selection of the programme was not quite as good, nor, I am sorry to say, can I give such unqualified praise to the performances. The programme was as follows:

PART I.

Violon—Nocturne élégiaque (Mr. W. Doehler).....L. Spohr
Piano—(Herr Goldbeck).....Goldbeck
a. Prière, b. Rêve de bonheur, —Nos. 8 and 9 Aquarelles.
Sacred Song—Ave Maria (Miss Brainerd).....Cherubini
Harp—Lucetta Fantasia (Mr. Aptommas).....Alvares
Piano—(Herr Goldbeck).....Chopin
a. 16th Prelude. b. Etude de Sixtes.

PART II.

Sonate Pastorale, Op. 28—(Herr Goldbeck).....Beethoven
a. Allegro—b. Andante—c. Scherzo—d. Allegro ma non troppo.
Lieder—(Miss Brainerd).....Fesca
a. Springtime—b. Der Wanderer.
Harp—"La Source" (Mr. Aptommas).....Blumenthal
Piano—(Herr Goldbeck).....Goldbeck
a. La Complainte—b. Valse interrompue.

Mr. DOEHLER (why not Herr Doehler, too?) acquitted himself very well in the rather mawkish nocturne of Spohr, but will never make a first-rate player. APTOMMAS showed, as usual, perfect command of his instrument, particularly in his last piece; but as I never can like the harp as a solo instrument, I did not enjoy his share in the performance much. Miss BRAINERD'S really fine voice did not show to advantage in the low, crowded rooms, nor were her pieces (two of them at least) at all "grateful," to Anglicise a very convenient German expression. Besides this, she had, as Mr. Beames (the inevitable) announced, only just arrived in town from a two weeks tour in Canada, having been delayed until that late moment by the bad state of the railroads, so that we all would have been heartily willing to excuse far greater deficiencies than were apparent. She made a happy hit in substituting for the last song on the programme Mendelssohn's Zuleika, which she sang with far more of the requisite tenderness and longing than at one of Eisfeld's soirées this winter.

The two "Aquarelles" of Mr. Goldbeck were again very beautiful, particularly the first one, which I like best of all that I have heard. His other compositions did not please me as well, though the Valse Interrompue was very brilliant and well worked up. But it was in the two remaining numbers that I had to find fault with him. In the Prelude of Chopin, which I anticipated great pleasure in hearing from him, he disappointed me very much. He seemed not to have entered at all into the spirit of that tender, sighing first part, but played it in a really matter-of-fact manner, too fast, without the least delicacy, and with nothing of the "rubato," which, like so many of Chopin's compositions, it so evidently requires. The second part, with its mysterious chords in the bass and its grand crescendo movement, he interpreted far better. The Sonata of Beethoven was, as a whole, very well played and conceived, but the first part and Andante were taken too rapidly. In the latter, particularly, the mournful stateliness and the "heart-break" in it (as a friend calls it) were in a measure lost by this hurrying, and the beautiful ending—I regret to have to say it—was completely spoiled by a few notes.—One or two of these occurred, too, in the Scherzo, or its Trio, I forget which. I hope sincerely that such things as these were only accidental, and that we shall not find Mr. Goldbeck only a new broom that swept clean.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.—Though our metropolis cannot begin to hope for an opera house, yet there is dispersed among our sparse population a good share of musical taste and talent.

There is a Quartet party which meets at the residence of Alexander H. Lawrence, Esq. once a week, which it is my privilege to attend. Mr. Lawrence is a gentleman alike eminent for his talents as a lawyer and his skill as a musician. He has a large and costly collection of the best quartet music by Beethoven, von Weber, Hummel, Reszinger, and other great authors. Mr. Lawrence is possessed of one of the violoncellos brought to this country by KNOOP, the famous performer, and which bears the marks of high antiquity. But the violoncello which Mr. Lawrence prefers, for its smooth, clear and powerful tone, bears the name of "Scheinlein, Langerfeld prope Nuremberg, A. D., 1781," who, according to Spohr, was a manufacturer of preëminent skill. This is undoubtedly a rare instrument, and its history is perfectly authentic from its maker.

Mr. Lawrence has recently purchased a "Thalberg" Chickering Grand Piano. This noble instrument was sent here by the Chickering for the use of M. Thalberg at his public concerts, and is regarded by Thalberg as the highest attainment and perfection of the piano. Its tones are rich, round, deep, and every note throughout the whole keyboard is full of sweetness.

We remember to have seen a Grand piano made by Broadwood of London. The change and expansion of the piano has kept up with the music which has been written for it. The score of a piece by Thalberg would have been regarded fifty years ago as far beyond the reach of human hands, as it certainly exceeded the grandest of the Grand pianos of those days.

Our quartet party consists of Mr. Kley, as pianist, Mr. Samuel Carusi and Mr. William Burke, who play the violin and viola, and Mr. Lawrence on the violoncello. They meet every Tuesday evening. That you may be able to understand the music they play, I will give you the pieces played on the last evening, viz: the first two movements of the Grand Quatuor for the piano-forte, violin, alto and violoncello, by von Weber; the Adagio, Allegro, Andante and Finale of the grand Quintuor, arranged as a Quatuor, by Beethoven, Op. 16; the Scherzo of Quatuor by Reissiger, Op. 70, and the first, second, and last movements of Mendelssohn's Quatuor, Op. 1.

I have addressed you this note, believing you will be glad to know that amid all the bickerings of party politics, we have in Washington some sons of Apollo, whose pleasure it is to cultivate and promote the interests of musical science.

With great respect,
"PETER SCHLEMIL IN AMERICA."

BERLIN.—(From a recent private letter.)—Now I come at last to what you doubtless expected in my first line—the music. The battle has commenced, and both hearer and musician are armed with fresh strength. The "Sinfonie Soirées" in the concert room of the theatre, where the three strings of Orpheus' Lyre, Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn, sound their accords, are in full progress, and those evenings, filled up with their truly classical performances, seem to give us strength for those other concerts, not so nobly filled, showing us as they do the goal which later composers are striving to attain. Having drunk at these pure fountains, we gain strength and patience to go on with those who are struggling to find the same paths, some still erring in darkness, but some already catching glimpses of the brightness they seek, as did Mendelssohn.— Might he not at length have reached it? Who knows?

The "Orchestra Verein" gave its first concert last week, and began with a symphony by ROBERT SCHUMANN, of whose death last autumn you surely heard. His veiled spirit a few days before his death regained its former clearness, and he was able to recognize his wife and feel grateful for all her care in his sufferings. He reposes in the beautiful churchyard at Bonn, and many friends including his best—Music—united in paying the last honors to his remains.

The symphony I mentioned has five movements and is very fresh. It is one of his last works, and contradicts better than anything else the opinion that his illness did not come upon him suddenly, and that his later works show its influence.

The second piece on the programme was Mozart's Ave verum, so beautifully executed by the pupils of Mr. STERN, the leader of these concerts, that it had to be repeated. I heard it still better last year at the celebration of Mozart's one hundredth birthday, when the Dom choir sang it without accompaniment; and one was tempted to believe the angels had descended to sing their Ave verum.

Then HANS VON BUELOW, Liszt's first scholar, played Beethoven's Concerto, Op. 5, a work of such beauty that one cannot stop to admire the ability of the performer, and filled with such glorious melodies that you are irresistibly borne away to higher regions. A psalm by Schubert brought me entirely down to earth again, and as to the overture, I was too fatigued to pay it much attention. It was the Melusina, by Mendelssohn, of a style similar to the Hebrides overture, but not of such original invention.

The anniversary of Mendelssohn's death was, as usual, celebrated by the performance of some of his psalms and passages from his oratorios.

I do not know whether the celebrated quartet of the brothers MUELLER is known in America. About twenty years ago it made a furor in Germany, and it was much feared that, as three of them within a few years past have died, the quartet was gone forever. But the phoenix seems to have risen from its ashes, for the remaining brother has four sons, who have inherited all the talents of their uncles, and the new "Müllersche Quartet" is as beautiful as the old, and Berlin rejoices not only to have this lineal descendant of the old quartet, but to have actually regained that which was lost.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The third PHILHARMONIC CONCERT will take place to-night, and if the love of good orchestral music has not died out among us, the Melodeon should be crowded. Mr. ZERRAHN has secured the assistance of that admirable violinist Mr. EDWARD MOLLENHAUER, who will play one of Ernst's fantasias, and one of his own. The Symphony will be a new one to us, namely the last of the four Symphonies by the lamented SCHUMANN, a work which in spite of all attempts to trace the signs of mental derangement in his later works, will be found (by those who can appreciate any great work on the first hearing) to be as clear and vigorous, and full of fine original ideas, as his Symphony in B flat, and quite as interesting as one of Mendelssohn's. So we judge, at least, from hearing one rehearsal. We shall have another opportunity too of better understanding and enjoying the "Faust" overture by Wagner. The other orchestral pieces will be the Allegretto (again) from Mendelssohn's "Song of Praise," the overture to Semiramide, and the Trio from Attila arranged, with solos for clarinet, English horn and bassoon. We are sorry to learn that the last concert barely paid expenses; 'his was ungrateful to the pains-taking conductor; but the extreme cold then was some excuse.

Messrs. A. Williams & Co., the enterprising booksellers at No. 100 Washington St., have issued a neat little pocket Diagram of the Boston Theatre, prepared by authority of the Management. It shows the position and number of all the seats in parquet, parquet circle, balcony and first circle, and gives the rules of the establishment. Theatre and Opera-goers will find it a great convenience.....The Afternoon Concert last Wednesday drew, we are told, an increase of audience. The principal piece was Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; after which a Cornet solo by Mr. HEINICKE, Strauss's Lorely waltz, the Miserere from the "Trovatore," a new Quadrille by Zerrahn, and the overture to La Gazza Ladra. These concerts are deservedly popular: but why insult the audience and the art by such a quack style of printed programmes? you take up what you suppose to be a programme, and find that you have got somebody's advertising sheet, eked out with silly and vulgar paragraphs of reading matter. O, reform it altogether! Next Wednesday will be presented Mozart's lovely Symphony in G minor; and, for a novelty, an orchestral Fantaisie by Carl Zerrahn, based on the "Carnival of Venice," with variations by all the instruments in turn. They say it is a most amusing thing.

The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY are still busy upon "Eli." To-morrow night they rehearse it with orchestra, which looks as if it were almost ripe for public hearing. Why will not the Society give us another or several more hearings of Mozart's "Requiem"? There is a general desire to become more familiar with it. They are abundantly able to perform it without the aid of Mr. Thalberg's singers; and what an interesting programme might be made by putting the "Requiem" in the first part, and making up the second part of songs and choruses from Mendelssohn and Handel, with a few of those Chorales of Bach (published by Ditson) which would sound so grandly, sung by that large choir! Think of it, Mr. President and Council....By the way, Ditson has published a very convenient and cheap edition of the "Requiem" entire, in octavo form, with Latin and English words, which will be a great help in the hands of the listener....We see that the "Requiem" has lately been performed in London, with Mendelssohn's "Song of Praise" for a second part. An excellent contrast.

THALBERG's management is out in the New York papers with another imposing manifesto, relating to the Farewell Concerts, which he is about to give in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, and Washington, previous to his departure for the West, in March, and for Europe in May next. These are to commence at Niblo's on the 16th inst. A new repertoire of pieces is set forth with great formality, and the motives thereof explained with tender anxiety for the musical culture of us all. The great pianist is not only to play a new list of his own works (including Songs without Words, the Tremolo, Marche Funèbre, &c.); but, to avoid "monopolizing the attention of the moment," and "exhibiting an unbecoming professional jealousy," et cetera, et cetera, he "will likewise interpret those works of the great masters, which time and merit have stamped as models, to be admired and studied by all those whose aim lies beyond mere frivolity." For this purpose he will play Beethoven's Trio in B flat, "Kreutzer," "Moonlight," and "Patetic" Sonatas; Mendelssohn's "Allegro Capriccioso," Sonata with cello, Concerto and Songs without Words; Bach's Preludes and Fugues (of course all of them!); Chopin's Marche Funèbre, Notturmes, the Scherzo, and Mazurkas; and Hummel's Septet. But this disinterested zeal goes further, and "at the loss of some hundred seats to the management," who "will find an equivalent in the better enjoyment of the music," the platform at Niblo's "will be moved to the centre of the saloon, thus presenting a more drawing-room-like appearance," et cetera, et cetera.Thalberg played on Thursday to 3500 school children in Philadelphia; Mme. JOHANNSEN, as well as D'ANGELI, assisted.

MORELLI has joined the STRAKOSCH Troupe in New York, and appeared last night in La Favorita, with PARODI, TIBERINI and MORINI. Mme. DE WILLHORST seems to have made a good impression by her début in Lucia....Of MARETZKY's Opera in Havana some reports say that he is having immense success, especially with "The North Star;" others that his singers are leaving him because their salaries are not paid; Miss PHILLIPS has gone to Charleston.

Advertisements.

CHAMBER CONCERTS. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's SIXTH CONCERT

Will take place on Tuesday, Feb. 10, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms. Programmes will be out soon.
Half package of four Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $2.50;
Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

Advertisements.

To secure insertion, Advertisements should be sent in as early as Thursday Evening.

MELODEON.

THE THIRD OF THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,

(Being the SECOND of the regular series of four) will be given on SATURDAY EVENING, Feb. 7, at the MELODEON, with the assistance of

Herr EDUARD MOLLENHAUER,
THE CELEBRATED VIOLINIST.

The principal pieces will be: Symphony in D minor, (No. 4.) by R. Schumann, (first time in Boston); Overture, Faust, by R. Wagner; Grand Fantasia for Violin, by Ernst, and La Sylphide, performed by Herr Mollenhauer; Overture to Semiramide, etc. etc.

Subscription Lists may be found at the principal music stores, where also tickets can be obtained. Packages of 4 tickets, $8; single ticket $1.

Doors open at 6½: Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock.
CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

NOTICE.

THE Members of the ORPHFUS GLEE CLUB inform their friends and subscribers that their SECOND Concert of the Series of Three, will take place at

Mercantile Hall, 16 Summer Street,

On SATURDAY EVENING, Feb. 14th, 1857, on which occasion they will be kindly assisted by

Miss LUCY A. DOANE,
Mr. WULF FRIES, Violoncellist, and
Mr. JOSEPH TRENKLE, Pianist.

AUGUST KREISSMANN, Director.

Tickets Fifty cents each. Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock precisely.

NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

THE next term of this highly successful Institution will commence in North Reading, Mass., on Wednesday, the third day of June next, and continue twelve weeks. Its object is the preparation of teachers for various positions in the musical profession, and thorough instruction and training in the theory and practice of the art.

Circulars, giving particulars, may be obtained free of expense, by addressing Normal Musical Institute, North Reading, Mass.
LOWELL MASON.
Feb. 7. 66
GEORGE F. ROOT.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting will be held at the REVERA HOUSE, on MONDAY, the 16th day of February, at 7 o'clock, P. M.
H. WARE, Recording Secretary.
Boston, Feb. 1, 1857.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1857. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERRAHN, Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.
Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts. To be had at the music stores of E. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.
Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 3 o'clock.

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING: An Analytical, Physiological and Practical System for the Cultivation of the Voice. By CARLO BASSINI. Edited by R. STORRS WILLIS. Price $4.
The special attention of Teachers and all persons interested in the study and practice of vocal music, is respectfully called to this new and valuable work.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

Kreutzer's 40 Studies for the Violin.

JUST PUBLISHED, PRICE $1.50.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,

Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.— (Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 13. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 68
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 68
- " 3. Fétis on Chorus and Chorus Singing.....88
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Cotel's Treatise on Harmony.....63
- " 6. Albrechtberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction. Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 68

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE, 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 65 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF
Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square
PIANO FORTES,
WITH THEIR
PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.
409 Washington Street, Boston,
(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

APR 29
MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmonium,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 83 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 254.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 20.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

Mozart's Requiem.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

(Continued from p. 146.)

Every one must confess that this style is admirably adapted to the lowly prayer, to the outpourings of a crushed and broken soul, and to the solemn hymns, which praise the glory and the works of God. Accordingly whatever there is in the Requiem of supplication, prayer, ascription, praise, meditation or Christian feeling, is treated in fugued or in simple counterpoint, as the Hosias for instance, yet always upon old and purely church-like melodies. On the other hand, it is no less certain that the church style, as it was used in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, by no means afforded that epic and tragic character which several of the numbers composing the Dies iræ demand. Here he was compelled to use throughout a phrased and pathetic melody, with a choice of chords; a modern modulation, and a complete orchestra; at the same time avoiding, be it understood, any direct or most remote resemblance with theatrical music, by means which the composer of the Requiem used, and of which we shall speak hereafter. Where is the composer who would undertake to-day to write a Dies iræ for voices alone? The admission or rejection of instrumental music in works for the church can no longer be a question of Art for any one. Instruments are admitted by the Roman Catholics; in the Greek church they are not. That, however, is a matter of church discipline, with which we are not here concerned. Why should the Catholic church reject the musical intentions of the Dies iræ, in which Mozart has done nothing but reproduce, through the only means his art afforded him, texts which had been consecrated by the ritual of the church?

Will earnest men, learned musicians, bring us back to the simplicity of Palestrina and Orlando Lasso, that is, to the childhood of musical art? Because you are writing for the church, will you renounce expressive melody, even when it has intrinsically a religious character? Will you renounce nine-tenths of the chords available, banish the orchestra, which did not exist in Palestrina's time, and only accept an extremely insignificant fraction of the whole technical and æsthetic material of an art, which has been perfected through three centuries of progress? In truth, men who write and print such things, make merry with their readers. Such imitation of the old masters to-day could produce nothing but a worthless copy or impression. To imitate Palestrina were not so extremely difficult a thing; but where is one to get the spirit of Palestrina, which was that of three centuries ago?

The sole end of this polemical digression has been to show how the text and liturgy of a funeral Mass among the Catholics conspired to form out of the Requiem a bridge of connection between the ancient and the modern music, under the pen of a composer like Mozart. Here are blended and reflected in the focus of one universal genius, the contemporary of all ages, the different tendencies which have predominated in church music since it has entered the actual state of Art. Here you find the antique melody of the choral song, which the Roman school had the honor of reconciling with counterpoint, in restoring to it whatever there was edifying in its lofty and original simplicity; there shine the treasures of harmony, heaped up by that learned school of organists, which arose and spread itself in Germany in the sequel of the Reformation, and of which the glorious representatives are Bach and Handel. In another passage you find, in just the right place, and in an incomparably superior degree, the elegance and the melodic charm, which distinguish the sacred works of a Pergolesi and Jomelli, yet without any admixture of the theatrical and antiquated forms by which these are disfigured.*

The Abbé Stadler said: "So long as figural music shall maintain itself in the Catholic church, this giant work (the Requiem) will be its crown." But why? Is it merely because Mozart, being by the date of his birth farther removed from the source of tradition, had carried its chain out to the limit where religious Art finally ceased, and because he united within a single frame the great models of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries? Was this historical cosmopolitanism, this perfect fusion of the elements which time and genius had prepared, the only title by which the composer of the Requiem placed himself above all church composers? Certainly not; for there is also something in the Requiem which distinguishes Mozart generally and essentially above all others; and something which even he was only once, by way of most extraordinary exception, in a condition to give.

* The Stabat Mater of the latter especially.

We already know that Handel was the one among the old masters, from whom Mozart borrowed the most directly. From him he took, or is supposed to have taken the thought of the opening number: Requiem æternam,* &c., which every one recognizes as one of the most sublime in the whole work; and Herr Weber cites the beginnings of the two works (the Anthem: "The ways of Sion do mourn," and the Requiem) as a most victorious argument in support of his singular view.† * * * *

We admit that the thought is just the same, which without doubt is granting a great deal. Two preachers have preached on the same text; but what a difference already from the introduction! How much more learned and sublime is Mozart's commencement! How it breathes that lofty evangelical sorrow, those tears, that fragrance, and that antique poesy of the Roman Church, of which Handel, as well as most of the Lutheran composers, constantly fell short. And when from the midst of this mournful chorus a voice lifts itself to attune the words: Te decet hymnus, Deus in Sion, does not one seem to hear the voice of an archangel and of St. Cæcilia herself with her organ, sounding a fugued accompaniment, which the most laborious efforts of mortals never could have power to reach? Here the

* Text to No. 1:

Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis.

Te decet hymnus, Deus, in Sion, et tibi reddetur votum in Jerusalem.

Exaudi orationem meam; ad Te omnis caro veniet. Requiem, &c.

Kyrie eleison; Christe eleison.

Rest eternal give unto them, O Lord, and may light perpetual shine on them.

To thee belong hymns, O God, in Sion, and unto thee shall the vow be performed in Jerusalem.

Hear my supplication; unto Thee shall all flesh come. Rest eternal, &c.

Lord have mercy; Christ have mercy.

† M. Oulibicheff here also cites the first sixteen measures of Handel's anthem, and the corresponding eight measures of the Ritornel or instrumented prelude of the Requiem. The theme is nearly identical, but the treatment essentially different, and the whole resemblance is confined to the ritornel and following bars of the Requiem.—Ed.

chorus gets possession of the figure of the instrumental theme, which has accompanied the solo. The song announces itself in canonical windings, which, long drawn out, like the echoes of a hymn from the first days of Christendom, resound through the galleries and tomb-stones of a vast catacomb. At the words: Et lux perpetua, repeated in alternate phrases, the orchestra descends in majestic unison upon the intervals of the chord; the trumpets sound the sublime farewell; the choir conclude with a soft and mysterious solemnity upon the dominant: luceat eis. Has he not already stepped into the eternal light invoked for the dead, he, who has written these first eleven pages of the Requiem, so much do they seem to transcend all ordinary human manifestations of power!

And these are the monstrous plagiarisms, under whose weight Herr Weber would fain crush his opponents, who, as he said, slandered Mozart far more than he himself did, when they assumed that Mozart put his name to such youthful studies!! But what if the plagiarist had never thought at all of Handel's anthem, or had not even known it? The reader shall judge for himself. While I copied off these broad citations, I sought in my memory for the theme of the Misericordias Domini, which Mozart is supposed have borrowed from Eberlin,* and judge of my astonishment, this theme is precisely the beginning of the Requiem:

Moderato.

The relationship is here much clearer, since as regards the voice part, i. e., the subject itself and its answer in the fifth, it amounts to identity. But for the rest, the Requiem æternam no more resembles the various fugued developments of the Misericordias Domini, than either of these compositions does the anthem of Handel. As the Abbé Stadler tells us, the thematic subjects in works of the fugued style, are common property, like themes proposed for academic competition. Whenever Mozart chose a borrowed theme, which was harder to treat than a theme of his own invention, he deemed the thought worthy of another and no doubt a better development. He certainly would never have employed it to treat it worse than they who had used it before him.

The Allegro of No. 1—that is, the Fugue of the Kyrie eleison—is worthy of the slow tempo which it follows, and to which it is adapted by the plan of its figures in sixteenths and by the elevated, solemn character by which it is distinguished. But it presents difficulties in execution which few choirs can quite victoriously surmount. It is a pity that the ludicrous should so threaten the sublime in this masterpiece of choral composition. If the Kyrie is badly or indifferently sung, it is intolerable, or of a more than ambiguous effect; but with a masterly delivery it is sublime.

[To be continued.]

The worth of Art appears most eminent in music, since it requires no material, no subject-matter, whose effect must be deducted. It is wholly form and power, and it raises and ennobles whatever it expresses.

Goethe.

* So says the Abbé Stadler.

Mendelssohn and his Music.

[Concluded.]

The life and labors of Mendelssohn thus were ended. In glancing at the labors in relation to the life, we are first struck with the vastness of their quantity. A hundred works, many of them, of the fullest proportions, testify to an industry almost unparalleled. But indeed, composition was not the task—it was the instinctive occupation of Mendelssohn's mind. At all times and in all places he was engaged in the conception or development of musical ideas. This process was incessantly carried on during his numerous journeys, and at every resting place his first requirement was a table, that the results might be securely noted. Music was at once the medium and material of his thoughts, and those thoughts flowed with a freedom only less marvellous than their symmetry and intrinsic worth. It is said that his music to the Antigone was the work of only eleven days—a feat that equals Handel's alleged composition of the Messiah in three weeks. He was present in the Birmingham Town Hall on an occasion when Handel's Coronation Anthem was with other works, to be performed. The concert was already begun, when it was discovered that a recitative, the words of which appeared in the text-books given to the public, was omitted from the part-copies. Noticing the perplexity of the managers, Mendelssohn quietly said, "Wait a little, I will help you;" and sitting down, composed within half an hour a recitative with complete orchestral accompaniments, which were re-copied, distributed, and while yet wet from the pen, were played at sight. How spontaneously not only his thoughts and feelings, but even impressions derived from scenery, took with him a melodic form, is shown in the origin of his finest overture. On his return from Scotland, in 1829, his sisters entreated him to tell them something of the Hebrides. "That cannot be told," said he, "it can only be played;" and seating himself at the piano, he improvised what he afterwards expanded into the Overture to Fingal's Cave. The Songs without Words, which are now amongst the most popular parlor music in the world, had a similar origin in the habitual necessity for musical expression in place of verbal. The apparent anomaly involved in their title ceases when it is remembered that these charming wordless lyrics were really the native language of the composer, and that he is in them as truly descriptive, thoughtful, impassioned, or even satirical, as if he had held the pen of Barry Cornwall or Heinrich Heine. That they convey varied impressions to different minds, by no means implies that the ideas embodied in them by the composer were not clear and specific. What they mean we should be sorry here to guess, with the knowledge that most musical readers have somewhere near them some more pleasant interpreter holding the known credentials of sensibility and fancy!

But there would be an injurious error in supposing, because music is described as the natural speech of Mendelssohn's mind—thus accounting for the great breadth covered by its permanent record—that therefore his works are a mere diary of personal thoughts and feelings. Mendelssohn did not belong to the diseased ultra-subjective school of poets which haunt this age like so many unblest and bodiless ghosts, but rather to that higher order which includes Shakspeare and Goethe—the order of healthy, synthetic genius, which uses the whole realm of nature and the wide range of human character as an open magazine of materials for new and individual creation. The works of Mendelssohn are as various in kind as they are vast in quantity, enriching every department of composition except Opera. Even in this last direction fragments remain which only want completeness to rank with the highest efforts of Gluck, Mozart, and Weber. In his detached scena, entitled Infelice, and the published portions of "The Son and Stranger," the true dramatic life throbs as powerfully as in Fidelio or Zauberflöte. How facile and splendid was the instinct of representative truth thus imperfectly utilized, is shown in the equal ease with which it rose to the highest level of the two opposite schools of Drama, the Romantic and the Classical. The harmonies he gave to Shakspeare and to Sophocles seem to be no gift, but a part of the organic growth of the works they illustrate. He does not so much sing in the two realms of Fancy and of Fate, as that they themselves endow him with their own voices. This instinctive fidelity to occasion and character is indeed visible through all his works, from the song, with or without words, up through quartets, symphonies, psalms, and oratorios. The mannerisms charged upon Mendelssohn, which do not vary with the occasion, may be all conceded, for, like the Claude light and the Rembrandt shadow, they serve only to identify the artist's work. Probably, for instance, no other composer ever wound up so many productions with flights of high soft cords con sordino. It was his habit, more than that of any composer known to us, to concert his music—the voices, or the voice and instrument, making quite separate contributions to the total effect. There are also occasional recurrences of phrase and figure, instantly to be recognized as Mendelssohnian. But all this in no way interferes with the integrity of each individual composition. The Italian symphony is as unlike the Scotch as Childe Harold is unlike Marion. The one is full of blue sky, gaiety, and passion; the other is misty, rugged, and charged successively with solemn and martial memories. Every work of Mendelssohn known to us is stamped with the same consistency. All his melodic wealth—and what composer has left so many fine airs floating in the memory?—and all the resources of his masterly part-writing, are made to subserve a clear prevision and intent, thus securing artistic unity in the work, and conveying to the mind a satisfactory impression of keeping and completeness.

But in the chief representative action of Mendelssohn's genius, the mere dramatic faculty seems to pass out of sight in the splendor of a pure inspiration. He is preëminently the musical interpreter of the Christian Evangel. Many before him had embodied sacred sentiments and incidents in noble compositions. Anglican service-music and Catholic masses are rich with many a strain worthy of the uses to which they are consecrated. But Handel alone, before Mendelssohn, had risen to the full height "of this great argument." In the Messiah, the spirit of faith and of praise found expression so sublime that it would seem as if no form of ascription could be worthier of the Divine Object. Nor can it be at all pretended that Mendelssohn has exceeded or even equalled Handel in the grandeur of his choral movements, though the already named "Thanks be to God," and the concluding chorusses of his Hymn of Praise and Forty-second Psalm, might suggest a doubt on that point. And yet is his, of all music, the most entirely true to the spirit of the new dispensation. To the great utterance of praise he has added the sentiment of love in its most exquisite forms, and to faith he he has given a character of touching confidence. In his harmony the human and divine seem to be harmonized; the aspiration of man is attuned to the nature and precept of Christ. Those who remember the alto song, "Oh, Rest in the Lord," and the chorusses, "Happy and blest are They," and "I waited on the Lord," will feel all the truth of what we write. This spirit is, indeed, transfused, with all the harmonizing power of light, through Mendelssohn's oratorios and psalms; and judging from the fragments of the unfinished oratorio of Christus, it would probably have found its finest development in that work. Serner elements, however, are not wanting in these compositions. The invocations of the Baalites in Elijah, and the exclamatory chorusses of the persecuting Jews in St. Paul and Christus, are terrible in their fidelity to the fell spirit of fantastical rage. The Jewish chorusses, especially, give so startlingly real a presentment of ruthless fury in the mobs who stoned Stephen and crucified Christ, as to set us musing with curious interest on the psychological question how far the composer's Hebrew descent in this case modifies the action of imagination. The chorus, "Stone him to Death," has intense cruelty in every bar of its broken and complicated rhythm. But all this, though in itself fine dramatic portraiture, has its finest use in eliciting, by contrast, and in musical expression, the Christian spirit of faith and love. In realizing that contrast, Mendelssohn's happy and original conception of the use of chorales in Oratorio has greatly aided, however we may doubt whether his success has justified Meyerbeer in extending the practice to Opera. After the fierce tumult of sounds which precedes the stoning of Stephen, with what a sacred and soothing simplicity ascend the harmonies of the fine old German tune which follows—harmonies which well might be supposed fit to rise to heaven with the passing soul of a Christian martyr! By the occasional introduction of these adapted hymns, Mendelssohn strikes the dominant tone of his sacred works; and the fact that the impression they produce is sustained and even intensified by his own richer and more elaborate movements, surely justifies the claim we have made on his behalf, that he is preëminently the musical interpreter of Christianity.

(Continued from page 138.)

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Gleaned from HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

TROMBONES.

There are four kinds of trombones; each of which bears the name of the human voice to which it bears the nearest resemblance in quality of tone and compass. The Soprano Trombone,—the smallest and highest of them all,—exists still in some parts of Germany, but is unknown in France; it has scarcely ever been used in the scores of the great masters; which is no reason, however, why it should not figure there sooner or later, as it is by no means certain that trumpets with pistons—even the highest—can advantageously supply its place. Gluck alone, in his Italian score of Orfeo, has written the soprano trombone under the name of Cornetto. He has made it double the soprano voices of the chorus, while the alto, tenor, and bass trombones double the other voices.

These three last-named trombones are the only ones in general use; and it should also be added, that the alto trombone does not exist in all French orchestras, while the bass trombone is almost unknown among them; it is even almost always confounded with the third tenor trombone, which has the charge of playing the lowest part, and to which, for this reason, the name is very improperly given of bass trombone, from which it materially differs.

Trombones are instruments with slides, of which the double tube can be lengthened or shortened instantaneously, by a simple movement of the player's arm. It may be conceived that these variations of the length of the tube must completely change the key of the instrument,—which is the case. Whence it follows, that trombones, possessing, like all brass instruments, all the notes resulting from the natural resonance of the tube in all positions, have thereby a complete chromatic scale, interrupted only at one point below, as will be presently seen.

The sound of the bass trombone is majestic, formidable and terrible; and to it belongs, of right, the lowest part in all masses of brass instruments. Nevertheless, we have the misfortune, in Paris, of being utterly deprived of it; it is not taught at the Conservatoire, and no trombone player has yet been willing to acquire its familiar practice. Whence it follows, that the majority of modern German scores, and even of ancient French and Italian scores, written for orchestras which possess, or did possess, this instrument, must be more or less deranged when they are performed in Paris. Thus, in Weber's Freyschütz, there are some low D's beneath the staff, in the accompaniment of the huntsman's chorus; and farther on, where the hermit enters, there are some low E's,

These notes are therefore of necessity carried into the octave above, because the three players in the Opera orchestra exclusively make use of the tenor trombone, which has them not. It is the same with the sustained low C's, in the chorus of Gluck's Alceste: "Pleure, O patrie;" only, here, the effect of these double C's is extremely important, which makes their transposition truly deplorable.

The bass trombone cannot lend itself to rapid movements with the celerity which others of the same family can command; the length and size of its tube requires rather more time to be put in vibration; and it will readily be imagined that its slide,—manœuvred by the aid of a handle which supplies, in certain positions, the length of the arm,—does not admit of great agility. Hence the real impossibility for German artists who use the bass trombone, to execute a crowd of passages in our modern French scores, which our trombone-players render as well as they on the tenor trombone.

The trombone is,—in my opinion,—the true chief of that race of wind instruments which I have designated as epic instruments. It possesses, in an eminent degree, both nobleness and grandeur; it has all the deep and powerful accents of high musical poetry,—from the religious accent, calm and imposing, to the wild clamours of the orgy. It depends on the composer to make it by turn chaunt like a choir of priests; threaten, lament, ring a funeral knell, raise a hymn of glory, break forth into frantic cries, or sound its dread flourish to awaken the dead or to doom the living.

There have nevertheless been found means to degrade it,—some thirty years since—by reducing it to a servile redoubling, as useless as grotesque, of the double-bass part. This plan has been at present almost abandoned. But there may be seen, in a host of scores, otherwise very beautiful, the basses doubled almost constantly in unison by a single trombone. I know nothing less harmonious, or more vulgar than this mode of instrumentation. The sound of the trombone is so markedly characterized, that it should never be heard but for the production of some special effect; its duty, therefore, is not to strengthen the double-basses, with the sound of which, moreover, its quality of tone has no sort of sympathy. Besides, it should be understood that a single trombone in an orchestra seems always more or less out of place. This instrument needs harmony, or, at least, unison with the other members of its family, in order that its various attributes may be completely manifested. Beethoven has sometimes employed it in pairs, like the trumpets; but the time-honored custom of writing them in three parts appears to me preferable.

The character of tone in trombones varies according to the degree of loudness with which their sound is emitted. In a fortissimo, it is menacing and formidable; particularly, if the three trombones be in unison, or at least, if two of them be in unison, the third being an octave below the two others. Such is the terrific scale in D minor, upon which Gluck has founded the chorus of Furies in the second act of his Iphigenia in Tauride. Such also is—but still more sublime—the immense shout of three united trombones, answering like the wrathful voice of the infernal gods, to Alceste's summons:—"Ombre! larve! campagne di morte!" in that prodigious air the original idea of which Gluck allowed to be perverted by the French translator; but which, as it is, has dwelt in the memory of all the world, with its unlucky first verse:—"Divinités du Styx! ministres de la mort!" Let us here moreover remark, that towards the close of the first movement of this piece, when the trombones divided into three parts respond—imitating the rhythm of the air,—in this phrase: "Je n'invoquerai point votre pitié cruelle!"—let us here observe, I say, that by the very effect of this division, the quality of tone of the trombone assumes instantly something ironical, hoarse, frightfully joyous,—very different from the grand fury of the preceding unisons.

In simple forte, trombones, in three-part harmony, in the medium particularly, have an expression of heroic pomp, of majesty, of loftiness, which the prosaic commonplace of a vulgar melody could alone impair or destroy. They then acquire—with enormously increased grandeur—the expression of trumpets; they no longer menace, they proclaim; they chaunt, instead of roar. It should be remarked, merely, that the sound of the bass trombone always predominates more or less, in such a case, over the two others; particularly if the first be an alto trombone.

In mezzo-forte in the medium, in unison or in harmony with a slow movement, trombones assume a religious character. Mozart, in his choruses of the priests of Isis, in the Zauberflöte, has produced admirable models of the manner of giving these instruments a sacerdotal voice and attribute.

The pianissimo of trombones, applied to harmonies belonging to the minor mode is gloomy, lugubrious, I had almost said, hideous. If, particularly, the chords be brief, and broken by rests, it has the effect of hearing some strange monsters giving utterance, in dim shadow, to howls of ill-suppressed rage. Never, to my thinking, has there been better dramatic effect deduced from this special accent of trombones, than by Spontini, in his matchless funeral march of the Vestale:—"Périssè la Vestale impie," &c.; and by Beethoven, in the immortal duet of the second act of Fidelio, sung by Leonora and the jailer, while digging the grave of the prisoner about to die.

Gluck, Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, Spontini, and some others, have comprehended all the importance of the trombone's duties; they have applied the various characteristics of this noble instrument, with perfect intelligence, to depicting human passion, to illustrating the sounds of Nature; and they have, in consequence, maintained its power, its dignity, and its poetry. But to constrain it—as the herd of composers now do—to howl out in a credo brutal phrases less worthy of a sacred edifice than of a tavern; to sound as for the entry of Alexander into Babylon, when there is nothing more forthcoming than the pirouette of a dancer; to strum chords of the tonic and the dominant in a light song that a guitar would suffice to accompany; to mingle its olympian voice with the trumpery melody of a vaudeville duet, or with the frivolous noise of a quadrille; to prepare, in the *tutti*s of a concerto, the triumphal advent of the hautboy or a flute;—is to impoverish, to degrade a magnificent individuality; it is to make a hero into a slave and a buffoon; it is to tarnish the orchestra; it is to render impotent and futile all rational progression of the instrumental forces; it is to ruin the past, present, and future of Art; it is to commit a voluntary act of vandalism, or to give token of an absence of sentiment for expression amounting to stupidity.

[To be continued.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Beethoven's Early Sonatas.

Few, if any, biographies of artists afford us much insight into the formation and development of their minds. Such a void is filled in the life of BEETHOVEN by those earlier works (before 1798). They were to me a great anthropological lesson, and are the same, I have no doubt, to many others. This, and the fact that the note of "A. W. T." demands a reply, induces me to claim some more space for them in your paper.

My own impression is, that I have seen when a boy more than three Sonatas in manuscript; and to assure myself, I have examined catalogues and biographies on the subject until I found in the Universal Lexicon der Tonkunst, now published in numbers by E. Bernsdorf, Liszt, Marschner and others, in the article "Beethoven," p. 357, that B. published and dedicated six Sonatas to the Prince Bishop of Cologne.

The article in which this statement occurs is unquestionably the best of all that I have been able to read, and therefore entitled to some consideration. Still it may be a mistake of the printer, who has worse mistakes to answer for than this one. Nevertheless it may be that Beethoven composed and published another set of three Sonatas, and I wish with all my heart that this may prove to be the case.

What an interesting parallel those earlier works of Beethoven form to those seven plays of Shakspeare not included in the collection of his works, but for which no other author can be found! How desirable it is that "A. W. T." should, either through your columns or in his anxiously expected biography, devote a chapter to those disowned children of Beethoven's youthful fancy!

F. W. M.

Roxbury, Feb. 12.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Feb. 9.—There is one branch of music, which, though extremely popular with the masses, seldom is thought worthy of notice by writers; I refer to organ music—not the organ fugues of Bach or the studies of Rink; not the harmonious thunder of diapason or sub-bass; but the more common and more popular street-organ music. Some wretched creatures who have no music in their souls, are continually grumbling about the annoyances of these musical demonstrations; but this unhappy class of persons are few and are daily growing fewer. The fact is, there has recently been a very great improvement in street organs. The music is generally much better in quality than formerly, and the instruments themselves are now really a pleasure to hear. Often, at night, when the streets are still and quiet, on returning from the opera your ear will catch the distant tones of some air you have just heard warbled by Lagrange or Parodi, floating from afar, like a sweet echo. At one corner the death-song in Lucia is wasting its sweetness on the desert air of Broadway, while in the next block the Miserere of Trovatore brings back memories of Brignoli or Tiberini, who sing their swan-like songs in the little cylindrical prisons in which they are supposed to be confined. Then the next moment we hear the Casta Diva, and as we pass on it merges into some of Verdi's passionate arias, till frequently a night walk in Broadway is one continued concert. There is one air from Verdi's Lombardi, which belongs to the repertoire of almost every street organ, and is unconsciously whistled by news-boys and hummed by everybody else. Verdi is now the reigning musical genius in New York, as well as in Italy.

There is one air, however, without which a street organ would no more be a street organ than a man without a head would be a man. After Verdi and Donizetti, the street organs fall back upon the inevitable "Mira Norma," of Bellini, as if it was their normal condition. When you see a boy in New York approaching you, in nine cases out of ten you will be safe in the conclusion that his Christian name is John; and when you hear the tones of a street organ in the distance, but too far off to distinguish the melody, you may be certain that it is "Mira Norma." As a distinguished poet aptly remarks:

"Be weather clear, or damp, or stormy,
They're always playing "Hear me, Normy."

Talking about Norma naturally reminds one of the opera at the Academy of Music, where PARODI and TIBERINI and MORELLI have been singing away to swarms of dead-heads, every evening's performance entailing a considerable pecuniary loss upon the unlucky manager. STRAKOSCH has made a great mistake in refusing to advertise in other than the three prominent morning dailies. The smaller papers, and especially the Sunday press, exercise an immense influence in musical and theatrical affairs, and are by no means to be disregarded. Strakosch has offended these journals in their most tender place—their pockets; and as his company is by no means perfect, the critics can find plenty of crevices into which to insert their critical crowbars.

The other evening at the opera I met a friend—one of those mysteriously "knowing" persons, who are gushing over with tattle and small-talk, and can tell you everything about everybody. He was a regular habitué of the opera, and it was with no small pleasure that he found in me a listener; and I must confess I was greatly interested in his garrulous gossip. He knew everybody, and volunteered an indefinite amount of information in general.

"For instance," said he, "you observe sitting in the parquette circle an elderly gentleman with iron-grey hair, rather stooping shoulders, a pair of spectacles, and an opera-glass?" Yes, I had seen him every night sitting in the same seat near the stage, and apparently enjoying the music most intensely. I had not known who he was till Jenkins (that is my gossipy friend's name) told me it was Bancroft. There may be seen night after night our great historian, whose Ferdinand and Isabella (!) and Phillip the Second (!) have brought him an income of $30,000 a year, applauding a cadenza and drinking in the delights of Italian music. He is one of the features of the opera, and Jenkins told me he knew him well, and that he had greatly assisted him in the compilation of Phillip II. But I never placed much confidence in these assertions of Jenkins.

Jenkins asked me if I knew how many dead-heads were present, and volunteered to point some out to me. So he directed my attention to a row of ladies seated on a front seat of the parquette; they were elegantly dressed, and attracted considerable notice from their beauty and self-possession, yet unassuming deportment. They were a family of fashionable Broadway modistes, who by industry and energy have amassed a fortune, and own several of the finest stores on Broadway. I knew not what Jenkins meant by pointing them out to me, until he told me they were all dead-heads! The Paterfamilias, the Mater, and some six children had every night their free seats in the parquette. Why? Because they were friends of a well-known musical agent, who has the free entrée of the Academy and the use of an indefinite number of seats.

An elegant gentleman, arrayed in unexceptionable broadcloth, with carefully trimmed moustache, lemon colored kids, and a white ivory opera-glass, arose near me, shedding an odor of Fraugissani on every side. I was at once impressed by his magnificence, and inquired of Jenkins as to his identity. "Oh," said Jenkins, "I know him well. He is a newspaper correspondent, and gets books from publishers, sells them, and is altogether a perfect specimen of that peculiar race of literary hacks, a shabby-genteel Irish literary man." "But," said I, "surely that elegant person is not a dead-head!" "Precisely so," was the answer; "he is a dead-head."

A number of boys and young men made a little noise here, and I remarked how annoying such ill-mannered persons were. "Not to be wondered at," said my Mentor. "One of the young clerks in a Broadway music store had some twenty-five free tickets given him, and has distributed them among his friends." "Then," said I, "they're all dead-heads?" "Precisely so," said Jenkins.

An elderly gentleman, wearing a gigantic pair of green spectacles, who constantly flitted about the different boxes, had long excited my attention. He is the most uneasy man I ever saw. At one moment he is quietly settled in a stage box, gazing at the audience through a huge opera-glass; a few minutes after, and you are surprised to see him talking with a lady in the parquette; then you are astonished to meet him but a moment after in the lobby, in deep conversation with an Italian artist; you hasten to your seat, and are petrified at seeing him sitting calmly on the next chair, as unruffled as if he had been there all the afternoon. He seems to be perfectly ubiquitous. I seized the opportunity of asking Jenkins who he was. "Bless me!" said Jenkins, "everybody knows Count Gogglescrowsky, the author of 'Lapland as it isn't.'" "Is he a real, live Baron?" I gasped. "Yes," said Jenkins. "Is he a—a—a—" I faltered, unable to speak the word.

"A dead-head?" inquired J., coming to my relief. "Oh yes, certainly; the Count's a dead-head of course, from his connection with a daily newspaper."

I was gratified at seeing at this moment a long vista of acquaintances, who were related to each other, and altogether formed quite a formidable array of crinoline, fine bonnets, and immaculate neck-ties. In conversation they assured me that they came every night to the opera, because, as they said, their friend Mr. Smith was a friend to somebody who had loaned money to the management, and of course he always had about fifty secured seats for nothing, and he kindly distributed them to his acquaintances. After this Jenkins pointed out to me the families of the different artistes, and a cloud of witnesses, who he assured me "belonged to the press." He also told me that the stockholders, having bought their shares in the concern long ago, of course paid nothing, and were de facto dead-heads. At last he promised to show me a sight not often seen at the Academy of Music, and pointed out a party of three, seated in the balcony. "There," said he, "look at them well. They paid their way in. Look at them well, for you may ne'er see their like again."

By this time I had grown bold, and so I said to Jenkins, "Are you a dead-head?" Jenkins said, "Precisely so." I then asked him whether that party of three were the only persons in the house who were not dead-heads. Jenkins said not a word, but pointed upwards. I thought he saw a piece of the ceiling about to fall, but he explained that he meant to direct my attention to the third tier and amphitheatre, where for 50 and 25 cents the real lovers of music go, and little dream that the fashionable crowd below is one mass of dead-heads.

So you may suppose that poor Strakosch, crushed by the indignation of the Press, and the weight of the Deadheads, cannot fail to lose money in his operatic speculation. His company is poor;—PARODI has not taken well with the audience, and the only hit of the season has been the undoubted triumph of CORA DE WILHORST as Lucia. She sang the part exquisitely, and good critics say that no one in the country can sing the Andante of the mad scene, Alfin son tua, as well. With the exception of SONTAG, I have never heard any artiste in this role, who pleased me better. Unfortunately, however, the excitement of a debut has had a reactionary effect, and Mme. De Wilhorst is confined to her room with illness, and will not be able to appear again in public for a long time. The opera season closes this week, to the grief of the Deadheads, and of

TROVATORE.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Feb. 5.—The "first grand concert," for the benefit of the poor, of the Springfield Musical Institute, last evening, was a decided success. The City Hall was filled to overflowing, notwithstanding the slight fall of rain out of doors. The choruses were sung with energy, precision and power, and showed the thorough training to which their director, Mr. SHAW, must have subjected them.

"Adey's Orchestra," under the direction of Mr. FITZHUGH, did noble service in the heavy choruses. The overtures, introducing each part of the programme, were performed well, though we have heard them played somewhat smoother and in better time at their rehearsals in Adey's Music Rooms. This was their first appearance, and it is hoped not their last.

The solo performances of the evening were excellent. The best was the obligato solo, "Inflamatus," from the Stabat Mater, sung by Mrs. BAKER. Her voice is a pure soprano, rich in quality, and reminds us of Miss ANNA STONE's, of old. The voice accompanied by the chorus to parts of the solo was given with remarkable effect.

"Wind of the winter night," sung by Mr. WINCHEL, was an excellent affair and well deserved the encore it received. Mr. Winchel has a superb bass voice, powerful as well as flexible. His rendering of the solo in "Crowned with the tempest," from Ernani, was admirable.

The "Mocking Bird," sung by Miss PENNIMAN, received an encore. A flute obligato, by Mr. BEEBE of the orchestra, added much to the success of the piece. But one of the gems of the evening was the "Holy Friar," sung by Mr. CHAPIN. His rich baritone voice and true enunciation gave a peculiar charm to the quaint satire of the song, and called forth a hearty encore.

The duet from Spohr, "Children pray this love to cherish," by Mrs. WELLS and Mr. KIMBERLY, formerly of Boston, was well sung, though it did not bring out the lady's voice as a song of a different character would have done. The slight tremolo of her voice gives much grace and effect to her singing in public.

The trio sung by request lost some of its effect by the substitution of another tenor.

Of the choruses, "The heavens are telling" and "Hallelujah" call for more than a passing notice. The orchestra, piano and voices so blended together that a perfect whole was the result. The grand mass of harmony filled every part of the large hall, and had Haydn or Handel been listening, they would have been proud of the interpretation of the performers.

Among the basses we noticed a Mr. MOZART of Boston. He is making arrangements for a concert here by subscription.

Of the debut of our young townsman, Mr. ALLIN, as pianist, we must express ourselves much pleased. His timidity will probably wear off with one or two more appearances before the public. In the humble position of pianist of the society, he performed his accompaniments with much credit.

We were somewhat annoyed by the hissing behind the dress curtain during the overtures. "A word to the wise," &c. More anon. AD LIBITUM.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 14, 1857.

THE ORGAN FOR THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL. We are happy to state that the question who shall build the Great Organ, is settled. WALCKER, of Ludwigsburg in Germany, is the man. The basis of a contract has been effected in Germany, which, like the recent conference of the four powers, is to be reconsidered and finally settled and signed in Paris and London. The reasons of the choice we doubt not will be obvious to any one who, like the worthy president of the Music Hall Association, the zealous originator and agent of the noble project, will make the organ tour of England, Holland and Germany, as thoroughly and intelligently as he has. During the past three months Dr. UPHAM has examined most of the finest organs, old and new, in England, Paris, and the German cities, conferred carefully with the prominent builders in all those places, procuring plans and specifications from not a few of them, and taken advice of the best organists and experts in the matter. The selection has been made with a full view of all the considerations which should govern in the execution of a commission of such magnitude and importance.

In fixing the preliminaries, nothing (it is thought) has been left unsuggested, which completeness, effectiveness and all attainable perfection could require. Of course it was a great work to digest such a document; and, to make all safe, the final agreement (as we have said) is still open.

The instrument, as now proposed, is to contain 85 stops, arranged upon four Manuals and a Pedal with compass from CCCC to f^{III} or e^{III} , as desired; Swell, embracing the second Manual and piano division of Pedal; separate Swell and Tremulante for Vox Humana and Vox Physharmonica; and Grand Swell or Crescendo and Diminuendo for the whole work (4 manuals and pedals). It will have composition pedals; the "Pneumatic Lever;" a forte and piano division of the Pedal keyboard; a new and effective method of tuning the free reeds by means of nut and screw; new and improved pallets, guarding against variation of temperature and hygrometric changes; an improvement in the metal Diapason pipes, giving them wonderful purity, fulness and richness of tone; and all the modern and approved mechanical contrivances of the French and English to be gained by personal inspection.

The whole is to be constructed of the choicest materials and in the best manner, and warranted by a sufficient guaranty to withstand all disturbing causes (accidents accepted) for ten years. The number of pipes and cost of each register are named in the contract; and—a very important stipulation, which could not be obtained in England—the weight and precise composition of the metallic stops. Bellows of modern pattern, with channels and wind-chests philosophically and mathematically calculated. The organ to be so constructed, that it may be worked by two men at the bellows, or by power, (Cochituate water, or other,) as may be deemed best.

From two and a half to three years must be allowed from the time of signing the contract to the completion of the organ in the hall. The cost of the work complete (without case), set up and tuned in the workshop at Ludwigsburg, is to be $13,000. All other expenses, of transportation, duties, case (to be made probably in Boston), alterations necessary to receive it into the hall, &c. &c., are estimated at $10,000, making the entire cost $23,000. One third of the first cost ($13,000) is to be paid on the signing of the contract. It will be remembered that $25,000 have been subscribed or guaranteed already for the purpose. When completed, this will be by far the most perfect instrument of the kind extant. It will add as greatly to the architectural as to the musical attractions of our noble Hall. The metal pipes will be displayed, and the superb structure, very broad and very high, will probably project in the middle and widest part some ten or fifteen feet upon the stage, with wings retreating gracefully, as is the custom with the organ fronts in Europe. It will complete architecturally the stage end of the Hall, by bringing the beauties of its design as it were to a worthy focus.

The whole work, when completed, is to pass under the careful scrutiny of the German government inspectors, and of any two persons whom the purchaser may select from England and Germany, to ensure that the minutiae of the contract shall be strictly complied with before the organ is accepted. The builders also pledge their own reputation and good name to produce, in every respect, an artistic work; one by which they shall be willing to be judged; and they engage furthermore to incorporate all essential improvements, if any should appear during the construction of the work, without additional charge.

This, of course, is a very imperfect description of the plan. We shall have the full particulars, doubtless, in a few weeks, on the return of Dr. Upham.

Manners in the Concert Room.

We have received the following among other communications, all setting forth the same grievance. Our readers should be interested in the matter. We have selected for publication three which treat the matter from different points of view, so that it will be well to read them all.

J. S. DWIGHT, Esq.: Dear Sir—Is there no way of reaching the visitors of the Wednesday afternoon concerts, and urging upon them, as a matter of justice and duty and common politeness, either to find their seats before the commencement of the concert, or to enter the hall only during the pauses between the movements of the Symphony? If a half minute or even a minute's pause should be necessary for this, doubtless Mr. Zerrahn would willingly allow so much time. Many purchase tickets to these concerts simply to hear the symphonies. Is it right that the satisfaction for which we part with our money and time should be taken from us by late comers and chatter-boxes? If people have no regard for us auditors, they should have some thought of Mr. Zerrahn's and his fellow laborers' interest, for we cannot be expected long to pay for hearing symphonies, if we are allowed no chance for quietly listening to them. Vigorous measures have been taken this winter to prevent talking at the New York Philharmonic rehearsals. I pray that the good sense and politeness of our people may prove sufficient to secure quiet without any resort to a similar movement here. Yours respectfully, Thursday, Feb. 3.

J. Q.

Wednesday evening, Feb. 4.

Mr. DWIGHT: Dear Sir—It has been a constant topic of complaint in the papers for years that the lovers of the so-called "light music" do not allow the lovers of your "classical" music to listen to symphonies in peace and quiet. I am not ashamed to confess myself (even in your columns) fond of hearing potpourris, Strauss' and Lanner's Waltzes, the similar productions of Zerrahn, and the feats of solo playing given at the Orchestral Union concerts. Being fond of this music, I wish to have opportunity of listening to it in the same peace and quiet which the symphony lovers demand. But no—they are excessively indignant if I and my friends dare to whisper during a long and tedious piece of classical music; but when the lively strains of the waltzes are heard they turn up their noses with a Peckeniffian air of lofty disdain quite refreshing to see. "That's only Strauss," or "That's nothing but a hash up of Verdi. We are above that!" and to show their contempt of Italian music, they begin to discourse in a very edifying manner, no doubt.

Now, Mr. Dwight, I will only add, that if your "classicists" wish us to refrain from annoying them during the symphony, let them set us the example during the other part of the concert. If A, B and C wish to hear Beethoven, they must allow D, E and F opportunity to hear Verdi. "With what measure ye mete it shall it be measured to you again."

VERBUM SAT.

MY DEAR DWIGHT—"Pity the sorrows of a poor" unfortunate who has been attempting to draw delight from the Wednesday afternoon concerts, but almost in vain. Unluckily I am a lover of music both "classic" and "light." I enjoy the grandeur and sublimity of a symphony by Beethoven with the most devoted admirer of that great man; and on the other hand, I sit with no little delight—of a different kind to be sure—through the racket, and confusion, and hurrah-boys of a potpourri from Verdi's "Traviata," such as we had on Wednesday. But unluckily I must hear music in quiet to enjoy it; and here comes in the misfortune. During the symphony the light music lovers are chatting, passing the compliments of the season, moving about from place to place, and the like, to the great annoyance of the lovers of that special kind of composition. Then when the second part comes, the symphony people take their turn, and pay off the former in their own coin. The result is, that we neutrals have a hard time of it. Now I paid my dollar the other day for tickets, and should be very thankful to people if they would not cause me to consider it a dollar thrown away. That they whose musical culture has not elevated them to the standard of the C minor Symphony should grow uneasy and chat, seems not so strange to me, as that those who are above lighter music and supposed to possess great musical knowledge, should remain during the second part of the concerts at all, if they can draw no edification from the music. Yours,

A LOVER OF QUIET.

We would decidedly advise the lovers of Symphony to heed the hint of No. 2, and listen to the pot-pourris and polkas with all the gravity they can command. It is certainly worth the sacrifice, if that will disarm the symphony disturbers. Let us even be willing to do penance for the sin and privilege of hearing a good symphony in peace by sitting through the "Verdi trash" with most respectful silence. At all events, if we cannot stomach it, we can retire, and that in the most courteous and quiet manner. But while the "classicists" are willing to make this concession, many of them doubtless will suggest, that probably the real objection to the symphonies is, (if it were honestly stated) that such music does not admit of conversation, and does require thoughtful attention. The lovers of "light" music do not perhaps care for any music which requires careful listening to. Their idea of Afternoon Concerts is literally of "promenade" concerts; the music to be but a light and sparkling accompaniment, or piquant sauce, to gossip and flirtation, and no more to be made an object of attention, as such, than the music in a dance, from which an enlivening influence is derived without a voluntary effort of the mind. It may be questioned, therefore, whether these persons are disturbed by the conversation or inattention of others during the performance of their favorite polkas. The whole difference is summed up in a word: the one class regard music purely as an amusement; the other regard it as Art and as an object of thought or feeling, as they would read a fine poem.

We add to the above the following quiz on Philharmonic manners, which has found its way into Willis's New York Musical World:

The Philharmonic Rehearsals—Rough Notes by Squabbs.—Like music—dislike bag pipes—went to Philharmonic Rehearsal—weather rather frigid—house cold—mercury below everything—listened to the Symphony—shivered through the slow movement—saw Mr. Fecher submerged in very red tippet—took snuff with him—said "wedder was much gold as was goot"—agreed with him—sauntered about the house—saw Emma Jane in private box—invited me in—accepted—introduced me to Sarah Angeline and Maria Mary Ann—Orchestra very annoying—too loud—could not talk without great exertion—Mem.—Orchestra should play very Pianissimo at rehearsals and not disturb conversation of the house—Went down stairs—saw Timm shivering, Allegro, in two overcoats—told him orchestra was annoying—said he would have it subdued—saw Gottschalk—winked at him—heard a lady say "he was two sweet for anything"—returned to Emma Jane's box—Gentleman from Germany, with orange hair, calls at our box—said he "was one of the management"—said "we mustn't talk, talking was prohibited"—Emma Jane suggests something about "a free country where freedom of speech is tolerated"—Bravo—Gent from Germany becomes disgusted and disappears—[Query for Hunt's Magazine, if one can't talk in one's own box at rehearsals, what is one to do to amuse one's self?—noticed large hat walking around with small boy under it—rehearsal concludes—found myself in a jam on the staircase—Hoops pressure very great—stood firm—Hoops obstinate but obliged to yield—Emma Jane and Sarah Matilda make a sandwich of me—Performed an Andante movement descending stairs, and an Allegro Vivace through Fourteenth street home.

CONCERTS.

Mr. GUSTAVE SATTER, in his third concert (Wednesday evening of last week) fulfilled his promise of repeating his "Sardanapalus" Trio, and producing his new piano quartet, composed "in memory of Kosciusko, the defender of Poland." Indeed, with the exception of the two vocal numbers, it was entirely a concert of original MS. compositions, performed by the author.

The Trio led the procession. Our impression of it on a second hearing was essentially the same as before. Without identifying it any more clearly with Byron's drama, we were struck with a certain degree of originality and beauty in the two first movements, and the want thereof, the reckless, Bacchanalian, mere physical impetuosity of the Scherzo and Finale. The whole seemed put together with great readiness and glibness, and not a little mastery of means. The Romance is really striking in ideas and treatment. The Allegro has a distinct leading and answering theme (the latter somewhat captivating), which are worked up in quite regular and logical sonata form; we observed a return, too, of its second theme, disguised somewhat, among the medley motives of the finale, thus giving the end of the work a sort of outward connection with the beginning. With this exception, we may say of Mr. Satter's music, both in the Trio and the Quartet, that it is more in the spirit of theatre music than of the Sonata Quartet style. It has ideas which interest you for the time being, and shows not a little talent and adventurousness; but it is fragmentary; thoughts come and go, and work together to no ultimate conclusion. It is chiefly episode; continually a passage sounds as if preparatory to a new scene or action on the stage.

The Quartet seemed to us a happier effort than the Trio, although perhaps less striking to most hearers. Its first movement is a strong and stirring Polonaise, indicative, we suppose, of the free and manly nationality of Poland. The "Legend" which follows, is sad, wild, pensive, full of reverie, reminding you now of Chopin in its melodic figures, and now a little of Schubert by its modulations, and march-like rhythms, and major chords ending a minor passage. The Minuetto, in the minor mood, is really delicate and beautiful; and the Finale restless, vigorous, and full of summoning up of courage as for a last effort.

The third piece was purely of the bravura order, a Fantasia on themes from I Puritani. It was made to display astonishing execution, and did it; but as music it was worse than nothing. The quartet: A te o cara, which can have no sense save as the melody sings itself simply, was ornamented, trilled and twirled upon in every note from the outset; and the noisy Suoni la tromba was, by way of "variation," turned into a sickly minor tune; the winding up was universal slam-bang.

Miss EMMA DAVIS sang a couple of Scotch songs with considerable acceptance, and showed that she had studied Robert, toi que j'aime; but she is scarcely prepared to sing such music in a public concert.

An extra concert, complimentary to Mr. Satter's subscribers, was announced. See advertisement.

The third of Mr. ZERRAHN'S PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS was enjoyed by a considerably larger audience than hitherto, and proved a concert of uncommon interest. The programme was as follows:

- PART I.
1—Symphony No. 4, D minor, (First time in Boston.) R. Schumann.
2—Grand Fantasia for Violin,..... R. Schumann.
Herr Eduard Mollenhauer.
3—Second Part, (Allegretto un poco agitato,) from the Symphony-Cantata, "Hymn of Praise," (By request) Mendelssohn.
PART II.
4—Grand Overture to Goethe's "Faust," (By request.) R. Wagner.
5—La Sylphide: Grand Fantasia for Violin,..... Mollenhauer.
Herr Eduard Mollenhauer.
6—Terzetto from the opera "Attila,"..... Verdi.
With solos for Clarinet, English Horn, and Bassoon, by Messrs. Schultz, De Ribas and Hunstock.
7—Overture: "Semiramide,"..... Rossini.

To our astonishment the new Schumann Symphony made a "hit" with the audience. In spite of its novelty, its depth of thought, its earnestness of purpose and for the most part sombre coloring, in spite of the absence of merely taking melody, and of all trivial commonplace and clap-trap, it was heard eagerly and applauded warmly. So far as we could judge from a single hearing, it is in the main a noble composition; the three first movements worthy of the best days of its lamented author. We understand that its best portions were composed some eighteen years ago, and the whole completed in its present form and first produced at the Dusseldorf festival in 1853. The various movements succeed each other without pause, so that the symphony forms one uninterrupted whole. A crash in unison of the whole orchestra, commands attention to a slow introduction, with a 3-4 movement, the middle instruments, reeds, &c., flowing in thirds, with pleading, passionate accent, which soon quickens into the fiery, earnest D minor theme of the Allegro. This is a grand movement, with something of a Beethoven-like earnestness and directness of purpose, but without the celestial, Beethoven-like victory and sweetness in the midst of its sadness. The leading motive, however, is worked in like organic fibre everywhere. This leads into a Romanza in A minor, whose quaintly beautiful and serious melody, sung by oboe and violoncello in octaves, mingles itself with a reminiscence of the introduction, and then alternates, in D major, with a delicious, cool, fresh passage in triplets (sixteenths) by the first violins, while the undercurrent of that first theme flows in in the wind instruments. Then a bold Scherzo in the original key—the same sharply accented three-four movement, of which Beethoven gives a model in his ninth Symphony, succeeded by a Trio in B flat, which is exquisitely fascinating and original, the first violins first leaning on a syncopated note and then gliding off in a smooth, liquid passage, made of phrases of six notes. A reminiscence of the first fiery Allegro leads in the Finale, which seems a strangely fragmentary, restless and unsatisfactory effort to conclude; not, however, without fine passages, especially one sweet gush of tenderness which seems to come out of the heart of the Choral Symphony. The bit of martial fugue, the loud and stern brass passages, and the rushing Presto at the end puzzled rather than edified us; so that the symphony, full of ideas and power as it is, has not made the impression of so pure a whole as his earlier one in B flat, which was several times attempted here some years ago, and which we should greatly like to hear played by the better orchestras of this day. The new symphony was finely played, save only that there is a tendency to too much noise and too little real musical tone in the brass. Since the first visits of the Germanians, we have not heard quite such smooth and musical blending of the brass in our orchestras as we could wish.

Wagner's "Faust" overture, also, was well received, and seems to improve upon acquaintance. It is not so brilliant—if it were, it would not be true to its subject—but it is a more original and more poetic work than the overture to Tannhäuser. It expresses the profound unrest, the high imaginative hopes and soul-sick yearnings of Faust with wonderful power, and yet, despite the monotony and pain of such a theme, excites and interests you to the end. The instrumentation is masterly, clearer and more euphonious, it seemed to us, than much of Schumann's.

The Semiramide overture was splendidly played, and Rossini's refreshing and spontaneous melody and harmony were just the thing to close such a programme. The well-worn Terzet from Attila, acquired a certain freshness from the instrumental arrangement, and its soprano, tenor and bass voices sang with tasteful expression, and good contrast, in the three reed instruments. Mr. MOLLENHAUER's violin solos were most rare specimens of finished virtuosity. There can be but very few violinists in the world, who have so perfect a mastery of the instrument. The pieces were of the ordinary unmeaning variation kind; a melody chosen to string variations upon, and not variations to illustrate the melody;—which surely is putting the cart before the horse and a false tendency in Art. We may say, he played an infinite deal of nothing with a wonderful deal of skill. For certainly, as regards any musical meaning, such variations are nothing; whatever the piece be called, when you listen to these solo-players, it is still the "Carnival" over again; that is to say, the same style of variations, the same figures, same ornaments, same passages, same tricks. The only question is, whether to string them upon this melody or that. Mr. Mollenhauer plays a melody so sweetly, that we would fain hear him more either in simpler or in more truly artistic music. His manner was modest; he shrank from repetition; but it was the demonstrative portion of the audience that insisted on having it all over again.

The Music Hall was all but crowded at the last Afternoon Concert. It seemed like old "Germania" times. The programme included Mozart's beautiful G minor Symphony, which was greatly relished apparently by most, especially the slow movement and the Minuet and Trio; the overture to Zampa; the "Vienna Punsch-Lieder" Waltz of Strauss; the Attila Trio; the Carnival of Venice, (an orchestral burlesque); and the "Wedding March." All these were capitally played. Mr. ZERRAHN's "Carnival" made a great hit, and will have to be repeated next time. It opened with a brisk and stirring introduction, with four trumpets, representing the rush of the people to the square of St. Mark, and leading ingeniously into the familiar Paganini air, that piquant, pregnant theme of endless variations, played first by flute and clarinet. Then came variations of all descriptions, "major, minor, heroic, pastoral, sentimental, heathenish," first for all the first violins, then the flute, then the violas, then the bassoon, then second violins, then clarinets, then 'cellos and double basses, and so on in turn by horns, trombone (rapid and flowery, and played with great skill), oböe (in the best style of Senor RIBAS), trumpets—all, in short, but drums and piccolo, which ought to form a coda. The last variation is ubiquitous, phrases of the tune answering from trombone, bassoon, &c., from all corners of the galleries, in a most funny, startling manner; and finally a grand crash. The variations were cleverly contrived, most of them difficult, and all extremely well played. Of all musical nonsense commend us to the "Carnival," fruitfulest of themes.

Of the Chamber Concerts, by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, the GERMAN TRIO, &c., we must speak next week.

Musical Chat.

This evening will be a busy one among the bees of our musical hive. Mr. SATTER gives his fourth and last concert (complimentary to his subscribers—such seems to be the fashion of the day) at Hallet, Davis & Co's, assisted by Mrs. MOZART, Mrs. FOWLE, and Mr. ADAMS, vocalists. Beethoven's great Sonata, op. 101, for the first time in Boston, will be a feature in the programme. At the same hour, the German "Orpheus," conducted by Mr. KREISSMANN, with the aid of the sweet voice of Miss DOANE, the violoncello of WULF FRIES, and Mr. TRENKLE, the pianist, give another of their delightful concerts at Mercantile Hall. And at the same hour again in the great Music Hall the HANDEL & HAYDN SOCIETY will be making their full and final rehearsal of Costa's oratorio, "Eli," preparatory to the public performance to-morrow evening. We think that "Eli" is destined to be very popular, and doubt not there will be a large audience present to hear it. No work has ever, to our knowledge, been brought out here with the advantage of such thorough and effectual rehearsal, as this has had under the wise and patient energy of Mr. ZERRAHN, with the best co-operation of the government of the society. The choir, in all four parts, are uncommonly well trained; the orchestra is fuller than any we have had this winter and at home in the accompaniments, which are quite rich and interesting, and the best available solo voices are secured. Mrs. LONG takes the principal soprano; Miss HAWLEY, contralto, the part of Samuel, which she sang with distinction in New York; Mr. C. R. ADAMS and Mr. S. B. BALL the tenor solos; Mr. THOMAS BALL (in the part of Eli) and Mr. WILD the bass. It will certainly "go" well.... Mr. ZERRAHN's next Philharmonic Concert will take place next Saturday evening. The programme is not settled, but we understand there is a prospect of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, and Schumann's "Manfred" overture (for the first time.)

We regret to learn that Mr. ARTHURSON, our tasteful tenor singer, is about soon to leave us. He proposes to spend a few weeks in Montreal, and then return to England. Mr. A. for several years past has been of invaluable service to our best concerts, especially of sacred music. In the oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn he has afforded the only true model of that rarest of all arts among our singers—the expressive delivery of Recitative. And in his singing of fine, classical melodies, however wanting he may sometimes have been in power of voice, we have always found the higher charm of a true style and feeling. His example will be missed. He has done much, too, to aid concerts for charitable and public purposes. We suggest that it would be no more than a fair return to offer him a complimentary concert before his departure. Will not the members of our various choral societies gladly co-operate in such an expression, and make it a substantial benefit?... We are happy to announce the appointment of our townsman, Mr. CHARLES C. PERKINS, as Lecturer on Art at Trinity College, Hartford, Ct. This is the beginning of a movement in the right direction. It is quite time that our colleges should recognize the Art element in their programmes of instruction. Why shall languages and sciences be taught, and not the Fine Arts? Why Homer, and Virgil, and Dante, and Racine, and Goethe, and not Michael Angelo, and Raphael, and Beethoven?—Does not a liberal culture equally include these latter; and is not the artistic as practically conservative and renovating an element in the whole social system, as any so-called useful study? Measures are also on foot at Trinity College to establish a Professorship of Music, and thus complete the department of Art. Doubtless much of the impulse to this good move has been imparted by another Boston gentleman, Mr. SAMUEL ELIOT, who for some six months past has occupied the chair of Literature and History in the same college. Let our older and larger Universities be looking to their laurels!

Dr. S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN delivered an interesting lecture before the Boston Art Club, on Thursday Evening, on "the Church Music of the Old and New World." His remarks upon our psalm book manufacturers were particularly spicy. We have no room this week to report the lecture.

Advertisements.

To secure insertion, Advertisements should be sent in as early as Thursday Evening.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

M. COSTA'S new and exceedingly beautiful Oratorio,
"ELI,"

Will be performed at the

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
On Sunday Evening, February 15th,
With the Vocal assistance of

Mrs. J. H. LONG,

Miss MARY E. HAWLEY, of New York,

Mr. C. R. ADAMS,

M. S. B. BALL,

Mr. THOMAS BALL,

Mr. H. WILDE,

And a large and efficient Orchestra. The whole under the able conductorship of

CARL ZERRAHN.

F. F. MUELLER,.....Organist.

Tickets, at 50 cents each, may be obtained at the principal music stores and hotels, and at the door on the evening of performance, or of the Secretary.

Doors open at 6 o'clock—Concert to commence at 7.

L. B. BARNES, Secretary.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

PROGRAMME TO BE PERFORMED BY GILMORE'S
SALEM BRASS BAND,

AT THE ABOVE HALL,

On Monday Evening, February 16, 1857.

PART FIRST. 1—Overture. Fra Diavolo. 2—Obligato for B flat Cornet: Selections from Domino Noir, performed by Mr. L. Newinger. 3—Anvil Chorus, from Il Trovatore. 4—Two pieces, No. 1, Song, "I've waited for thy coming"; No. 2, New England Guards' Polka, dedicated to Capt. G. T. Lyman. 5—Solo for E flat Cornet: Fantasia on Old Folks at Home, performed by P. S. Gilmore. 6—Grand Duo for Violins. 7—Scotch Medley, introducing twelve popular melodies, and closing with twenty variations on Yankee Doodle.

PART SECOND. 8—Marion Walts. 9—Trumpet Solo: variations on a Swiss air, performed by Mr. H. Kehrhaun. 10—Pot Pourri, Battle of Sebastopol. 11—Quadrille, dedicated to the Charlestown City Guards. 12—Divertissement from Robert le Diable. 13—Battle Galop. 14—Grand Finale: Rogers' Quickstep, by Dodworth; dedicated to the Boston Light Infantry.

Tickets, 25 cents each, can be had at the Hotels, Music Stores, and at the door on the evening of the Concert.
Doors open at 6½: Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock.

MELODEON.

THE FOURTH OF THE

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,

(Being the THIRD and LAST BUT ONE of the regular series of four) will be given on SATURDAY EVENING, Feb. 21, at the MELODEON. Particulars hereafter.

CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

THE FOURTH AND LAST OF GUSTAVE SATTER'S
PHILHARMONIC SOIRÉES

Will take place at the
ROOMS OF MESSRS. HALLET, DAVIS & Co., No. 409
Washington Street,

This (Saturday) Evening, at 7½ o'clock.

Mr. Satter will be kindly assisted by Mrs. MOZART, Mrs.
FOWLE and Mr. ADAMS, &c. &c.

NOTICE.

THE Members of the ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB inform their friends and subscribers that their SECOND Concert of the Series of Three, will take place at Mercantile Hall, 16 Summer Street,

On SATURDAY EVENING, Feb. 14th. 1857, on which occasion they will be kindly assisted by

Miss LUCY A. DOANE,
Mr. WOLF FRIES, Violoncellist, and
Mr. JOSEPH TRENKLE, Pianist.
AUGUST KREISSMANN, Director.

✓ Tickets Fifty cents each. Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock precisely.

THE PSALMS OF LIFE.

A compilation of PSALMS, HYMNS, ANTHEMS, CHANTS, &c., embodying the SPIRITUAL, PROGRESSIVE, and REFORMATORY
Sentiment of the Present Age. By J. S. ADAMS.

This work is adapted to Public and Private Religious Worship, Social Gatherings, Reform Meetings, Special Occasions, and the Family Circle. It is a "Hymn Book" and "Music Book" combined, containing upwards of 500 Psalms, Hymns, &c., and nearly 200 Tunes. The former comprise the best lyrical productions of the old writers of "Sacred Poetry," together with those of modern writers, among whom are Whittier, Longfellow, Lowell, Tennyson, Mackay, Dana, Swain,
Massey, Eliza Cook, Alice and Phoebe Carey, Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. Sigourney, and many others. It has been prepared with special reference to the already large and rapidly increasing demand for a volume that should express the sentiments and views of advanced minds of the present time. It is entirely free of all sectarianism, is prefaced with very full and complete Indexes, giving First Lines, a Classification of Subjects, Tunes, and Metres, contains 282 pages, library style, and is handsomer and durably bound in cloth, embossed and lettered.
Price, 75 cents. Also, in leather, filletted sides and lettered.
Price, $1.00.

✓ Copies will be forwarded by Mail; and Societies or Individuals purchasing in quantities will be allowed a discount from the above.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co. 115 Washington St.

S. B. BALL,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
Rooms at Rev. A. A. Miner's Church, ... School Street, Boston.

NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

THE next term of this highly successful Institution will commence in North Reading, Mass., on Wednesday, the third day of June next, and continue twelve weeks. Its object is the preparation of teachers for various positions in the musical profession, and thorough instruction and training in the theory and practice of the art.

Circulars, giving particulars, may be obtained free of expense, by addressing Normal Musical Institute, North Reading, Mass.
Feb. 7. &c. LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting will be held at the REVERE HOUSE, on MONDAY, the 16th day of February, at 7 o'clock, P. M.
H. WARE, Recording Secretary.
Boston, Feb. 1, 1857.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday,
the 14th of January, 1857. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERNER, Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.
Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts.
To be had at the music stores of E. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.
Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 8 o'clock.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY
FOR THE DIFFUSION OF
MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:
VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation
and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text.
The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—
(Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 13. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 63
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 63
- " 3. Fests on Choir and Chorus Singing.....88
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Cate's Treatise on Harmony.....63
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough
Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction.
Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents.
Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 63

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,
389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late at St. Paul's Church,)

ORGANIST of SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,
PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF
Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.
409 Washington Street, Boston,
(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

BOSTON.

tf

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmonium,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.
RESIDENCE, 38 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,
Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,
GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO-FORTE,
and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
✓ Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

JOB PRINTING
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature;
including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts,
Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of
New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
✓ Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements,
quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 255.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 21.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 283 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & OORY, Providence, R. I.
O. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BRACHMAN, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ECKHAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LOWN, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

Mozart's Requiem.

BY AN OVERSEER.

(Continued from p. 154.)

Mozart saw fit to divide the Dies iræ into six pieces of music, not that the execution and nature of the text required this division, but in order to obtain a greater variety of expression and of form within this noble sphere. After the Requiem and Kyrie, those models of the most sublime and learned church style, comes the No. 2, the commencement or introduction of the Dies iræ.^{*} Written for the chorus, in simple counterpoint, D minor, Allegro assai, this piece is of an imposing and sombre character, of a wonderful dramatic effect, if you will, but not at all theatrical. By the church-like cadences of the periods the composer has avoided reminding one of the theatre. I am sufficiently an enemy to formalism in opera music, and generally in all music, but sacred music forms a very natural exception. There the melodic formulas, by which I mean the ancient ones, are more than permitted; they are indispensable, like the obligato endings of the

* Text to No. 2:

Dies iræ, dies illa,
Solvat sæclum in favillâ,
Teste David cum Sybillâ.

Quantus tremor est futurus,
Quando iudex est venturus,
Cuncta stricte discussurus.

Day of vengeance, day of burning,
Seer's and Sybil's word confirming,
Heaven and earth to ashes turning!

O how great the tribulation
When the judge shall take his station,
Judging strictly man's probation!

Lutheran Choral. They are the seal of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and nothing more positively determines the character of age, unchangeableness and holiness, which are the most essential attributes of church music.

No. 3. The Tuba mirum^{*} forms a contrast with the preceding piece: Andante, in B flat major, four solos, executed by a quartet of solo singers. This piece has already been confessed as incomparably the weakest in the work; and yet with another text and in any sort of an oratorio, it would be a masterpiece. Never have religion and the thought of death inspired a musician with a sublimer melody than the tenor solo. Is there anything more noble than to hear the words: Mors stupebit by a fine, powerful voice? What divine charm! What elegiac loftiness! It is necessary to understand, too, that from the line: Quid sum miser tunc dicturus, with which the fourth solo commences, the tapers are extinguished, the odor of frankincense is dissipated, and the catafalk has vanished. We find ourselves no longer in the halls of God. This total darkening of the church style lasts to the end of the Tuba mirum. A spot of 23 measures in a score of 118 pages (Härtel's edition). One must

* Text to No. 3:

Bass. Tuba, mirum spargens sonum
Per sepulchra regionum,
Coget omnes ante thronum.

Tenor. Mors stupebit et natura,
Cum resurget creatura
Judicanti responsura.

Liber scriptus proferetur,
In quo totum continetur,
Unde mundus judicetur.

Alto. Iudex ergo cum sedebit,
Quidquid latet apparebit,
Nil inultum remanebit.

Sopr. Quid sum miser tunc dicturus?
Quem patronum rogaturus,
Cum vix justus sit securus?

B. Hark! the angel trumpet sounding,
Thro' sepulchral realms rebounding!
See the dead the throne surrounding.

T. Death and nature view, affrighted,
Dust and spirit re-united,
Man aris'n to judgment cited.

Then is shown the book containing Written deeds the world arraigning,
Open guilt and guilty feigning.

A. When the judge supreme is seated,
All's disclosed that's now secreted,
Ev'ry wrong's redress completed.

S. Trembling at his indignation,
Where shall I make supplication?
Scarce the righteous find salvation.

not analyze with this severity the sacred music of our day, even the works of the most celebrated masters. It would almost annihilate them, with a few exceptions.

No. 4. But at once the church style reappears in all its grandeur and sublimity: Rex tremendæ majestatis,^{*} G minor, Grave. Those descending tones, falling with tremendous unison, that thrice repeated and sublime exclamation of the chorus: Rex! Rex! Rex! strengthened by all the metallic voices of the orchestra, do they not show us the earth shaken to its axis, and the Lord of hosts, borne upon the wings of seraphim, descending slowly from the heavens! Out of the midst of the trumpet crash of the Judgment Day you hear the universal prayer resound—a prayer in canonical movement, slow and full of earnestness and humiliation, a thoroughly Christian prayer. The thunders of Sinai are hushed at length, to let the last vow, the last feeble cry of departing humanity approach the feet of the Judge: Salva me! salva me! The conclusion is in the minor chord of the fifth, to connect itself better with

No. 5. Recordare, Jesu pie,[†] Andante, F

* Text to No. 4:

Rex tremendæ majestatis,
Qui salvandos salvas gratis,
Salva me, fons pietatis!

King tremendous! Judge all-seeing!
Yet by mercy sinners freeing,
Save me, great and holy Being!

† Text to No. 5:

Recordare, Jesu pie,
Quod sum causa tuæ viæ,
Ne me perdas illâ die.

Quærens me, sedisti lassus,
Redemisti, crucem passus;
Tantus labor non sit cassus.

Iuste iudex ultionis,
Donum fac remissionis,
Ante diem rationis.

Ingemisco tanquam reus,
Culpâ rubet vultus meus.
Supplicanti parce, Deus,

Qui Mariam absolvisti,
Et latronem exaudisti,
Mihî quoque spem dedisti.

Preces meæ non sunt dignæ,
Sed tu bonus fac benignè
Ne perenne cremer igne.

Inter oves locum præsta,
Et ab hædis me sequestra,
Statuens in parte dextrâ.

Kindly, Jesus, recollect me,
Though thy cross with shame affect me,
In that awful day protect me.

major, for solo voices, like the Tuba mirum. Here the text of the Dies iræ naturally required a new contrast with what went before: Supplicanti parce Deus! qui Mariam absolvisti et latronem exaudisti, mihi quoque spem dedisti. This expresses the sinner's hope in the merits of the cross and of the blood of Jesus Christ, but a hope accompanied with contrition and shame; Ingemisco tanquam reus, culpâ rubet vultus meus. As a work of art and science the Recordare appears to me to be in vocal music what the overture to the Zauberflöte is in instrumental—a wonder without precedent, and which no one has sought to imitate. With regard to expression, it includes in itself all that there is church-like, and at the same time it is extremely delectable to the ear. Antique learning and modern euphony raised to the highest degree, and emulously tending to one goal! In vain have I searched among the patriarchs and doctors of Italy and Germany for a model of the Recordare; but I am convinced it can nowhere be found. We may remark in the first place, that, take away the instrumentation of this piece, there would still remain very beautiful vocal music, which might be executed without orchestra in any church or elsewhere. This remark, which in itself anywhere is of great importance, when we speak of sacred compositions, is applicable to most of the pieces of the Requiem, as well as to the works of other masters, who have treated this style with a perfect knowledge of its laws. But what is far more extraordinary is, that the accompaniment of the Recordare, without any addition, and simply by making a few abbreviations, would afford a perfect masterpiece of instrumental music, a wonderful church-like interlude for orchestra or for the organ; and it is unnecessary to say, that the figures of the instrumentation present themselves quite independently of the voice parts. Its leading movement is a Canon for two voices in the second, or, more accurately speaking, in the seventh below; which Canon alternates on the one hand between the contralto and the bass—on the other between the soprano and tenor. It is almost a fugued choral song. In passages where the words demand shades of a more pathetic expression, the melody assumes a more modern form, and the voices, united in quartet, perform ensembles and imitations in the free style with wonderful variety of design. During these movements and combinations of the voices, the orchestra works out a totally distinct fugue with strict imitation, with several subjects, wonderfully embellished by the master's hand, but flowing full of grace and beauty from the source. From time to time the fugue is interrupted, to give place to a simple accompaniment; then is heard anew that incomparable bass, ever varied and ever singing, which through a thousand melodious windings and a thousand contrapuntal ramifications, pursues the thread of a serious, persistent meditation on the Infinite, while the violins and the violas weave other significant and mystical comments around the solemn discourse recited by the singers. The effect of this unheard of combination between the voices and the orchestra borders upon the marvellous, like the labor that produced it. Like the Zauberflöte overture, the Recordare seems to date from the oldest of all forms, fugued music; it is a canto fermo with improvised voices in fugued style; beyond this you find no coincidence between the two pieces; they are diametrically opposite in character, and as to the working up, the Recordare admits of no comparison with whatsoever else.

[To be continued.]

Originality in Music.

(From the New York Musical World.)

Originality, for the present purpose, shall be considered as a property or mark of distinction standing out boldly, in the productions of extraordinary minds when compared with those of the average calibre. To be thoroughly original a work of art must be totally unlike every other work, saving only in those general properties which belong to the species of art to which the specimen pertains. Thus, each of two pictures may be perfectly original in its character, notwithstanding they are both alike in one respect—that they are representations of visible objects, produced by coloring matter laid upon a surface.

There is such a thing as undesirable originality, the result, not of the genius of a master mind, but of a morbid desire after notoriety. This leads to extravagance, oddity, eccentricity. Its products, 'tis true, are not cast in the common mould; but neither are they of a nature to be admired or sought after. Its deviations from ordinary standards are but so many censurable obliquities. Such deviations there may be in every walk of Art, but it is not our present business to explore them. Obliquities of moral character and deportment there may also be, affording ample field for observation, as so many specimens of attempted originality; but neither is our business with them. The remarks which follow will relate to originality as manifested in musical composition.

Originality in music is of two kinds. It may exist in the subject or theme, and in the treatment of that subject. Where originality is discoverable both in the subject and in the manner in which it is handled, (an exceedingly rare case,) there of course the claim to the distinction is doubly strong. To invent a new phrase of agreeable melody is to exercise in a certain sense a creative power. It is a power conferred upon few individuals of the many millions of which the population of the earth is made up. To string musical notes together in harsh and unpleasant sequence, such as is not to be found in any known composition, would be a comparatively easy task. Such passages, had they by possibility occurred to the imagination of any gifted composer, would never have been allowed to escape his pen. With that branch of originality we are now concerned.

What must be the extent of a melody before it can, in this age of the world, claim the merit of originality, may well be questioned. Quite certain it is that no two or three notes can be put together which have not followed each other in a similar manner before; perhaps no short single phrase whatever. But when we come to longer phrases, or to successions of short phrases, the possible variety increases in a ratio which it would task the powers of the arithmetician to calculate. Then there is room for invention; and the workings of a master mind, having the grasp of such materials, soon make themselves manifest.

This may be illustrated by a reference to literary composition. We do not look for an original composition consisting of two or three words only. Perhaps such a composition is not possible, provided good sense be the essential condition. Yet what an illimitable scope for the display of inventive power do the words of our language,—of any language indeed present!

As melody is the leading feature of all music, we have placed it in the front rank as regards originality. In harmony there is not so much room for invention; perhaps, at this time of day, there may be thought to be none at all. Certainly it would be hard to discover a new combination of musical sounds, such as human ears under any circumstances would tolerate. But new successions of chords or harmonies may possibly be introduced; at all events, original effects may be elicited by such collocations. This point, however, relates rather to treatment than to the subject.

We have heard sometimes of an "original style." This, however, means nothing more than the mode of treatment, which may be almost infinitely diversified. Of course, as we shall not be so insane as to attempt to frame rules for the creation of original melodies (!) so neither shall we make the slightest endeavor to define novel plans of treatment. Every composer must manage those matters for himself. "Every art is best taught by example." The student therefore will do well—it is very old advice, and we make no claim of originality for it,—to study the works of acknowledged classical masters. He will there frequently find similar ideas, almost identical phrases, employed by those whom we esteem amongst the most gifted with inventive genius; yet with such dissimilarity of treatment, that the remembrance of one composition is seldom recalled by another, although founded upon nearly or quite the same theme. The case is paralleled by two sermons written upon the same text; yet perhaps having, when examined, scarcely two ideas in common.

We shall exemplify this idea by quoting a remarkable instance. Few of our readers can be unacquainted with Handel's "Messiah," and the majestic fugue chorus at the words, "And with his stripes." Here is its text.

And with his stripes we are healed

Now turn to J. Sebastian Bach's celebrated forty-eight preludes and fugues. At the 44th fugue (the 20th of the 2nd set, when the work is divided into two sets) the theme is thus announced:

The leading phrase transposed to another key, is precisely the same as Handel's; yet the two compositions bear no further resemblance to each other. Which of these two great men, Bach and Handel, first broached the idea, perhaps never can be determined; and it is needless to enquire. A third party, as great as either of them, has employed the same melodic thought. The concluding chorus of Mozart's celebrated Requiem Mass gives out its principal text thus:

Cum sanc - tis tu - - is, &c.

A counter subject in the alto commences in the second bar, and gives a decided color to the whole fugue. It will be good for the student to make a serious study of those three movements. The text is the same in each case, (for the proportionate elongation of the first note of the phrase in the last cited instance makes no essential difference,) and yet the products are totally unlike.

Now Mozart must have seen and known Han-

Painfully thy passion bought me,
Long thy wearied spirit sought me,
Thro' such suff'ring hope is brought me.

Judge, to whom revenge pertaineth,
Pardon grant me while love reigneth,
Ere consuming wrath remaineth.

Wounded conscience me accusing,
Guilty blushes me suffusing,
Spare the sinner sin is bruising,

Thou, who Mary's love perceivedst,
And the dying thief receivedst,
Even me with hope relievedst.

Tho' my prayer unworthy grieve me,
Lord most gracious, still relieve me,
Lest eternal fire receive me.

'Mid the sheep a place decide me,
And from goats on left divide me,
Standing on the right beside Thee.

dal's use of the phrase, and there is a very great probability that he was also well acquainted with Bach's treatment of the same theme; and yet, with all his extraordinary inventive powers, he chose to adopt it as the finale of his last, perhaps his greatest work.

A similarity of subject then must not be set down to the account of poverty of invention; it may be rather considered as an allowable quotation. We have it in literature, why not in music? We remember to have heard the famous Samuel Wesley express his wish that we had some equivalent in music for the inverted commas of ordinary quotations. The adoption of some such symbol would screen many a poor fellow from the charge of plagiarism.

Dr. Tuckerman's Lecture.

(From the Traveller, Feb. 13.)

CHURCH MUSIC IN THE OLD WORLD AND IN THE NEW. The sixth lecture before the Boston Art Club was delivered last evening by Dr. S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN, who discoursed of the rise, progress, decline and present condition of church music in the old world, and of the state of the art in America at this time. In commencing, he remarked that in all ages of the world, as a part of religious worship, music had been held in high estimation. It was coeval with society. It attained a high degree of excellence in the days of the Hebrew kings. At the dedication of Solomon's Temple, 200,000 musicians assisted in the grand ceremonies of the occasion; but during the century preceding, little mention is made of the music of the Jews, who think there must not be much music before the coming of the Messiah. The music of the early Christians was tinged with Paganism. During the first five centuries after Christ, considerable progress was made in musical science, and near the close of this period the introduction of discords was made. Mention was made of nearly all the distinguished artists that have lived in Europe, and especially of the immortal Handel. The bright era of musical art initiated by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, was particularly mentioned, and the credit of being the great nurse of musical art awarded to the Catholic church.

The decline of church music, which commenced at a time in the reign of the Stuart kings, was attributed to its debasing and corrupting union with the dramatic and ornamental style.

In speaking of the modern school of church music, the lecturer complained that it was full of devices and superficial arts for the sole end of producing an effect, which was only the same as that produced by a performance of the Anvil Chorus in Trovatore. By such arts the taste of the listener grows depraved, the temple of God is dwarfed into an opera house, and the creature is worshipped before the Creator. Genuine church music, said the lecturer, like the Gothic temples in which it used to resound, is founded upon immutable principles, and was alike beautiful in all ages.

(From the Courier, Feb. 13.)

In the second portion, Church Music in this country was spoken of. In America, the lecturer said, the term Church Music has no other meaning than to denote the character of the music usually found in our endless collections of psalm and hymn tunes. Within the past thirty years many hundred different collections of psalm tunes have been published in the United States; and we may safely say that, if from the contents of all of them we would rake out the bad music, the residue would scarcely suffice to make one respectable collection of good and appropriate church tunes. The manufacture and sale of such works as these can have no other effect than to create a vulgar and profane taste, as well as an appetite for a style of music which is radically bad; and the use of such compositions, whether for private practice or for public worship, is not only destructive to all the decencies and proprieties of Church Music, but will most assuredly result in totally unfitting us for the proper enjoyment and appreciation of all good music.

The lecturer advocated the total abolition of hymn books, and a return to the best metrical version of the "Psalms of David," thus substituting a devout and sober psalmody in place of the many objectionable hymns now in general use; also the discontinuance of Quartet singing, with all its prettiness, feebleness, and glee-like effect; and the provision of choirs of not less than sixteen voices. Let the ministers of all denominations, said he, study, in some degree, the art of "Church Music," sufficiently so, at least, to enable them to determine whether the music they are listening to is a good church tune, constructed upon ecclesiastical principles, or the adaptation of some pretty melody from the last Opera; and, as in olden time the Church's ministers were, at once by choice and compulsion, the Church's musicians, let not their successors at the present day esteem it beneath the dignity of their cloth to study and acquaint themselves with genuine Church Music—such as Martin Luther pronounced next in importance to Theology.

In this country, the church organist enjoys neither importance nor consideration of any kind. Of the three classes which may be found, the man of real ability and merit must speedily grow disgusted with his position, and will either resign his office or else pursue his own inclination in defiance of censure and opposition; the performer of somewhat humbler rank will remain stationary in acquirement, or dwindle into insignificance; and the mere piano-forte player, who knows the Organ only by the white and black of its manuals, will snap his fingers at Art, pamper the ignorant follies of his auditors, and achieve his only aim:—a trifling addition to his income. It is often asserted that there is no occasion to employ men of science and skill for the little music that is done in our churches; that if an organist can after some fashion get through or over a psalm tune and a chant, and make sufficient noise upon his instrument to cover the final retreat of the congregation, it is enough. But it is not enough for the necessities of the church, who, in her anxiety to spiritualize men's minds, must not forget that they need some preparative influence which it is beyond the power of ordinary pulpit eloquence to provide, and that, in treating Music indifferently, or as a thing of nought, she casts from her the surest means of the power she covets.

The lecturer concluded by urging that with the Clergy and the Organists and Choirs of our churches rests the power to effect an immediate and thorough reformation. Let our Clergy, said he, obtain such an acquaintance with church music as will enable them to form just and correct opinions, both in regard to the selection as well as the performance of all music within their houses of worship. Let our organists contemplate and study the works of the great ecclesiastical composers of the sixteenth century; let them discountenance musical quackeries in every form and shape, and strive to elevate the dignity and importance of their office. And for the uses of the church, let them cultivate only that pure and legitimate style of music which the voice of history, as well as the experience of centuries, has declared to be eminently fitted above all others for this high and holy purpose.

"Brummagem" Piety.

(From Punch.)

We learn from a (spirited) paragraph in a (highly respected) weekly contemporary (The Musical World) to which, of course, "a press of more important matter" has prevented any earlier allusion, that a majority of the Members of the Birmingham Town Council have acted recently in such a manner as to render it desirable to have their portraits taken, and sent in to the association for wholly closing Sunday, as candidates for the Cant Gallery which we hear is in formation. The act by which they have immortalized themselves (for, being introduced in Punch, their reputation is undying) has been the prohibition of a concert of purely sacred music, which it was proposed to give in their Town Hall on Christmas Day, at prices that would render it accessible by "the people." The debate upon the question is said to have been a long one, and in proportion to its length was the narrowness of mind which was evinced by those whose votes had the majority. As a sample of the oratory by which they professed to expound their views, and justify their opposition to the leave which was applied for, we are told that—

"One expressed his opinion, that sacred music was not different from polkas, except that it is played slower. Another observed, that he did not individually object to music of any kind, but he didn't like sacred music blown through a trumpet."

Had it been proposed at this Christmas Concert to perform the Hallelujah Chorus on a pair of bagpipes, we should think this latter gentleman would have not withheld consent to it. His objection, it would seem, is directed not so much against the music as the instrument; and in instancing the trumpet as his particular aversion, he is probably moved by a spirit of rivalry, as he perhaps is in the habit of blowing his own. Now in the bagpipes he in no way need have had such fear of competition; while its tone might in some measure have "improved the occasion," by reminding those who heard it of those sermons in drones which we most of us have listened to.

When ears are stopped with the cotton of Cant, they are rendered deaf not only to reason, but to music. However long a fanatic's auriculars may be, he can hear no difference between a psalm tune and a polka, at least if the former be played out of Church-time. Having "no music in his soul" all music sounds alike to him, whether it be the Handel of the organ-loft or the handle of the street piano; and having himself "no mind for" it, he compounds for other sinfulness by condemning that as such.

It is a common phrase to speak of articles of doubtful origin as being "Brummagem" ones. And we think such spurious sanctity as that which would prevent even the music of the Messiah being played on Christmas Day, may be fittingly set down as "Brummagem" Piety.

Madame Clara Novello.

We have no finer oratorio singer than Madame Clara Novello; no soprano voice heard at our concerts is richer, more artistic, or more sustained, than hers. Perhaps, also, no lady, known to the professors and admirers of music, has run a more distinguished career; for though she has never created an enthusiasm to rival the furor raised by Jenny Lind—though her name has not been blazoned by Barnum puffery, or heralded by mock litigation—she has gone on, from year to year, with an increasing fame, and now stands among the ornaments of her profession.

She was born on the 15th of June, 1818, and is the daughter of Mr. Vincent Novello, an organist and musician of no inconsiderable repute, chiefly esteemed, however, on account of his arrangement of Mozart's masses. Many others of the same family have attained distinction in the melodious, and even in the literary art, but Clara Novello is, undoubtedly, the most illustrious of the name.

Before she was six years old she began her studies; and, by the advice of the celebrated Fétis, she was presented, some time later, as a candidate for admission among the pupils of the Academy of Sacred Music, in Paris. The brilliant Choron was then at the head of the establishment. He asked the little girl to sing; she obeyed, and sang "The Soldier Tired." That was enough for Choron. He waved all the ceremonies of the institution, and received her at once. No circumstance could be more fortunate for the youthful student. She threw herself into her studies with the utmost ardor, and even took part in the public performances of the Academy, though upon these occasions her height and age were so disproportionate to those of the other competitors, that she had to be mounted upon a stool.

The Academy was unfortunately suppressed, in consequence of certain matters into which it is unnecessary to enter, though it should be stated, that in no way did they reflect upon its directors or pupils. Clara Novello, then still very young, returned to England, and commenced her brilliant career as a concert singer. This she continued for a considerable time, in England and in Ireland, appearing twice in Norwich, at the opening of a Catholic chapel, and at the theatre, during the performance of "Acis and Galatea." We should mention that it was at York she received the rudiments of instruction, and that, when she appeared in public in that city, the "childish treble" of her voice, now mellowed into sweetness and power, was remembered, and applauded with sympathetic admiration. At length the great master of German music, Mendelssohn, hearing of her talents, invited her to make her appearance in Germany; she accepted the proposal; she sang before a critical audience at one of the most fastidious of continental capitals and her triumph was at once announced and confirmed. Germany is essentially a country of music, where no mean professors of the art can satisfy the cultivated ear of the public in the great cities, so that Clara Novello's success in all directions elevated her to a distinguished rank. She was then invited to Russia, and the Russian connoisseurs appreciated her no less highly than the Germans. Returning a second time to England, Malibran and Rubini, the stars of the operatic stage, were interested in her reputation, and counselled her parents, with the most sincere friendliness, to secure for her voice the advantages of an Italian discipline, that she might come forward and grace the Italian stage. To Italy, therefore, she went, and received the advice and assistance of the illustrious Rossini, at Bologna, who recommended her to the well known Cavalière Micheroux, of Milan, in the Austrian territories, then considered one of the most proficient musical instructors of the day. With his aid, Clara Novello advanced to the highest department of her profession, and not only attained a perfect command of the language, and the native method of employing it for dramatic purposes, but actually appeared in the principal theatres of Italy—at Fermo, at Bologna, at Padua, and at Rome. Her success was remarkable; her reputation increased every day. As an illustration of this we may mention that when Rossini produced at Bologna, under the directorship of the celebrated Donizetti, his wondrous work, the "Stabat Mater," he offered to Clara Novello the homage of asking her to sing it. Many a prima donna in Italy would have felt a glow of pride at receiving from such a master such an invitation.

Two years passed. All Europe had now heard of Clara Novello's performances. She then married, in Italy, the Count Gigliucci, and retired for awhile into private life. But the burning tempest of 1848 swept over the Continent, and after the events of 1849 the Countess Gigliucci was determined, by a concatenation of circumstances, to resume the toils and the triumphs of her favorite profession. Once more the London season was graced by her presence; once more the theatres of Rome, Florence, Lisbon, and Madrid resounded with her praise, which even swelled aloft under the unrivalled roof of the Scala, at Milan.

Other circumstances of her career, in addition to those of purely professional interest, may be enumerated. It has been said by a musical critic that she not only acquired her excellent constitution, but much of her power as a vocalist from the healthy life she passed during her childhood in Yorkshire. She was accustomed to pass whole days together at a pleasant farmhouse on the Yorkshire moors, breathing the most bracing air in England; living with pastoral simplicity upon home-baked bread, home-made cheese, home milk, home-fed poultry, and bacon; and, as we are informed by her account, "her rations were like a sparrow's meal at harvest tide." In London, while quite a child, she used to entertain her parents, friends, and patrons, with "The Soldier tired," variations upon the Irish melody, "My lodging is on the cold ground," and the air in the Beggar's Opera, "Cease your funning," the favorite of Madame Catalani and Mrs. Salmon. Moreover, her father and mother were acquainted with the widow and sister of Mozart; and at Paris she acquired her well known solid and firm sostenuto from singing without accompaniment in the choral pieces of Palestrina, Leo, and Handel. It was while singing in one of these that she excited the admiration of the French king Charles X., who might have been a happier and a better man had he never attempted to be anything more than a musical critic. The Prince de Polignac, on this occasion made some very flattering observations to the youthful singer. It is said that upon the outbreak of the revolution, Clara was so terrified by the confusion and clamor around, that she sank into a stupor, and remained in that condition for six and thirty hours.

In England, she sang in the celebrated "Ancient Concerts," and in the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, where she sang the Per Pieta of Mozart, at a time when she was not fifteen years old. A high honor, at such an age, to be invited to take a solo part at the most distinguished instrumental concerts then resorted to by the musical world! In the same year, 1833, she made her first appearance at a provincial festival at Worcester, and, twelve months later, was one of the orchestra at the Centenary Handel Festival, held in Westminster Abbey. At sixteen she was elected an associate of the Philharmonic Institution, a new wreath being thus placed upon her brow.

The quality of her voice is admitted to be of the finest character. The utmost art, conjoined with the utmost ease, pervades her intonation. She is devoted to a pure, natural, and healthy style, introducing no capricious, showy, or eccentric variations, but always sweet and equal, whether when warbling a ballad, or singing some of the difficult pieces of Spohr or Cimarosa. Her forthcoming appearance in London is expected with uncommon interest, there being no singer in the country from whose performance the amateur may be more certain of deriving delight and satisfaction, than the elegant and accomplished lady, Clara Novello.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Feb. 17.—Owing to various circumstances, I heard THALBERG last night for the first time. I had heard and read enough about him to know exactly what to expect, and I was neither agreeably nor disagreeably disappointed. I can find no better mode of expressing my opinion of this prince of virtuosi than by subscribing fully to your own most pertinent and just remarks about him; I found that they agreed with my impression in every particular. Nor can I refrain from quoting to you the opinion of a friend whose judgment I value highly, and which, given as it was in a private letter, is too good to be lost to the public. My friend says: "I have heard Thalberg. I give him all credit for his marvellous execution; I find a great sensual enjoyment in its perfection. There is a beauty and delicacy of touch, a peculiar art of bringing out the vocal powers of his instrument, which I never heard before. But how infinitely does all the pleasure which I derive from his operatic airs, enveloped in halos and sparkling notes, and runs, and arpeggios, fall short of the deep, heart-felt satisfaction with which I have listened to CLARA SCHUMANN's performance of the deep, soul-filling works of Beethoven, Chopin, Mozart! Why is it that so few can feel the difference? Why will mere glitter so far outweigh solid gold with the multitude? At one of Thalberg's concerts he gave us a movement from Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat. That one movement, with orchestral accompaniment, was worth all the rest together, singing and all, yet it fell dead upon the audience, while I drank it in as the mown grass does the rain. A great soul was speaking to mine, and I communed with him, as the preachers say. The Fantasias, fine as they are, seem like arabesques in gaudy colors, when compared with the soul, the deep, heart-felt power of love and beauty in a face by Raphael. One such face outweighs acres of common canvass. So does a true musical work outweigh whole realms of fantasia-covered music-paper. Why, one evening with young RUBINSTEIN's storm and calm, in which his powerful nature puts forth its utterance by his skilful fingers, is worth more than all I heard from Thalberg; for Rubinstein has a soul beyond and above the mere exhibition of finger gymnastics in varying operatic love-songs. What are Thalberg geniuses but superb musical pastry cooks? The tables glitter with jellies and candies, and beautiful works of art constructed in sweets, but there is no strong meat there. Children in Art, as well as other children, like sweetmeats; but is the greatest he who can give them the best sugar-plums?"

Thalberg gave us last night his Fantasias on Don Giovanni and Russian airs, his variations on Elisir d'Amore, and his "Andante." The first and third of these I can say nothing new to you about. I enjoyed the Minuet in the first exceedingly; and so, too, the real singing of the pretty Russian airs. I have a weakness for popular melodies, and greeted old friends in the "Rothe Sarafan," and the National Hymn. These were worked up with the utmost perfection; it was really curious to watch and follow their labyrinthine evolutions. The beautiful Andante was beautifully played, but not being familiar with it beforehand, I shall have to hear it again before giving a decided opinion about it. There was a new arrangement made in the disposition of the platform. It was in the middle, and held two Erards, at which Thalberg played alternately, so that we could see by turns his fingers and his face. And when in the latter position, it was marvellous to notice how, during the most difficult passages, he would calmly raise his eyes and pass them over the audience, as if he were but twirling his thumbs, instead of, as a gentleman near me remarked, "playing a different variation with each of his fingers." I never saw so calm and quiet a pianist; one can hardly realize at first the perfection of his "pianism," accustomed as we are to see modern virtuosi earning their laurels "by the sweat of their brow." Mme. D'ANGRI, with her abnormal voice, sang Ah mon fils, an aria from Donna del Lago, one from Betty, for which her voice is almost too heavy, and where, in the Swiss refrain, she is more true to Nature than to Art, and her cheval de bataille, the Rondo from Cenerentola. In the latter she roused all the admiration I can give to faultless passage singing. Her floriture were marvellous. Mme. JOHANNSEN also took part in the performances of the evening, singing the Aria from the Freyshütz and a couple of German songs very finely. Her voice has improved during her season of rest. The remaining number of the programme presented a new feature, a "Declamation," which, according to the European custom (!!!) had been added to the entertainment by way of variety. Mrs. DAVENPORT ranted, and gasped, and whispered, and mouthed out Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armor." Of the first two-thirds I caught only now and then a word, but towards the end I consoled myself for the bad delivery by the beauty of the poem. I do not think our public would be much offended if this part of the performances were omitted.

I must beg Mr. BURKE's pardon for having forgotten to mention his share in my enjoyment that evening. It was so great, through his admirable rendering of De Beriot's "Tremolo," that I hardly see how I could have made such a mistake.

You have probably seen from our papers that Thalberg intends giving three "Matinées," and will play at each one several classical pieces. I anticipate great enjoyment from them. To-morrow night, too, he plays Chopin's "Funeral March." He has his hands full, for after playing yesterday morning for the schools, and giving a concert last night, he is announced in New Haven for to-night. To-morrow he again plays twice, as on Monday, Thursday in Brooklyn, Friday morning in a matinée, and evening at a charity concert, and Saturday gives another concert.

Your printer is incorrigible. He spoils the meaning of two or three of my sentences the last time by leaving out a word in one place and changing one in another. I spoke of a current of mournful tenderness (not "tendencies,") running beneath the humor of a Scherzo of Beethoven, and wrote that Goldbeck spoilt a movement by a few false notes, instead of "a few notes."

At a private house, not long ago, I heard OLE BULL once more after many, many years. The poor man looks worn and broken down by sickness, misfortune and disappointment, and there was something very touching in seeing him stand there with his eyes shut, and his beloved violin pressed to his breast, drawing forth from it, in sounds as sweet and pure as ever, the plaintive airs of his native land. He is certainly a genius, if he is not much of a musician, and though he has a considerable load of humbug on his conscience.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 21, 1857.

Costa's "Eli."

The enterprise and industry of the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY in procuring so early and studying so thoroughly this new oratorio, (first produced at the Birmingham Festival in August, 1855,) were rewarded by a very large and highly interested audience on Sunday evening. Never did first performance of an oratorio here pass off more successfully. The larger portion of the music seemed to give great pleasure, particularly the second part, which introduces the young Samuel; the first part, in spite of many admirable pieces, was rendered somewhat heavy by the dullness of the part of Eli, with its frequent, long-drawn recitatives. The text, by Mr. BARTHOLOMEW, of London, the well-known translator of musical texts, borrows its materials from the first book of Samuel, which he has worked up with some skill and poetic addition. On the whole it is a meagre plot, without much aim or unity. The beautiful story of the child Samuel undoubtedly formed the chief attraction of the subject; and then there was musical suggestion in the idea of a temple service; a ministering priest Eli for a central figure, capable of being treated like Mendelssohn's Elijah, only without much of a history; the suffering and prayer and joy of Hannah and Elkanah; and for gay and stirring contrast, the orgies of Eli's unpriestly sons, and the war with the Philistines. Of the musical contents of the work a brief sketch must suffice.

The Overture consists of a soft choral prelude on the organ (F major), followed by a short orchestral fugue in D minor, and is not of particular interest. Eli (bass voice) in recitative commands the trumpets to blow for a solemn feast, and the trumpets blow. Then follows a temple service. The opening chorus: Let us go before the Lord, &c., commencing in whispered staccato, and gradually worked up to great power and splendor at the words: Make a joyful noise, is one of the best things in the oratorio, and was very finely sung. Elkanah (tenor solo) mingles his praise with that of the chorus. Then comes an air by Eli, a tender bass melody, somewhat "Elijah" like: Let the people praise thee, which is taken up by the choir in full harmony and canon; and then sentences of benediction chanted or intoned by Eli, with responsive Amens in harmony, quite church-like and impressive. Next a cheerful chorus: Blessed be the Lord, ending with an Amen fugue, elaborately wrought and showing abundant technical mastery of the art, if no peculiar grandeur of effect; the instruments follow it with a reminiscence of the opening staccato chorus, and this closes what we may call the first scene.

In the next we have the prayer of Hannah: Turn thee unto me, quite an expressive melody, in rather a common German style, of mezzo soprano range; the rebuke of Eli and her reply: I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit, &c.; his Go in peace, and the chorus: The Lord is good, sweet and soothing in its character, with arpeggio triplets in accompaniment, an exceedingly clever imitation, whether conscious or not, of Mendelssohn's He watching over Israel, or Happy and blest are they. The dialogue between Elkanah and Hannah: Hannah, why weepest thou, is an expressive piece of recitative, helped out, like all the recitative in the oratorio, by orchestral suggestions. Their duet: Wherefore is thy soul cast down, is beautiful and touching, if not strikingly original.

Here follows a long Bacchanalian, Verdi-ish sort of chorus, introducing the two profligate sons of Eli, to the words: For everything there is a season; let us eat and drink; there is a time to laugh, &c., which is rather necessary to the explanation of what follows, and might serve to brighten up somewhat the sombre gravity of the first part. But this it was thought best to omit on a Sunday evening. The recitative and air of Eli: My sons! my sons! &c., fails of the effect of corresponding passages in "Elijah," which M. Costa seems to have had in mind in his whole treatment of this character; in its dull solemnity, its ambitious instrumentation and redundancy of dark modulation, it is open to the same criticism with much of Spohr, though not particularly like Spohr; with all its wealth of means and appliances, it lacks some vitalizing element. How much an inspiring manner on the singer's part might serve to supply this we know not; it did not have it in this instance. This remark may serve for long stretches of Eli's recitative, which we shall pass lightly over. A brief chorus of Levites, for male voices, leads in a Chorale in C minor: How mighty is Thy name, plain and imposing in its harmony. The sacrifice is suddenly interrupted; the "Man of God" appears, denouncing their polluted offerings. The Levites answer in phrases of recitative chorus. A quite dramatic effect is produced here by a single rapid sentence of unison by the people: They have profaned it! The Man's denunciations are declaimed in startling intervals, with trombone accompaniments, and followed by a brief chorus of muttered indignation: We are become a reproach to our neighbors.

The scene changes, to the "neighbors," the camp of the Philistines. Saph, their "man of might," shouts out his war song, with immense martial trumpeting in the orchestra, and valiant responses of the chorus: War against the Israelites! The song is in a very commonplace heroic style, although worked up all together to quite a stirring pitch, and is an ungracious task for any ordinary singer. It requires a tenor of the most robust and trumpet quality. The chorus of the Priests of Dagon is sufficiently solemn and barbaric, and vividly suggestive at the words: See! his glance in vivid flashes. He speaks in thunder-crashes, &c.

Another air by Eli, sorrowful and penitential in its tone: Hear my prayer O Lord; chiefly remarkable for the beauty of the accompaniment and the dramatic figure in the violoncello which preludes to it and pervades it. The Man of God appears again, clothed with new terrors, by the grace of trombones and low reeds and dreadful Don Giovanni-like modulations. He announces the death of Eli's sons. A better model than the statue scene surely could not have been found for this purpose; but the model is far more simple and more grand than the copy.—Passing over the Mendelssohnish duet between the two basses, (Eli and the Man,) and its fine orchestral modulation into another chorale: O make a joyful noise, with more recitative by Eli, we come to the joyful song of Hannah: I will extol thee, O Lord, a bright, soaring melody, which cannot fail to recall Handel's "Rejoice greatly," although its style is not Handelian. In a high B flat, sustained through three full bars, it reaches its climax of ecstasy, taxing the powers of the soprano singer. A short recitative between Hannah and Eli, about the future of the child, Samuel, leads into the chorus: Hosanna in the highest! which is a learned fugue with two subjects, and perhaps the most impressive composition of this form in the oratorio.

Part Second opens with the Morning Prayer of the child Samuel, followed by Recitative between him and his parents, Trio, and Quartet with Elijah, asking and receiving counsel and blessing. The music of all this is chaste, pure and tender. The Quartet, unaccompanied, is the same choral strain which we heard from the organ preluding to the overture.

Next follows a March of Israelites; very long and very stupid; recitative of Eli, exhorting to the fight; short chorus, invoking divine wrath upon the foe, introductory to another, one of the most elaborate in the work, with wild intervals and rushing accompaniments: O God, make them like a wheel, as the stubble before the wind, &c., and leading into the hard and cruel-sounding fugue: So persecute them, &c., which has some terrific discords, furious accompaniment throughout, and is hard to sing and hard to hear sung. This was omitted, and we had next the martial hymn, to the tune of the march: God and King of Jacob's nation, &c., followed by the march itself again in abridged form. It would seem that the author was partial to it. So are not we.

Very beautiful, at least with orchestra, is the Evening Prayer of Samuel; the decrecendo as he falls asleep is managed to a charm; and the angel chorus: No evil shall befall thee, for female voices in four parts, with harp accompaniment; follows as naturally as possible. This was found one of the most pleasing pieces.

A messenger announces bad news from the war; chorus with agitated accompaniment: Woe unto us, we are spoiled, followed by perhaps the grandest and most telling chorus in the work: O God, when thou wentest forth, &c., the earth shook, &c., save us, O God! It is indeed a masterly descriptive chorus.

The recitative which follows, between Eli, sleepless, "scared with dreams," and the young Samuel: Here am I, for thou didst call me, is finely dramatic and conceived in the true spirit of the subject. It is followed by chorus of Levites (tenors and basses), a staccato martial movement, quite slow: Bless ye the Lord, ending in four parts: The morning is gone forth, the day is come. Here were omitted a long recitative in which Samuel recites again the divine judgment against the house of Eli, with the shivering Don Giovanni chords once more; an air by Eli: Although my house be not with God, yet hath He made with me an everlasting covenant, &c.; a wild dirge-like chorus: Howl, howl, O gate; scraps of recitative announcing the further defeat of Israel, and the death of Eli; Samuel, bidding the trumpet blow (as in the first scene) for a solemn assembly, &c. &c.—all rather essential to the completion of the narrative, and some of it by no means of the least interesting in a musical point of view. The oratorio concluded with the chorus: Blessed be the Lord, and Hallelujah fugue, quite elaborate, but not inspiring,—at least judging from one hearing.

As a whole, "Eli" is a noble and impressive oratorio. The composition is learned and musician-like, and generally appropriate, tasteful, dignified, often beautiful and occasionally grand. It is by no means a work of genius, but it is a work of high musical culture, and indicates a mind imbued with the best traditions and familiar with the best masters of the Art, and a masterly command of all the modern musical resources—except the "faculty divine." Neither in ideas, in treatment or in style can it be called original. Even in the parts where you cannot identify any special relationship with some greater author, you recognize no stamp of a decided individuality; there is nothing of which you may say, when you meet the like of it again, this is and can be only Costa; for it is the style, the character of no one in particular, and simply shows the author well at home and able in a good conventional style:—in the Chorales and the Fugues, for instance, which it is equally idle to compare with Handel or pronounce original. But very much of it, as we have seen, betrays a direct relationship. In its subject, dramatic treatment, instrumentation, and even in the character of much of the music itself, it seems to have been suggested by "Elijah." The whole part of Eli is modelled upon that; its recitatives, alternately parlando and cantante, moulded so large and stately, and with such ambitious wealth of dramatic instrumentation, have all the form of Elijah, but lack the poetic charm and are quite tame and heavy in comparison. And where in its melodies or in its choruses, beautiful, descriptive, grand as they are often, do you find any such felicitous and marked creations as haunt you after hearing Mendelssohn or any true creative genius? One may use Milton's diction well and not be a Milton. The tone of the work, as we have said, is high and earnest. It does not descend to trivialities, or poor commonplace, except it be in the war-song and the march. In melody it avoids the sickly, sweetish sentimental. For the work of an Italian it is wonderfully German. But M. Costa is a learned musician, has conducted operas, oratorios and symphonies in England for many years, and is thoroughly experienced in the music of the great German masters. He knew well the sources of oratorio style sure to satisfy the English; it was enough to know Mendelssohn, Handel and the English cathedral music; and these impressions mingling with a thousand others, formed a general medium in which so clever a musician could paint without directly copying any one.

In the performance the Handel and Haydn Society did itself great honor. The choruses were all admirably sung and showed the excellent fruits of Mr. ZERRAHN'S training. The orchestra was uncommonly complete and rendered the rich and difficult accompaniments with nice effect; nor did Mr. MUELLER'S labors at the organ fail to approve themselves to the ear. Of the solos, the part of Eli, dull in itself, was rendered more so by the inanimate singing and frequent false intonation of Mr. THOMAS BALL; his voice is rich and powerful, and he has earned the character of a conscientious and correct singer; but it requires more to lift the load of Eli. Mr. WILDE'S fresh and resonant baritone told to good advantage in the denunciations of the Man of God. Mr. C. R. ADAMS sang the tenor solos of Elkanah with clear, sweet, telling voice and good expression; he is an improving singer. In the war song of Saph Mr. S. B. Ball did all that could be expected; it is an ungracious song and needs a Braham's lungs. The female solos left little to be desired. Mrs. LONG gave her recitatives and arias with her usual expression and effect, and her clear, flexible soprano glided through the intricacies and sustained itself in the level heights of the joy song with ease and grace. But it was with a new and a peculiar pleasure that we listened to the refined and musical contralto (or rather mezzo-soprano) of Miss HAWLEY, from New York. Her voice lacks power in the lowest tones, but otherwise her rendering of the music of Samuel was purity itself; the voice, style of singing, look and manner were finely suited to the part.

"Eli" will be repeated to-morrow evening.

CONCERTS.

We had not room last week for mention of the sixth concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The programme was as follows:

PART I.

- 1—Quartet, No. 68, in G,.....Haydn.
Allegro moderato—Adagio—Scherzo.
- 2—Adagio from the Sonata in B flat, op. 22, arranged for Quartet and Clarinet by J. C. D. Parker,.....Beethoven.
- 3—Piano Trio in E flat, op. 98,.....Hummel.
Allegro con moto—Un poco Larghetto—Finale,
Allegro con brío.

Messrs. Hamann, Meisel and W. Fries.

PART II.

- 4—Quartet in B flat, No. 8,.....Mozart.
Allegro vivace assai—Minuetto moderato—Adagio—Finale, Allegro assai.
- 5—Andante, arranged for Violoncello obligato and Piano, by Burchard,.....Haydn.
Messrs. W. Fries and A. Hamann.
- 6—Andante and Scherzo from the Quintet in A, op. 18, Mendelssohn.

It does make a great difference whether a piece be played well. That Quartet of Haydn, at one of the preceding concerts, we found uninteresting. Then the air was warm and close, the leader sick, the strings scratchy, and the attempt unfortunate. No wonder that the Club wished to play it under better circumstances; it was worth at least one fair hearing, and this it now had. It was played remarkably well; the instruments went smoothly and in tune; and though by no means a very striking composition, we found a taste of Haydn quite agreeable. It was well to leave off the last movement; there was enough without it.

It was a novel idea, and not an altogether bad one, to arrange that Adagio from Beethoven's Sonata for string quartet, with a clarinet to sing the melody which runs continuously through it.

It is a Sonata which we only know in private, and this Adagio especially could never greatly interest a concert audience, played in the original form; yet we have long had a liking for it; the melody is truly beautiful, the modulations worthy of the author, and, as now interpreted, making the melody so prominent, it charmed in spite of its length and uniformity. It was finely rendered.

Of Hummel's Trio in itself we need not speak. His music is always elegant, classical, masterly, and of the best that can be without ever betraying a spark of genius. Of the pianist, Mr. HAMANN, we may say that he acquitted himself very creditably for a first public appearance in that character, and for one who has only devoted himself to the piano during the past year or two. (He has been better known and of late missed as an excellent horn-ist in our orchestras; a young man of artistic and musician-like character.) His playing was evidently timid, and therefore a little tame, but showed good comprehension and capacity. The Andante by Haydn was quite a pleasing piece, and Mr. FRIES'S violoncello sang expressively as ever.

We are sure of a good time whenever there is a Quartet by Mozart on the bill. This No. 3 is not one of the most remarkable, but the infallible Mozart grace and spontaneity, the child-like, Olympian power are there. The Allegros and Minuetto have a pastoral gaiety; the Adagio is full of beauty and of feeling; the whole was nicely played. The Mendelssohn fairy Scherzo seemed a little weak and manneristic after Mozart.

The second concert of the German "Orpheus" filled Mercantile Hall again to overflowing. The entertainment was as delightful and the audience as happy as at the first. The programme was a choice one:

PART I.

- 1—An Das Vaterland,.....C. Kreutzer
- 2—Fantasie, on the Violoncello,.....Lindner
- 3—Duet, from Idomeneo,.....Mozart
Miss Doane & Mr. Kreissmann.
- 4—The Cheerful Wanderer,.....Mendelssohn
(By request.)
- 5—Aria, "Dove sono," from Le Nozze di Figaro,.....Mozart
- 6—Die Jungen Musikanten, (The young Musicians),.....Knechen

PART II.

- 1—Reiterlied, (Rider's song),.....Gade
- 2—{ a. Rondo Capriccioso, for the Piano,.....Mendelssohn
b. Song from Weber, Transcribed by.....Liszt
Mr. J. Trenkle.
- 3—Aria, From "Die Entführung",.....Mozart
Mr. Kreissmann.
- 4—The Wanderer's Night Song,.....Liszt
(By request.)
- 5—Barcarole,.....Schubert
Miss Doane.
- 6—Der Jaeger Abschied,.....Mendelssohn
(The Huntsmen's Farewell.)

The Part-songs were all sung with beautiful precision and expression, except in one instance, where the voices swerved from pitch during a somewhat difficult modulation, and where the piano-forte, instead of holding them together, only made the discord more apparent. They were all fine and effective pieces. The hymn to "Fatherland" is peculiarly manly and thrilling. The song of the "Young Musicians" begins and ends in a right jovial and buoyant strain; and has a sentimental tenor solo, a charming invocation to the "sweetest maiden," which was exquisitely sung by their leader, Herr KREISSMANN. Miss DOANE sung Dove sono with fine taste and dramatic feeling; and the dreamy, poetic Barcarole of Schubert in a style so satisfactory, that, in spite of our aversion to encores we did inwardly crave a second hearing. (She answered with a little English song.) It is a rare treat to hear such a song as that in the concert room. OTTO DRESEL played the accompaniments.

Mr. Kreissmann's singing of the tenor air from Mozart's "Seraglio": Gieb, Liebe, mir nun Freude, was so perfect in feeling, style and execution as to excite a most imperative demand for repetition. The Duet from Idomeneo, too, was very satisfactory. Mr. TRENKLE's playing of the Rondo by Mendelssohn, and more especially of the exquisitely imaginative transcription of Weber's Schlummer-Lied, by Liszt, was eminently artistic. The young pianist has gained in elasticity of touch, in fineness and delicacy of outline, and renders the spirit of a fine composition as few among us can. The violoncello solo by Mr. WULF FRIES also gave great pleasure.

The sixth Wednesday Afternoon Concert of the ORCHESTRAL UNION drew an immense audience. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony (third time this season, and always new and speaking to the soul), and Weber's delicious "Oberon" overture (a thoroughly imaginative tone-poem, which never wears out), formed the valuable part of the programme. Wittman's Waltz: "Magic Sounds," the Miserere, arranged from the Trovatore, Mr. Zerrahn's "Carnival," of all the instruments again, and his new "Concordia Quadrille," also found plenty of admirers. Judging from the steady increase of audience, we are happy to say that there does not seem to be any imminent danger of the Afternoon Concerts coming to an end.

On the same evening occurred Mr. GUSTAVE SATTER's fourth and last concert. We were not present, but the following windfall, having alighted on our desk, shall make report.]

To Mr. Dwight, Editor of "Journal of Music":

I live in the country; went to town Saturday, Feb. 14, in pursuit of pleasure. Saw yellow poster, "SATTER'S COMPLIMENTARY CONCERT." Very fond of music; struck by his remarkable letter in your Journal. Came across a ticket; concluded to go and hear him; arrived at rooms about 7.25 P. M.; well filled; apparently few heads deceased (not sure on this point); particularly struck by the architectural embellishments; thought hunting scenes on the walls very novel and pretty idea; have a tendency to distract the attention from the musical character of the entertainment, and open a field of enjoyment in striking contrasts and agreeable surprises. Became very much interested in looking at the dogs and trying to make out their game; concluded they were bore hunting; recalled stories I had read of such hunts in the Black Forest; became oblivious of surrounding things and very much excited; consciousness restored by applause of audience on entrance of the performers. Entertainment opened with "Duet and Trio" from Il Trovatore; very well sung. Manrico manifested considerable feeling in requesting his madre to retire and dream; madre pleasantly consented, and they were quite harmonious. Theoretically madre began to slumber. Leonora added her voice to the scene, which would probably have caused some disturbance but for the theoretical sleep in which madre was plunged; quiet preserved, however, and Leonora retired with madre and Manrico just before her death; audience quite gracious—not enthusiastic.

Sonata in A, Op. 101, Beethoven, by Mr. Satter. Mind wandering a little; wondered if Shakspeare's Hamlet was as good as Forrest's; said to myself, suppose Forrest prefers Metamora to Hamlet, would he be likely to season Hamlet with a little Indian? Upon the whole thought he would. Audience very enthusiastic. Mr. Satter responded; played minuetto of Mozart's; very happy effect; audience much quieted. No. 3. "Com' e bello," Mrs. Fowle. (Mem. Donizetti's music altogether too florid; wonder I never noticed it before.) Audience encored.

No. 4. Fantasia de bravoure sur, I Puritani. Mr. Satter. Indulged in pleasant memories; thought of Badiali and Amodio, and how the "house" always "came down" when they rushed up to the foot-lights and waved their little cotton flags in the liberty duet; imagination very much excited by quite audible echoes of duet from piano-forte; growing louder; become quite fearful; getting confused; looked at dogs; discovered one with mouth open; wondered if he had been howling; tumult suddenly ceased; thought of the dog; absurd; smiled; audience rapturous. Mr. Satter made an effort to shake the petal from the "last rose of last summer," with what effect time alone will tell.

No. 5. Air from "I Masnadieri." Mrs. MOZART. Heard this lady sing at festival a few weeks since; sang "Hear ye, Israel," with much beauty and force of expression. (Mem.—Verdi is very much like Donizetti in some things.) Audience very cordial.

No. 6. Fantasia de bravoure sur, "Robert le Diable." Thinking about piano-fortes; wondered if 'twas possible to gauge their musical capacity and determine what pressure to the square inch (applied to the key-board) was necessary to exhaust it; quite pleased with the idea; wished it could be done; thought it would save the pianist a great deal of labor and the public generally some disagreeable experiences. Audience very decidedly gratified; left the room inaudibly warbling, "Home," &c.

SUBURB.

The Concerts of the GERMAN TRIO have been continued at irregular intervals, making it impossible to attend them all. There have been three since our last notice. In two of these the features were a Sonata for piano and violoncello, No. 4, by Mozart; Trio, op. 70, by Beethoven; Trio, by Thalberg, op. 69; Trio in C minor op. 1, by Beethoven. Also violin Concerto by De Beriot; air from the "Magic Flute," sung by Mr. ADAMS; songs, by Miss TWICHELL; Songs without words, composed and played, by Mr. HAUSE; Elegie for violin, by Mr. GAERTNER, &c., &c.

The fourth concert took place last Tuesday evening with this programme:

- PART I.
1—Sonata in B flat, for Piano and Violin.....Mozart.
Allegro moderato—Andantino sostenuto e cantabile—Allegro Rondo.
- PART II.
2—Romanza from Guillaume Tell.....Rossini.
3—Solo for Violoncello.....Kummer.
4—Grand Duo for Violin and Piano.....De Beriot & Osborne.
5—Aria: "Porgi amor,".....Mozart.
6—Freischütz Fantasia for Violin.....Mocessor.
- PART III.
7—Trio in E flat, op. 1, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, Beethoven.
Allegro—Adagio cantabile—Scherzo, quasi Allegro assai—
Finale, Presto.

The Sonata and the Trio were both from the earliest published works of their authors; both beautiful compositions, and well rendered. Mr. GAERTNER's violin never to our ear sounded better; his playing in these pieces was free from the exaggeration in which he sometimes indulges, and but for which he is one of the best of violinists. Mr. JUNGNIER as a violoncellist is always satisfactory when he plays good music. A more sympathetic touch, in addition to the rare execution, of the pianist, seemed all that was wanting to make the charm of the Sonata and Trio complete.

We felt the same drawback in the accompaniment to the "William Tell" romanza: Selva opaca, &c. which Mrs. LONG sings so finely, as she did, also the well-known aria from Mozart. The violoncello, for its solo, sang Robert toi que j'aime quite feelingly. The Duo for violin and piano recalled many memories of one of the most delightful of operas, Rossini's "Tell," and very pleasantly too, although the violin could not escape a violent recurrence of its mad fit in the military finale from the overture. Yet this and a like furor in the Freischütz fantasy stirred up the plaudits of the crowded room. An artist must learn to resist his audience; for audiences spoil artists, if artists will be spoiled.

Musical Chat.

CARL ZERRAHN's "Philharmonie" to-night will be the last but one—bear that in mind. He will give us Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, and Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," (for the first time); and for lighter attraction he announces a repetition of Mr. MOLLENHAUER's brilliant violin solos. The feast will be rich and rare.....THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB announce Miss DOANE and Mr. KREISSMANN for next Tuesday; and we may hope for another hearing of those fine songs sung at the "Orpheus." We are glad to see a Beethoven Quintet in the bill, where Beethoven's name has not figured much this season.The many admirers of Mrs. J. H. LONG's artistic singing will be pleased to see a Complimentary Concert announced for her. It will take place at Chickering's next Saturday evening, and we are happy to know that most of the tickets were bespoken before the announcement. A few, however, still remain for those who apply early.

Oliver Ditson gives us a truly valuable book in "Bassini's Art of Singing: an analytical, physiological and practical system for the cultivation of the Voice; by CARLO BASSINI; edited by R. STORRS WILLIS." From what we have read of it, as it first appeared by chapters in Willis's Musical World, (now, however, much more complete, with exercises and illustrations) we are convinced that it contains more instructive hints and more philosophy than any School for the Voice with which we are acquainted. We reserve it for fuller notice.

The STRAKOSCH Opera will recommence in New York on Monday evening, Mme. CORA DE JUNKERST having sufficiently recovered to appear in Lucia.... The superb new Opera House in Philadelphia is soon to be opened for operatic performances. The MARSTZEK troupe—minus LAGRANGE, who has a brief engagement in New Orleans—arrived at Charleston from Havana, to assist in the opening. A new prima donna from Italy, Mme. GAZZANIGA, arrived at Boston in the Europa; and we hear also of a new tenor Sig. ARNOLDI—not our old friend of that name—both destined for Philadelphia. The Trovatore, of course, will be the first opera to set its stamp upon the institution, Mozart, Rossini, Beethoven, Weber, &c., having become "old fogies" and not fit to live. The leading parts, it is said, will be sustained by Mme. Gazzaniga, Miss Philipps, Sig. Brignoli, and Sig. Amodio.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

M. COSTA'S new and exceedingly beautiful Oratorio,
"JELI,"
Will be repeated at the
BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
On Sunday Evening, February 22d,
With the Vocal assistance of
Mrs. J. H. LONG,
Miss MARY E. HAWLEY, of New York,
Mr. C. R. ADAMS,
M. S. D. BAILL,
Mr. THOMAS BAILL,
Mr. H. WILDE,
And a large and efficient Orchestra. The whole under the able conductorship of
CARL ZERRAHN.

F. F. MUELLER,.....Organist.
Tickets, at 50 cents each, may be obtained at the principal music stores and hotels, and at the door on the evening of performance, or of the Secretary.
Doors open at 6 o'clock—Concert to commence at 7.
L. B. BARNES, Secretary.

Advertisements.

To secure insertion, Advertisements should be sent in as early as Thursday Evening.

MELODEON.

THE FOURTH OF THE
PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,
(Being the THIRD and LAST BUT ONE of the regular series of four) will be given on SATURDAY EVENING, Feb. 21, at the MELODEON, on which occasion

Herr EDUARD MOLLENHAUER,
THE CELEBRATED VIOLINIST,

Whose performance at the previous concert was received with such enthusiastic applause, will make his SECOND and LAST appearance in these Concerts.

(Subscription Lists may be found at the principal music stores, where also tickets can be obtained. Packages of 4 tickets, $8; single ticket $1.

CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's SEVENTH CONCERT

Will take place on Tuesday Evening, Feb. 24, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms, assisted by Miss LUOR A. DOANE and Mr. KREISMAN.

Beethoven's Quintette in C.—Cherubini's Quartette in E flat.—A Scherzo from the Quartette in A, by Mendelssohn, (first time).—"Dove Sono," a Duo from "Idomeneo," and one of Schubert's favorite Songs will be sung by Miss Doane and Mr. Kreisemann.

Half package of four Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $2.50; Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

COMPLIMENTARY CONCERT TO MRS. J. H. LONG.

The friends of Mrs. Long having tendered to her a Complimentary Concert, which will be given on Saturday Evening, Feb. 29th, at Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. Mrs. Long will be assisted by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, and other eminent artists.

The few tickets remaining unsold may be procured at the new Music Store of Messrs. Russell & Richardson, No. 291 Washington Street. Price One Dollar each.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1867. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERRAHN, Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.
Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts. To be had at the music stores of E. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.
Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 3 o'clock.

Will soon be Published:

COOKE'S CELEBRATED METHOD OF SINGING. A new and improved edition.
INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE GERMAN CONCERTINA, with a Collection of popular music arranged for that instrument.
In Press: INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE ENGLISH CONCERTINA.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

S. B. BALL,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
Rooms at Rev. A. A. Miner's Church, ... School Street, Boston.

NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

THE next term of this highly successful Institution will commence in North Reading, Mass., on Wednesday, the third day of June next, and continue twelve weeks. Its object is the preparation of teachers for various positions in the musical profession, and thorough instruction and training in the theory and practice of the art.

Circulars, giving particulars, may be obtained free of expense, by addressing Normal Musical Institute, North Reading, Mass.
Feb. 7. 66
LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.
Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY
FOR THE DIFFUSION OF
MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY: VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $8.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.— (Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 18. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue. $1 68
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction. 1 68
- " 3. Fets on Choir and Chorus Singing. 88
- " 4. Mozart's Suetinet Thorough Bass School. 21
- " 5. Cabel's Treatise on Harmony. 68
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction.

Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents.

Vol. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards. 2 68

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,
289 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church,)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,
(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 38 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,

Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,

306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,
GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO-FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

JOB PRINTING
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 31 SCHOOL STREET.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 31 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. [Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line. 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line. 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion. $12.00
Do do each subsequent. $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 31 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 256.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 22.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 252 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
O. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 806 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 151 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Translated for this Journal.

Mozart's Requiem.

BY A. OULINICHEFF.

(Continued from p. 162.)

No. 6. The terrors of the Dies iræ reach their climax in the Confutatis maledictis,* Andante, A minor. In regard to effect this piece vividly reminds us of the last scene in Don Juan, and yet nothing can be less like that as it regards idea and style; this is the finest eulogium which could possibly be bestowed upon No. 6 of the Requiem. Appalling as this composition is, especially in the four-part chorus that concludes it, yet the absence of declamatory forms, the canonical passages, the antique endings impress unchangeably upon it the stamp of high church music. What a touch of genius is that figure in unison, which, heaving and rebounding like a gigantic wave, seems to hollow out and lay bare the burning bed of the damned! Have we ever heard the soprano and contralto modulate as in the same figure after Voca me cum benedictis: C minor and G major; G minor and D major; D minor and A major; A minor and E major; the

* Text to No. 3:

Confutatis maledictis,
Flammis acerbis addictis,
Voca me cum benedictis.

Oro, supplex et acclinis,
Cor contritum quasi cinis,
Gere curam mei finis.

When the cursed are confounded,
With avenging flame surrounded,
With the just my name be sounded.

Hear me praying, lowly bending,
Conscious guilt my bosom rending,
Guard me thro' the solemn ending.

minor chords giving the tonic and the major chords the dominant, beat for beat, on each of the four times of the measure, and upon an instrumental ground-work which makes all shudder! The basses of the chorus and the tenors, strengthened by the trombones, embrace in long, alternating passages, the successive keys represented by these coupled chords. What shall we say finally of the Voca me, when it returns in the tonic of the piece, and is developed as imitation with a figured accompaniment of the violin alone, which seems to be a sort of reminiscence of the Recordare? Ineffaceable melody, mysterious blossom of the soul, which, pressed down by the tempest of the day of wrath, opens at last its trembling cup to the rays of the divine mercy! The whole orchestra lets itself be heard at the end of this pianissimo fragment; the chorus, until now divided, unite upon Oro supplex; the chill of death has penetrated to the veins of the listener. Yes, it is the breath of the grave, it is nothingness itself that animates this fearful harmonic or unharmonic radiation and these vocal periods of four measures, which fall so regularly upon their cadences (veritable phantoms for the ear, so unexpectedly they come), as if the choir of the living, while uttering the last words of each verse, were already mere dust. It is the sublimest of the sublime. Thou hast bestowed thy grace, my God, on him who wrote this holy music to thy glory, and mayst thou forgive us likewise when our hour shall come!

No. 7. The grand and splendid picture of the Dies iræ could not close more happily than with the Lacrymosa,* the most impressive of all religious or profane choruses, which more powerfully than any other form of remorse and terror expresses the highest anguish and religious supplication. Even Herr Godfrey Weber, with his strange doubts and still stranger criticisms, has paused at the Lacrymosa, although Stüssmayer claims it from the ninth bar as his work. I should not have used so much forbearance. With a determination to tear the Requiem to pieces, I should have known how to find as much fault with No. 7 as with all the rest, and my criticism would have turned out no worse in this case than in many others. I would have said, that the elegiac and often highly pathetic melody of the Lacry-

* Text to No. 7:

Lacrymosa dies illa,
Quæ resurget ex favilla
Judicandus homo reus,
Huic ergo parce, Deus.

Day of mourning, day of weeping,
When from ashes rise the sleeping,
Guilty men to hear their sentence,
God of mercy spare repentance.

mosa was not exactly what is called church music; and, by an exception rarely met with among writers who espouse a desperate cause, I should have said the truth. But after I had said this, I should have been very careful to add, that the solemn, earnest rhythm (Larghetto, 12-8), the orchestral figures, the sublime crescendo at the words: Judicandus homo reus, the entrance of the trombones, which sob in unison with the voice, a thoroughly church-like harmony, which in the accented parts supplies the natural chord of the dissonances by prolongation, and finally the sublime church cadence upon Amen, take from the melody the character of dramatic pathos, which it might have had with another instrumentation, another harmony, another rhythm—so much so, that were one to hear the Lacrymosa in the theatre, to whatsoever words, every hearer of good taste would resent it as a profanation. Would you then dispute the right of church music to excite wholesome and holy tears—tears not shed for our own luxury, over imaginary sufferings, but tears wept for ourselves, in view of the most certain thing in the world for all of us—Death!

(Conclusion next week.)

(Continued from page 155.)

Characters of Musical Instruments.

(Gleaned from HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

THE BUGLE, OR CLARION.

We conclude the discussion of wind instruments by a few words on the bugle family.

The simple bugle, or clarion, is written on the G clef, like the trumpet; it possesses in all, eight notes,— and even the latter, the high C, is only practicable on the deepest bugle; while the low one is of a very bad quality of tone. There are bugles in three keys: in B \flat , in C, and in E \flat ; they are seldom to be found in any other keys. The flourishes played upon them, lying always exclusively on the three notes of the common chord, are necessarily so monotonous as to be almost wearisome. The quality of this instrument is rather ungraceful; it generally wants nobleness; and it is difficult to play it well in tune. As it can execute no diatonic succession, shakes are necessarily precluded upon it.

Bugles appear to me to rank no higher in the hierarchy of brass instruments, than fifes among wooden instruments. Both the one and the other can hardly serve for more than leading recruits to drill; and to my idea, such music should never be heard by our soldiers young or old, since there is no need to accustom them to the ignoble. As the sound of the bugle is very loud, it is not impossible that an opportunity may occur for employing it in the orchestra, to give additional violence to some terrible cry of trombones, trumpets, or horns united; and this is probably all that can be expected from it.

In cavalry music, and even in certain Italian orchestras, bugles with seven keys are found, which traverse chromatically a compass of more than two octaves, beginning from B \flat beneath the staff, up to the C above.

It does not want for agility; many artists play it in a remarkable way; but its quality does not differ from that of the simple bugle or clarion.

The Bugle with pistons has a lower compass; it is much better worth than the keyed bugle; it produces a good effect in playing certain melodies of slow movement.

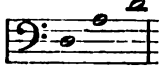

THE BASS OPICLEIDE.

Opicleides are the altos and basses of the bugle. The bass opicleide offers great resources for maintaining the low part of masses of harmony; and it is also the most used. It is written on the F clef; and its compass is three octaves and one note.

The quality of these low sounds is rude; but it does wonders—in certain cases—beneath masses of brass instruments. The very high notes have a wild character, of which perhaps sufficient advantage has not yet been made. The medium, especially when the player is not very skilful,—too much recall the sounds of the cathedral serpent,* and of the cornet à bouquin; I think it should rarely be allowed to be heard much displayed. There is nothing more coarse—I might almost say, more monstrous,—or less fit to harmonize with the rest of the orchestra, than those passages, more or less rapid, written in the form of solos for the opicleide medium in some modern operas. It is as if a bull, escaped from its stall, had come to play off its vagaries in the middle of a drawing-room.

THE SERPENT.

Is a wooden instrument covered with leather, and having a mouth-piece; it has the same compass as the bass opicleide, with rather more agility, precision in tune, and sonorousness. There are three notes,— much more powerful than the others; hence those startling inequalities of tone, which its players should apply themselves with all care to overcome as much as possible.

The quality of tone, essentially barbarous, which distinguishes this instrument, would have suited better with the rites of the sanguinary Druidical worship, than with those of the Catholic religion; where it always figures, as a monument of the want of intelligence, and of the coarseness in sentiment and taste which, from time immemorial, has directed in our temples the application of Musical Art to Divine Service. There must be exception made in favor of the case where the serpent is employed, in masses for the dead, in doubling the terrible plain-chant of the Dies Irae. Its frigid and abominable blaring doubtless then befits the occasion; it seems to invest with a kind of lugubrious poetry, those words expressive of all the horrors of death, and the vengeance of a jealous God. It would be no less well placed in profane compositions, where ideas of this nature had to be expressed; but then only. It mingles ill, moreover, with the other qualities of orchestra and voices; and, as forming the bass to a mass of wind instruments, the bass-tuba, and even the opicleide, are greatly preferable.

LAUTERS ET LE TROUVÈRE.—A London correspondent writing of the recent production of Verdi's Troutre at Paris in a French version, says that Madame Lauters made her debut in the part of Leonora, and was very well received by the public. That occasion has given birth to a new method for appreciating the talents of an actress, which we beg to be allowed to set as an example to other countries. One of these speculating tradesmen who discount the future of a fair singer, a rich cabinet-maker, offered, before the representation, to Madame Lauters, to supply her en attendant with a handsome suit of furniture. She accepted gratefully, expressing a wish to have her sitting-room fitted up in rosewood. Our manufacturer, however, found that too expensive, and being but imperfectly acquainted with his young customer's voice, he refused to go beyond simple mahogany. But when he beheld, with all Paris, her beautiful personal appearance on the stage, when he heard her expressive singing, he was charmed by the enchanting lights and shades, the delicate touches of each note. Madame Lauters was behind the curtain, receiving the homage of the manager and a crowd of enthusiastic admirers, when the cabinet-maker approached her and pronounced, bowing very low, the magic words, "Madam, it shall be rosewood." Envy pretends that the fair Leonora preferred this compliment to the most high-sounding sentences by which her literary and artistical courtiers endeavored to flatter her vanity. It will be a new expression in the theatrical slang, and many a debutante will pretend to sing "rosewood," although her voice may scarcely be worth "mahogany."

THE DONATION OF GEORGE PEABODY.—We find in the Baltimore papers the letter in which Mr. PEABODY announces his gift of three hundred thousand dollars to the city of Baltimore for the establishment of an Institute for the "moral and intellectual culture of the inhabitants of Baltimore, and collaterally of those of the State, and also the enlargement and diffusion of a taste for the Fine Arts,"—the donation to be hereafter increased to five hundred thousand dollars. The letter would occupy nearly one of our own columns, and goes extensively into detail in respect to the scheme and organization of the institution. The donor brings into his design—first, an extensive library, to be well furnished in every department of knowledge, and to be free for the use of all persons who desire to consult it, but the books not to be taken out of the library except in very special cases—its general plan and regulations resembling the Astor Library of our own city—second, the periodical delivery of lectures by the most capable and accomplished scholars and men of science who can be procured; and, in connection with this, yearly prizes to the graduates of the High Schools—third, an Academy of Music, affording all facilities necessary to the best exhibitions of the Art, the means of studying its principles and practising its compositions, and periodical concerts aided by the best talent and most eminent skill—fourthly, a Gallery of Art, to be supplied, to such an extent as may be practicable, with the works of the best masters, and the admission to which to be free—and, fifthly, ample and convenient accommodations for the Maryland Historical Society. It will be seen at once that an institution founded upon such a basis, must prove an inestimable blessing to such a city as Baltimore, especially if conducted in conformity with the following impressive injunctions, with which the donor closes his letter:

I must not omit to impress upon you a suggestion for the government of the Institute, which I deem to be of the highest moment, and which I desire shall be ever present to the view of the Board of Trustees. My earnest wish to promote, at all times, a spirit of harmony and good will in society, my aversion to intolerance, bigotry and party rancor, and my enduring respect and love for the happy institutions of our prosperous republic, impel me to express the wish that the Institute I have proposed to you shall always be strictly guarded against the possibility of being made a theatre for the dissemination or discussion of sectarian theology or party politics; that it shall never minister, in any manner whatever, to political discussion, to infidelity, to visionary theories of a pretended philosophy which may be aimed as the subversion of the approved morals of society; that it shall never lend its aid or influence to the propagation of opinions tending to create or encourage sectional jealousies in our happy country, or which may lead to the alienation of the people of one State or section of the Union from those of another. But that it shall be so conducted, throughout its whole career, as to teach political and religious charity, toleration and beneficence, and prove itself to be, in all contingencies and conditions, the true friend of our inestimable Union, of the salutary institutions of free government, and of liberty regulated by law. I enjoin these precepts upon the Board of Trustees and their successors forever, for their inviolable observance and enforcement in the administration of the duties I have confided to them.

George Peabody has, in this donation, built for himself a monument which will endure as long as civilization finds a home upon this Western Continent. His name will go down from generation to generation enshrined in this institution, and associated with all that is noblest in mercantile character. We cannot well imagine a grander achievement than the calling into being a new agency like this, for the improvement of society. If measured by their permanent influence upon the progress of the race, the exploits of conquerors are insignificant in comparison.—Cour. & Eng.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Musician's Dream.

BY DAISY.

CHAPTER I.

"All great desires that God has given
Are prophecies of powers;
But genius, though the gift of Heaven,
Demands laborious hours."

"Where have you been, Berthold? All day have we sought for you, and we feared evil had befallen you; besides, our good cousin Philip called to engage you to play your violin at his wedding."

"Then he may ask some one else, mother. I will not touch my violin again till I can bring forth music at my will."

"What do you mean, Berthold?"

"Listen, mother," he replied. "Everywhere, from the earth and the sea and the sky, arise strains of celestial harmony, as if the Spirit of Music—if such there be—could speak; but when I would render the notes upon my violin, I make only harsh, unmeaning sounds. O! if I knew something about music!"

Berthold Weimer was considered one of the best musicians in his native town and for miles around; but all the praise he received on this point only served to remind him of his still great ignorance. Often, after playing for hours to a delighted audience, he would seek the solitude of the forest, and study and compose by himself and as often he would finish by throwing aside his instrument in despair, and resolve never to touch it again. In vain his mother (whose earthly hopes were centered in him) and his friends remonstrated with him for his lack of pride; he was not satisfied with flattery, and they were obliged to console themselves with the thought that he was yet a young man. "When he grows older," they said, "he will be ashamed of his foolish enthusiasm."

Soon after the conversation just related, Berthold bade his mother good night and retired to his own room, and ere long, wearied with the mental labors of the day, he was overcome by that (to him) most welcome visitor—Sleep.

Suddenly he heard a voice, like music from afar, calling: "Berthold! Berthold!" He started and looked to see from whence the sound came, but no one appeared.

"What is it, mother?" he inquired; for it seemed now broad daylight, and he was sitting in the little parlor with his mother as usual; and even as he spoke the sweet voice came: "Berthold!" but this time a beautiful melody swept by, such as never before had charmed his ear.

"It is the Spirit of Music!" he cried. "She

(* An instrument much used in French churches.—Translator.) is calling me; I will go to her temple, and perhaps, dear mother, I may return to you a musician." And hardly waiting long enough to say good-bye, he took his violin, and started on his journey.

But a little while had he walked ere he heard some one calling to him to stop, and turning round, he saw a young man named Ernest, a friend of his, who was trying to overtake him.

"You, too, are going to the temple of Music, are you not?" he said.

"Alas! I know not if I shall ever reach it. Yet if I might be permitted—"

"Nonsense!" exclaimed the other. "Of course you will; but why choose this road? Is there no easier path?"

"None but this will lead us thither," replied Berthold. "You know the old saying: 'There is no excellence without great labor.'"

They were both silent for an instant; then Ernest exclaimed:

"Come along, Berthold. We shall never get there at this rate."

And so they went on; but in two or three days Ernest began to grow weary, and at his own request Berthold left him, to journey alone once more.

Through many intricate turns and many a dark corner the path led, in some places so narrow he was in danger of losing his footing; or it would diverge into so many by-roads that it required a nice discrimination to decide which was the right. In all these times of danger, he seemed to hear that faint voice urging him to press on, and he always followed in the direction whence it came. He met many others travelling on the same errand, but some were distracted from the true path by hearing of the temple of Fame, which they said stood near that of Music; and some were lost in their self-confidence, which led them to choose at the outset the most difficult places in the road, wholly neglecting all appearance of ease in their way. Only Berthold was untiring in his zeal and devotion to the art of Music, and if sometimes he felt inclined to go back, he thought of those words he had spoken to Ernest, and they gave him renewed courage as he journeyed on.

CHAPTER II.

It was the last night of Berthold's pilgrimage, (though he knew it not) and feeling more than usually fatigued, he gladly lay down to sleep.

He was awakened in the morning by the noise of myriads of instruments, and voices joining in a song of welcome; and directly before him on an eminence stood the temple of the Spirit of Music. The air was full of melody; even the birds sang sweeter and clearer, and the very trees swayed to and fro in unison with the glorious strains. But what was his amazement, as he reached the entrance of the temple, when he saw written upon the gate the thought that had cheered him so long amid his toil: "There is no excellence without great labor."

He had only time to notice this, when the door of the temple swung open, and the form of one so surpassingly lovely met his gaze, that he involuntarily knelt at her feet. This beautiful being was the Spirit of Music.

In one hand she held her chosen emblem, the lyre; the other was extended to greet Berthold. She wore a robe of snowy whiteness, and on her head was a crown of gold and laurel entwined. She spoke, and he recognized the voice that had thus far led him on, and every word that fell from her lips thrilled his heart with joy, as she said:

"Thou hast done well, Berthold. Thou art now worthy of the highest title it is in my power to bestow. Arise! for thou art now a Musician indeed."

Then she placed on his head a crown resembling her own, only far less beautiful.

"O spirit!" he murmured, "tell me, I pray thee, what became of Ernest and all those whom I met on my way. I would fain bring them into thy presence, that they also may receive thy gifts. I am not worthy such great honor."

"It cannot be," she replied. "Didst thou not behold the inscription written upon the gate?"

"I did."

"Know then," she continued, "the reason why Ernest came not with you. He wished to have a thorough knowledge of music, but he was destitute of courage; he thought himself able to find me with no exertion save that of will."

"And the others?" said Berthold.

"Some were more eager for fame than for a true right to the name of musician, and some pretended to seek me, that they might the more easily deceive others by teaching in my name; and some were too sure of the victory to take the requisite steps to merit it. None must offer me a divided love, who would be ranked among my servants in the art."

"But I would know more than all who have yet reached thy temple, O Genius!" said Berthold.

A frown passed over her features for an instant, as she replied sternly:

"There is yet more for thee to learn ere thou shalt go farther. Beware of jealousy. Be not envious of any; avoid only false pretenders and would-be artists, who have not the true fire of genius within their souls; they only have a right to be jealous. Now listen, Berthold."

She waved her hand over the lyre, and immediately there burst forth a strain of music, so harmonious and joyous that Berthold felt almost perfect happiness in listening to it. Of such music he had never dreamed, and as it ceased it seemed to him that it was impossible for any one to compose a more soul-stirring piece; but even while he was too lost in ecstasy to speak, there arose a soft minor prelude, plaintive and low at first; gradually it seemed as if striving to pass into a major key, and then it was like a heroic song breaking forth; but through every change there was still that same minor chord, as if a spirit were struggling to burst the bonds of earth and reach its heavenly home, and calling its companions to release it.

As the music finally ceased, Berthold felt a strange calm within him, yet he could not refrain from weeping. The silence that ensued was broken by the Spirit, as she asked:

"Why dost thou weep at this tune, Berthold, and not at the other?"

"I weep because the last piece spoke to me of a longing, which cannot be filled—of another world, whither I would but cannot go. It is like a voice from the 'better land.'"

"Thou hast well spoken, Berthold. The first melody was but intended to give thee joy; it was indeed music, but its language was of this world.

In the other is shadowed forth the highest and purest use to which the art of music can be consecrated; and the longing of which thou speakest is the cry for the more perfect knowledge which may be found in the home of thy inheritance above. Endeavor in all thy compositions to mingle the two thoughts, that thou mayst cause thy fellow-men not wholly to despise the present life, and yet to desire that existence immortal, unchanging, even the rest that remaineth for the people of God's kingdom. Behold now this wonder." She showed him a silver cord, one end of which was attached to her lyre—the other was lost in the clouds; he could just trace its course a little way above the earth. "The other end of the cord," she continued, "is in heaven, from whence comes the noble art of Music, whose guardian I am on earth. Seek thy inspiration from on high, and it will never fail thee. Thou canst never weary of the sameness, for in no art or science can any one be perfect. Earnestly seek for truth in whatever thou shalt write thyself, and play only such pieces as will tend to elevate the art. Above all, have patience and perseverance by thy side, and thou shalt never fail in interpreting my voice, and I will be with thee always."

She passed away, and again arose a soft melody in the air. Berthold's eyes grew heavy, and he sank to the ground in slumber.

The sun shone brightly through the windows of Berthold's room, and the birds chirped and sang their songs in the trees, as he awoke in the morning, with a prayer of thanksgiving in his heart for the vision of the night before. It was indeed but a vision, but he made its lesson a reality. In after life, when he heard young students in the art of music indulging in egotism, or in danger of giving way to undue despondency, he never failed to tell them the "Musician's Dream."

Musical Correspondence.

SPRINGFIELD, MA., FEB. 12.—The two concerts lately given by the MUSICAL INSTITUTE, have brought out some talent worthy of notice in your journal. These concerts have been perfectly successful. The popular idea, that none but foreign artists can perform music of a high character is a false one, although we are willing to concede them the highest place in the profession. The Institute is made up strictly of home talent, and will compare favorably with the societies of New York and Boston, except in point of numbers. Your correspondent, "Amateur," a few weeks since noticed the Society very handsomely and acceptably. The choruses from "Samson," "Elijah," and the "Creation," were finely sustained, and with a uniformity and expression quite unexpected.

The sopranos, who particularly distinguished themselves, were Miss PENNIMAN, Mrs. BAKER and Mrs. WELLS. They all rank high in our estimation, but we cannot forbear expressing our preferences while we would not disparage any. Miss Penniman has without doubt the finest voice and the best method; she sang Bishop's "Mocking-bird" song at the first concert with a natural grace and elegance which few of her age could achieve, and at the second concert, Donizetti's O luce di quest' anima, with the same natural perfection and ease, astonishing even her most ardent admirers. She has great compass, singing the lowest treble notes with smoothness and power, and as high as C with equal beauty and richness. Aside from her articulation she has no superior in the vicinity. Mrs. Wells possesses many of the same characteristics, with the exception of strength of tone. She enunciates better than Miss P. in many respects; has had more experience, being considerably older, and deserves much credit for the perseverance with which she has improved the few advantages it is said she has received, but has not the volume of tone or beauty of person which Miss P. can boast. Mrs. Baker as an oratorio performer has no superior in the city. Her voice is strictly soprano, and though her low notes are rather light, in Rossini's Inflammatus she excelled beyond expectation, carrying the audience with her in that magnificent production. With a little more confidence she would sing creditably in any of the societies of our larger cities. The basses were of the finest we have ever heard, not excepting the Choral Societies of New York. Among those we knew, who came up to our standard, were Mr. WINCHELL, Mr. CHAPIN, and Mr. MOZART,—the latter being, we believe, a Boston singer of considerable note, who is to give a series of concerts in this city, and who kindly volunteered upon this occasion. Mr. Winchell distinguished himself in "Crowned with the tempest," and Mr. Chapin in several duets and quartets, showing a degree of cultivation very creditable to himself and the society. There were others whose names we were unable to learn, who deserve notice, both tenor, bass and soprano, and who acquitted themselves creditably. The programmes of both concerts were performed in a superior style, fully deserving the commendation they received from two of the largest audiences ever convened in the city. Mr. SHAW, the director, has certainly achieved a triumph, establishing his reputation in that capacity, and securing the unqualified approbation of the society as well as of the public.

A SPECTATOR.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Feb. 17. The first of "Mozart's Series" came off last evening. Owing to disagreeable weather the hall was but partly filled. The concert was an excellent one. Mrs. MOZART, in the cavatina from Beatrice di Tenda, shows an excellent voice, of pleasant quality, and a charming method. Miss TWICHELL, with her winning smile, pretty manners, and extraordinary contralto voice, sang herself into great favor with the audience. "The dearest spot on earth is home" was exquisitely sung. Mr. ADAMS, in "The Wanderer," by Fesca, exhibited as good a tenor voice as has ever honored Springfield with a visit—rich, sweet, and in tune. He received an encore. Mr. MOZART was enthusiastically received in a ballad: the "Old Sexton," and in "Rooked in the cradle of the deep."

Master MCCARTY, the blind pianist, did wonders. We suppose "knowing ones" would have called his first solo from the "Magic Flute" the best, but his second, "Medley of popular American airs," brought down the house. Some people cry "gammon," "clap-trap," when a ballad, medley, or the like is introduced in the programme, but gammon or no gammon, such things work well in the end,* for after laboring through cavatinas, arias, etc., the ear likes a trifle to rest the mind and give greater zest to the next "gem." Certainly, no less agility of fingering was displayed in the latter than in the former solo. Call it not a sign of depraved taste when some familiar tit-bit is seized by a listening audience, who go into raptures as the pianist piles difficulty upon difficulty on such a simple foundation.

Mr. FITZHUGH, of this city, performed the accompaniments on a Grand piano from Boston for the occasion. The quartet: "Ye spotted snakes," was the finest four-part singing we have ever heard without accompaniment. The delicate shadings and modulations were finely sung. One place in particular, where the contralto strikes the major third in closing a minor phrase, produced an excellent effect by its accuracy.

* We hope our correspondent does not expect us to endorse this. Does the devouring of "yellow-covered" literature prepare one to enjoy Shakspeare, or Bacon, or Plato? And as to his second reason, is the display of agile fingering the end of music?—ED.

The Quartet, assisted by Mr. Fitzhugh, sing in Hartford to-night, and give two more concerts here on Wednesday and Friday evenings. This as a Coda from

AD LIBITUM.

NEW YORK, FEB. 24.—THALBERG continues his successful career, and is rapidly adding another fortune to those he has already obtained in Europe. He has introduced the feature of Piano-Forte Matinées, in which he is the only performer, playing about five of his own compositions, a fragment of classical music, and an operatic fantasia on the Orgue Alexandre. The number of tickets is limited to four hundred, which are subscribed for chiefly by ladies. During an intermission in the performance, colored waiters, ridiculously dressed in old-fashioned knee breeches, pass around ice-creams, and other light refreshments, and the Matinées resemble a pleasant little sociable party rather than anything else. For the forthcoming Evening concerts, the Opera troupe of the Academy of Music has been engaged, including PARODI, TIBBINI, MORELLI and Mme. DE WILHORST. They will appear at Niblo's Theatre, and produce Mozart's Requiem, Rossini's Stabat Mater, and oratorio music. The expenses of the management are enormous, but the receipts are correspondingly great—the agent of Mr. Thalberg is a man of tact and ability, and yet he is himself astonished at the remarkable success of Mr. Thalberg's American career.

Mr. STRAKOSCH has recommenced his opera season with CORA DE WILHORST as Lucia. She sang even better than on her first appearance, and if she is as successful in La Sonnambula, her next rôle, her fame and fortune are secured. Mr. Strakosch promises no novelties, and it is impossible to say what is forth coming at the Opera House. He continues to snub the "minor press," who retaliate by a contemptuous silence. He even neglects to send them the usual complimentary tickets, at which their indignation knows no bounds.

A Miss DE ROODE, a Belgian young lady, who sang with great success at Mr. S. P. Townsend's famous Fifth Avenue Charity Concert, has further appeared in public, at Mr. GOLDBECK'S Pianoforte recitals. The lady is desirous of appearing in opera, and there is no reason to doubt her success, should she obtain an engagement. She is at present a governess in an up-town family, and probably the finest resident soprano in our city.

The PYNE sisters are still in this city. Mr. HARRISON, it is said, has gone to England for materials for a new English opera company. By the way, there may perhaps be few that are aware how Louisa Pyne first became a professional singer. Many years ago, she and her sister Susan were engaged as soprano and contralto in a church—Surrey chapel, I think—in London. From long practice, their voices assimilated most exquisitely, and they soon obtained an enviable local reputation. Crowds flocked to the chapel to hear the warbling of the sisters, and their performance was probably far more attractive than the sermons of the worthy pastor. One day, or one night rather, a musical entertainment was to be given, before the Queen, and an indefinite number of titled folks. The programmes were all made out and the parts distributed, when it was suddenly discovered that the principal soprano was indisposed and could not attend. What was to be done? No other soprano could be found to fill her place! The conductor was in a state of perfect agony of mind, for Royalty was to grace the concerts with its benign presence, and the idea of disappointing, or in any manner, doing, saying and thinking anything that by any construction might be made to imply the slightest ghost of disrespect towards Royalty or Nobility is, as you are aware, sufficient to throw any independent manly Briton into convulsions. So the conductor was quite beside himself with anxiety; at last some one suggested Louisa Pyne; she was sent for, came and sang the music on the programme—which proved to be from Mozart's Zauberflöte—to the conductor. He was struck by the sweetness and purity of her voice, and engaged her to sing in the evening at the concert. She did so, was successful, the Queen took an interest in her, and from that time her fortune was made; she quickly became what she now is—the most delightful and most popular of English singers.

I have noticed as an agreeable little peculiarity of newspaper writers, that whenever they make a very stupid blunder, they at once attribute it, with the most naive simplicity, to a "typographical error." This is a very convenient custom, and deserving of all praise. Consequently, you will please remember that when, in a recent letter, I attributed to the pen of Bancroft certain famous works of another historian, it was only "a typographical error"—by no means owing to the carelessness of TROVATOR.

NEW YORK, FEB. 24.—THALBERG's plan of giving Matinées has proved eminently successful. The tickets (limited to four hundred) sold so rapidly, and there was such a great call for more, that very soon a second series of Matinées was announced, and within a few days, before the second has even commenced, a third. Two of the first series have taken place, with the following programmes:

FIRST MATINEE.

- 1—Fantasia—Sonnambula.....Thalberg
- 2—Andante.....Thalberg
- 3—Sonata in C sharp minor.....Beethoven
- 4—"Il Trovatore" (on the Alexandre Organ).Thalberg
- 5—March Funèbre.....Chopin
- 6—Etude "La Légende".....Thalberg
- 7—Fantasia—"L'Éclair d'amour".....Thalberg

SECOND MATINEE.

- 1—Trio in B major, (Piano, Violin and Violoncello). Beethoven
- 2—Fantasia—"Don Giovanni".....Thalberg
- 3—Sonata in C sharp minor.....Thalberg
- 4—Etude, (Repeated Notes).....Thalberg
- 5—Finale—"Puritani" (on the Alexandre Organ).Thalberg
- 6—Mazurkas.....Chopin
- 7—Lucresia Borgia.....Thalberg

Mr. Thalberg, to give ton to these entertainments, could do no better than to put all the arrangements for them, with the exception of his own small personal share, into the hands of BROWN, the great, (in more senses than one) the inimitable, the indispensable, whose fame has surely reached your ears. Brown, whose original office is that of sexton in Grace Church, is, besides, the factotum of upper tendom; no ball or party can be given within its limits without Brown to provide the supper and army of waiters, to order the carriages into rank and file—in some cases even to introduce the guests, with the utmost pomp and suavity, to the mistress of the house. Brown also keeps on hand a list of "available gentlemen," for the use of such ladies as are obliged to go beyond their acquaintances for the requisite number of "beaux" at their entertainments; and for the Gothamite Coelebses, he knows by heart the names, fortunes, and qualities of all the heiresses in town. Everybody knows Brown, and Brown knows everybody—except Curtis, of whom he "did not know what right he had to write the Potiphar papers. Who was he? He had never met him in good society."

At Thalberg's matinées, therefore, Brown could not be missed, and showed himself in the new light of a patron of the Fine Arts. He surpassed himself on these occasions; the room was well ventilated and not overcrowded, and the startling announcement on the programme of an "intermission for lunch," (which raised great speculations as to whether Mr. Thalberg would take his lunch at that time, or whether there would be a bar, etc.,) was explained by the appearance of half a dozen dusky waiters bearing trays with chocolate, ice cream, cakes, and sandwiches, of which such as sat near the passages could partake freely. Mr. Brown also condescended to make a speech, expressing Mr. Thalberg's thanks to the audience for their presence, (did he include dead-heads, I wonder) and his willingness to play any piece, not on the programme, which the ladies (there were so few gentlemen that they might well count for nothing) would suggest.

I will pass over the Fantasias and other compositions of Mr. Thalberg, only saying that they were played with the usual perfection, which makes one forget what one is hearing, and that I learned fully to appreciate the beauty of the "Andante," and speak more particularly of the new features on the programmes, the pieces by Beethoven and Chopin. The March by the latter was exquisitely given, with all the breadth and grandeur in the first part, and delicacy and tenderness in the second, which it requires; but the Mazourkas did not please me at all. There was a harshness, a loudness, an utter want of gracefulness in their rendering, which astonished me. Of the Sonata and Trio of Beethoven I hardly know what to say; they left an unsatisfied feeling. There was an uncertainty in Mr. Thalberg's performance of them, which gave one the impression that he did not feel at home in them. His conception of the first movement of the Sonata was so different from the usual one (he treating it entirely as a Song without Words, bringing out the melody with exquisite beauty, it is true, but making a mere subordinate accompaniment of the triplets), that I, for one, could not enter into it at all. The Menuetto was faultless, but in the Finale the want of spirit, as well as of neatness, was painfully apparent. Of the Trio he only played three movements, transposing the Adagio and Scherzo, and ending with the latter. The artist manifested rather more enthusiasm in this than in the Sonata, but, I am very sorry to say it, made so great a mistake in the first movement, that BURKE and BERGMANN, who performed their parts very finely, found it a difficult matter to keep up with him. Apart from this, however, there was a great charm in the smoothness and clearness with which this great work was rendered, and to the majority, who, not knowing the piece well, did not notice the mistake, it probably gave unalloyed enjoyment. In compliance with requests from the audience, Mr. Thalberg gave us, the first time, "Home, sweet home"—and how beautifully!—and the exquisitely delicate, restless, graceful Tarentella. To-day the choice was less happy; some one had asked for his waltzes (why not polkas?) which proved very sparkling and graceful, but only that, and for the finishing off we had the Don Pasquale Fantasia.

On Saturday evening the MENDELSSOHN UNION gave their second concert, and performed Rossini's Stabat Mater, a vocal Quartet by Wm. Mason, and Mendelssohn's music to Athalie. The society committed two great faults in making the performances entirely too long and in commencing them very unpunctually, more than half an hour after the time announced. One of the two longer compositions, with some trifle besides, would have been quite sufficient for enjoyment without weariness; but under existing circumstances half the audience left before the end. I must plead guilty to having done so myself, though very reluctantly, as I was charmed with the music to Athalie. It is very characteristic of the tragedy, and full of beauty, but of course, not having heard the whole, I can hardly criticize it. The solos in this, as well as in the Stabat Mater, were divided between quite a number of ladies and gentlemen, of whom I may name Mrs. CRUMP, Mrs. BRINKERHOFF, Miss TINGLE, and Messrs. GUIDI and WERNEKE as the best. The latter gentleman particularly, who is a new star in our musical heaven, sang the Pro peccatis admirably, as also Mrs. Crump the Inflamatus. The choruses gave, as in "Eli," evidence of very careful training and thorough understanding of what they were singing, for which great credit is due to Mr. MORGAN, the conductor. In "Athalie" the vision of Ichoida, spoken to music, was very ably delivered by Mr. GEO. S. PARKER, the President, I think, of the society, and an earnest amateur musician. He is a brother of Mr. J. C. D. Parker of your city. The Quartet by Wm. Mason, a Serenade, "sweet and low," like Tennyson's Cradle Song, was sung by all the voices with good effect. I hope we may yet some time hear the Athalie alone or at the beginning of the evening, when our minds are fresh.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 28, 1857.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The "BOSTON MUSICAL JOURNAL," recently edited and published by B. F. BAKER, Esq., having been discontinued, we have entered into an arrangement to supply each of its subscribers with DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, for the balance of his year, and as much longer as he may choose to signify by complying with our printed terms.

This list contains many names of persons who have been subscribers and receivers of the B. M. J. for the larger portion of the current year, but who are still indebted for the subscription price ($1.00). All such dues should be immediately forwarded to this office, (Dwight's Journal of Music, 21 School St., Boston,) we being authorized by Mr. Baker to collect them. Of course we are under no obligation to continue to supply those who do not remit, since payment in advance was a condition of subscription. But we send our present number, at least, to all whose names we find upon the list, and trust that most of them will take measures (very easy measures) at once to cancel the old obligation and secure the continuance of a musical paper which we hope to make acceptable and worthy of their support.

Mr. Baker's journal was issued fortnightly at $1.00 per annum; ours is weekly, at $2.00. Each subscriber to the former, therefore, will receive the full number of papers to which he is entitled, but at more frequent intervals. Meanwhile we shall endeavor so to interest them in the weekly reading which we shall send them about musical matters, that they shall miss nothing of what they have found valuable in their former paper, while they shall gain a greater quantity and variety of matter. To this end we shall labor to adapt our paper somewhat to their peculiar demands, by more frequent treatment of the practical topics in which they have been interested. Through these columns, too, the words of their old teacher will (we have reason to trust) occasionally reach them.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—Mr. ZERRAHN was cheered on Saturday night by a larger audience and a more substantial response to his unsparing efforts to gratify the love of fine instrumental music. Yet it was only the Melodeon that was full; it should have been the Music Hall. The programme ministered acceptably to popular as well as to high tastes, as follows:

- PART I.
1—Eighth Symphony, in F major,.....Beethoven.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.—II. Allegretto scherzando.—
III. Tempo di Minuetto.—IV. Allegro vivace.
2—Grand Capriccio for the Violin.....Bross.
Herr Eduard Mollenhauer.
3—Scherzo from Symphony No. 3, (Scotch,).....Mendelssohn.
PART II.
4—Overture to Byron's "Manfred,".....R. Schumann.
(First time in Boston.)
5—Fantasia for Violin: "La Sylphide,".....Mollenhauer.
(By desire)
Herr Eduard Mollenhauer.
6—Serenade.....Schubert.
With Solos for Trumpet, Violoncello, and Oboe, by Messrs. Heilicke, W. Fries and De Ribaa.
7—Overture: "Martha," (By request,).....Piotov.

We heartily thank Mr. ZERRAHN for that Eighth Symphony, which we have not heard for several years. Its fine imaginative, happy movements, were rendered with much truth and delicacy. It was refreshing both to sense and soul; and though its form is smaller, its mood less earnest, its character more joyous and Haydn-like, and less tending to the sublime, than most of Beethoven's other symphonies, yet it bears as truly as any of them the stamp of genius and of deep experience, and possesses a peculiar interest, when we think of such a gush of delicious sunshine coming from the inmost soul of one, who could not know such joy, had he not been as great a sufferer and as grand a character and genius as Beethoven. It is his opus 93; he wrote it in his dark days. Yet from beginning to end it is as much a "Joy" symphony as the "Choral"—only in a different sense, more purely joyous, the simple, spontaneous expression of a happy moment, and not the crowding of a whole life's meaning and result into a symphony. That second movement expresses a more pure and perfect happiness than almost any piece of instrumental music which we can now recall, and it is wholly different from Mozart or Haydn, implying vastly greater depth of nature than the last, at all events. This Allegretto scherzando never fails to charm to the demanding of a repetition. Indeed so perfect is its charm that it ends unexpectedly, and the mind must have more. The Minuetto is somewhat Haydn-like, and so are the themes of the first Allegro; but the working up, the treatment, the instrumentation, show an inimitable mastery and grace. In the Finale joy runs riot in uncontrollable ecstasy and play of poetic fancy. Here, as in the Allegretto, is revealed an element in Beethoven, not perhaps exactly fairy-like, but romantic in such a way as to suggest comparison or contrast with the fairy vein of Mendelssohn. It indeed transports you far more, into a yet more marvellous realm of fine imaginary existences, and has altogether more that is wholesome and akin to Shakspeare, than Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. We do not suppose that Beethoven designed anything of that sort; but does he not in this Symphony reveal a faculty, a genius, which might possibly beat Mendelssohn upon his own ground? And do we not find something analogous to the Shakspearian universality and power of going out of himself and living in his creations, in genius which can produce works so different as the Symphony in C minor and this joyous and imaginative No. 8—this last, too, at a time when life was anything but joyous outwardly?

The Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, one of the most bright and riant of tone-pictures, was only less bright after Beethoven; yet it was fascinating and finely played.

Of Schumann's overture to "Manfred" we know not what to say. The impression of a single hearing does not remain so distinctly on the mind as to warrant an opinion, still less an attempt to characterize. We certainly followed it through with great interest, and found nothing to lessen the respect with which we have thus far listened to everything of Schumann's that has been produced here. Naturally resembling somewhat (in the feeling of the composition) the "Faust" overture by Wagner, it did not impress us quite as forcibly; but it did leave a strong desire to hear it played again.

Mr. MOLLENHAUER's most skilful virtuosity upon the violin again reaped its abundant harvest of applause. The thing was admirably done, if it were worth the doing. He answered but one encore, and then very reasonably, with but two or three variations of the "Carnival." The Schubert Serenade, for orchestra, was nicely played. Were we to speak critically of the arrangement, we should say that the violoncello alone of the three instruments can fitly sing such a melody. What poetic lover would serenade his mistress with a trumpet? And then the hautboy, while true to the pastoral idea of the love-sick shepherd's oaten reed, is not the voice for so modern, intellectual and cultivated a style of serenade as Schubert's. This by way of parenthesis, while we own that the three soloists all made the most of which their task admitted and approved themselves fine players. "Martha," (by request), is not an overture which tends much to elevate the public taste; its sentimental horn melody is weak and common-place, the rest but rhythmical jingle. It was played well, was enjoyed much (we do not doubt) by many, and we will not quarrel with their pleasure in it, if that be the condition of our getting better things in the same evening.

On the whole the concert was the best of the season. The fifth and last is announced for next Saturday (March 7); we trust it will be given in the Music Hall, and that a much larger audience than we have yet seen will reward Mr. Zerrahn's indefatigable and excellent exertions.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—Costa's oratorio, "Eli," was performed again on Sunday evening, before a considerably larger audience; and yet not large enough, we regret to learn, to warrant another repetition. The worst effect of this may be to discourage the Society from giving other compositions of more mark. We are bound to have the Requiem, however, on the return of THALBERG.

Of the merit of this second performance we could only repeat what we said of the first. The choruses and the accompaniments went admirably.

The charm of Miss HAWLEY's pure and simple rendering of the music of Samuel was not diminished; it is a great pleasure to hear anything so perfectly in character, so chastely expressive and free from all trick of display, even if the voice be not of the most powerful and brilliant. Saving the lowest contralto, however, it was powerful enough, and truly sweet and musical. Mrs. LONG sang the bright song: I will extol thee, even more effectively than before. Eli's faults were still uncured. The tenor of Mr. ADAMS and the baritone of Mr. WILDE improve upon acquaintance.

Of the composition itself, too, we found our first impression in no way essentially changed. To much of it we listened with undiminished interest; some parts come out with more decided force and beauty, as those Mendelssohnian choruses, such as: The Lord is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble, &c., which is quite felicitous in its theme and truly a beautiful chorus; and some of the larger fugues, one of which, especially, the concluding Hallelujah, with its exulting native, impressed us much more than it did before. And as to the singular phenomenon of the German, or Italian character of most of the music (being written by an Italian), we have to make some deduction from the statement; we did become aware, in many of the instrumental ritornels and symphonies, of a certain dramatic style, that smacked not a little of the current Italian opera stage.

The production of the work is truly creditable to the Society, and it is well worthy to be heard several times.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The Chickering Saloon was completely filled on Tuesday evening, and the concert was the most interesting of the season, embracing the following excellent selections:

- PART I.
- 1—Quartet No. 1, in E, Cherubini
Introduction and Allegro agitato—Larghetto—Scherzo
Allegro moderato—Finale, Allegro assai.
 - 2—Song: Gretchen am Spinnrade. From Goethe's "Faust," Schubert
Miss Lucy A. Doane.
 - 3—Adagio and Scherzo from the Third Quintet in G, op. 69, Spohr
- PART III.
- 4—Recitative and Air: "Dove Sono," from the "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart
Miss Lucy A. Doane.
 - 5—Intermezzo from the Second Quartet in A, op. 18, (first time), Mendelssohn
 - 6—Duet from "Idomeneo," Mozart
Miss Doane and Mr. Kreissmann.
 - 7—Second Quintet, in C, op. 29, Beethoven
Allegro moderato—Adagio—Scherzo—Finale, Presto.

We have never before derived so much pleasure from the vocal portion of the entertainment, whether as regards the selections or the execution. Miss DOANE's voice and style more than justified the good impression which they made in the two concerts of the Orpheus Club; perhaps the place was better suited to her. Schubert's music to Goethe's Meine Ruh' ist hin, &c., with the perpetual spinning wheel figure in the accompaniment, seizes the true passion and spirit of the song; she sang it with such artistic delicacy and fervor that she was obliged to sing again, when she caused still more delight by giving (in English) the same composer's charming "Barcarole." Mr. DRESSEL accompanied. In Mozart's Dove Sono, with the introductory recitative, and the duet from Idomeneo, she added fine dramatic verve and expression to very correct and finished vocalization. Miss Doane had formerly, and may yet at times be liable to a tendency to sharp in her singing; but this she successfully avoided on Tuesday evening, as well as at the Orpheus concerts. A certain shrill and too penetrating quality, also, which was once felt in her higher notes, is now happily subdued and softened, while the freshness, elasticity and delicate flexibility of her organ remain; to which is added a peculiar charm of refinement and good taste. She is now one of our very best soprano singers, and does great credit to her teacher, Mr. KREISSMANN. Why do we never hear her in our oratorios and larger concerts? Mr. Kreissmann's share in the duet was very perfect; he seems to have gained in sweetness and fulness of voice, while for every physical defect of organ he makes up in a small room by the artistic style and expression of his singing.

The instrumental pieces were all excellent. The Cherubini Quartet suffered in its first movement (as did certain passages in the Beethoven Quintet) from something of a wiry and false sound of the highest violin tones; but generally the renderings were quite satisfactory. That Cherubini Quartet, as we come to it again, strikes us as a little hard and over-elaborate in its first and last movements; the Larghetto and Scherzo are charmingly original. Spohr was like himself, only in one of his best moments; the new Intermezzo from Mendelssohn gave us a somewhat new phase of his fairy vein, and quite a fresh and taking one. But it was reserved for the glorious old Beethoven Quintet to make the pleasure of the evening complete; with only the exception of a high note or two, it went finely; and we were reminded that we have heard too little of Beethoven's Quintet and Quartet music this winter.

Only one more of the eight concerts remains, and that will take place on the 10th of March.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—At the last Afternoon Concert we were disappointed in not hearing the Eighth Symphony repeated; but we were richly compensated by an earlier Beethoven Symphony, the No. 2, in D, which by the grandeur of its introduction, the fire of its first Allegro and its Finale, the divine majesty and beauty of its Andante, and perfectly pastoral joy and frolic of its Scherzo and Trio, still holds a place among his great works. It is common to speak of it as belonging to his Haydn period and as showing still the manner of Haydn; but nothing that Haydn ever wrote can stir the soul to such depths, or indicates such force and fire of genius. The orchestra did their work well, and the attention of the very large audience was remarkable.

The remainder of the programme was all light: a violoncello solo, played by JUNGnickel, a Lanner Waltz, the overture to "Stradella," Zerrahn's "Trovatore Quadrille," and a Potpourri, called Ueberall und nirgends (everywhere and nowhere).

A Hint to Choirs.

MR. EDITOR:—I think no man of middle age can have failed to notice the great depreciation of our church choirs, especially in the country, in one respect, namely, in their power of singing full, flowing melody. Twenty-five years ago, however defective our singers may have been in other respects, there was hardly a little country meeting-house in which you could not hear the trebles carrying their part with great freedom and ease in such tunes as "New Sabbath," "Effingham," "Rothwell," and others, where the melodic phrases ran up to F and G. But now I seldom hear a note above D and E, and these generally are given with a sort of half-confident manner that makes the ear constantly await notes an eighth or quarter of a tone flat. Have the powers of our soprani degenerated? Are there no longer such good voices as our fathers and mothers possessed? No, sir, this is not the case at all; there never were better voices in any age or country than our own New England possesses. I find the cause in the want of cultivating and developing the voice. At the "Old Folks' Concerts," as they are called, we hear the old tunes, however high they run, sung with as much ease as ever, and this simply because by practice the singers have learned to use their powers upon the high notes. In the days of the old "Bridgewater" and "Handel and Haydn" collections, and of the "Village Harmony," a full flowing melody was thought almost a necessity in a psalm tune, and every singer instinctively learned to use his or her vocal powers in such a manner as to sing those melodies with effect. Of late years a sort of namby pamby, hum-drum, sickly, sentimental tune has been in vogue, and as this sort of thing seldom requires the tenor to rise above D or E, there is nothing to call forth the upper notes of the voice. Hence, through want of culture, the individual singers depreciate, and the consequence is a falling off in the choir collectively.

Now, sir, I wish to urge upon all our choirs the necessity of their spending more or less of the time at their rehearsals in singing music which will call out their voices upon the high notes, and teach them to sustain with ease and effect the full flowing melodies of a better class of tunes than those now in vogue. If we go on at the present rate, in a few years it will be as rare an event to hear a choir sing a melody, as it has, alas! already become to hear a tune in the minor mode, decently sung. Yours respectfully,

A LOVER OF PSALMODY.

OLD HUNDRED AGAIN.—We are pleased to find in the last number of the Musical Review a paragraph evidently from the pen of Dr. Mason, in reply to our Diarist's query, a few weeks since, as to the fact of a copy of the "Old Hundredth" of the date "1546" having been found in Lincoln Cathedral. Letters from Rev. Mr. Havergal give the date 1564. Dr. Mason has a copy from the year 1567. The oldest copy mentioned in Mr. Havergal's interesting history of the tune is from 1561, and the oldest copies found by our Diarist are one of 1560 and one of 1559.

The mere date of this one psalm tune is of small importance, but as it is the representative of what was once the popular and almost exclusive Protestant music, to fix the era of the tune is of much importance in musical history.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The Complimentary Concert to our very deserving artist, Mrs. J. H. LONG, will take place at Chickering's this evening, and will be an excellent affair. Tickets enough were subscribed for early in the week to almost crowd the hall; it is to be hoped that "a few more" remain for others of her many friends and admirers. She will sing three of her best pieces, viz: Prende per me, by Donizetti, the Romanza from "Tell," and Mozart's Parto ma tu ben mio, with clarinet obligato. She will be assisted, too, by Mr. PARKER, pianist, and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who will play a Quartet by Beethoven, and favorite selections from Mendelssohn and Onslow. ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS is in town, and will give us a concert. MORGAN, the organist, and GUIDI, the tenore, have also some show of their art in preparation for us. Of the times and the seasons we are not yet notified.

So we are not to have "Eli" again at present; nor anything else of the oratorio kind until Thalberg comes (about the middle of March). But there is a hopeful project on foot, fitly emanating from the old Handel and Haydn Society, of assembling the musicians from all about and holding a grand three days musical Festival in Boston, after the manner of those in England and Germany. Three entire oratorios are talked of, and perhaps concerts in the evenings. May we suggest that, instead of three oratorios (which only John Bull can digest in one week), one of the days be consecrated to Beethoven's "Choral Symphony"? It is due to the honor of Boston, after all the sneers provoked by our Beethoven Statue Festival, not to let another year pass without producing that sublime work, with orchestra and choral parts entire and on a worthy scale; and what better time could be chosen than such a festival, should it be brought about? Mr. ZERRAHN's last concert is to be given in the Music Hall, next Saturday evening; and what is more, he has secured the great attraction of the German prima donna, Mme. JOHANNSEN, who will probably sing some fine operatic scena from Mozart, songs of Schubert, &c., (although the pieces are not fully determined.) The Symphony will be the glorious one in C by Schubert. Mr. Zerrahn's concerts have not yet begun to remunerate him; in going to the Music Hall and engaging Johannsen he assumes a heavy expense; and if these superior attractions in themselves are not enough, it is at least a duty which our music-lovers owe to one who has done so much for them, to give him a brim-full house.

Musical Matinées are getting into fashion in New York. Yesterday, at 2 P. M., Herr GOLDBECK, the pianist, was to give "Recitals" in classical and modern music at the Spingler Institute, assisted by Mlle. DE ROODE, OTTO FEDER and DOEHLER. . . . A play founded on Goethe's "Faust" has been produced at Laura Keane's Theatre, "with Spohr's music." "Who the deuce Jonathan Birch, Esq. (the person announced as the translator) may be," the Tribune "with its limited knowledge of American authors," does not venture to say, but does say that he has sadly burlesqued Goethe; and as to the music having been written by Spohr, the same paper adds: "We should not have thought it." By the way, Spohr's music was not written to Goethe's "Faust," but to a poor libretto by Bernard, a Vienna poet, founded merely on the old Faust legend, and first given at Prague before 1818. This play had the run of Europe for some thirty years. Possibly it is this poem, and not Goethe's, that now undergoes the Birch. . . .

At one of a series of those simple evening parties here called "Sociables," (the rule of which is that each family entertains the others in its turn in any mode it may devise,) we found that music was the order of the evening. Surely it is not often that at any formal concert we are treated to a programme quite so fine as this:

- 1—Sonata, for violin and piano, Beethoven
- 2—Two-part Song, Mendelssohn
- 3—Aria: Non di fiori, from "Clemenza di Tito," Mozart
- 4—Masourkas, Chopin
- 5—Songs, Robert Franz
- 6—Andante from First Symphony (for four hands), Beethoven
- 7—Songs, Schumann
- 8—Two-part Song, Mendelssohn
- 9—Songs, Franz
- 10—Sonata, in F, violin and piano, Beethoven

The execution, too, was worthy of the programme; our friend SCHULTZE was the violinist; all the rest was the contribution of young lady amateurs.

Our townsman, HARRISON MILLARD, is singing acceptably in Ireland, as will be seen by the following, from the Illustrated News:

MISS CATHERINE HAYES AT BELFAST.—Miss Catherine Hayes is on a tour in Ireland, accompanied by Mlle. Corelli (contralto), Signor F. Lablache (barytone), and Signor Millardi (tenor); and by Mr. G. A. Osborne, composer and pianist, as conductor. The Belfast papers state that Miss Hayes was enthusiastically received in that town. The grand scena and aria, "Softly sighs the voice of evening," was given delightfully, evincing by every note she sang the beauty, richness, and power of her voice in all its ranges. Signor Millardi then followed, in aria, "Bel adorata." Applause, hearty and sustained, rewarded this gentleman in his performances during the evening. After this solo Miss Hayes again appeared, and in her charming style sang "The Last Rose of Summer," which was encored. She re-appeared, and delighted her admirers with "The harp that once thronged Tara's halls." Mlle. Corelli next sang the cavatina, "In questo semplice," by Donizetti, and was warmly applauded for the sweet and agreeable style in which she rendered it. The first part of the programme was concluded with a duo by Miss Hayes and Signor Lablache, "Signorina in tanta fretta," from "Don Pasquale." After an interval of some ten minutes the second part of the performance commenced with a duo, "Vernatemi del vino," by Lablache and Millardi. Miss Hayes then sang "Home, sweet home," and, in compliance with an enthusiastic encore, she gave "Coming through the rye."

Of Mme. GAZZANIGA, the new prima donna engaged for the opening of the new Opera House in Philadelphia. Fitzgerald, who was present at a rehearsal (of Travatore), says:

She is (we should suppose) about twenty-eight—slightly above the medium height—her face is open, frank and expressive—her manners are easy, lady-like, and well-assured. At first sight, she is plain-looking, quite so—but familiarity with her countenance heightens its expression and enhances its interest. We should not like to express a positive opinion as to her merits as a singer—yet, we will say, that all our predilections are in her favor. Her voice is peculiarly and delightfully sympathetic—it is clear, fresh, strong, flexible, true—she has it entirely under control, so thorough is her cultivation. She sings easily, runs up and down the scale like a canary-bird, and she has very considerable compass; but it is not her voice, or her person, or her manner, that so entirely captivates—it is her sympathy with the sentiment of her author; she sings conscientiously, with much feeling and expression. Perhaps she is the most sympathetic singer we have ever heard.

This opening was to take place Wednesday evening, with Martezek as conductor; Mlle. ALDINI, (and not Miss Phillippa), to sing Azucena; BRIGNOLI, AMODIO, &c, in the other rôles.

Musical humbug seems to be as rife as ever. We have received the programme to a concert given this week in Lowell, by "Kirmazinga, the young Princess of Delhi," with a biography upon the back; the bill includes the Duet from Norma, by "Princess of Delhi and Lady of Lowell," "Star Spangled Banner," by the Princess, and a variety of pieces in which the names of Satter, Schultze, and various Boston artists figure.

Boston can boast by far the largest music-publishing establishment in this country: that of OLIVER DITSON & Co. Their catalogue (in the words of the Transcript) exhibits a list of upwards of 300 music books, and 20,000 pieces of sheet music. These are all of their own publication, and comprise Methods of Instruction for the voice, and for every instrument. Collections of music. Among the latter are all the best Operas, Oratorios, and Masses. In addition to these, their stock embraces the publications of every music house in this country. The house has been established for nearly a quarter of a century, and is enabled to supply numerous books and pieces of sheet music which cannot be found at any other place, and which are generally supposed to have long since passed out of print. This enterprising firm will soon erect a large and splendid store, specially arranged for their business. The site selected is on Washington street, three estates south of Winter street, and extending through to Jackson place. The location is an admirable one, and the establishment will doubtless be an honor to Boston.

The London Athenæum is concerned lest CLARA SCHUMANN should wear out her welcome to England; it says:

We understand, by a letter from Germany, that Madame Schumann intends to visit London again this year, and we fear with something like a fixed "mission," to habituate us to music of the broken-crockery school,—since we are told that of late she has gone the length of performing, in one of Mozart's Concertos, cadenzas written by Herr Brahms, which are described by a correspondent as "feverish, incoherent, and truly ugly." Worse taste than this, knowing as we do what the style of Herr Brahms is, it would be hard to imagine.

"Rara Avis" is the odd title of a new Literary and Musical Journal, published monthly at Portage city in Wisconsin. It assures us that a host of lovers of music are springing up upon the prairies. . . . We see our old "Germania" friend, CARL SENTZ, mentioned as the general director of the Philadelphia "Germania Orchestra" concerts. Mr. SIMON HASLER is the leader. The concerts, given by daylight, are very popular.

Advertisements.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

THE FIFTH AND LAST OF THE
PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,

Will be given on Saturday Evening, March 7th, 1857,
AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
On which occasion

Madame BERTHA JOHANSEN,
The Great Prima Donna,

Will make her FIRST appearance in Boston.

A limited number of single tickets, at $1 each, may be had at the principal music stores. Packages of 4 tickets, $3. Doors open at 8½—Concert to commence at 7¼ o'clock.
CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

JAMES W. VOSE'S PREMIUM PIANO-FORTES.

A SILVER PRIZE MEDAL
Was awarded for these Pianos at the last Great Exhibition in Boston, in competition with the best makers in the country, for their fine musical tone and perfect action. Also,

A BRONZE MEDAL,
For the superiority and beauty of the exterior. Every instrument purchased from this establishment will be warranted to give full and perfect satisfaction.

Warerooms 335 Washington St., corner West St.,
BOSTON.

WILLIAM GOOCH,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
AT JAMES W. VOSE'S, No. 335 WASHINGTON STREET.

COMPLIMENTARY CONCERT
TO MRS. J. H. LONG.

The friends of Mrs. Long have tendered to her a Complimentary Concert, which will be given on Saturday Evening, Feb. 28th, at Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. Mrs. Long will be assisted by the MANDOLIN QUARTET CLUB, and other eminent artists.

The few tickets remaining unsold may be procured at the new Music Store of Messrs. Russell & Richardson, No. 291 Washington Street. Price One Dollar each.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,
At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1857. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERRAHN,.....Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.
Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts. To be had at the music stores of E. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.
Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 3 o'clock.

Will soon be Published:

COOKE'S CELEBRATED METHOD OF SINGING. A new and improved edition.
INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE GERMAN CONCERTINA, with a Collection of popular music arranged for that instrument.
In Press: INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE ENGLISH CONCERTINA.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

S. B. BALL,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,

Rooms at Rev. A. A. Miner's Church, School Street, Boston.

NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

THE next term of this highly successful Institution will commence in North Reading, Mass., on Wednesday, the third day of June next, and continue twelve weeks. Its object is the preparation of teachers for various positions in the musical profession, and thorough instruction and training in the theory and practice of the art.

Circulars, giving particulars, may be obtained free of expense, by addressing Normal Musical Institute, North Reading, Mass.
Feb. 7. 6t
LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY
FOR THE DIFFUSION OF
MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:
VOLUME VII.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation
and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME VIII.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples by Thomas Pickering.—(Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 13. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 63
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 63
- " 3. Fétils on Choir and Chorus Singing.....88
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Catel's Treatise on Harmony.....63
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction. Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards,.....2 63

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,
389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Piano-Forte Instruction.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 66 HANCOCK STREET.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.

J. H. HIDLEY,

PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,

And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,

544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square

PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,
(Near Boylston Market.)

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

Apr 29

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmonium,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 38 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.,
Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.

WILLIAM SCHULTZE,
GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO-FORTE,
and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
NO. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. — Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 257.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 23.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, 291 Wash'n St. "
" OLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

THE POWER OF SONG.

A TRANSLATION FROM SCHILLER.*

From rocky cleft the torrent dashes,
Down, down he comes with thunder-shock;
The sturdy oak beneath him crashes,
And after rolls the loosened rock.
Amazed, o'erjoyed, with awe and wonder
The traveller stops and gazes round;
He hears the all-pervading thunder,
But cannot tell from whence the sound.
So rolls the tide of Song, forever,
Where mortal foot hath wandered never.

Leagued with the dreaded Powers above us,
Who darkly spin life's slender thread,
Who can resist his power to move us?
Who can the singer's spell evade?
He Hermes' magic wand inherits,
And charms the heart with influence soft
Down to the realm of tortured spirits,
Or bears it heavenward aloft,
On Fancy's airy ladder reeling,
Swayed to and fro with giddy feeling.

As when into the scenes of pleasure
Some dread disaster stalks along,
With giant-like, unearthly measure,
And scatters terror through the throng:
He strips at once the gay delusion—
This stranger from the other world;
The masks fall off in dire confusion;
Earth's greatness to the ground is hurl'd;
And before Truth's all-conquering mirror
Withers each work of sin and error;—

So, every earthly burden spurning,
Man's thoughts at Music's bidding rise;
And, with immortal ardor burning,
With godlike tread he walks the skies.
The Gods as one of theirs embrace him;
There must his daily troublers sleep;
Thither no destiny can chase him,
Thither no earthly thing may creep:

* From "Select Minor Poems of Goethe and Schiller," translated by J. S. DWIGHT.

His brow is smooth, no fear alarms him,
He knows no care while music charms him.

And as the boy, with hopeless longing,
When stolen freedom yields no rest,
But home-thoughts to his heart keep thronging,
Flies to his injured mother's breast;
So Music has the power to charm us,
When turn'd from Nature's simple truth;
From cold and foreign ways to warm us,
With the old feelings of our youth.
In Nature's arms, O! then we rest us,
Where freezing forms may ne'er molest us.

Translated for this Journal.

Mozart's Requiem.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

(Concluded from last week.)

The Offertorium, that is, the prayer, which in a Latin mass immediately precedes the taking of the bread and wine, Mozart has divided into two pieces: Domine Jesu Christe and Hostias, each concluding with a fugue upon the words: Quam olim Abraham. The Abbé Stadler has told us that it was a traditional practice among the Catholic masters to treat this part of the text in the form of a regular Fugue, and the Requiem of Cherubini also shows us that it is customary to repeat this Fugue at the close of the Offertorium.

No. 8. The Domine,* so mournfully, evangelically and majestically commenced by the chorus voices, but with imitations in the orchestra, (Andante, G minor) presents a constant accumulation of ideas, and passes decidedly into the fugued style in the verse: Ne absorbeat eas Tartarus, with a vigorous accompaniment in sixteenths, to serve as counter-subject to the voice parts. Upon this chorus follows a wonderful quartet of solo singers, which also is regularly fugued, but upon another theme, which leads on step by step to the no less wonderful Fugue upon Quam olim,

* Text to No. 8:

Domine Jesu Christe, Rex gloriæ, libera animas omnium fidelium defunctorum de pœnis inferni et de profundo lacu.

Libera eas de ore Leonis. Ne absorbeat eas Tar-turus, ne cadant in obscurum;

Sed signifer sanctus, Michael, repræsentet eas in lucem sanctam,

Quam olim Abrahamæ promisisti, et semini ejus.

Lord Jesus Christ, King of glory, liberate the souls of all the faithful dead from the pains of hell and from the deep lake.

Liberate them from the mouth of the Lion. Let not Tartarus swallow them, let them not fall into the dark;

But let the holy standard-bearer, Michael, present them into the holy Light,

Which thou didst promise formerly to Abraham and to his seed.

whose commencement is marked by the coming in of the trombones. It is usual to change the Andante here prescribed into an Allegro moderato, and I believe with reason. It would be hard for the performers to prevent being somewhat carried away by the sweep and extraordinary fire of this Fugue, which is the most imposing and pathetic of all the church fugues that I know. The counter-subject is worked up in the orchestra with immense vigor; the theme, contained within two bars of the voice parts, is in fact nothing but a redoubled exclamation: Quam olim Abrahamæ! Promisisti! The development is as simple as possible; but observe with what art, what genius the subject in the vocal bass (bars 15 and 28) is more immediately calculated to call forth the most touching answers in the upper voices, and how the simple thought of the song and the instrumentation fill out the Fugue without any interruption. It is one whole; the details are not observed; a stream of fervent inspiration, which bears one irresistibly along with it, and then instantly disappears.

No. 9. The *Hostias is a Larghetto in E flat major, distinguished not only by the wonderfully beautiful melody of its choral song, but also by its excellent, we might say, pious choice of chords. One cannot imagine a more devoutly Catholic, a more holy, Christian prayer, than this No. 9 of the Requiem. Palestrina would not have composed otherwise, had he known all that he did not know in regard to harmony. But since the prayer of a mass for the dead must always distinguish itself in some passage by a certain something from all other church-like prayers, Mozart has intermingled the deep humiliation and composure of his Hostias with periods of a pathetic character and a more modern turn; yet since the instrumental figure adopted from the outset, a very animated syncopated figure, does not change, the unity of the piece remains untouched, in spite of the heightened expression in the vocal melody, which soon returns to its first steady movement, and ends with a pause.

I beg my readers to consider the passage of the Hostias criticized by G. Weber (23d to 25th

* Text to No. 9:

Hostias et preces tibi, Domine, laudis offerimus.
Tu suscipe pro animabus illis, quarum hodie memoriam facimus.

Fac eas, Domine, de morte transire ad vitam;
Quam olim Abrahamæ, &c.

Offerings of prayer and praise, O Lord, we bring to Thee. Do Thou espouse the cause of those souls, whom we to-day hold in remembrance.

Cause, O Lord, that they may pass from death to life;

Which Thou didst promise to Abraham, &c.

measure). It is sublime—no more, no less. How could he fail to remark, that what he has pleased (for what reason I know not) to reproach with unsteady movement, to-wit, that very common thing in vocal music, the leap of the octave, is never here the melodic feature which strikes the ear most sensibly? The reason is obvious. It is simply that the melody is here found in the orchestra, and that the instrumental figure, in traversing all the intervals of the chord, one after another, fills up the chasm between the octaves executed by the soprano.

No. 10. Sanctus. Here melodic design, harmony, modulation, instrumentation, all is grand, all is truly sacred within the few bars of the Adagio, and there can be no doubt that this number would have to be placed among the most prominent conceptions of the work, if Mozart had had time to develop the Fugue of the Hosanna.

No. 11. The Benedictus, (Andante, B flat, major) composed for quartet of solo-singers, and with a melody in itself but little church-like, returns, nevertheless, to the church style by the learned forms of its development. Whether the voices move alone, or in imitation, or in compact chords, they present the thematic ideas with wonderful variety and in an enchanting manner. Observe, for instance, that passage in thirds between the soprano and tenor; it is only a passage in thirds and sixths; yet it extorts a cry of admiration. Throughout the whole the Benedictus is a prayer of soft and touching solemnity, a work of uniform grace, and an admirable masterpiece of polyphonic style. That would be a great deal to say of Süßmayer.

No. 12. In the Agnus Dei, the twelfth and last number, (Larghetto, D minor) we recognize the master in invention, and indeed still better than we have recognized him in the preceding piece in the working up. Who but Mozart could have invented this sublime figure of the accompaniment, in which are expressed all the majesty of the temple in its days of grief and mourning, all the grandeur of a parting which religion has sanctified? Who else in the world, but the composer who wrote under the inspirations of death itself, would have found out the four-voiced passage: Dona eis requiem, and the ritornel that follows? The angels, as conductors of souls, seem in this prayer to pray for them.* One were fully justified in saying, with the intelligent and learned critic, Marx, of Berlin, that "if Mozart did not make the Agnus, then whoever has made it must without doubt be Mozart."

How singular! we repeat again. Süßmayer, who gives himself out as the composer of the Sanctus, a sublime composition in the ten measures of the Adagio—of the Benedictus, a wonderful composition, to say the very least, and of the Agnus, an angelic or even divine composition—Süßmayer avoids developing the Fugue of the Hosanna, whose majestic subject he twice introduces, and he arrives at the verse of the Agnus: Et lux æterna luceat eis (where a new piece should have commenced, according to the plan adopted for the division of the text). Does Süßmayer know nothing better to do than to take up No. 1 again at the nineteenth measure, and end the work with the Fugue of the Kyrie applied to the words: Cum sanctis tuis in æternam? I ask again, is not this the strongest and most striking of all conceivable moral proofs, that Süßmayer was very careful not to introduce a single thought into his work as finisher, or rather as enlightened copyist, which did not belong to the master?

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music in the Public Schools.

MR. EDITOR:—It must be gratifying to all who have at heart the advancement of musical science among us, to observe that the subject of "Music in the Public Schools" is attracting attention. A recent correspondent of the Transcript ("Educator") says: "That music may be made a study, most interesting and useful, there has been abundant proof in the Boston schools, in years past, &c." Now, weak and defective as the present system is, it would be difficult, I think, for "Educator" or any one else to prove any deterioration from the first. The fact is, from the very outset, the thing has been carried on without the slightest claim to thoroughness. A study it has never been. I propose to show wherein it is defective, and, for reasons which will appear hereafter, shall have sole reference to the schools for boys.

In the first place, so far as we can learn, the boys are taught without classification; that is to say, no reference is had to age or musical capacity. Voices pleasing and harsh; voices in tune and out of tune; voices of high and low compass; all are exercised at one time and in one room. By the combination of such heterogeneous materials, the equilibrium of pitch is destroyed; hence the rough sounds which smite the ear of the listener on these occasions. Again, the amount of time given to musical practice is wholly inadequate; this point, however, will be touched upon when we come to speak of the proper classification of pupils.

Perhaps the worst feature in the system is the character and style of music adopted by the schools. The words, too, in most cases are better fitted for use in infant schools and in the nursery. It should be borne in mind that the greater part of the music published in our day, is the veriest trash, in no way entitled to the name of music in its higher sense, and only serves to give to Art a downward tendency. In this category must be included such music as is used in our public schools. Let a person now go the rounds on "music day," and he will hear little or nothing besides a succession of worn out Ethiopian melodies, extracts from operas, and nursery songs of so infantile a character as to insult the good sense of every intelligent boy above ten years of age. Dr. TUCKERMAN, in his excellent lecture before the Boston Art Club recently, commented severely on the wretched productions of modern psalm-book makers. His remarks may apply with equal force to the Song Books both for secular and Sunday school use. Like the psalm-books, they have proved profitable to their compilers, but to the community a stumbling-block and to musicians foolishness. Supposing that any other branch of study, say Arithmetic, were reduced to this low standard, the progress of our children might end with the solution of a few infantile puzzles.

It is safe to say that not one boy in twenty, on leaving school, can reply correctly to the simplest questions in musical theory; much less can he sing the plainest passage by note. Such a result as this reflects discredit upon all concerned. Let us apply the first remedy,—that of classification; and to render the expediency of such classification the more obvious, let us consider one out of a multitude of instances which might be pointed out under the present arrangement. Here are two boys occupying adjacent seats and perhaps singing from one book. In the face of the one, the physiognomist discovers traces of a spiritual organization and refinement of emotion wholly wanting in the other. Let him station himself near these boys, and, if he listens attentively, he will find that external appearances have not deceived him. To speak plainly, one of them has a "musical ear;" the other has not. The result is, a continual contest between true and false intonation. The evil effect of all this is, to blunt the finer sensibilities of the former individual, while the latter, (being unconscious of his error) is hardly susceptible of improvement, for musicians well know that if a person has a radically deficient "ear," no amount of training will make him a reliable singer.

Having shown that the present indiscriminate method is productive of evil, while it presents no advantages, I will suggest a method of classification. First of all, the music teacher should take the name of every boy in school under twelve years of age who, upon trial, gives evidence of extraordinary musical capacity. Here it should be remarked that the plan of limiting the musical exercises to the higher classes is incorrect, particularly as regards the first class, where boys are supposed to have arrived at an age which leaves but little time for cultivation before the change of voice takes place, which is generally at fifteen. Observation and experience indicate that, out of two hundred pupils, he would find about thirty who would come up to the mark. He should then consult their wishes, and those only who are strongly inclined to devote special attention to the cultivation of music as a science should be retained. This second process would most likely reduce his class to about twenty, a very convenient number. This class should practice one hour daily, separate from the rest of the school. Should musical exercises still be carried on promiscuously with the whole school as at present, (a matter of but little importance one way or the other) the boys composing the select class just described, should be excused from attendance.

This brings us to the subject of a proper textbook. The defects of those now in use have been already shown. A book designed for thorough instruction should first contain a vast number of carefully prepared solfeggi, embodying almost every conceivable melodic movement in all the keys up to, at least, five sharps and flats. To be sufficiently copious, this collection should furnish five hundred exercises of at least sixteen bars each. And it should be the duty of the teacher to avoid, as much as possible, assisting his pupils by thumping out the melody upon the piano. So long as learners are allowed to rely upon such aid, they will never make independent readers. If the exercises are well adapted, the lower harmony (omitting the vocal note) will, after a few lessons, suffice for an accompaniment. In a short time under such training, boys will make great progress in reading music,—an accomplishment which they acquire much more rapidly than persons, of mature years. In addition to these solfeggi, this book should contain some substantial compositions by the best masters, from the practice of which pupils might obtain ideas of style, not to be expected from mechanical exercises alone. Give all popular melodies and operatic sentimentalisms "a wide berth." It is needless to say that no such work as above described for school use, is in existence, for the reason that under the present defective system there has been no demand for it. Let us take a high view of this matter. Let us take the ground that, if the science of music is worthy of any attention in our public schools—if the study and practice of it exerts upon the youthful mind those benign influences usually attributed to it, it is worthy of thorough treatment. In another article I shall endeavor to show some of the advantages which might occur to those youth who, being musically gifted, are encouraged and aided in the study of the science, with special reference to the music of the Episcopal Church.

* The idea that angels bear the souls of the departed to God, is expressed in the Offertorium: Sed signifer sanctus Michael representet eas in lucem sanctam.

PRECENTOR.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 2.—It was gratifying to see Dodworth's Saloon actually full, for once, at EISELDE's last concert—whether the reason lay in the fine weather or in the attraction presented by the name of Miss DE ROODE upon the programme, I cannot tell; enough that the audience was large, and appreciative too. We had Beethoven's Quintet, No. 4, well played and full of beauties, of course; Schumann's exquisite Quartet, in which Mr. TIMM took the piano part, and acquitted himself admirably, (in spite of his greater familiarity with the style of less modern composers,) and a Quartet, op. 17, of Rubinstein, which did not please me as well as the one which we heard last winter. The novelty of the occasion was the first appearance in public of Miss MARIE DE ROODE, whose actual debut at a private charity concert you will remember as having been chronicled by "Trovator." This young lady, a native of Holland, I believe, of pleasing, frank, unpretending appearance, is happy in the possession of a full, rich, fresh voice, which she knows how to use to the best advantage. Her singing of Haydn's "With verdure clad" was uncommonly fine, and showed plainly that she enters fully into the spirit of what she is performing. In Schubert's Ave Maria she was not so fortunate; there was not enough simplicity in her rendering of this composition, and a change which she introduced in the last "Ave Maria," was in bad taste, and seemed too evidently intended to show how high her voice would reach. I regretted, too, that she sang the French words, which bear a meaning just the reverse of the original, or the German translation; Ellen's Ave Maria in the "Lady of the Lake" being an invocation to the Virgin for the safety of her father, while the French words represent a mother praying for her child.

On Thursday afternoon we had another of young GOLDBECK's delightful Matinées, which I enjoyed even more than the two preceding ones. There has been an absence of pretension and formality, a social atmosphere about these entertainments, which have lent them a peculiar charm. This last one was more fully attended, being given, for private reasons, at the pretty Hall of the Spingler Institute, which holds more people than the parlors of a private house.

Mr. GOLDBECK gave us first, with Mr. DOEHLER, Beethoven's lovely Sonata in F, op. 24, for piano and violin. His part was very finely played, but he might have found a better accompanist, I think. Of two of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," Nos.

1 and 6, of the first book, he played the first entirely too rapidly, thus quite altering its character. Two new Aquarelles, "Souvenir de Chiswick," and "Brighton-Scène Maritime," (rather snobbishly designated as having been "composed for the Duke of Devonshire, and first played at Mr. G.'s concert at Devonshire House,") were not quite as pleasing as those previously played, one of which, "Moonlight Night," was repeated on this occasion. In the last Sonata of Beethoven, Mr. Goldbeck surpassed himself; I have never yet heard him play so finely, or with such religious earnestness. The beautiful Variations, the graceful Scherzo, the sublime Funeral March, which raises one to the skies, and the sparkling, dancing Finale, which lets us gently down to earth again, all were rendered with an unctious and spirit which I have rarely heard excelled.

The songs by the young artist, (which Mr. FEDER would have interpreted to more general satisfaction, had he omitted his usual very unpleasant grimaces and gestures,) were very pleasing. They were: "From thee, Eliza, I must go," by Burns, in which some fine modulations were noticeable, and two to German words, of which the last, "Zwiegesang," was charmingly fresh and original. Miss DE ROODE left nothing to regret in her performance except her indistinct articulation of her English words, which may be ascribed to her slight acquaintance with the language. Equally well with the air by Haydn, she sang Weber's Und ob die Wolke, and Mendelssohn's "Maid of Ganges." Her sister, who seems also a fine musician, played the accompaniments.

Mr. Goldbeck has been very successful in these Matinées, not so much pecuniarily, perhaps, as in what was more his object, becoming known to the musical public, and gaining a position in influential society. He is already a great favorite of the ladies, and has quite a number of pupils. To such earnest, striving, anti-humbug young geniuses, one can wish nothing short of the best success. May it be his!

I close my chronicle with the notice of THALBERG's last Matinée, or rather the last of the first series, which took place last Friday. On this occasion, we had a treat in Hummel's Septet, which was played to perfection by Mr. Thalberg, accompanied by various members of the Philharmonic orchestra. Only three movements were given, however, beginning with the third, followed by the Scherzo and Finale. The other pieces were the "Moïse," "Adelaide," the Tarantella, and the Norma duo with Wm. MASON, besides Masaniello and the "Last Rose of Summer," as encores. Of all these I liked the "Adelaide" by far the best. How beautifully it sings itself, and with what exquisite feeling he plays it! In the duet with Wm. Mason, I was pleased to notice how much the latter has improved since I last heard him. How could he but be inspired, though, by the honor of playing with Thalberg! Such "runs" as came from beneath the fingers of the latter, I never heard before. I could compare them to nothing but the sighing and moaning of the wind.—I have not yet spoken of one feature of these Matinées, the performance on the Alexandre Organ, and now I mention it only because it is a novelty, and not because I was pleased with it. The capacities of this instrument, as the programmes say, are the following:

"The power to sustain single notes and chords, while at the same time the most rapid and brilliant passages can be performed—the notes being sustained by mechanism, governed by the knees, thus leaving both hands free to manipulate; its capability to use singly, and combine the tones of the Violin, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, Bassoon, and the Human Voice."

But I regret to say that these wonderful attributes were all lost upon me, and that the music it produced sounded to me very much like a common hand-organ of unusual power. I hear, however, that Mr. Thalberg does not bring out its full force, not being as yet accustomed to it, and that there are persons in this city who can show it off to far better advantage. Nous verrons.

DRESDEN, FEB. 11. (From a private letter).—The "Tonkünstler Verein" (Union of Musical Artists) is the best association of the kind here (and S. inclines to think, in Europe). On the present occasion (a members' meeting, not public) we had a Sonata of Beethoven, played by OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT and Herr KUMMER, the first Cello in Dresden. Mr. G. has improved wonderfully since he was in the United States, and the performance was such as to elicit the warmest approbation from this most critical audience. A week later at the same place, a Trio of Beethoven, with Goldschmidt, Kummer and Külveck, and a most singular composition of Bach's, written for strings, horns and reeds, and performed with a gusto which would enchant you, by, I think, eighteen instruments. That evening was closed (the musical part of it) by some of Chopin's preludes by Goldschmidt, charmingly played, but not equal to Dresel. The materials for fine concerted music in Dresden are probably not surpassed in Europe. At least this fact is confidently and constantly asserted by dilettante travellers, and of course stoutly maintained by residents.

The charm of the place to music-lovers of moderate means, is the frequency of cheap concerts of a high order; and as these constitute a marked feature of Dresden life, I will give you some account them at the risk of repeating what you may have heard from others. These concerts generally commence at 3, 4 or 5 P. M. The exploiteurs of them are the owners or lessees of large coffee-houses; and music is thus very judiciously made the bait to attract a full coffee-room, and it always succeeds. So the price is put very low—2½ groschen, (6¼ cents), and every person is expected to call for something to drink or eat, or both. We will take the "Link'sches Bad," it being the best, to display this feature of German life. This establishment is a little over a mile from the Elbe, in the section of the city called the Neustadt. The coffee-room is a very large and fine room. I estimated the size by the eye, and made it 110 by 60, and 30 high. In the middle of one side is a semi-circular depression, or renforcement, in the wall, of about 12 feet arc, raised three feet above the level of the floor, and accommodating twenty-six to thirty musicians. Distributed all over the floor of this great room are plain cherry square tables of two sizes, accommodating six and twelve persons respectively. I generally arrive there on Thursday at about 5 o'clock, the hour of commencement, pay my 2½ groschen to a man who stands in the ante-room with a china plate full of change and a pile of programmes, printed in the simplest and cheapest style. I have a stranger with me to-day, and, taking our programmes, we pass on to enter a door on the left, which brings us into a room some twenty-five feet square, with glass partitions towards the hall, and wide-open doors into the same.

"Why, the room's on fire!" exclaimed my friend. "What a dense smoke!" "Only tobacco smoke; three hundred cigars must be expected to make some smoke." "But the ladies—how can those young girls of eight, ten and twelve to twenty stand this? They surely cannot sit it out a whole evening." "You shall see. Come, let us get a seat." "Seat? there don't appear to be one vacant in the room." "Oh, yes; don't be too modest; let us go up half way, so as to be opposite the orchestra. Kellner, give us two seats." The waiter looks about and presently sees one table where perhaps two more might squeeze in, and says a word to one of the occupants, who moves aside, without any of the French suaviter in modo, but also without ungraciousness, and we take two chairs and draw up. The waiter lowers his head to take our orders. "One hot punch, one café." "But hark! sh! What is that?" "Die Felsenmühle, Reissiger." "How admirably they play! The conductor is also leader and has no notes." "No, he never uses a note, and has the whole repertoire of classical music in his head. Whether he knows it thoroughly, understands its spirit, you shall judge to-night and in future. The applause is very hearty; now let us look round. What a singular scene!"

But, to drop the conversational, I will try to describe it. There are, at a rough estimate, 500 persons present; say 350 men and 150 ladies and girls. Three narrow aisles are left between the tables the whole length of the room. Every man is smoking; cigar in the mouth, American fashion; cigar in a pipe, or cigar in a mouth-piece, but no weed in pipes; at least I have seen none in places so respectable as this. You may perhaps fancy the denseness of the smoke. Every lady is either sewing, or knitting, or embroidering, and drinking either tea (out of a tall tumbler), or beer, or coffee; and every man has before him his great glass mug of beer, with glass handle and powder top (to keep the smoke out?) or his glass of punch, or tea, or coffee, or "Bishop," or "Cardinal."

The programme is divided into three or four parts, and an interval of ten or fifteen minutes between each two is passed in chat and squeezing up and down these narrow aisles. The orchestra disappears, the leader generally mixing with the company, drinking his mug of beer and puffing his cigar. The first and second parts have been: (I take up a programme at a venture from my drawer) 18th Dec. 1. Fest overture, von Jul. Rietz. 2. March from the Ruinen von Athen, von Beethoven. 3. K. K. Kammerball Tänze Walzer, von Lanner. 4. Friedensmarsch aus Rienz, von Wagner. II. Theil. 5. Overture zum Freischütz, von Weber. 6. Sonata Pathétique, von L. Beethoven, für Orchester arrangirt, von Schindeldeisser. III. Theil. Sinfonie, C dur (No. 7) von C. M. von Weber. IV. Theil. Overture to Zauberflöte; Arie und Duet aus Euryanthe; Frohsinns-Saloon-Walz, von Strauss; Viel Liebchen Polka, von H. Hünerfurst. But who is HÜNERFURST? Why, he is the very remarkable young man who conducts, leads, and has made this orchestra what it is. His musical memory is prodigious and he uniformly conducts without notes. I have seen him conduct and lead thus a great variety of music, among it Haydn's No. 7 Symphony, Beethoven's Eroica, and Nos. 2 and 5; overtures without number, of Mendelssohn, Wagner, Weber, David, Mehul, Meyerbeer, Hiller, Auber, &c. &c. He has much talent as a composer, some say genius. Monday afternoons at 3 he carries his orchestra to the concert room of the Grosser Garten, when there is always one symphony in the programme.

The "Brühlische Terrasse" is the third and only other first class concert-room café in Dresden. Saturday, 4 P. M., is the great day there; but the orchestra is not Hünerfurst's, but Laade's—very good, but second to H's. Here also, on this day is one symphony. So you see that we always have three symphonies per week, and frequently more. At the last public concert of the Tonkünstler-verein, the programme consisted of Sonata Op. 58 of Beethoven, for piano and 'cello, Weber and Kummer; Serenade, Op. 25, for flute, violin and viola, of Beethoven—an exquisite thing and played most superbly, and Hummel's Septet Militaire, Op. 114, for piano, flute, violin, clarinet, 'cello, trumpet and contra-bass. (Conclusion next week.)

MUSIC.—Every human feeling is greater than the exciting cause; a proof that man is designed for a higher state of existence; and this is deeply implied in music, in which there is always something more and beyond the immediate expression.—Coleridge.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 7, 1857.

We cannot do better than to give the leading place, in this week's Journal, to the practical questions so ably discussed in the communication below. They are questions of the greatest interest to every musical and concert-going community, to all our large choral or orchestral societies in town or country, and especially to the proprietors and managers of Music Halls. The problem of a good hall for music on a large scale, with large audiences, we conceived to be in the main satisfactorily solved by our noble Boston Music Hall; and so does the writer of the article below. For the audience it is good enough, it is a triumph—so far as it is possible to reconcile the seating of very large audiences with the best conditions of hearing and enjoying music; for it must be borne in mind that something of musical effect must, in any hall conceivable, be sacrificed in the accommodation of great numbers.

So far our Music Hall may be esteemed a model. But one of its internal features has always been regarded only as temporary and experimental. The whole present arrangement of the stage end of the hall has always had reference to a future plan of completion, in which a main determining element will be the grand Organ, recently contracted for in Europe. Meanwhile a difficulty, not felt by the audience, is felt by the singers and performers on the stage, as is accurately set forth below; and now comes up the question, the solution of which for the Music Hall will be the solution of it also for all music halls throughout the land:

How should the stage end of the hall be constructed? And how should choir and orchestra be placed, with relation to each other and to the audience, and to the most mutually inspiring, easy and effective discharge of their respective duties.

Our correspondent's hints are timely, as they are humorous and readable, and present some reasons which it will be hard to set aside. Now is the very time to solve this question, and get at ruling principles and methods. Just as the love for public musical entertainments is stirring and organizing itself in all the cities and large towns of our Republic, and music halls innumerable are being planned and built, it will be well for all concerned to give a little careful consideration to this topic. The stage of the Boston Music Hall presents a very proper point of departure for the whole enquiry; and we trust our readers in the country and in other cities will consider that we are not limiting ourselves to the mere musical interests of Boston, when we invite them to read what follows:

The Stage of the Music Hall.

MR. DWIGHT:—The matter then is fixed.—We are to have a Grand Organ in the Music Hall. It is a subject for rejoicing that the efforts of that gentleman, who has devoted himself so generously to this object, have been crowned with success. The erection of this instrument upon the scale proposed, will of course render great changes necessary in the accommodations—and want of accommodations—now existing in the Music Hall for the orchestra and chorus of our great Oratorio performances. Now, as alterations in the stage will be unavoidable, and as, if thought on the whole to be advisable, a complete change in its arrangement can be made without putting the proprietors of the edifice to extra expense, it is a favorable time to bring forward a topic which should have been thoroughly discussed before the plans of the hall were drawn, but which seems to have attracted no attention whatever. Allow me to begin the discussion by presenting a chorister's view of the matter. In plain, clear, unmistakable terms, the point to be considered is this:—

Is the stage of the Music Hall, in its fitness for the purposes of a great choral society, worthy of a gold medal as being of the worst possible construction, of a silver medal as being only very bad indeed, or only of an "honorable mention," as being bad enough in all conscience.

That it is bad, I think you would have a unanimous vote—in case the question were put to the Handel and Haydn Society—from Mr. Zerrahn at the conductor's "Pull," up to the unfortunate individual who sits some quarter of a mile away, hard by that musical door, whose hinges are sure to squeak when a particularly soft passage in the music renders such a tone particularly effective.

Well, then, the question is now open for discussion.

[Unfortunate individual near the squeaking door.—]Mr. President, before proceeding to discuss the topic before us, I will state that I shall move the award of the silver medal, it being actually within the power of my imagination to conceive of a worse arrangement of a stage than the present—as in case the stage descended front to rear, and we were shut up behind a screen, as the present organ is, for instance, so that our voices should make their way into the hall through cracks and crannies, as the organ's tones now are forced to do—for which doubtless excellent acoustic reasons might be given—though I can find none in the books. A screen before an organ must be an improvement if the tones of the instrument are very bad—just as the singing of a very bad choir sounds best if we have a thick partition between it and us. Since the musical reporters of all the papers have given the Handel and Haydn chorus much praise lately, a screen appears to be unnecessary for us. This by the way.

In support of the motion to award the silver medal, I lay down certain propositions.

First, the effectiveness of every sound, whether musical or not, depends in great measure upon the position in regard to it of the ear to which it penetrates. Sound is the result of the striking upon the organ of hearing of a pulsation or wave of the air, caused by the sonorous body. If the ear be in the direct line in which the tone-waves are put in motion, the sound is much louder than if not. Thus the report of a cannon, which will almost deafen a person at quite a distance in front, is easily borne by him who applies the match. Words spoken in the open air or in a large room, which are perfectly audible and distinct to a person some distance off in front, are not understood by one standing half the distance behind. You place a piano-forte upon the stage, and raise the cover, the tones reflected by that cover are heard more distinctly at the other end of the hall, than by a person on the seats by the organ. A person stands upon the edge of the stage and speaks to another upon the main floor; he involuntarily, by the instinct of habit, turns his face downward, so that the tone-waves proceeding from the mouth are directed in their passage between the lips in a line to the ear for which they are meant, and what he says will be distinctly audible to the person addressed, though undistinguishable to persons at half the distance in the side gallery or on the stage. If he speaks to the latter, he instinctively turns towards them.

Now apply the principle. You place a body of forty sopranis upon the stage. Every good singer in the exercise of her art throws back her head and shoulders into such a position as will give the best opportunity for the full and easy play of the organs of voice. The result is that the tone-waves, as they proceed from her mouth, have a direction upward, and the ear at a distance of a hundred feet, if at an elevation of forty feet from the floor, will catch those tones much more fully than at half the distance upon the floor. Now, as the good singers are the effective part of the whole body of the sopranis, we have the main body of tone thrown from the stage in a line to the upper gallery, and hence the effect is much better there than below. The difference is made still greater from the fact, that in oratorio singing the books held by the choristers act as reflectors to throw the tone-waves off in an ascending direction. A principal objection which I have heard against the Music Hall is an alleged want of efficient choral effect from large bodies of singers, which difficulty the strongest objector admits only applies to the main floor.

The inference to be drawn from all this is, that the volume of tone from a chorus is shot out above the heads of the audience upon the main floor—that is, that the stage is too high.

The stage in the Music Hall is actually more elevated than in any first class opera house with which I am acquainted, and yet the necessity which causes the operatic stage to have the elevation which is generally given, does not exist in a concert room—namely, that a place may be provided for the orchestra off the stage. Moreover, the stage of the opera houses into which I happen to have been is not above the level of any except the front ranks of the parquette, as the main floor of the auditorium invariably rises as it recedes from the orchestra. The main floor of the Music Hall is level. The famous halls of the Sing-Akademie at Berlin, and of the Gewandhaus at Leipzig both have level floors, and the stage in both cases is not more than a foot or two in height at the front and rises but very gradually as it extends rearward. At Exeter Hall the stage is more elevated, but the main floor of the auditorium slopes upward, so that the rear seats are actually higher than the stage, and the spectator looks downward to it. Thus theory, experience and example admonish us to lower the platform of the Music Hall.

Secondly. No true choral effect can be attained from a body of singers unless the separate bodies of tone from the different parts come out into the auditorium blended into a single mass, forming one body of harmony. Hence the great care which is exercised at the grand musical festivals and upon the operatic stages of Europe, to secure a certain due proportion in the number of choristers upon each part. But however nicely balanced be the tenors and altos to the sopranos and basses, and these to each other, if these various corps are so placed as to pour out their masses of tone so as to reach the auditor's ear as distinct bodies, this proper blending is lost. Now in the Music Hall a body of altos throw out directly to the front their part of a chorus; on the other side the sopranis are doing the same, while high over the one thunders out the base, and over the other shouts the tenor.

Thirdly. The goodness of a chorus depends upon the excellence of the individuals, and the power of the best singer to add to the musical effect depends in no small degree upon his feeling himself in time and tune with all the rest. To sing with ease, freedom and confidence, a person of nice ear must be able to hear for himself more or less distinctly the effect which is arising at the moment from the united force. This is the case, even with the simple psalmody of the meeting-house; how much more then in the performance of modern choruses, with their constant changes and modulations into all sorts of keys! Think, now, a moment of the difficulties the rear ranks of the Handel and Haydn tenor have to contend with in the choruses of "Eli." Perched away up upon the outskirts of civilization, with an organ behind them, shut up in a closet, whose tones are projected in straight lines through loopholes over their heads out into the hall, with the alti and sopranis, far down below and in front, throwing their voices directly away, with an orchestra so placed as to be inaudible in the choruses—these unfortunate individuals must get their pitch as they can and keep it if they can, utterly unable to catch, in a score of bars, one single full chord, which shall show them that they are in tune. People who have never tried this have no conception of it. Did the tenors have a leading melody to sing, returning often to the tonic, and getting now and then a new start from the orchestra, it would be comparatively easy to close a chorus in tune; but having only a part to "fill in," the wonder is that we do not always come out upon the final chord a quarter of a tone flat. Critical ears tell us we often do. Put twenty ordinary singers where they can feel the influence of the harmonic relations of the other parts, and they will produce a better tenor than forty fine singers, who must sing more or less by guess. If now at a performance of an oratorio you have about one in five who either have not rehearsed the music, or who cannot read a common psalm tune with decent correctness, your good singers, with all their rehearsals, have an awfully hard load to carry. Now to proceed—

[A Voice.]—Mr. President.

[President.]—The gentleman who cannot read music.

[The Voice.]—I wish only to move, that in the choruses the instruments play the vocal parts, as they do in country choirs.

[President.]—The gentleman is out of order, and it is moreover doubtful if even that would keep him right. The unfortunate individual will proceed.

[Unfortunate individual.]—To go on: The present arrangement of the stage, rising as it does in terraces running straight across, precludes any new arrangement of the chorus, and we must therefore go on as we are for the present. While rehearsing in the room below, we sat in the curved lines of an amphitheatre, and there was real pleasure in joining in a chorus. All singing in the hall, however, is a task wearying, unsatisfactory and laborious to a large portion of the society.

Fourthly. In oratorio performance in Europe the orchestra is supposed to accompany the chorus; with us the chorus accompanies the orchestra. The former plan is the composer's intention; the latter plan is an American improvement. I take it for granted, however, that the composer knows best, and as our stage furnishes no accommodation for the orchestra except in front, I present this fact as an argument for the silver medal. So far as my observation goes in Europe, the plan is universally adopted there of placing the orchestra in all vocal concerts behind the chorus. The consequence is, that the vocal force comes out full and prominent, as it should, both because it is in front and has fair play, and because it is upheld and reinforced by the sharp tones of the stringed and other instruments behind. When Jullien gave the "Messiah" in New York, the Sacred Harmonic Society filled the front of the stage, and the hundred instrumentists took the background. Is it not the clearest thing in the world that this should always be the arrangement? Does any gentleman refer me to the theatre as a case on the opposite side? The reason of that is hinted before, and the defect of having the orchestra in front is remedied so far as possible by placing it below the singer and the chorus, and making it face towards them.

Having thus opened the discussion, Mr. President, I shall wait to hear the other side.

[President.]—Will the unfortunate individual, before he takes his seat, suggest such improvements as in his opinion may reduce the silver to a leathern medal?

[Unfortunate Individual.]—In any changes in the construction of our stage which may be proposed, it must not be forgotten that part of our present space is to be taken up by the new organ. Now, whatever slope is given to the stage as we recede from the front, it should be confined almost entirely to the singers' seats, leaving a level platform behind for the orchestra. This rise of the successive ranks should be so gradual as just to enable each rank to sing above the heads of the rank in front. But instead of going into the matter myself, I will read the following extract from Berlioz, whose name should have some weight with musical people.

Before reading this extract, let me add, that we have now upon the stage, what, in relation to a choral society, is an unmitigated, unqualified nuisance. I refer to the statue of Beethoven, standing there in the centre. If the proprietors of the hall will only move that down to the main floor near one corner of the stage, I for one will vote that the Handel and Haydn Society give a series of subscription concerts to purchase a similar statue of mighty old Handel, to place in a corresponding position opposite.

Berlioz speaks as follows:

In general, for concerts, the disposal of the orchestra which seems best, is this:—An amphitheatre of eight, or, at the least, five rows is indispensable. The semicircular form is the best, for this amphitheatre. If it be large enough to contain the whole orchestra, the entire mass of instrumentalists will be disposed along these rows; the first violins in front, on the right, facing the public; the second violins in front on the left; the violas, in the middle, between the two groups of violins; the flutes, hautboys, clarinets, horns, and bassoons behind the first violins; a double rank of violoncellos and double-basses behind the second violins; the trumpets, cornets, trombones, and tubas behind the violas; the rest of the violoncellos and double-basses behind the wooden wind instruments; the harps in the foreground; close to the orchestral conductor; the kettle-drums, and other instruments of percussion behind or in the centre of the brass instruments; the orchestral conductor, turning his back to the public, at the base of the orchestra, and near to the foremost desks of the first and second violins.

There should be a horizontal flooring, or stage, more or less wide, extending in front of the first rows of the amphitheatre. On this flooring the chorus singers should be placed, in form of a fan, turned three-quarters towards the public, so that all shall be able easily to see the motions of the orchestral conductor. The grouping of the chorus-singers in consonance with their respective order of voice, will differ, according as the author has written in three, four, or six parts. At any rate, the women—sopranos and contraltos—should be in front, seated; the tenors standing behind the contraltos; and the basses standing behind the sopranos.

The solo-singers should occupy the centre, and foremost part of the front stage; and should always place themselves in such a way as to be able, by slightly turning the head, to see the conducting-stick.

For the rest, I repeat, these indications can be but approximative; they may be, for many reasons, modified in various ways.

At the Conservatoire, in Paris, where the amphitheatre is composed of only four or five rows, not circular, and cannot consequently contain the whole orchestra, the violins and violas are on the stage; while the basses and wind instruments alone occupy the rows; the chorus is seated on the front of the stage, facing the public, and the women sopranos and contraltos, turning their backs directly upon the orchestral conductor, are under an impossibility of ever seeing his motions. Such an arrangement is very inconvenient for this portion of the chorus.

It is everywhere of the greatest consequence that the chorus-singers placed on the front of the stage, shall occupy a plane somewhat lower than that of the violins; otherwise they would considerably deaden the sound of these latter.

For the same reasons, if, in front of the orchestra, there are not other rows for the choir, it is absolutely needful that the women should be seated, and the men remain standing up; in order that the voices of the tenors and basses, proceeding from a more elevated point than those of the sopranos and contraltos, may come forth freely, and be neither stifled nor intercepted.

When the presence of the chorus-singers in front of the orchestra is not necessary, the conductor will take care to send them away; since this large number of human bodies injures the sonorousness of the instruments. A symphony, performed by an orchestra thus more or less stifled, loses much of its effect.

[President].—The question is still open for discussion.

[Scientific Gentleman].—Mr. President, to all the learning upon the subject of tone-waves and laws of acoustics of the Unfortunate Individual, and to his arguments and conclusions, I say ditto. But I wish to touch upon an additional point or two.

We hear that the organ is contracted for; that it is to be a really grand, a very large and expensive instrument. It will then of necessity require a large space for its accommodation. Now if the instrument be constructed in a compact, square form, as is commonly the case, it must project towards the centre of the stage in such a manner as to leave two large spaces on each side, and remove our last hope of finding standing room for the orchestra behind the chorus.

It is quite the fashion, I find, to shut up organs in large closets; hardly a new church is built now-a-days in which this is not the case; so that it makes little difference whether an organ be good or bad, it has no chance to display its qualities. The first speaker mentions the tone-waves or pulses of the air, which give us the sensation of sound. If these waves or pulses follow at regular intervals, and amount in number to sixteen in the second, the sound conveyed to the ear is musical. The greater the number to the second, the higher the pitch. Now, precisely as a wave in a sheet of water diffuses itself from the point where a stone strikes, so does a tone-wave diffuse itself in the air. An open organ pipe, standing in the centre of a hall, throws these waves upward, and they diffuse themselves equally in all directions. If the pipe be placed at one extremity of the hall, the wave can only expand outward from the wall. If the pipe be in a closet, the expansion of the tone-wave can only take place after it has passed out of the confined space in which it is produced. If, now, an entire organ be compressed and jammed into a small space, you find its power and sweetness greatly injured by the want of room for the tone-waves to rise and expand unimpeded. When the full organ is playing, the jar of conflicting sounds, the mixing up and breaking of the tone-waves, is a natural consequence. The peculiar effects produced by the swell of an organ we all know, but who would have an organ all swell? No—we want the great organ to send forth its tones in their utmost fulness and beauty. Well, then, we want the arrangement of the new instrument such as will give it "ample verge and scope," and at the same time not encumber the stage, and prevent the best arrangement of our choral and orchestral forces.

Who has not noticed the difference of effect when a choir in one of our churches has happened to sing standing on the main floor, instead of being perched up in a lofty gallery? It is equally true of all music that it produces most effect when least elevated. Hence I would have the organ rest as near the main floor as possible. Again, to avoid disagreeable echoes, reverberations, and foci of sound, it is important that the surface behind the vocal force should be as nearly plane as possible. Hence it follows, that while, by spreading the organ as much as possible laterally, you give its pipes the best opportunity to speak, you get the greatest possible extent of plain surface behind the chorus. As, however, the greatest portion of this surface will consist of cylindrical pipes, with interstices between, it becomes of less importance to have the front of the organ a straight line. If, therefore, it should prove practicable to spread it widely, it might assume a slightly curvilinear form, say somewhat like our musical character, the brace, for the sake of attaining greater elegance of form. Thus:

or

[President].—Does any other gentleman wish to speak upon this question? A. W. T.

CONCERTS.

The Complimentary Concert to Mrs. J. H. LONG took place at Chickering's last Saturday evening. The room was filled with the most respectable and appreciative listeners, who seemed to take a friendly interest in a singer, who has made such marked and constant improvement of her powers, and who has served so faithfully and so ably alike in the church service and in most of our more important concerts. Indeed she has for some time occupied the position of our foremost soprano. Her programme was excellent:

- PART I.
1—Quartet in A flat, No. 5, op. 18.....Beethoven.
Allegro—Scherzo—Tema con variazioni.
2—Romanza from William Tell: "Selva opaca,".....Rossini.
Mrs. Long.
3—Adagio and Scherzo from the posthumous Quartet in E minor.....Mendelssohn.
4—Duetto: "Mira bianca luna,".....Rossini.
Mrs. Long and Sig. Corelli.
PART II.
5—Ballade, for Piano and Violoncello.....Moscheles.
Messrs. Parker and W. Fries.
6—Aria: "Parto, ma tu ben mio,".....Mozart.
With Clarinet obligato, by Mr. T. Ryan,
Mrs. Long.
7—Andante and Scherzo from the 34th Quintet,.....Onslow.

Mrs. LONG sang the romanza from "Tell" more beautifully than ever, Mr. J. C. D. PARKER accompanying at the piano with his usual delicacy of taste. The Air by Mozart exhibited her dramatic style to good advantage, and is an effective concert piece; the running bravura passage at the end was neatly executed, but in itself the least interesting part of the music. The clarinet obligato, in so small a room, finely as Mr. RYAN always plays it, stood out in rather too bold relief before the quartet of strings, as compared with the voice. But the great point of interest was the Duet, from Rossini's Soirées Musicales, in which Mrs. Long was joined by her teacher, Signor CORELLI, one of the very best tenors we have had in this country, whenever he has command of his voice. The uncertainty of that led him some years ago to quit the stage and devote himself to teaching, in which capacity he has been of incalculable service to the many voices that have been entrusted to his culture. It was long since he had been heard in public, and the pleasure that he gave was very great. A little hoarse in the lower tones, he sang, as he cannot but do, like an artist, with style and fervor; and on both parts the duet was capital and had to be repeated.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who kindly volunteered their services, performed the fine old Beethoven Quartet, with the famous Andante and variations, and the other classical selections most acceptably. The Ballade by Moscheles is one of the most fresh and piquant things that we have heard from that composer, and was interpreted to a charm. The whole affair passed off with spirit and was of just the right length to make all enjoyable.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS gave her concert (unfortunately for her own success and for many who would fain have heard her) on the same evening, at the Music Hall. The hall was hardly one third full. Yet had she the attraction of a nice little orchestra, under ZERRAHN, who played Reissiger's Overture to "Yelva," and a very popular Concert overture by Kalliwoda, with fine precision (at least the latter piece); of Mr. SATTER, the pianist, who produced a new Quartet of his own (for piano, and violin &c), founded on Goethe's "Mignon" (he turns all the poets to account), and a fantasia on Robert; of Signor GUIDI, who sang a couple of tenor airs from Lucrezia Borgia; of Mr. ADAMS, the tenor, and of Messrs. RIBAS and KOPFITZ, who played the English horn and flute solos in the Romanza from L'Eclair.

We were in time to hear the last piece of the first part, the duet from Tancredi, sung by Miss PHILLIPPS and Mr. ADAMS, which was an excellent performance. Our fair contralto looked and sang even more charmingly than in her last visit home. In the Recitative and Air: Che farò, from Gluck's "Orpheus," she evinced more taste, more finish and more fervor than on former occasions, so that her audience were delighted. Her voice is remarkably fresh, rich, musical and powerful, and has gained in flexibility and smooth, free delivery. We earnestly hope that we may soon hear her under better auspices. The success of a concert depends on management as well as music. This one was ill-managed, ill-timed, too long and confused in programme, and tediously delayed in execution. Miss P.'s other pieces, which we did not hear, were Ah, non credea (Bellini), an English Ballad: "My heart is breaking," and Prende per me (Donizetti).

Good organ playing is one of the things which rarely come to public hearing in this country.

Still rarer are the opportunities of listening to great organ music, the real classics of the instrument. The latter sentence perhaps states the want more correctly; for we have not a few skilful organists; and what is lacking is the chance to hear them where they have sufficient scope to make old Bach and Handel and the other masters live to us. Stated concerts of organ music, where only or chiefly the best, the legitimate organ music should be heard, we have long felt to be desirable and practicable. Let an hour or two each week be set apart; let the place be wherever there is a fine organ (perhaps going from one to another in rotation); let there be a very small fee of admittance; and let the best organists in the city combine, or take their turns, in playing to us these noble compositions, until we begin to find out what great organ music is.

Meanwhile we think it a chance too good to be missed, when such an organist as Mr. MORGAN, of New York, makes us a flying visit, to play in public on the great Tremont Temple organ. To be sure there is a little more of the organ virtuoso character about him than we care for, and the display of his own remarkable executive agility in putting the many-voiced monster through its paces in all sorts of music, occupies a large place amid his more sober classical interpretations. He plays in one moment a grand Fugue of Bach, and in the next "extemporizes" on the "Anvil Chorus," illustrating the clap-trap tendency of the times, which does not allow one place or instrument to be sacred from the invasion of the most hacknied triviality. But that Mr. Morgan is a most admirable performer and a good musician we do not need to say. We do not know his equal, taking all things together, in this country. He is master of all the resources of the instrument, and when he comes he gives us not a few good fugues and choruses, besides the overtures, fantasias, variations, &c., that catch the ear of those who go to wonder and to be amused.

His two concerts at the Temple on Tuesday afternoon and evening were excellent, although the programmes would not have suffered by some pruning. We only regretted to see so very small an audience; people knew not what they lost. More clearly than ever were we impressed by the fact that the effect of the full organ suffers from its muffled position behind that screen, as perhaps also by the want of a larger space in which to vibrate. In crowded harmonies, as in that Mendelssohn Sonata, the sound was confused; all was more clear and intelligible in the Bach Fugue in G minor.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION gave us for the eighth Afternoon Concert Beethoven's delicious, joyous, imaginative Eighth Symphony. It was highly enjoyed no doubt by many of the crowd present; but for the first time in our recollection the Allegretto failed to command a repetition. That, however, was the fault of the audience, and not of the symphony or orchestra. The well-known Allegretto from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the overture to Zanetta, Waltzes, &c., filled out the programme. The Afternoon Concerts are decidedly popular.

Musical Chat-Chat.

CARL ZERRAHN's Philharmonic Concerts make a brilliant finale this evening. The mere fact that this last one will be in the Music Hall, and not the Melodeon, adds a great attraction. But, besides that, he offers us a programme worthy of the Music Hall. We are to hear that glorious Symphony in C, by Schubert, once more, after a couple of years rest; we could anticipate nothing with more satisfaction. Then there will be a new Fest-Overture, by Julius Rietz; the Tannhäuser Pilgrim Chorus again, and the overture to "Tell." Besides which, we are to listen for the first time to the distinguished prima donna of the late German Opera in New York, Mme. JOHANNSEN, who will sing the Scena from Freyshütz, which it is said she does better than anybody who has sung it here since Jenny Lind; also a song of Schubert's, Volklied, and a Waltz di bravura, by Benzano. The Transcript tells us, that this lady is the daughter of a distinguished clergyman in the Duchy of Holstein, where she was born.

She travelled in Germany four years as a concert singer, and was received with immense enthusiasm. She also sang at the Royal Theatre of Berlin, where she met with the greatest success. In the general style of her singing she is more like Jenny Lind than any other artiste now before the public; at least, such is the opinion of the best European critics. The compass of her voice is very large, and the ease with which she manages it prevents the attention of the hearer from being directed to the execution rather than to the expression.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB in their concert next Tuesday (the last of the eight!) will have the aid of Mr. KREISSMANN, who will sing songs by Schubert and Robert Franz. Mr. HAMANN, too, will play in a Beethoven Trio.... The German "ORPHEUS" will sing again next Saturday evening, when they will give the old Vaterlands hymn, and when Miss DOANE will sing an Aria from Mozart, new to Boston audiences, and with Mr. Kreissmann a duet from Fidelio. We have heard the wish expressed by not a few, that the "Orpheus" would take a larger hall; others would like to share the pleasure.... Mozart's Requiem, with a selection of other Catholic music, will soon be performed in the Tremont Temple, by the choir of the Cathedral in Franklin street, assisted by other Catholic choirs, under the direction of Mr. A. WERNER. Particulars hereafter.... A general resort of all the musical people for the week past has been the magnificent new store of our old friends RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, of which a description will be found below. It is the largest, most elegant, and most completely furnished establishment of the kind in America, if not in the world. The union of the stocks of the two old firms makes a collection of music and instruments, in which almost every one can find his want supplied. Promptness, obliging courtesy and good order are the rule and habit of the place. Success to them! Such enterprise deserves it.

Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" was read in her inimitable manner by Mrs. FANNY KEMBLE, before a private audience at Chickering's, on Thursday Evening, with Mendelssohn's music, under the direction of OTTO DRESSEL. The overture and other instrumental parts were played upon a Chickering Grand by Messrs. Dresel and Trenkle, and the fairy choruses were sung by a Club of lady amateurs. It was indeed a most rare and delightful entertainment; but private as it was, we cannot help alluding to one gross disturbance, which exemplifies the manners of "fine society." Several times the commencement of the music proved a signal for quite loud and general talking. The unconscious insult to the music, the performers, and to those who wished to listen and enjoy poem and music as one whole, (according to the intention of Mrs. Kemble's invitation,) was unworthy of a well-bred audience. The same feat is to be given publicly in the Music Hall, Saturday evening, the 21st, before the Mercantile Library Association, and with an orchestra directed by CARL ZERRAHN.

Advertisements.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's EIGHTH (and last) CONCERT

Will take place on Tuesday Evening, March 10th, at Messrs. CHICKERING'S Rooms, assisted by Messrs. AUGUST KREISSMANN, Vocalist, and AUGUST HAMANN, Pianist.

A fine programme will be given. Half package of four Tickets, to be used at pleasure, $2.50; Single tickets $1 each, may be found at the music stores.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

THE FIFTH AND LAST OF THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,

Will be given on Saturday Evening, March 7th, 1857, AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL, On which occasion

Madame BERTHA JOHANNSEN, The Great Prima Donna,

Will make her FIRST appearance in Boston.

A limited number of single tickets, at $1 each, may be had at the principal music stores. Packages of 4 tickets, $3. Doors open at 6 1/4 - Concert to commence at 7 1/4 o'clock. CARL ZERRAHN, Director and Conductor.

NOTICE.

The THIRD (and last) SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT of the ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB

Will take place at the

MELODEON,

On Saturday Evening, March 14th, 1857,

With the kind assistance of

Miss LUCY A. DOANE, and the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

AUGUST KREISSMANN,.....Director.

Tickets Fifty cents each. Concert to commence at 7 1/4 o'clock precisely.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS, At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1857. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERRAHN,.....Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.

Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts. To be had at the music stores of E. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.

Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 3 o'clock.

RUSSELL & RICHARDSON,

SUCCESSORS TO

George P. Reed & Co. and Nathan Richardson, 291 WASHINGTON STREET,

Importers, Publishers, Wholesale & Retail Dealers in FOREIGN AND AMERICAN MUSICALS, PIANO-FORTES, MELODEONS, BRASS AND ALL KINDS OF BAND INSTRUMENTS, ACCORDEONS, &c.

Every variety of Strings, and Musical Merchandise of every description, at the lowest prices.

A Description of RUSSELL & RICHARDSON'S New Musical Establishment, copied from the editorial columns of the BOSTON MORNING POST, Feb. 23.

"The well known music publishers, Russell & Richardson, have removed from No. 17 Tremont Row and 282 Washington Street, to a new store at No. 291 Washington Street, in the granite building recently erected by Mr. Burnett. Their new quarters, it is generally admitted, exceed in size and completeness of detail any similar establishment in the world. The store is 161 feet deep and 20 in width, 77 of the former being devoted to the retail business of the firm, and 75 to the wholesale. The intervening space is occupied for counting room purposes. On one side of the retail department are classed the foreign publications, while on the other those of American origin. In the wholesale department are their own publications and musical instruments of all descriptions. Admirable arrangements have been made for the sale of opera and concert tickets. The walls are finely ornamented, and the store throughout has been adapted with much taste to the comfort and convenience of visitors. An ample passage connects with Winter Street for the entrance of merchandise, and above are the rooms devoted to printing operations. A fine cellar extends for the same length of the store above, and here are kept the "heavy goods"—consisting principally of Prince & Co's Melodeons, for which Russell & Richardson are the New England agents. There is one excellent feature that should not go unnoticed—a large fire-proof safe under the sidewalk, and connecting with the cellar, in which plates of all their own music are secured against damage. The pecuniary value of this to the firm must be very great. We have thus called the attention of our readers to Messrs. Russell & Richardson's new store, for we deem an enterprise of this character a matter of public interest, reflecting credit upon the musical reputation of our city, and nothing tends more to a proper cultivation of the fine arts than encouragement to those who with a just appreciation of its beauties make it a means of livelihood. They are both young men of energy and experience, and their exertions entitle them to brilliant success."

JOE PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

FIRST PREMIUM PIANO-FORTES.CHICKERING & SONS

Have received the following awards for their exhibition of

PIANO-FORTES

At the Fairs of 1856:

FROM THE

Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association

FOR THE

BEST GRANDS, SEMI-GRANDS, and PARLOR GRANDS,

"For most decided and meritorious Improvements,"

THE GOLD MEDAL.FOR THE BEST SQUARE PIANOS,
THE SILVER MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST PIANO-FORTE CASES,
THE SILVER MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
BRONZE MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST SPECIMEN OF JIG-SAWING, BRONZE MEDAL.

FROM THE

American Institute, New York,

FOR THE

BEST GRAND PIANO, THE GOLD MEDAL.

FROM THE

Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society,
THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SILVER MEDAL.

ALSO,

At the Illinois State Fair,
THE HIGHEST PREMIUM,
A SILVER MEDAL.

This House was established in 1823, by JONAS CHICKERING, and up to the present time has furnished 19,000 PIANOS. For the exhibition of these Pianos in the United States and in England, they have been awarded—

Eleven Gold Medals,
Seventeen Silver Medals,
Four Bronze Medals.*WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.*JAMES W. VOSE'S
PREMIUM PIANO-FORTES.

A SILVER PRIZE MEDAL

Was awarded for these Pianos at the last Great Exhibition in Boston, in competition with the best makers in the country, for their fine musical tone and perfect action. Also,

A BRONZE MEDAL,

For the superiority and beauty of the exterior. Every instrument purchased from this establishment will be warranted to give full and perfect satisfaction.

Warehouses 335 Washington St., corner West St., BOSTON.*WILLIAM GOOCH,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
AT JAMES W. VOSE'S, No. 335 WASHINGTON STREET.*S. B. BALL,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
Rooms at Rev. A. A. Miner's Church, School Street, Boston.*EDWARD L. BALCH,*Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:*VOLUME VII.*Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation
and Orchestration,Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.VOLUME VIII.*Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.— (Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 13. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 68
 " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 68
 " 3. Fétis on Choir and Chorus Singing.....38
 " 4. Mozart's Sencil Thorough Bass School.....21
 " 5. Cotel's Treatise on Harmony.....68
 " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction.
 Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents.
 Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards.2 68

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square*PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.409 Washington Street, Boston,

(Near Boylston Market.)

A. NEWHALL & CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO THE LATE D. B. NEWHALL.)

RESPECTFULLY inform their friends and the public, that, having purchased the entire stock of the late D. B. Newhall, they will continue the business at the old stand; and having great facilities for manufacturing, they are now prepared to receive orders for the justly celebrated instruments of their predecessor, with all the modern improvements.

Their instruments will be made in the most faithful and perfect manner, as the proprietors themselves superintend the manufacture, and having had many years personal experience, with the late D. B. Newhall, in manufacturing Piano-Fortes, are determined to make none but the best instruments.

Persons in want of a superior article, are respectfully requested to give us a call.

Warerooms, 344 Washington Street.

ALFRED NEWHALL. JOHN R. MULLIN. NELSON S. REED.

Will soon be Published:COOKE'S CELEBRATED METHOD OF SING-ING. A new and improved edition.INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE GERMAN CON-
CERTINA, with a Collection of popular music arranged for that instrument.In Press: INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE ENG-LISH CONCERTINA.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

THE next term of this highly successful Institution will commence in North Reading, Mass., on Wednesday, the third day of June next, and continue twelve weeks. Its object is the preparation of teachers for various positions in the musical profession, and thorough instruction and training in the theory and practice of the art.

Circulars, giving particulars, may be obtained free of expense, by addressing Normal Musical Institute, North Reading, Mass.

Feb. 7. 66

LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,*J. C. D. PARKER,Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.*SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Piano-Forte Instruction.Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.*G. ANDRÉ & CO.,Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,*

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.*WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO-FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.*SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.*J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.*C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,Dépôt of Brard's Grand Pianos.*

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

J. H. HIDLEY,
PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.*GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late at St. Paul's Church.)
ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.*DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
 Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
 For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
 Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
 Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
 Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 258.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 24.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, 291 Wash'n St. "
"CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
"C. BREURING, 701 Broadway, New York.
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
"G. ANDRE & CO., 308 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
"MILLER & BRACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Susan Bedloe.

(From the Brown-papers.)

Her face—that is, in its features—was only pretty, not handsome, and yet it was lovely; but then she had the neatest little figure, the prettiest hand and arm, the beautifullest springy foot and ankle, that came of a Sunday into any of the meeting houses in all Hildale. Her father, the doctor, when she was an infant, used to declare that little foot a model of perfection in form; and who should judge rightly on this if the doctor could not? He did not live to see the promise of infancy fulfilled, poor man! But little Susan grew up, the hope and pride and joy of Widow Bedloe. Her boys went off into the world, but her daughter remained, her staff and comfort.

How different she was from all the other girls of the place! John Hath incurred the resentment of all the women in the town when he said that it was strange how all the education, intelligence and refinement of Hildale were confined to the Bedloes and the Norvals. This was long before little Susan was born, but as she inherited all the refinement and grace of the family before her, it brought John H.'s unlucky speech to mind. She was surrounded by such an atmosphere of delicacy and had so much of that charm which we express by the term "lady-like," as to attract the notice of every stranger who saw her at school or in the singing meeting. She was always cheerful and merry, and yet the most modest little creature you could find in a thousand. She never put herself forward, never had a thought of attracting admiration, but somehow all the best young men in the place were sure to surround her at the village parties and "sings," leaving for her the more showy girls, who sought to attract them.

She had, too, a quiet dignity, which was conspicuous through all the ease and playfulness of her manners—perhaps too much of it, for the young men not only were thereby deterred from any improper freedom in her presence, but seemed to be impressed with a feeling that she did not quite belong to their sphere, and sought elsewhere, among girls whom they did not admire and love half as well, for helps, meet for them. The neighbors thought farmer Lendle's son, over the hill, would marry her. I think he would have proposed and been accepted if he had not shared in that feeling, and felt a sort of awe mingled with his evident fancy (a Shakspearean word) for her. But I can only judge from appearances, like the other neighbors.

Let me tell you about Susan and Mrs. Smith, it was so like Susan.

Widow Bedloe's means were small; so Susan, when she was old enough, opened a private school for the village little ones.

Speaking of schools reminds me of a letter the widow once received, which she read and re-read with tears of joy. She had sent Susan to a school for young ladies a few miles from Boston, and kept her there until circumstances forbade her longer stay. But at the close of her vacation, after Susan's return home, came a letter from the principal, offering to take Susan again, free of cost to the widow, because of her excellent influence upon the other pupils! But there were reasons, honorable to the mother, why this offer must be declined.

So Susan opened her school, which was of course mostly composed of children of special genius for tormenting everybody, and such as belonged to parents who neither could nor would pay the tuition. This is quite the general rule with such private schools in country villages, or used to be.

Folks wondered how little Susan Bedloe could keep order, and shook their heads, but sent their young ones. But she did keep order, and I believe as much because she loved so to laugh with them and make them happy. Still she had her trials.

Now Mrs. Smith was a great, stout woman, with a face like a November day and a voice like a November nor'wester, who patronized the victim to the extent of two offshoots of the Smith family tree—bullet-headed, snubby-nosed little animals, always showing a variety of bumps on their crania, gotten from their mother, though not by way of birth or inheritance. These were sticks of a crooked sort, quite past being reduced to order and symmetry by Susan's usual gentle means; and at length the occasion came, when, with bitter tears, she applied what she really supposed to be corporeal punishment. The young ones, as in duty bound, exerted their nascent nor'westers to such extent as in them lay, and next day the poor little mistress received a visit from the awful Mrs. Smith.

Afterwards Mrs. Smith reported progress to Miss Jenkins.

"I gin it to her good, though," says mighty Mrs. Smith.

"Sarved her right, little stuck-up thing!" remarks Miss Jenkins. "What did she have to say for herself?"

"Oh, she didn't say much—believed it hurt her more than it did the children to 'inflict the punishment,' as she called giving 'em the lickin'; that she was obliged to do it for the good of the school, and all that. I told her, if my children needed anything of the sort, I wasn't afraid nor unwilling to give it, but that I wasn't going to have any little chit, to whom I am paying my money, slappin' my 'Dolphus and Dorindy. I got the steam well up, I tell you; but when the meachin' little thing began to cry and never said a mad word, I declare I couldn't say nothing more, only that I shouldn't send 'Dolphus and Dorindy any longer."

And so on and so forth.

As for Susan, she went home, and the faint flush upon her cheek looked a little as if she was provoked. But simply saying that she had had a scene with Mrs. Smith, which rather roused the good widow and almost called out a bitter remark or two, Susan went to her own chamber and sat down to a favorite book, in which she found something about a soft answer turning away wrath, and other matters of that sort, to be found in the said book. Then she came down again, with a face as smiling as a June day.

A week afterward, and tap, tap, tap on the door of Susan's school-room.

"Open the door, Johnny."

Little Johnny opened the door, and Susan's heart sank within her to see Mrs. November Smith enter with all her might and bluster.

"Arter what has passed between us," began Mrs. Smith, "as I told Mr. Smith last night, I ought to settle up with you for what time 'Dolphus and Dorindy did come. So here's the money. I guess you'll find it right."

"Thank you, Mrs. Smith. I wish you would not think hardly of me. I thought I was doing right when I punished the children. I don't think I spoke an angry word to them, and I am very sure I did not act in anger."

"Well, I guess on the whole you haven't done no harm. I jest come from your mother's, and she tells me she hasn't seen you mad for ten years, and that you go up stairs and read the Bible when you find yourself getting that way."

"Oh, Mrs. Smith!" exclaimed Susan deprecatingly.

"Now, Susan, the fact is, as I told your mother, that 'Dolphus and Dorindy are crying to come back again, and so I guess I'll send 'em again to-morrow. I told your mother too—she does look poorly, I vow!—that if you'd step up this evenin' to my house I'd send her a couple of quarts of new milk and some eggs; I guess she needs that sort of thing."

And so the Northwester got round and was succeeded by —"the sweet South,

That breathes upon a bank of violets."

Mrs. Smith called in upon Miss Jenkins on her way home.

"What a queer little bit of a thing Susan is!" said the mighty lady. "She cried when I blowed her up last week, and she up and cried again to-day just because I made all up with her."

And so soft, sweet, gentle Miss June conquered hard, rough, stormy Mrs. November.

Susan had just such a voice as one would expect from her—just that "excellent thing in woman," of which Lear speaks; and it was a delight to hear her talk, her gentle eyes interpreting all she said, now earnest, now sad, and now brimming full of fun. And her voice in singing was the same; not powerful, but "tuned to every merry note," or "bathed in tears," according to occasion and matter. When Hobson taught the singing school, his ear soon began to distinguish a delicate, sweet voice, generally "drowned out" by half a dozen other rough, untutored ones, but which did more than his violin to keep the rest somewhere nearly in tune, so true and unfailing was it; and this voice he at length traced to quiet, unpretending little Susan, who sat quite in the background and devoted herself to making the most of his instructions. Like a Cremona violin in an orchestra, such a voice is not conspicuous at first, but if you sit at a distance it soon makes itself felt through all and above all in its quiet beauty—a golden thread in a web of ruder material.

Village politics and petty quarrels are the breezes which keep little country towns from stagnating. They amount to nothing, and when the occasion is past all is forgotten, and the Smiths, Joneses, Barons and Browns are as friendly as ever. The singing school and the singers' seats in the meeting-house are almost invariably the scenes of discord in more senses than one. Now, what on earth anybody could find against little Susan that winter as a means of picking a quarrel, I declare I cannot imagine; but so it was.

Hobson was to close his school by a grand concert in the meeting-house, and, with the rest, Susan had a song allotted to her. When the others were supplied, and her favorite piece was still left, she of course chose that—something, I forget what, that just suited her voice, and to which she gave all the charm arising from her native refinement of taste and her thorough appreciation of the poetry. At the first rehearsal she sang so beautifully that half a dozen other girls were provoked that they had not selected the same song.

The queen bee of the hive, after proper consideration, concluded that it was just adapted to her powers, and Hobson was finally forced to transfer it to her, and select another for little Susan, which was in no way adapted to her voice, and which was in other respects unsuitable. Hobson, poor fellow, had to look to the favor of the powers that were, and Widow Bedloe and Susan were not of them. So the queen bee sang the song in a brass voice, to the universal hilarity of the neighborhood. Susan's brother, the college boy, stormed, but she did not. She simply but firmly refused to sing an unsuitable piece. As the brother and sister were walking home after a "sing" at which she had been shabbily treated, he broke out in no measured terms. At length he noticed that she was weeping.

"Ah, I am glad to see that you have some spirit left. Don't go near them again."

"It is not they; I cry to hear you talk so."

This was a damper on him. At the concert she sang no song, but exerted herself to the utmost to make the treble go off well; and everybody knew in their hearts that she was the sweetest singer there.

Widow Bedloe was member of a church in the other part of Hildale, and when Susan was old enough she joined the choir. It was a long and weary walk thither, up the back road and over the hills; but the storm must be severe and the mud or snow very deep which prevented her from bring in her place upon the Sabbath morning. She attracted no attention, singing her appointed part with the rest without display, in her own quiet manner, doing all the good she could and making no pretensions. But as time passed on, and one treble married, another left the seats in a huff, another moved away, and the like, David, the leader and sweet singer, began to find out what a treasure he possessed in that modest little lady. He could depend upon her. He knew she sat with him from a sense of duty; that it was a part of her religion to cultivate the talent given her, and use it in the praise of the great congregation. His ear seemed to follow the golden thread of her gentle voice, and to rejoice in its unfailing certainty. Could he have had his way—but his choir was composed of volunteers, and he could not—she should have stood next to him, as the leader of his girls. But she never sought this, and there were others who did, and so she still sat in a lower place, and exalted herself by her very humility. The congregation, too, felt the difference when Susan was unavoidably absent, though unable to define in what it consisted.

Our choir had its stormy times as well as others. Differences and quarrels between the singers, ambitious strivings to be chosen to the leadership on the part of some of the village Brahms and Rubinis, questions of first and second places among the girls, and other important matters, often seemed to bring the choir to the brink of dissolution. Once or twice the trebles left the seats in a body, save Susan, who to the surprise of everybody, carried the soprano part through two Sundays, not very powerfully perhaps, but triumphantly. She would have nothing to do with any of their quarrels. She took no side in any of the troubles, but came to meeting, went to her place, and sang to the best of her ability.

Now all this was a great source of annoyance to Miss Apse, a girl of strong will, strong voice, and rather strong auditory nerve, judging from the tones she could sometimes make and bear without flinching. But as the ears of the congregation were not very nice, she was esteemed a great singer and ruled with quite an imperial sway. But Susan thought lightly of her authority, and did her duty, whether Miss Apse did hers or not. And so she became the Mordecai of this Miss Haman. There are many ways in which the Miss Apse of a choir can annoy one against whom she thinks she is bound to exert her power. I need not specify them. She bore all patiently, had her kind smile ever ready when Miss Apse thought fit to greet her, and no one knew from her that any other discord existed between them than those which were made by the "head singer" in the exercise of her vocal powers. Such matters seem trivial, and indeed in themselves are so; but trivialities, after all, make up the most of the good and ill of our condition, and Susan felt these things keenly. But as she had hitherto lived down petty jealousies, envyings and strifes, and had become the thread around which all that was good in her companions crystallized; as the influence of her example was already powerful among them, and her character morally was producing the effect upon their feelings and manners which her sweet, unerring voice produced upon their singing; so she patiently waited for the opportunity of conquering Miss Apse, in unwavering faith that it would come.

Well, on a warm Sunday towards the end of summer little Susan was in her place. She sang sweetly as usual, but with difficulty, and when she reached the end of her long and weary walk home, she was greatly exhausted. The next Sabbath afternoon she was buried. I don't know when I have had such a touch of the heart-break as then. The bell tolled mournfully as the little procession moved into our graveyard, poor widow Bedloe leaning upon the arm of her son, the college boy, and his brother supporting the feeble steps of another widow, his mother's sister. All the neighbors were there and wept. Great Mrs. November Smith vowed it was "too bad in Providence to—" and here she broke down, and began to sob in such a manner that Miss Jenkins felt the influence and cried like a baby. The children cried for poor little Susan Bedloe, and the grown up people wept with the bereaved mother; but she and her two boys—their grief was too deep for tears. A cold storm of autumn was raging, and the widow stood at the window. The thought of Susan, as exposed to all its chill and cheerlessness, came over her, and then for the first time she wept bitterly—bitterly.

They told me that on the following Sabbath, when the choir rose to sing the hymn—

"Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb," previous to the funeral discourse, Miss Apse's voice first faltered, then stopped, and finally that she sank back into her seat, utterly unable to go on. One after another followed her example, and after a couple of stanzas the attempt to sing was given up. Whether this statement is literally correct I do not know; I was not there. I do know that never was a truer thing said than the remark of Mrs. Smith when she heard of the inscription which is placed on the white marble slab that points out little Susan's grave: "I vow, that 'ere text was made for that gal!" for it is this:

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

[From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung]

The Piano-Forte Compositions of J. S. Bach.

EDITED BY FRIEDRICH CHRYSANDER.

This new collection of Johann Sebastian Bach's pianoforte compositions, of which the first volume is now lying before us, forms part of the cheap stereotyped edition of the Classical Composers, published by L. Holle, in Wolfenbüttel.

This edition is intended to pave the way for a knowledge and appreciation of Bach, even among those who have hitherto been strangers to his art. It naturally does not interfere with the existing good and complete editions of his works, but it may assist in causing many of the incorrect editions, distinguished for the uncertainty of their authorities, and the want of knowledge displayed in them, to lose more and more of the estimation in which they are held.

We greet this edition with real delight, and tender our best thanks to the editor and publisher, since it was only by sacrifices on their part that they could offer the public so beautiful and correct an edition at such a price, one thaler and eight silver groschen* for a volume of 110 folio pages, printed on vellum paper, in large clear characters.

The predominating intention of the arrangement in which the pieces follow one another (with the exception of the capriccio in B major, on the departure of a brother), is an educational one: the pieces proceed gradually from the easier to the more difficult, from the simple to the more artistic. We doubt, however, whether this very judicious arrangement can be carried out in the subsequent volumes. In the first volume begin the twelve small Preludes, intended by Bach himself for "Anfängende" (beginners). These are followed by the six small (French) Suites, and the fifteen Inventions, with the symphonies belonging to them. The latter are here, for the first time, so arranged that each Invention is followed by the symphony in the same key. These pieces thus form the best introduction to the Clavier bien tempéré. The Invention, that is to say, according to ourselves, a thought, stands in about the same relation to the symphony that the prelude does to the fugue.

The Capriccio sopra la Lontananza del suo Fratello diletissimo is a curiosity for the history of programme-music, which is almost as old as instrumental music generally, although, in former times, intended to be more humorous than serious. It attained its greatest height in the "Battles of Austerlitz," etc., at the commencement of the present century, whereby it became ridiculous, precisely because it was meant to be serious. For the modern school, its revival was reserved by the doctrine of the purport of music, and whither this doctrine leads we have seen by lamentable examples. If the real masters of former times, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and even Beethoven, employed titles now and then, it was merely in order to intimate, generally, either the peculiar frame of mind by which the composition was suggested, or that which it was intended to inspire in the hearers. For this purpose, they selected a musical motive which struck them as suitable, but this was all; for this motive and its thematic treatment constituted the real and proper substance of the composition, which substance can never be aught but musical, founded on, and developed by, tone, and not on and by words and objects, or events. Despite the titles:—1—Flattering of the Friends to prevent him leaving; 2—Description of various accidents which may befall him, when away; 3—A general Lament; 4—The Friends arrive, since they perceive that it cannot be otherwise and take leave," old Bach departs so little from the contrapuntal—that is, the genuine musical—style, that he actually concludes with a fugue of two and a-half pages, all' Imitazione della Cornetta di Postiglione.

The cheapness of this edition will now enable hundreds, nay, thousands, who could not pay the high price of the former editions, and were obliged to put up with the Clavier bien Tempéré, incorrectly printed and costing five thalers, to possess the works of the immortal Bach. Let us but diffuse all the magnificent creations of the two last centuries, pure, unadulterated, with intelligible explanation, and in a form within the reach of every one, and the stupid dragon of the Music of the Future and Poetry-Music, which behaves so strangely, will be overcome without a struggle. We must, therefore, seize the opportunity, as we have so often done before, to make a most earnest appeal to teachers of music. The excuse, that the compositions in question are difficult to be obtained and cost a high price, exists no longer. The inexhaustibly rich Bach; the ever fresh Haydn; the thoughtful, and, oftentimes daring Clementi; the entrancing Mozart—are, at present, one and all, to be procured in cheap editions, just like the classic authors of German poetry. And when parents or fair pupils come and say, "Give us a very pretty piece to play in company, if you please," sit down at the piano, and play them something of the above masters. If you yourselves can play such a piece, your pupils will direct their minds to it of their own accord.

The editor—with the thankworthy assistance of Herr R. Zimmer, of Berlin—has given some very suitable explanations of the appropriate style in which Bach's pieces should be performed, as well as of the so-called "Manieren," and shown, in twenty-six examples, contained in notes written in full, how they should be carried out. This imparts a special value to his edition.

On account of their general interest, we conclude by appending the editor's remarks on the names, characters, and time of Bach's compositions, as the kinds of instrumental-pieces usual in those days have been almost entirely strange to us.

"1.—The Allemande possesses, as a dance, a joyous character; in Suites and Partitas for the piano, its movement is more serious and the harmony full. It begins the dance (or comes immediately after the Prelude) and is followed by Courante, Sarabande, Gigue, etc., in an order which is seldom disturbed. It enjoys the place of honor as being a German invention.

"2.—The Anglaise, an English kind of dance, is lively in character, varied and more or less quick in its movement.

"3.—The Aria is principally a vocal piece. Applied to an instrumental composition, the name signifies what we, at present, call a "Lied ohne Worte." The style of playing it must be melodious, and the time throughout slow. Mattheson says:—"It finds a place on the piano as well as on every other kind of instrument, and is, commonly, a plain, short, singable melody, divided into two parts, and one which mostly appears so simple, because the player can embellish and change it in innumerable ways, in order to display his manual dexterity, although retaining the fundamental passages." (Kern mel. Wissenschaft, p. 122). In the aria with 30 changes (vol. II., pp. 147—187), Bach displays something more than manual dexterity, just as, generally, in all that he undertook, he surpassed everything previously done.

"4.—The Bourrée is a French dance-melody, of a gay and choice character, in two-two time. It requires the execution to be light and round, not too quick. Flowing, smooth, gliding and closely connected. (Mattheson.)

"5.—The Chaconne (Ciaccone) is an Italian dance, in three-four time, and moderately slow in its movement. For further particulars, see Passecaille.

"6.—Concerto. Bach's concerto, vol. II., p. 102, is a pianoforte sonata, in three movements; the tempo of the last two is given; the first should be taken allegro moderato.

"7.—The Courante, in Suites and Partitas, always follows the Allemande. It requires to be performed in a serious style, the notes being played more staccato than slurred (Koch, Lex. 398). This, also, is a dance-melody.

(Conclusion next week.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music in the Public Schools.

II.

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I will now do as I intimated at the close of my first communication, and will speak of the adaptedness of boys' voices to the music of the Church.

"It is not true that every blockhead can be trained successfully as a Chorister." So says the learned Dr. Hodges. It is true however, that boys, selected with strict reference to musical aptitude, and subjected at an early age to thorough discipline in the science, may, and often do, attain, while yet boys, to a degree of skill hardly conceivable to persons unacquainted with the subject. Entire oratorios, solos and all, have been repeatedly performed in the English cathedrals by men and boys; the latter sustaining in a most efficient manner the part usually assigned to females in this country. In the music of the legitimate old church school, alla Palestrina, the voices of boy choristers are absolutely essential. The same may be said of the works of all the great cathedral composers, like Tallis, Byrd, Gibbons, Croft, and Purcell, all of whom, and many more, were choir boys in their younger days, and wrote for voices like their own. As an indication of this, we find that all correct Church musicians, even down to the present day, have avoided the extreme high notes of the staff and have confined themselves mainly to the range best suited to the voices of boys; that is from a compass certainly ample for all needful effects in church. The few musicians who have had experience in the matter, find that in point of flexibility and purity of tone these voices are unsurpassed.

In the European cities, schools are established and supported by government, with special reference to the encouragement of those youth, who, being naturally gifted, desire to become proficient in music. From these schools, the church singers are selected. The boys connected with the world-renowned cathedral choir (Dom Chor) at Berlin, are educated in a school of this sort. Music of the highest character is performed by them with matchless skill. If we trace the history of the most eminent musicians the world ever knew, we find that they began their career as choristers. Such was the case with Palestrina, Tallis, Purcell, Mozart, Handel, Haydn, Boyce and a host of others.

The project of employing such trebles in the place of female voices, has of late been made the subject of animated and, at times, acrimonious discussion. With the question of propriety simply, this article, has nothing to do. Its settlement clearly belongs to the clergy. The questions for the musician to settle are such as these:—Have we not among us much youthful talent which, if encouraged and brought out, might be turned to great advantage in the choral service of the Episcopal Church? Has not the adaptedness of boys' voices to the performance of true church music (not psalm-tunes) been to a great extent overlooked in this country? Are not the most efficient choirs in Europe those in which the treble is sung in part or wholly by boys? Now in replying affirmatively to these inquiries, we do by no means seek to exclude the many excellent female voices to be found in our choirs. Such voices are indeed quite sufficient for choir purposes, where no liturgical form of service is adopted. But in the service of the Episcopal Church, where the psalms as well as the canticles are chanted, a double choir of boys is a desideratum. When the Te Deum is sung anthem-wise, as set to music by correct Church writers, the treble cannot be properly sustained by women; for it should be remembered that English cathedral composers, when they write for the church, never write for other than male voices. The absurdity of attempting the performance of these sublime compositions with a single quartet I cannot better illustrate, than by relating the following incident from "real life" in one of our choirs. The worthy organist (a true church musician in theory at least) undertook to lay aside for a season a modern and flimsy production known as "Jackson in F," to substitute one of greater merit. The quartet soon found the ponderous harmonies of old Gibbons too much for them. The sturdy old composition was not to be "taken" by portamentos, sentimental turns, or by any other species of modern attack. The prima donna at last turns round to the organist in disgust and exclaims—"Oh, horrid!" The organist in his indignation demands—"Why, Madam, what is horrid, the music or the performance?"

* About ninety-five cents.

Boys are now employed quite successfully in many of the New York and Philadelphia churches. Among the number may be mentioned Trinity and the Church of the Holy Communion in the former, and St. Mark's in the latter city. The double choir, connected with an Episcopal church in our own city, furnishes a notable instance of the proficiency which boys are capable of making, with moderate application. These choristers assemble for practice daily for about one hour. They are not only competent to sustain the music of the church, but are able to sing, even at sight, anthems of a difficult character, and this too, without accompaniment; an achievement which but few experienced singers would choose to undertake. This, with a multitude of facts which might be stated as bearing upon the subject, proves the assertion made in my first communication, viz: that the ability to read music "at sight" is an accomplishment which boys acquire much more readily than adults.

It is true that a great degree of indifference exists with the public in reference to this matter. Many persons entertain the notion that such voices can never be made available in a style of music requiring finished execution. The stubborn facts I have just quoted, about choirs in the Old World and in our own country, will perhaps have a tendency to remove this prejudice in some degree. That such prejudice does exist, is not remarkable when we come to consider the specimens occasionally given to the public in the shape of juvenile exhibitions, where a motley assembly of two or three hundred children are taught to shriek temperance songs and juvenile oratorios (!) Whatever may be the moral effect of such affairs, the musical effect must be deplorable. And the time will surely come when a discerning public will consign to their proper rank those teachers who, by getting up such displays, degrade the standard of science to a level with their own abilities. Every science has its "professors," who seem to have no higher ambition than to popularize themselves with the uneducated masses. Such "professors" sooner or later fall to a level with the uncultivated tastes to which they pander. However, the standard from which they fall is not very high, and the damage to themselves from the concussion is but trifling.

PRECENTOR.

The Musical Critic of the London Times.

(From the London Correspond. of the N. Y. Tribune, Feb. 20)

The London Times is generally looked upon as the highest authority in matters concerning public opinion—in fact, for the majority of the Britons, The Times is public opinion itself. That it does not direct this opinion in politics, but simply reflect it, in accordance with the ideas and the material interest of a few capitalists, is a well-known fact. The writers are, individually, allowed to express no convictions, however serious may be the topic on which they are called upon to provide articles. They form a staff, obeying blindly the word of command. I will quote an instance illustrating the state of things which I am discussing. The musical reporter of The Times, Mr. Davison, is undoubtedly a man of great ability, and possesses extraordinary literary accomplishments. His style is fluent and charming, such indeed as can be expected only from the most brilliant feuilletonist. His pen was unquestionably a profitable acquisition for Printing-house Square. But on what conditions were his services procured? The Catholic legend relates that the venerable Bishop Saint Remi, who received the barbarous founder of the French monarchy, King Clovis, into the bosom of the church, while in the act of baptizing the royal neophyte, exclaimed, "Proud Sicander, kneel down; henceforth, burn what you have worshiped, and worship what you burnt." The Times, mutatis mutandis, is the Saint Remi of modern times, calling upon its reporters to burn, or, at least, to bite with the sharp tooth of criticism, whatever they previously held most sacred.

Before his conversion, Mr. Davison wrote in The Musical Examiner a number of essays which deservedly attracted the attention of all artistic circles. He was, at that time, a fervent partisan of the new romantic and the old classic school. Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Frederic Chopin were the gods of music, and Davison their faithful prophet. Armed cap-à-pie, in due Don Quixote fashion, he went to war, not against imaginary wind-mills, but against the "wealthy" Meyerbeer, of whom he said that "his celebrity was a paradox," against "the oily fatness of Rossini's green maturity," against the "ponderous Thalberg, whose musical position was a riddle for an Celipus to solve," and a host of composers of the French and Italian school. He wrote for Wessel & Co., the music sellers in Regent street, "an essay on the works of Frederic Chopin," "the mighty poet and subtle-souled psychologist," in which he called Messrs. Thalberg, Döhler and their "detestable tribe of empty followers," "harmonic knife-swallowers" and "crotchety turners of summersets." In one word, he then bestowed his admiration on composers of decided and individual genius, and did not spare his attack against the self-conceited children of mediocrity. The German school of music had at last found a devoted adept in Great Britain.

One day, however, or rather one evening, the tempter appeared in the person of a gentleman living somewhere in Queen square, and connected in some way or other with The Times. We are assured on good authority that the following language was held by the enticer to the gifted critic:

"You are a man of talent, and your musical reports would do honor to the columns of the great paper; but as Meyerbeer is in favor with the public, you must not attack Meyerbeer; as the Italian Opera is in vogue, you must sing the praises of the Italian Opera; last, but not least, The Times being an English and not a German paper, you must prove that Germany is declining and that Great Britain is about to shine as the brightest star in the musical sky. Are you now prepared to write on these conditions?"

Alas! Mr. Davison did not refuse, and is now worshipping what he formerly burnt with an inquisitorial zeal and fervor.

Here is what the French would call the secret de Polichinelle. This is the reason why the ingenious critic, who had declared Beethoven and Mendelssohn to be the most accomplished piano-forte composers that ever existed, who called Frederic Chopin one of the greatest musicians, rails now at the artistic claims of Paris and asserts that the decline of Germany is at hand. Great Britain forever and in all things, even in music. To parody Mr. Davison's own words, he is, in obedience to the proprietors of The Times, "a self-opinionated Englishman, who ejaculates, 'I am a Briton,' and is satisfied that to be a Briton is to be all that to be is worth." If, as he formerly complained, "the prevailing tone of the most popular music of the present day is unhealthy and vicious in the extreme," are we not entitled to attribute it to those numerous critics who, like himself, ever go with the tide? Ab uno disce omnes.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 9.—The Philharmonic Concert Saturday Evening attracted an immense audience, as usual, the Academy of Music being crowded to overflowing. The concert was singularly uninteresting, the following being the programme:

PART I.
Second Symphony, in C, Op. 61, (2nd time). R. Schumann.
1. Lento—Allegro con energia. 2. Larghetto.
3. Scherzo—Molto vivace. 4. Allegro, Molto vivace.
Aria, from the Oratorio "Creation," (On Mighty Pens). Haydn.
Mademoiselle Marie de Roode.
Solo for the Violin, "Rondo Papageno". H. W. Ernst.
Mr. Edward Mollenhauer.

PART II.
Concert Overture, in A. Op. 7, (first time). I. Riets.
Scenes and Aria, from the Opera "Oberon". C. M. Von Weber.
Mademoiselle Marie de Roode.
Solo for the Violin, "La Sylphide," [by request].
Mr. Edward Mollenhauer. Mollenhauer.
Overture to "Egmont," in F minor. L. Van Beethoven.

The Symphony received very little applause, and it was my impression that it deserved no more than it received. But when I consider to how great an extent trifling extraneous circumstances affect one's enjoyment of music, I hesitate to give you any decided opinion. A close atmosphere, a slight pain in the tooth, a crowded uncomfortable seat, a chattering neighbor, even mere bodily fatigue—any of these is sufficient to turn a symphony into a suffering, or a musical Paradise into a musical Pandemonium. Consequently I have nothing to say about Schumann's Op. 61, excepting that it put my next neighbor to sleep, and that its somniferous effect upon myself was with difficulty resisted. Of course, I could not thus appreciate it, for Music is such a delicate, ethereal spirit, that we must have all our faculties about us, to grasp it, and I often wonder how any one can talk of listening to its harmonies, (as some persons do,) merely as a rest from active occupation, and because it gives them such a quiet sensual delight, as to enable them to think composedly on other subjects. The same persons would think it highly absurd to visit a picture or piece of statuary, without expecting to devote some special attention to its examination, and yet they will saunter into a concert room, and let the sweet sounds glide over their ear without actually taking the trouble to enjoy them. These same persons frequently fall asleep, and a sleepy man at a concert not only makes himself highly uncomfortable in endeavoring to resist the allurements of Morpheus, but also makes himself slightly ridiculous by falling a victim, (as is almost invariably the case) to these same somniferous allurements.

Miss DE ROODE did not come up to my expectations. She does not seem able to sing an air like Haydn's "On mighty pens"—her voice is not majestic enough to satisfy the hearer, and the composition allows no display of that dramatic expression, which is her peculiar forte. In Weber's aria, she sang much better, but was coldly received.

EDWARD MOLLENHAUER played as exquisitely as usual, exhibiting wonderful command over his difficult instrument, and holding the audience rapt with delight. The other instrumental selections presented nothing new of interest. On the whole the Concert was a weak one—such was the opinion of my sleepy neighbor, in which I concurred with as much heartiness as one sleepy individual can be expected to manifest to another still more sleepy individual.

The "American Music Association" has given a concert recently, consisting chiefly of original compositions, the only one of special merit being a "Consecration Anthem" by Dr. HODGES, Organist of Trinity Church. It is a solid composition, in strict Ecclesiastical style, and was extremely well performed by a quartet, consisting of Mrs. E. G. BOSTWICK, Miss ROYJOHN, Mr. A. JOHNSON, and Mr. CHARLES GUILMETTE, and by the chorus of the society, Dr. Hodges himself presiding at the Piano-forte. The other contributions to American musical art, were a few common-place ballads, and a duet for piano-forte and clarinet, by J. N. PYCHOWSKI, played by Mr. CANDIDE BERTI, and Mr. KEIFER. Mr. BERTI and Mr. WILLIAM MASON performed Liszt's Preludes, for two pianos, in splendid style. Miss C. M. SHEPPARD made her debut as a soprano, with tolerable success.

THALBERG has leased our Academy of Music for one year, commencing next September, for the purpose of giving a series of grand concerts, to be varied by occasional operatic performances. No one could assume the management of the opera, who could be more acceptable to our public. Mr. Thalberg's personal popularity is very great here, and will certainly have considerable effect in ensuring the success of his speculation. Mr. ULLMAN, his agent, will sail shortly for Europe, to obtain fresh artists, and it is even rumored, that BALFE will be engaged as Conductor. In the meantime MARETZKE will give a short operatic season at Niblo's with Mme GAZZANIGA as prima donna, and Mme. PAEZ, who recently failed so ignominiously at the Philadelphia Opera House, may also appear.

Nobody knows how STRAKOSCH's operatic speculation succeeds, but were he losing to any great extent, it is not very probable he would continue the season. There was a splendid house present Friday night to hear CORA DE WILHORST in Lucia. She sings to-night in the "Child of the Regiment," and on Wednesday takes a benefit, before leaving for Europe to pursue her much needed musical studies. Her performance on Friday evening was, by far, the most successful she has yet given.

The "Old Folks," from Boston, gave a couple of Concerts at the Tabernacle, last week, but owing to inefficient management, they were not prominently before notice, and the usual courtesies were not extended to the press, who consequently treated the "Old Folks" with silent contempt—and the press is everything here.

OLE BULL gave a concert Friday evening, at Dodworth's Saloon, and for the first time I could appreciate the wild enthusiasm which Paganini once excited. Ole Bull is wonderful—marvellous—and what increases the interest with which we listen to his performances, is the marked individuality of his character, observable in his countenance, and the workings of his features, as he so visibly enters into the spirit of his music. His performance of Paganini's Variations on the air "Hope told a flattering tale," was one of those astonishing feats which knock criticism quite speechless with amazement. It scarcely seemed possible that a man could produce so distinctly with one violin, the effect of several instruments, by simultaneously playing a pizzicato accompaniment with one hand, and a flowing melody with harmonic chords, with the other. Yet this is what Ole Bull does. Those who have heard him in his youth say he has lost none of his former power and spirit, and by declaring him to be the most astonishing violinist since Paganini, fully endorse the otherwise unimportant opinion of TROVATOR.

NEW YORK, MARCH 10.—A slight indisposition prevents me from giving you more than a hurried account of our third Philharmonic Concert, which took place last Saturday evening. The audience was not quite so large as on previous occasions, the programme being perhaps not quite as attractive to the general public. The Symphony was Schumann's, in C, op. 61, and the Overture Goethe's Egmont, and a Concert-Overture by Rietz. These were all very well played; in the Symphony particularly the first and last movements. The composition by Rietz was brilliant and well instrumented, but rather common-place, and full of reminiscences. The instrumental soloist was EDWARD MOLLENHAUER, who showed his usual mastery of the violin in the old "Sylphide," by himself, and a "Rondo Papageno," pretty, effective, and apparently exceedingly difficult, by Ernst. Miss DE ROODE was the vocalist of the evening, and was, I am very sorry to say, only prevented from making a complete failure by the extreme good nature of the public, who, in view of her evident agitation, applauded generously. Her voice, which in a medium-sized room, and with the piano, appears full and strong, was entirely too weak for the immense Academy, and even, it seemed to me, for an orchestral accompaniment. And to this natural disadvantage, she had added another of her own creating, in the unfortunate choice of her pieces. They were the extremely difficult arias, "On mighty pens," from the "Creation," and Ocean, du Ungeheuer, from Weber's "Oberon." These are both compositions which none but a very great singer should undertake; the chief beauty and interest of the first lying in the perfect representation of the many tone-pictures it contains, and the last requiring the utmost dramatic force to make it appear to advantage, when robbed of the stage accessions which it originally requires. It is very high, and very fatiguing, and Miss De Roode was not by any means equal to an artistic rendering of it. I could not but pity her, and wish that she had been contented with simpler means of showing her powers.

OLE BULL is giving a series of concerts, assisted by various artists, which are said to fill Dodworth's Saloon very well. Thalberg's Matinées are drawing themselves out into an endless chain—the first series of three was followed, or rather dove-tailed by a second of two, that again by a third, and in among these again came sundry single ones. Last night the maestro gave a grand concert, with the assistance of the Harmonic Society, who performed Rossini's Stabat Mater, and for next week new attractions are promised.

CINCINNATI, O. MARCH 4.—Our city has recently taken quite a start in musical matters and our progress deserves to be noticed in your Journal. During the past weeks we have enjoyed some important performances by home societies. Our new "Philharmonic Society," which is organized upon the plan of the New York Philharmonic, thus far has given two Concerts and three afternoon Rehearsals. In the last Concert, which was the first of three Subscription Concerts, they treated us to the superb "Pastoral Symphony" by Beethoven. The audience numbered nearly 500 (living) heads. They seemed spell-bound in listening to the heavenly strains of the greatest of all musical masters; there was not a whisper, hardly a breath. This audience, we suppose, was not exactly after the New York pattern. The afternoon Rehearsals have also been well and silently attended; as yet the latest New York fashion of handing round chocolate and ice cream has not been adopted. The Orchestra has about 30 members and is well proportioned: two double Basses and 7 violins give a very fine basis to it, and in this respect it is a good deal more satisfactory than the transient Orchestras, the old "Germanians" and Jullien's, we have had here. Our leader, Mr. L. RITTER, is a man of thorough musical knowledge, of a wide interest in old, new and "future" Music, and of the purest intentions. He leads also our new Vocal "St. Cecilia" Society, which a few days ago performed the whole of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," with the German text, with a chorus of 70 or 80 singers and an Orchestra of about 30; in all, over 100 performers. It was a very creditable performance. The writer a few months ago heard in New York "Eli" by the Mendelssohn Society, and has no hesitation in asserting, that ours can boast of a good deal more precision and promptness. It was probably the first performance in the States of an Oratorio with the original German text by so large a Society. Think of the "Pastoral Symphony" and the whole of "St. Paul" in the Western back woods!

DRESDEN, FEB. 11.—(Concluded from last week.)—As I think it must interest you and perhaps give you a more accurate notion of the condition of musical taste in this capital, (which is certainly a very controlling capital in this department of Art,) I will give you a catalogue of some of the music I have heard here, omitting, of course, that which I have already mentioned. In opera, Oberon, four times; Così fan tutte, twice; Der Freischütz, twice; the Zauberflöte; Meyerbeer's "North Star," (which I cannot admire); Fra Diavolo; the "Templar and Jewess," of Capellmeister Marschner, very fine and effective; "Don Juan," very finely given; Euryanthe, Lucia, &c. The company is very good. Madame BÜCKNER-NEX, the soprano, probably one of the first now on the continent, is a fixture here, under a year's engagement, and appears in every opera. Fraulein KRALL is a pleasing second soprano, arch and pretty; a charming voice, but not a great singer. In the alto line, KREBS-MICHALESKI is the best, tho' not great, but makes the best Elvira I have seen since I was in Paris in 1840. TICHATSCHKE, the tenor, has been a great singer. He is said to be over 60, but manages to look and act like 40, and still sings extremely well. They have a very good buffo bass singer and actor in Herr ABIGER. The choruses are much better than with us, or at the Italian Opera in Paris, and the old Hunter's Chorus in the Freischütz was given as I had never heard it before. The fairy groupings in "Oberon" are really exquisite, and that opening chorus brought D.'s Club vividly before my imagination. The Così fan tutte is a lovely little piece, with the most meagre and insignificant plot, and seems to me as well played as possible. But the great reputation of the Opera here rests mainly on the Orchestra, which is also said to be the best in Europe. I care not whether it be or not; it is certainly the best I ever heard, and I have been lately (three months ago) sitting behind those soap-locks of BORRESINI, at the Italians, in Paris, where he is now conductor. This remarkable orchestra is presided over by Herr KÄRSE, Kapellmeister of the King of Saxony, who has a genius for his department of work.

Of the less pretentious Quartet-vereins, there are many. I belong to one, the "Musikalischer," where they give just such a programme, once a fortnight, as our Mendelssohn Quintette Club in Boston, but they do not play as well. Here, as in most meetings of the kind, the ladies sit together, filling the floor of the principal room, the gentlemen standing under and outside of the arches which generally separate the room into two parts, a few getting seats on the outskirts, (literally, sometimes.) Three or four times during the winter, these Vereins give what they call a "Thés dunsant" to their members. We attended one of these. A band of one of the regiments plays Polkas, Waltzes and Quadrilles, and dancing is kept up briskly, and with an energy unknown out of Germany, from 7 till 10 or 10½, when the supper is announced. And this important element in German social life must not go undescribed. In a large suit of rooms, adjoining every dancing or concert hall in Dresden, tables are set out, quite plainly, but very clean; a carte de restaurant, with the prices of the dishes marked against them, is upon each table. The tables are of various sizes, from eight to twenty seats. Parties of intimates take a table or an end of a table and call for what they please, paying therefor at the time.

We were almost completely strangers at the first of these parties, but the President of the association put us into pleasant company at a table of eight, and as we sat down, introduced me as follows in German: Herr —, I have the pleasure to introduce you to Fraulein MARIA WIECK, (and aside, sister of CLARA SCHUMANN, the first pianist in Dresden,) Herr Wieck, her father, Herr Wieck, her brother, and so with Mrs. —; then to several officers n uniform, and we commenced our supper. My friend—strive to imagine us—a party of eight—in ball dress—sitting down to a hot supper of veal cutlets and stewed string beans, Rhine wine, &c. But we had a very pleasant time. Marie Wieck is pleasing, rather pretty, and speaks tolerable English, and intimated a desire to go to the U. S. if she could feel assured of success. I have not yet heard her play. Herr BLASSMANN is the best pianist here,—a young man, and member of the Tonkünstler, as are all the best artists of the place.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 14, 1857.

CONCERTS.

The last PHILHARMONIC CONCERT was a grand one. The Music Hall presented an inspiring show of audience, although not full, and we congratulate Mr. ZERRAHN upon this satisfactory, though late, response to his brave efforts in the cause of orchestral music, as heartily as we thank him for the good things he has given us, and above all for that ever-glorious Symphony by Schubert. But first let us record the programme:

- PART I.
1—Grand Symphony, in C major,.....Schubert.
I. Andante con moto, Allegro ma non troppo—II. Andante.
III. Scherzo, Allegro—IV. Allegro vivace.
2—Scena and Aria: "Wie nährte mir der Schlummer," from the opera Der Freischütz,.....Weber.
Madame Bertha Johannsen.
PART II.
3—Festival Overture,.....Jullius Rietz.
[First time in Boston]
4—a. Morgen Ständchen,.....Schubert.
b. Volklied,.....Kücken.
Madame Bertha Johannsen.
5—Chorus of Pilgrims, from Tannhäuser,.....Wagner.
Sung by a Select Choir of Male Voices.
6—Waltz di Bravura,.....Bensano.
Madame Bertha Johannsen.
7—Overture: "William Tell",.....Rossini.

That Symphony was the richest feast of instrumental music we have heard this winter. We do not say of course that it surpasses Beethoven's C minor; but, considering its greater novelty, we listen to it just now with a fresher interest. Intrinsically it is a work of genius, a truly inspired creation, from beginning to end; as truly so as any Symphony by Beethoven or Mozart. Indeed outside of Beethoven (and with a full recognition of the merits of his predecessors and of Mendelssohn in this line) we know no work of instrumental music that appears to us so great, that so exalts and fills the listener. It tingles with imaginative life and ecstasy in every bar; it teems with beautiful and glorious ideas, which are wrought up and carried through with logical consistency and vigor; it is equally remarkable for melodies of startling individuality and beauty as for the wildest wealth of modulation and the richest instrumental coloring; it is full of solemnity and full of joy, and with its buoyant rhythm treads on air like one caught up by the divine afflatus. And then, as Schumann says of it, "its heavenly length, like a thick novel in four volumes by Jean Paul!" Ah, there's the rub! we fear many of the audience thought only of the length and found it very tedious. Certainly that was the case with some of the newspaper critics. We think it may be curious and not altogether uninteresting to string together some of these critical opinions which appeared in Monday's papers. If they do not show the worth of Schubert's Symphony, they show its length. It will be seen that witnesses differ, not only as to "melody," but even as to effect on the audience.

The orchestral performances and Pilgrim Chorus by a select choir of male voices were acceptable generally, though Schubert's Symphony wearied by its excessive length—55 minutes—and Rietz's Festival overture wasted the energy of this orchestra and much valuable time for no good purpose. There was too great a slice of "Young Germany" in this programme for general enjoyment or satisfaction, but the performers gave their best care and skill to make it palatable.—Evening Gazette.

As to the symphony by Schubert, with which the performance commenced, we cannot say that we think it worth an hour's time of two thousand people, so long as we have compositions of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Haydn or Mozart that are not worn out. The songs of Schubert are unrivalled, but he does not wield the wand which, in the hands of the illustrious four, has enchanted the world. The symphony has beautiful passages, and, as it seemed to us, they were fairly brought out; but pretty passages will not make a symphony, any more than pleasing fancies or lyrical strains will make an epic poem.—Atlas.

Nearly an hour elapsed during the performance of the first piece, but notwithstanding its great length it is not wearisome when treated in the masterly manner of Saturday evening. It is a beautiful work. Schubert as a melodist, is unrivalled, and this peculiarity of his permeates the entire composition. It was heard with rapt attention, and at the end of each movement the audience expressed the pleasure they were experiencing.—Traveller.

A second hearing of Schubert's Symphony (in C major) does not amend the feeling of tediousness and ennui which ensued from the former. With the exception of a portion of the Andante, there is no evidence of any symphonic form, certainly not as much as in the overture to William Tell, which has distinct themes. Forty-five minutes attention to "broken crockery" and forty horse brass power does not elucidate a great degree of pleasure, or at the best, the ten minutes enjoyment of one movement does not "pay" for the other infliction. The new overture ("Festival," by Julius Rietz,) is a pleasing production of the Young German School, but it displays no feature of originality or great genius. The William Tell overture is a standard composition, always agreeable and piquant, and the best known to the public of any of Rossini's compositions. It was needed after the surfeit of braying and crashing instrumentals which the audience had sat through, that something should be given to soothe the perturbed mind, and the graceful vocalism of Madame Johannsen smoothed the way to receive the final strains of the orchestra in the delightful overture which closed the evening's entertainments.—Journal.

The Symphony, new to much of the audience, prolix in its construction and its themes elaborated to the exhaustion of instrumental resources, failed to make an impression. Its full groundwork of harmony, dignified treatment and gleams of melodic beauty, scarcely compensated for a want of directness of leading motive, a rounded symmetry of figures, and that picturesque grouping of musical fancies which in Beethoven's works of the kind so immediately fill the mind's eye and catch the dainty musical ear.—Transcript.

Schubert's glorious symphony (in C Major) it was indeed delightful to hear again. We hardly know any composition of this kind so interesting. It is more Beethovenish even, than some of Beethoven's own. Without imitation of any master, it seems free from mannerism of any kind, and thoroughly original, the work of a master, most evidently, in conception and logical treatment. The themes are most beautiful and their development admirable. The solemn and magnificent andante of the second movement, is to us the most remarkable part and is as the similar movement in Beethoven's "Heroica," or the grand funeral march of Chopin, which it much resembles. The symphony was wonderfully well played.—Telegraph.

Poor Schubert! Out of the six but two who recognize a decent Symphony in this thy greatest work, which Mendelssohn and Schumann, when they exhumed it from the immense mass of thy posthumous manuscripts, rejoiced over as having saved to the world a pearl of inestimable price! Both Mendelssohn and Schumann, the two men whom the haters of the "New School" pit against each other, making the first the type of all that approved, lasting excellence, against which the "men of the Future" so offend! They thought, and all Germany thinks with them, that Schubert, whose genius for song-writing surpassed all others, was even greater in his instrumental music, and particularly in this his Seventh Symphony. (It was written in March, 1828; he died the November following. Schumann found seven of his Symphonies; it is since said that there are twelve.

This one alone is published.) No young composer of his day so interested Beethoven.

This date shows, (only one year after the death of Beethoven), that the work is by no means to be classed with the "music of the future." And as to "broken crockery," absence of the "symphonic form," and all that, the criticism deals in catch-words, and not genuine perceptions or ideas. Will the writer perhaps inform us in what the symphonic form consists? If Beethoven's or Mendelssohn's symphonies are models of it, we must assure him that Schubert's follows, throughout, the same general plan of structure. For a first movement, we have a slow Introduction, the religious theme of which is first, as it were, intoned by the horn, and then worked up by the orchestra, with a Beethoven-like sublimity; and then starts off the Allegro, which has a leading and an answering theme, the first bold, heroic, full of nerve, the second of an exquisite gaiety, and these are stated, contrasted, blended, discussed, illustrated in the usual symphonic manner, with perfect directness and consistency, yet with endless variety and beauty of outline and coloring, until near the end the religious horn theme, or a phrase of it, sounds in from one part or another of the orchestra, and rounds off the whole to still completer unity. The Andante is marvellously beautiful, with a pervading melody, in form like other Andantes, and only growing to such length, because its thoughts are so inspired, so pregnant, that they haunt and tempt the mind along, and seem too beautiful, and too significant to end. The Scherzo, strong and jovial and riotous, is the usual quick three-four movement in two parts; followed by the usual Trio, which in this case is very long. (Schubert loved to keep up the Scherzo mood), but is built on a buoyant, triumphant, glorious theme, worthy to be so prolonged. The Finale has the usual Rondo form, and is elated with ideas such as come only to the mind in its happiest moments, and must not be dismissed hastily. After listening to so much before, (and music, which, if it speaks to one at all, has been most exciting), the fulness of this last movement may possibly cloy one whose appetite may not be in its best state as to keenness and endurance. But hundreds listened, and drank in joy and inspiration through the whole four movements. Now that a large part of a miscellaneous audience, hearing such a work, perhaps for the first time, should find it lengthy and fatiguing, is not to be wondered at, and no one can blame them. But that "critics," they who are supposed to be more appreciative than the many, and to be the leaders of opinion, should simply follow in the wake of the most common tastes and prejudices, flatter the popular ignorance, reduce all to the standard of amusement and success with idle listeners, and find nothing in a great work of genius to report of but its length, is something droll and lamentable. Such criticisms, to borrow a luminous phrase from one of them, do not "elucidate a great deal of pleasure."

Is, then, the popularity of a symphony, on the first hearing, the true criterion of merit? And is great length, (a thing to be avoided as a general rule, all will admit), a sin that cancels every merit in a work of genius? "Hamlet" is very long; yet we never heard it called a poor play. The "Messiah" is long; yet it passes for a pretty fair Oratorio. So of the "Choral Symphony."

We should tremble for the fate of all of these, were they on trial, as new works, before such judges. This Symphony is long, but can you find a weak spot in it?

But we have not room for a chapter upon musical criticism. To return to the concert. The symphony was better played than we have before heard it, (in the summer of 1852, by a small orchestra under Mr. Suck, and in the winters of '53 and '54, by the Germanians). It was one of the best orchestral performances we have yet had. The Overture by Rietz, written for the Düsseldorf Festival, (too early, too, for "music of the future"), is quite a musician-like and pleasing serious composition, not at all outré and singular, but such as might have come, apparently, from any clever follower of Mendelssohn. The only "Zukunftis" music in the programme, therefore, (critics to the contrary), was the Tannhäuser chorus, which is popular enough for our critics, and was sung by a fine band of male voices.

The vocal part of the entertainment was eminently satisfactory. Mlle. JOHANNSEN fully justified the good report that came before her. Since Jenny Lind, we have not, verily, heard the scena from the Freyschütz sung so satisfactorily by any one. To be sure, here was not by any means the consummate execution of a Sontag; but there was very superior execution, a voice far more rich and telling, and a magnetic quality, a soul and fervor in the whole delivery, which there was no mistaking. Schubert's "Hark the lark!" was sung in the true spirit, charmingly, but the lady did not play the piano accompaniment so delicately as might be. The Volkslied was naive and bright, and in the Waltz she showed remarkable skill in bravura singing (far less of course than Sontag or Lagrange) and put a deal of energy into the concluding cadence. It cost her a little time to get "acclimated" to the hall and to the high pitch of the orchestra; and she labored under a cold, which accounted for an occasional thin or worn tone, but in spite of all she triumphed, and her singing grew, and will grow, should we hear her again, upon her audience.

Mr. ZERRAHN has toiled severely that we might have good music. The last concert saved him from loss of money, but not from loss of time; the series has yielded him but door-keeper's wages. Yet it is clear that the appetite of the public has only awakened at the eleventh hour, and really craves more. Why then should we not have another concert—a Benefit concert to Mr. CARL ZERRAHN?

Music in Europe.

In Germany, the interest in the New School Music seems to be increasing; at all events, its leading creators, or manufacturers—whichever we may choose to call them—show no signs of relaxing their activity. RICHARD WAGNER, who writes his own librettos, on the theory that the poem and the music should be one birth, one whole, and who regards his Tannhäuser and Lohengrin as but experiments, is at work on his intended masterpiece, Die Nibelungen. This musical drama will be composed of four parts: Rheingold, Wallkure, Siegfried and Siegfried's Tod. The representation will take four evenings. Wagner is building a theatre on purpose, at Zurich, his place of exile, and the best singers in Europe will be engaged for the occasion. The first two parts are already composed, but the whole will not be ready under a year or two. There is an absurd report that LISZT has entered the religious order of Franciscan Monks at Peeth. It is, very likely, a joke on the part of his enemies, based on the religious subjects of his recent compositions. A Paris correspondent of the New York Evening Post says of him:

Letters dated 17th inst., have been received from him in Paris, in which he speaks a good deal of music, but not a single word of any intention of becoming a monk. At the request of Liszt, the poet Otto Roquette has just written a legend in six scenes on the life of St. Elizabeth, which is destined for the inauguration of the Salle de Wartburg, recently completed in the palace of the Landgrave of Thuringen. Liszt, moreover, proposes to compose a symphony on the battle of the Huns, from the picture of Kaulbach, as soon as he has terminated his Schiller symphony, entitled "The Ideal." This is not all. When he has finished the new mass on which he is now occupied, he intends to write an ecclesiastical cantata, which will poetically and musically illustrate the eight beatitudes of the "Sermon on the Mount," and an oratorio, "The Christ," the text of which will be by Frederick Rückert.

There is a suspicious report that Herr Lachner is about to finish Mendelssohn's Loreley, of which opera he has left only fragments. Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" Cantata has just reached the Concerts of the Conservatoire at Paris. The German musical papers are a long time in reaching us, and we have seen no programmes of the Leipzig Gewandhaus concerts for a long time. Concerts and operas go on there, and in all the German cities, as usual, but with uncommon barrenness of novelty, although it were worth an American's while to hear what our correspondent has heard in Dresden this winter. In Berlin, the opera given at the Royal Opera House on Mozart's birth day was Donizetti's L'Elisir. At Leipzig the reigning opera, by last accounts, was M. Auber's Gustave. At Vienna the art languishes.

At Paris the long expected opera, Psyche, by M. Aubroise Thomas, has come out at the Opera Comique some say successfully. Mlle. Ugalde was Cupid, Mlle. Lefevre, Psyche, and M. Battaille, Mercury. At the Opera, we read of little besides Verdi, chiefly the Traviata, or the Trovatore done into French, and hence less successful than usual. But there are various symptoms of a classical turn in Paris. The Société des Jeunes Artistes have produced fragments of Gluck's Aleste,—a failure, because Gluck's music cannot well be separated from the stage. Mme. Viardot has been singing Handel's "Return O Lord of Hosts," in English; and the Count de Stainlein has started a new Quartet Club, to give chamber concerts, at which, besides his own works, those of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schubert and Weber are to be performed.

In London the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace, still go on. Mozart's G minor Symphony, the overture to Fidelio, and Horsley's to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," formed the orchestral portion of the last programmes. The Sacred Harmonic Society have been performing Mozart's Requiem and Mendelssohn's Lobgesang for one concert; for another Mendelssohn's Athalie and Rossini's Stabat Mater; for others, "Elijah," "Eli," and so on. The great topic now is the approaching HANDEL Festival to be held in May at the Crystal Palace, under the auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," and "Judas Maccabæus," are to be given by 2300 really efficient performers, the Sacred Harmonic Society taking the lead. It appears from the records of this Society that, of its 344 performances at Exeter Hall, exactly one half have been entire oratorios of Handel, including, besides the three above named, "Samson," "Solomon," "Joshua," "Saul," "Jephtha," "Deborah," "Athalie," and "Belshazzar." Miss Arabella Goddard has been adding to her laurels, by playing another of Beethoven's latest Sonatas, the op. 109, in E major.

MUSICAL EDUCATION.—We called attention some weeks since to the prospectus of the "Boston Musical School," issued by Messrs. B. F. BAKER, J. W. ADAMS, L. P. HOMER, and J. C. D. PARKER, who constitute its Board of Instruction. In answer to inquiries, we can state that it will commence its operations on the first Monday in April; that there will be two terms each year, of twelve weeks each; that the complete course will extend through three years; and that a new class will be formed at the opening of each term.

We trust the hopes of its conductors will be fully realized, and that it will grow (why should it not?) to be a true school of musicians. They tell us it will be conducted on principles similar to those of the "Conservatoires" of Europe; and like those, its object will be to furnish an ample and complete musical education, chiefly to those who intend pursuing the art as a profession, though amateurs can also avail themselves of its instruction, provided they are sincerely bent upon a serious and earnest study of the art. One great advantage which such an institution promises, is a system of perfect discipline, which in any pursuit will always have its solid effects. All students will be compelled to ground themselves in the fundamental principles of music, theoretically as well as practically.

The instruction being given in classes, too, will excite emulation, which is productive of good results, if maintained in a proper spirit.

Instruction is furnished at an extraordinarily low rate of tuition, thus bringing it within the means of every one desirous of a musical education.

Opportunity will be secured for the pupils to hear all public musical performances that will be likely to improve their taste or serve in any way to aid their advancement in a knowledge of the art.

Certain evenings in the week will be devoted to the practice of music by the whole in a body, and also to performances, by such as shall be deemed prepared, in the presence of invited friends.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Notices of the last Concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club—an excellent one—the concert, not the notice—and of the ninth Afternoon Concert, must lie over to next week.... Our friend, "A. W. T.," last week, speaking of the best location for a choir in the Music Hall, remarked that "it is true of all music, that it produces most effect when it is least elevated"—a truth fully apprehended by our modern composers of effect music, and heartily confirmed, too, by newspaper critics.

This is the season of "last concerts." To-night the German "ORPHEUS" give theirs, in the Melodeon, and with an exceedingly rich programme, Miss DOANE, Herr KREISSMANN, and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club assisting.... Sig. CORELLI gave a delightful private concert, with his pupils, past and present, to the number of some fifteen ladies and a dozen gentlemen, at Chickering's on Thursday evening. For amateurs there was a great deal of fine, artistic singing; and choruses by such a body of pure, fresh voices are never heard in public. But we can only mention it this week.... Preparations for the great Music Festival in Boston (of which we spoke last week) are going on in earnest. The Handel and Haydn Society, who take the initiative, are now rehearsing "Elijah" with a view to it. It is now contemplated that it will take place during the three or four days immediately preceding the May Anniversaries, so that the crowds of strangers who visit our city at that time may include this also in their programme of a grand week. Three oratorios will probably be given: two on Friday and Saturday, one on Sunday evening, and for Saturday evening Beethoven's "Choral Symphony." The chorus to be increased to at least 600; the solos to be sung by the best talent in the country; the orchestra to consist of at least 50 performers, under the conductorship of Carl Zerrahn. To ensure the Festival a guaranty fund of $4,000 is required, and we are happy to learn that over $3,000 is already subscribed.

Advertisements.

PIANO-FORTES.

JACOB CHICKERING,
300 Washington Street, Boston,

WOULD invite his friends and the public generally to examine his new and elegant style of PIANO-FORTES, which for purity, firmness, and sweetness of tone, as well as for neatness of touch, completeness of action, and durability, are second to none manufactured in this country.

Our facilities for manufacturing are such, that we can afford to furnish instruments to purchasers on as reasonable terms as they can be obtained elsewhere.

NOTICE.

The THIRD (and last) SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT of the ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB

Will take place at the

MELODEON,

On Saturday Evening, March 14th, 1857,

With the kind assistance of

Miss LUCY A. DOANE, and the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

AUGUST KREISSMANN, Director.

Tickets Fifty cents each. Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock precisely.

FIRST PREMIUM PIANO-FORTES.CHICKERING & SONS

Have received the following awards for their exhibition of

PIANO-FORTES

At the Fairs of 1856:

FROM THE

Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association

FOR THE

BEST GRANDS, SEMI-GRANDS, and PARLOR GRANDS,

"For most decided and meritorious Improvements,"

THE GOLD MEDAL.FOR THE BEST SQUARE PIANOS,
THE SILVER MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST PIANO-FORTE CASES,
THE SILVER MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
BRONZE MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST SPECIMEN OF JIG-SAWING, BRONZE MEDAL.

FROM THE

American Institute, New York,

FOR THE

BEST GRAND PIANO, THE GOLD MEDAL.

FROM THE

Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society,
THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SILVER MEDAL.

ALSO,

At the Illinois State Fair,
THE HIGHEST PREMIUM,
A SILVER MEDAL.

This House was established in 1823, by JONAS CHICKERING, and up to the present time has furnished 19,000 PIANOS. For the exhibition of these Pianos in the United States and in England, they have been awarded—

Eleven Gold Medals,
Seventeen Silver Medals,
Four Bronze Medals.*WAREHOOMS,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.*JAMES W. VOSE'S
PREMIUM PIANO-FORTES.A SILVER PRIZE MEDAL
Was awarded for these Pianos at the last Great Exhibition in Boston, in competition with the best makers in the country, for their fine musical tone and perfect action. Also,A BRONZE MEDAL,
For the superiority and beauty of the exterior. Every instrument purchased from this establishment will be warranted to give full and perfect satisfaction.Warerooms 335 Washington St., corner West St.,
BOSTON.*WILLIAM GOOCH,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
AT JAMES W. VOSE'S, No. 335 WASHINGTON STREET.*S. B. BALL,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
Rooms at Rev. A. A. Miner's Church, School Street, Boston.*EDWARD L. BALCH,*Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:*VOLUME VII.*Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation
and Orchestration,Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.VOLUME VIII.*Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.— (Former price, $5 25.) In paper wrappers, $1 13. By mail, $1 20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 63
 " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 63
 " 3. Fête on Choir and Chorus Singing.....88
 " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
 " 5. Cotel's Treatise on Harmony.....63
 " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction. Vol. 1, Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3, Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three volumes bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 63

NOVELLO'S MUSIC STORE,

389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square*PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.409 Washington Street, Boston, (Near Boylston Market.)*A. NEWHALL & CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO THE LATE D. B. NEWHALL.)

RESPECTFULLY inform their friends and the public, that, having purchased the entire stock of the late D. B. Newhall, they will continue the business at the old stand; and having great facilities for manufacturing, they are now prepared to receive orders for the justly celebrated Instruments of their predecessor, with all the modern improvements.

Their instruments will be made in the most faithful and perfect manner, as the proprietors themselves superintend the manufacture, and having had many years personal experience, with the late D. B. Newhall, in manufacturing Piano-Fortes, are determined to make none but the best instruments.

Persons in want of a superior article, are respectfully requested to give us a call.

Warerooms, 344 Washington Street.ALFRED NEWHALL. JOHN R. MULLIN. NELSON S. REED.*Will soon be Published:*COOKE'S CELEBRATED METHOD OF SING-ING. A new and improved edition.
INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE GERMAN CON-
CERTINA, with a Collection of popular music arranged for that instrument.
In Press: INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE EN-GLISH CONCERTINA.*Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.*NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

THE next term of this highly successful Institution will commence in North Reading, Mass., on Wednesday, the third day of June next, and continue twelve weeks. Its object is the preparation of teachers for various positions in the musical profession, and thorough instruction and training in the theory and practice of the art.

Circulars, giving particulars, may be obtained free of expense, by addressing Normal Musical Institute, North Reading, Mass.
LOWELL MASON,
Feb. 7. 64. GEORGE F. ROOT.*MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,*J. C. D. PARKER,Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,*Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARIGives Instruction in Singing.
Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.Piano-Forte Instruction.*Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.*G. ANDRÉ & CO.,Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,*

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.*WILLIAM SCHULTZE,

GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.*SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.*J. TRENKLE,*TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.*C. BREUSING,IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC, 701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY..

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

J. H. HIDLEY,PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.*GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,

(Late at St. Paul's Church.)

ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.*DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,A Paper of Art and Literature,Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.*TERMS OF ADVERTISING.First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 259.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 25.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, 291 Wash'n St. "
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

A Letter from an Old Contributor.

MY ROOM, SPRING THE 1st, 1857.

DEAR DWIGHT:—X. Snows again. March is coming in lion-like, though hardly like a lion. Since church I have been out for a walk—with the storm in going, breasting it in returning. After leaving my room, I soon turned into the street which leads from Harvard College to Brighton, and crossing the river, went on directly to Brookline, to that beautiful hill which you see beyond the Milldam from Boston Common. Speaking of this street, reminds me of the feelings with which, a whole generation ago nearly, I used to come from the country and cross the bridge into Cambridge. Then as I came up the slightly ascending way, and caught sight of the old houses on either side—among them, Porter's, famous for flip! and the small square on which then stood the old Court House, Wiswall's Den, old Massachusetts just beyond, and other relics of American antiquity, I was carried back into ancient times, and enjoyed the feeling of the past, with emotions which, in Nuremberg itself, have hardly been stronger or more filled with the indefinite longing for the olden time, which sheds such a delicious half-sadness into the soul. You remember how quiet Cambridge used to be. Then, to my country boy's mind, the old College buildings were the seats of awful wisdom, and here science brooded with fostering wings—an incubation under which no egg could addle. I seemed to smell literature and science in the very air. I looked with reverence upon old Lennox, and felt an abiding confidence that the sententious apothegm of Venerabilis Snow, "Ysters is 'ysters when they is 'ysters, and when they isn't they isn't!" contained unsounded depths of scholarship. I met young men in their Sunday clothes of a week day, and their trim outer man did but impress me more profoundly with an idea of the grandeur of their mental achievements. The Latin and Greek books, once my father's, but then stored in the attic at home, would be but child's play to these favored mortals, and even to some the dark rows of the Hebrew letters, to be read backwards, must be not devoid of meaning! In those days, Plato, Demosthenes, Diodorus Siculus, Xenophon, Livy and all those hard names so profusely quoted by Rollin—then my classic—had a much more familiar sound to my ears than now—and these I could see imprinted in the faces I met. On one occasion the author of "Classology," a prodigy of learning as I then thought, took me into Harvard Hall, then the Library, and showed me the 40,000 volumes there congregated. Would that I could have that feeling again!

But at this rate I shall not take my walk. I will only add that my four years since that time, within the college walls, have made sad havoc of the romance!

As I said, I crossed the river, and went out to the Cambridge crossing of the Worcester Railroad; thence keeping the same course, I fell into the main road that leads to Brookline village, and finally turned into a field, beyond which, I ascended the hill.

Through the air, murky with the fine snow flakes of the incipient storm, I saw, as through a glass, darkly. But superbly beautiful was the view. Behind, to the West, lies the hilly and broken country, extending away beyond Nonantum and Natick, even into the Nipmet and Nipmuck country of Colonial times. But save the scattered clumps of pine and fir, the trees, garmentless, were asleep—hibernating—and the earth was white in broad patches, like a frost-bitten face. But from the high hills of Waltham, all around the semicircle as far as the Blue hills of Milton, the picture was wintry but perfect. My eye luxuriates in varied form and color, as does my ear in full and powerfully modulated harmonies. The blossoming time of Spring, and the deep hues of brilliant Autumn, are my visual carnivals. And yet, though the background was filled in with but the colors of winter, patches of snow for white, the blackness of leafless groves, and the dull brown and buff of fields and pasture land, there was my beloved beauty of color. At this distance and elevation, the thousand and one hues of the buildings of the villages and cities, which lie upon the plain, or nestle along the foot of the ridges, that limit the prospect, now seen distinctly through the leafless trees, come out marked objects to the eye, and blend in one grand mass of infinite variety of detail. The river was a pathway of light along the broad valley below, and from its bosom rose a few tapering spars of schooner and sloop, hinting at summer and ocean perils. From beyond Mount Auburn, all round to the point where the river divides the peninsula of Shawmut from the main, the low lands are bordered by a continuous city, in summer time half buried in foliage. At the point of separation, the masts of a great naval and mercantile marine cluster, and then comes the dark brown mass of dome-crowned Boston, rising from the waters below me, and allowing glimpses of the island-dotted bay beyond. Onward, and the eye passes over a range of hills, at the foot of which lie Roxbury and South Boston, and beyond opens a country of exquisite beauty, even to the Blue Hills. Looking directly down, I have the palace-like country seats of Boston millionaires, beautiful homes of business men in moderate circumstances, the white farm house with its green blinds, neat cottages of every style and form—all in orderly disorder, all mingled with orchards, groves, gardens and fields. Long, straight lines cross the marshes and waters in all directions; they are roads and iron ways, bridges and causeways, and on another day would be alive with the vehicles of business men and pleasure-seekers. But to-day is the Sabbath of the Lord, and all is still.

How thoroughly American is the entire scene! All these fields and pastures divided by walls of stone; the houses scattered all over the land, each upon the possessions of its owner; every one built hew and where its owner will; no where else, England perhaps excepted, would these plains present any other appearance than an open, hedgeless, fenceless extent of field and meadow, with villages rising here and there like islands from its surface. The scene would be treeless, save long lines bordering the public ways, possibly groves upon the barren hill tops, and the fruit trees which rise in and about the villages. The outlines of the view would be the same, but its physiognomy would be utterly changed. Here and there would be a park, with palace and lodge; but most of our view now is park-like, with innumerable seats and lodges. This beautiful hill top, now bare, would in the old world be crowned with a ruin, a convent, a chapel, or a tower, and on every warm, pleasant day, men and women—of all classes, of every rank—would come hither and drink in spiritual life from the beauty around.

You have heard of the Porta Westphalica? The Westphalian gate! It is the spot where the Weser, coming down from the highlands of Hanover and Hesse-Cassel, breaks through the Wiehen Gebirge, as the Mohawk breaks a passage through the ridges of New York, not far from Little Falls. The city of Minden, famous in history is near the Porta, and in this region Hermann, the Arminius of the Latin Historians, said to the Romans, "thus far and no farther!" The passage cut by the Weser is narrow, and on either side rises abruptly the lofty ridge, and extends far away. On the height—upon the Northern side—the taste of the people for beautiful scenery has led to the erection of a tower. In the autumn of 1854 I walked thither from the hospitable house of those dear Minden friends, with Wilson. We made our way slowly up the Eastern slope, through the thick woods, and came out at length upon the cleared space by the tower. The Eastern declivity is very steep, and as my companion came to the brow of the height, and the lovely Weser valley opened at a glance to his eye, in all its superb beauty, dotted with villages, and bordered with "hills rising over hills," the river winding peacefully along, bearing the tall-masted boats of German inland commerce, his countenance flushed up with emotion, and for the moment he was speechless! So last summer, a true and gentle woman, with heart to feel, fancy to enliven, and taste to appreciate the scene from Corey's hill, after taking me in various directions through Brookline, the most beautiful of suburban towns on earth, as I verily believe—whose only drawbacks are its dust in summer, want of sidewalks, and of some public promenade or park, such as this hill would afford—brought me by a winding way, ascending from the rear, to this spot. As we came out upon the summit, and my eye glanced over the view I have been trying to describe, then all glorious in its summer garments, and at that moment glorified by the brilliancy of the setting sun, as it sent its rays aslant through our transparent atmosphere, touching tower and steeple and dome, causing distant windows to flame as with unearthly fire, seats and farm-houses sleeping in thickening shadows around the base of the hill—the emotions of my friend at the Porta Westphalica became my own. How does the psychologist explain them?

I have looked down upon London from Primrose hill; upon Berlin from the Kreuzberg; upon Vienna from the Kahlenberg; upon Salzburg from the Mönchsberg; upon many a city and town from the spots which the tastes and culture of the people or of the governments have consecrated to the spirit of beauty, as an inheritance to the public forever, and yet, though more grandeur and sublimity has been presented to my eye, I can tell of no spot where the elements of beauty have so abounded as to give rise to deeper emotions than those which stir me as I get this unrivalled view of Boston and its surrounding country.

This hill is in the very centre of the panorama. How happens it that, when every point which might be thought to vie with this has been snatched away forever from the public, by the crushing tread of the march of improvement—has been cut up into lots and sold by speculators—that this should have escaped? Grant, oh Fate, that this exemption from the common lot may last until I shall no more be able, at the call of "incense-breathing morn," or when "dewy eve" begins to brood over the landscape, thither to wend my way.

But who know this spot? Who care for it? who visit it? The "appreciative few" are few indeed. Misses Simple and Mincing know nothing of it. They have climbed the heights, and sought the views, and gone into raptures, and talk still, as of divine things, of all the spots to which Murray's Guide Books have sent them in the tour of Europe. But they have not seen Boston, nor New York, nor Albany, nor any other American city from any neighboring elevation. They have ascended the weary steps of old cathedral towers in European cities, and felt a new feeling as they looked down upon the streets and squares, and markets, and habitations, and pleasure grounds, below and around. But from our State House balcony or lantern they have never looked—that view is for the common people and country folks! I crossed the Common the other day with a Man of Fancy. Our eyes followed the straight, level line of the milldam, and rested upon Corey's hill.

"Does it not rise," said he, "with a curve as graceful and soft as the breast of a Venus? I suppose it will be bought by and by to fill up the back bay—for there is nothing like putting things to use, and there it stands, just in the right position for this purpose. I see now at least five hundred modern Greeks armed and equipped for the attack! When the spring time comes again, and its slopes have their garment of green, come here and mark how refreshing to the eye, how soft and lovely a termination to the view from this spot, that hill affords. Could I have an opinion which should carry weight into the public councils, or could I exert an influence upon the millionaires who dwell in its vicinity, I would never cease from my labor until that place was made the Primrose hill of Boston, and secured as a pendant to the Common forever. I would have its slopes waving with trees. Clumps of pines and firs and hemlocks should be scattered upon its surface. The maple, the ash, the hickory, the chestnut—all our native forest trees should be there. Winding roads and circuitous pathways should lead to its top. Openings in the groves should offer points whence the eye should drink in the views. The Kalmia and other flowering shrubs of our forests and hillsides, should be naturalized in its soil. Some irregular but picturesque edifice should crown its top, with platforms and towers, whence, over all, the visitor should take in at a glance the complete panorama. Here should dwell a forester with his assistants, armed with the terrors of the law, both to nourish and cherish the members of his vegetable republic, and see that it suffer no detriment from occasional attacks from Goths and Vandals. It should be another Mount Auburn, but devoted to the living. And in after years, when this one spot should come to stand alone as the representative of the gentle, forest-covered hills, which once limited the view from Beacon hill or the State House dome, then would thousands and thousands look back and join in the praises of the Man of Fancy, who wrought out the salvation of Corey's hill from the ruthless hand of speculation. Then too, when the open fields had become covered with the lofty forest, and autumn came on, and the Great Painter would put all other artists to the blush, he would find a spot of canvass here, hard by the city, upon which to lay his colors, and would delight to exhibit annually a painting, to us Bostonians, the like of which no other large, sea coast city on earth could boast."

Here the Man of Fancy looked round to see that no millionaire was near, and putting his mouth to my ear, added:

"This would cost money—and money, you know, is needed to buy copper stocks, build Vermont railroads, explore the Amazon, secure the Southern trade, and save the Union." A. W. T.

The Piano-Forte Compositions of J. S. Bach.

EDITED BY FRIEDRICH CHRYSANDER.

[Concluded.]

"8.—The Fantasias and Preludes (likewise the Capricci, Toccate, and Ritornelli) have one quality in common, namely, that they are not subjected to any fixed form, and commonly serve as an introduction to a serious, "elaborate" piece. Mattheson calls them musical whims. As everything about them is so uncertain, the tempo cannot be so generally defined; every one must, therefore, see how, in doubtful cases, he can set himself right. Bach, however, treated the whims more seriously, and created a perfectly new and more classical branch of art, especially out of the Prelude. His Preludes, too, are so characteristic, pithy, and peculiar, that the proper mode of playing them is self-evident.

"9.—The Gavotte.—Its emotion is thorough, exultant joy. A frisking character is a special peculiarity of this kind of melody, and, by no means, a running one. For the pianoforte, certain Gavottes are set, which are characterized by great license, but still are not so bad as those on the fiddle." (Mattheson). The movement must not be too quick. This species of dance possesses, moreover, the peculiarity of being always in two-two time.

"10.—The Gigue (Gigue, Giga) is a dance in six-eight time, merry and gay. Mattheson subdivides the Gigue into several kinds, which he describes in his droll and lively manner. 'The ordinary, or English Gigues,' (he says, Kern mel. Wissen, p. 115), 'have, as their peculiar emotion, a fiery and flighty ardour; a passion which speedily evaporates. The Loures, or slow and punctuated ones, exhibit a proud, puffed-up character; for which reason they are very popular with the Spaniards. The Canaries must be accompanied by great eagerness and activity, but must still be somewhat simple. The French Gigues, finally, which are not used for dancing, but for fiddling (whence, perhaps, they are thus denominated) are wound up, as it were, to a pitch of extreme quickness or fleetness, but mostly in a flowing and by no means impetuous manner, something like the current of a brook.' It is with the last kind that we have here to do.

"11.—The Minuet, a dance characterized by 'moderate merriment,' as Mattheson asserts. In former times, it regularly began all dances in society. Introduced in the Suites and Partitas, the Minuet is no longer subjected, in time, rhythm, and movement, to the fixed dance-form. It was still more expanded in instrumental music after Bach; but whether Bach's Minuets ought to be played altogether as fast as the later Quartet-Minuets is still doubtful.

"12.—With Bach, the Overture takes the place of the Prelude, when he wishes to introduce a grand piece, and be somewhat more important than usual. Like Handel, he held to the French Overture, to which Lulli gave its form; a largo movement with roulades (which were always played more in a staccato than sustained style) is followed by a fugued piece, allegro. The magnificent Overture at the commencement of the fourth Partita, vol. II, pp. 44–50, is a model. Bach clung to the old custom of repeating the first slow movement only when his composition allowed it; see B. vol. II, p. 122; in other cases he by no means did so.

"13.—Both the Partita (Partie) and the Suite indicate an assemblage of melodies, but are somewhat distinct. The Suite consists only of dance-melodies, in which merry company the Allemande, as a German production, had, for the honor of the thing, the first place, while the others, differing in time and rhythm, followed and thus, as it were, belonged to its suite. Of this kind are the small (so-called French) Suites in the first volume. The grand (so-called English) Suites in the fourth volume have, on the other hand, a rather important Prelude as an introduction, and must, therefore, properly be called Partitas, for, in addition to the dance-group, the Partita possesses other movements of separate invention, and, consequently, forms the transition to the Sonata, and other independent piano-forte music.

"14.—The Passeccaille (in Italian, the Passacaglio) is, likewise, a dance. All commentators assert that it is similar to the Chaconne; but the difference between the two is rather variously laid down. Koch (Lex., 1139) says: 'The real difference between the Chaconne and the Passeccaille is as follows:—the latter must be played with a somewhat slower movement, while the melody must be more agreeable than the former.' Mattheson, however, asserts the direct contrary when he says:—'The Chaconne moves along more slowly and deliberately than the Passeccaille, and not vice versa' (Kern mel. Wissen, 123, and, also, in the Vollk. Capellmeister, II., chap. 13). I must agree with Mattheson, and look upon Koch's explanation simply as the result of his having mistaken the one for the other. The tempo of both dances is rather slow and quick.

"15.—The Passepied agrees with the Minuet, but is more nimble in its movement. Allegro.

"16.—The Polonaise; a Polish dance, in three-four time, of a solemn, grave character, and the movement of which is about equidistant between the Allegro and the Andante.

"17.—The Rigaudon is a merry, joyous dance in alla-breve time, the melody of which, in my opinion, is the prettiest of any; its quality consists in an agreeable and somewhat dallying pleasantry. The Rigaudon, however, is a mongrel, made up of the Gavotte and Bourrée, and may not improperly be a triple or quadruple Bourrée? (Mattheson).

"18.—The Rondo (Rondeau) is marked by an unconstrained, native style, and a tolerably lively tempo, when the contrary is not expressly stated.

"16.—The Sarabande. 'This contains no other emotion of the mind than ambition; its species are, however, distinguished by the fact that the dance-sarabande is comprised in a narrow, and yet, at the same time, more haughty form than the rest of the race; that it admits no roudades, because its grandeur cannot suffer them, but clings, stiffly and firmly, to its seriousness. For playing on the pianoforte and the lute, a person somewhat lowers himself with this kind of melody, employs greater license, nay, even makes doubles or broken work out of it, which we call Variationes (Mattheson, Kern mel. Wiss., 119). The movement, according to this, is slow, even slower than in the Allemande, to which also, in the rich embellishment by grace notes and ornaments, it possesses the greatest similarity.

"20.—The Sinfonia is, properly speaking, a composition for several instruments, and similar to the Concerto Grosso. It generally was employed as an introduction to important vocal pieces, or was played in the intermediate pauses. With regard to the latter case, I could point out in Bach's music many symphonies which are not even four bars long. When Bach composes a Sinfonia for the pianoforte, his intention is to give us a sonorous piece of music similar to the Overture. If it consists of one movement, a moderate tempo must be taken. When it possesses several movements, it generally agrees in tempo with the Overture; thus, for instance, it may be easily perceived that the Sinfonia, vol. ii., p. 15, must, from the 30th bar, be played allegro.

"21.—The Toccata, together with the then-very immature pianoforte-sonata, was regarded as belonging to that kind of music in which the fingers were moved more than the heart, as Mattheson assures us. Let any one see whether this is true of Bach's Toccatas; let him look at the grand artistic movements in F sharp and C minor, vol. ii., p. 80, part 6, and vol. iv.

"The remaining designations, such as Burlesca, Duetto, Echo, Inventio, Preambulum, Scherzo, Variatio, etc., which Bach employs in other places, require no explanation.

"Whoever has endeavored, according to the above instructions, to seize the character of the various pieces, and the proper manner of playing them, will proceed with tolerable certainty in the study of Bach; with more certainty than those who bind themselves down to a prescribed tempo, to prescribed signs of expression, and to a prescribed mode of fingering. With a few exceptions, the tempo is evident from the name of the piece, and so, likewise, is the appropriate manner of playing; for there is more in the name than the modern signs can convey. In these strictly contrapuntal compositions, let all dallying and affected ornament, all coquettish changing from pp to ff, and the like flowery effects, be most especially eschewed; these compositions must be played calmly, clearly, sonorously, and uniformly from beginning to end. In the dance-like and concerted pieces, a greater variety of coloring is appropriate; it is allowable to go as far as the stream of tone allows, or as far as waggishness and humor will extend. For the sake of example, I have included, in the French Suites, the time as fixed by Grienkerl in Peters's excellent edition (vol. vii.); it may serve beginners as a guide, but, as we do not get it from Bach, but only from a connoisseur (though, certainly, a celebrated one) of his works, it cannot be absolutely binding on anybody. Lastly, the fingering offers the least difficulty, if the learner only sets about it in a sensible manner—that is to say, if he begins with what is simple and, comparatively, easy, and proceeds gradually. Hitherto, the Clavier bien tempéré, was the sum total with which people began and with which they left off. It thus came to pass that many burnt their fingers, and experienced a desire for external means of assistance. In the present edition I have exerted myself to restore the natural state of things, such as was undoubtedly intended by Bach himself.

"With regard to the playing, Czerny once gave (in Peters's edition, vol. i., preface) an excellent piece of advice, namely, that the performer should, firstly, even in the most intricate passages, keep his hands as quiet as possible, and secondly, execute every separate part independently of the other, strictly connected and consistently. 'The player,' he adds, 'will then find the trouble required for this, on the piano as well as on the organ, rewarded by the valuable effect produced by a full-toned and flowing style of execution.' Where the above directions are not sufficient, as far as the time is concerned, the following rules may be borne in mind: If the performer, when playing, finds that the counterpoint is obscured, and the series of parts not clear, but entangled in one another, he should take the time slower; if, however, pervading dissonant tones are too prominent and hard, he must play more quickly. The observance of these two rules will prove of great service, especially in all more strictly contrapuntal compositions—such as the Symphonies, in the first; the Variations, in the second; and the Fugues, in the third and fourth volume."

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

A Complaint from the Country.

MR. EDITOR:—I have been a reader of your Journal ever since its first appearance, and through its columns have become acquainted with many things in Art of which I had had no glimpse before.

I live in the country, away up in Hampshire, in a village not visited by a railroad, and seldom by a stage coach. My profession (I sell my own medicines), does not require me to visit Boston, and I know but little of it except through the newspapers. I have, however, from my long acquaintance with your columns, become familiar with great names, and at least with the titles of famed classical compositions.

Indeed, I have often formed a very definite conception of music which I have never heard, and I read the programmes of those most delightful concerts, which have become an established institution in your good city, with an avidity and relish almost equal to the pleasure of actually listening to them. Listening, did I say? I have listened, with the aid of your own interpretation, and my conception, to the Sinfonie Eroica, played by a most wonderful orchestra, in a concert hall, the magnificence of which would cause the brilliancy of the Music Hall to pale and shrink into insignificance beside it.

I have heard and seen an imaginary Lagrange, with a superb troupe of visionary artists, perform the Don Giovanni, in a way to give it new vividness even to Mr. Oulibichiff, and so that it seemed as if the real, once-existent personages had themselves re-visited the earth, and gone through their allotted parts at my bidding.

I know, intimately, most of the resident musicians of your city, and I welcome them with outstretched hand, at each return from their seven-days absence. I take a personal pride, as a countryman, in the praises showered upon William Mason, and the names of Dresel, Satter, Jaell and the "Germanians," have become "household words" to me.

With this preamble, I will relate a recent history, in which some of the above names were actors:

Through the enterprise of some scheming entrepreneur, out-Barnuming Barnum, a bundle of show-bills arrived at our post office, containing a romantic account of the life and adventures of the beautiful "Kirmazinga," an Eastern Princess. This absurd "woolly-horse" story would only have attracted the laugh it merited, but for the accompanying programme, in which the names of Mr. Satter, pianist, and of several gentlemen connected with the Germania Serenade Band, figured largely.

"Surely," says Deacon E——, our chorister, to whom I always lend my paper after reading it myself, "there must be something in this; these names are a sufficient guarantee of the genuineness of this affair." "No, indeed," exclaims little Miss M——, who is going to Boston to take lessons, when the branch railroad through our town is built, "Mr. Satter would not engage in anything beneath his character as an artist." "No, indeed," echo the other readers of your Journal, who take the paper in turn, after the Deacon and myself are done with it.

Full of these considerations—with the Deacon's wagon, (it will carry more than my chaise), and my horse, we set out for the city of M——. Arrived there, we found a large audience awaiting the presence of the performers.

I shall not trouble you with a detailed description of the shabby appearance of this so-called Princess, nor of the smiles which would not be restrained from spreading over the countenances of the players from Boston, as she struggled through the translation of "Ah, non giunge," and "Robert, toi que j'aime."

I had thought I knew something of what was possible upon the piano-forte, but the playing of Mr. Satter was, to me, a wonderful revelation of the art in which Thalberg, Jaell, and our Mason have reaped such high honors. Although my astonishment and delight were such that, upon any other occasion, I would gladly have paid the largest sum my purse could afford, to listen to such a performance, at this time, I could not a moment forget that it formed a part of one of the most shallow impostures that ever made the name of a showman infamous.

My surprise at the finger-feats of the pianist did not equal the astonishment produced by the sudden overturn of all my previous notions of an artist. Could this be a man with that sublime and holy love for his Art, that would cause him sooner to commit a sacrilege, than mutilate the work of a master, or introduce an "unclean thing" in a classical programme? Was this the pure mind to which all clap-trap and humbug were pollution? This, the worthy follower and interpreter of Mozart and Beethoven, and himself a composer of no small pretensions also? Above all, could this be he who, in various letters, "open" and otherwise, has claimed so much from the community as an artist and composer? I need not say that my ideas concerning artists have greatly fallen; that the symphony performances in my halls on a Sunday eve, must be done by artists of my own creation, which shall be "sans reproche," and that I shall revel in a world of tones by myself, unenvying your more favored readers, to whom the appearance of great artists is as familiar as the wax-figures in the Museum, and untroubled by any Delhi Princess, with Barnum-like programme.

Deacon E—— was rather disappointed with the "Orchestra," perhaps not so much from any deficiency on the part of the players, as from the utter inadequacy of six instruments to perform the music promised in the programme. I once heard the Mendelssohn Quintette Club attempt a familiar overture, which failed of its effect from the same cause.

In conclusion, I would recommend to Mr. Satter that, in imitation of many other performers, who endeavor to forestall the public opinion by arraying themselves in long self-imposed titles, he should hereafter announce himself as "the Pianist of the Kirmazinga Troupe."

P. S.—Everything depicted in the above, actually occurred in Lowell, Lawrence and Manchester. If it had been in Boston, you would doubtless have felt called upon to have fully rebuked the actors. We, here in a country place, are almost totally debarred from hearing great artists or great music, and when the only persons capable of giving us really good music, in a respectable manner, stoop to degrade their art by such companionship, it is not only our right but our duty to complain.

Yours Respectfully,

AN UP COUNTRY DOCTOR.

A Letter from Liszt.

[The Pesth papers publish the following extract from a private letter written by Liszt, at Zurich, to Franz Erkel:]

"A wearisome illness kept me a fortnight in bed.—During that period, I conceived the first notions of the 'Symphonische Dichtung,' which is to form the continuation of the Hungaria, and to which your beautiful 'Prayer,' which has grown on me so much, was the inducement. I shall probably bring you the bantling, quite completed, next summer. I must first, however, set about working out my Schiller's Ideale. The four movements, instead of two, are fashioned according to your good advice. By Easter, I will send you the score of the Mass, which is being printed at the Imperial Printing Office. This work, with the improvements, additions, and final Ague in the 'Gloria,' which I wrote out on my arrival here, will please you pretty well. I spent some glorious days with Wagner. His Niebelungen (which he has half finished) is a whole sublime world of which no one has a conception. The four operas are to be ready for production in two years. In truth, my dear friend, you must see and hear them. How does your 'Hunyadi' translation for Weimar get on? I think of being back there in about three weeks, and, if you do not delay too long sending in the score, the work may, as I wish, be still studied in the course of the present season.—When I am once delivered of my 'Hungarian Opera,' I shall beg Count Ráday to be a sort of godfather to it."

MENDELSSOHN AND BERLIOZ.—We find in the London Musical World the following reference to a gossip letter about Berlioz, which we copied from the Paris correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune.

(To the Editor of the Musical World).—Sir: I have read, in more than one memoir of the celebrated critic and composer, M. Berlioz, something to the same purport, more or less, of the following extracts from a very lovely translated essay and biography, which has recently appeared in Dwight's Boston Journal of Music:

"In 1841 he went to Germany, where he had great success; he is far more popular there than he is here. During his tour he gave concerts with Mendelssohn. They would invariably be called out; and at a grand festival given by them, they embraced each other on the stage, and exchanged their bâtons amid loud applause."

I am able to give to the above statement, as a personal friend of the late Felix Mendelssohn, an unqualified denial, which I shall feel obliged by your allowing me to do in your widely-spread columns.

Your obedient servant,

ANTI-PUFF.

P. S.—I enclose my name and address.

WHO WROTE THE NEGRO SONGS.—The principal writer is Stephen C. Foster, author of "Uncle Ned," "O, Susannah," &c. Mr. Foster resides near Pittsburg, where he occupies a moderate clerkship, upon which, and a per centage on the sale of his songs, he depends for a living. He writes the music of his songs, as well as the poetry. These are sung wherever the English language is spoken, while the music is sung wherever men sing. In the cotton fields of the South, among the mines of California and Australia, in the sea-coast cities of China, in Paris, in the London prison, everywhere in fact, his melodies are heard. "Uncle Ned" was the first. This was published in 1845, and reached a sale unknown till then in the music publishing business. Of "The Old Folks at Home," 100,000 copies have been sold in this country, and as many more in England. "My Old Kentucky Home" and "Old Dog Tray," each had a sale of about 70,000. All his other songs have had a great run. All his compositions are simple, but they are natural, and find their way to the popular heart.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 17.—At THALBERG'S Concerts last week, Rossini's Stabat Mater, performed by the New York Harmonic Society, with the Opera troupe and orchestra from the Academy of Music, was the chief attraction. The concert took place in Niblo's Theatre, and on the stage were picturesquely grouped the chorus singers, the players upon the instruments, and the vocal soloists. In the centre sat the four prime donne, PARODI, ANGRI, PATTI and JOHANNSEN, each arrayed in a different style—Parodi, like an angel all in white; Angri, magnificent as a dahlia in dark red; Patti, like a fresh, pretty buttercup, in yellow brocade; and Johannsen, like a moss rose, in delicate pink. At either end of the row of prime donne, sat TIBERINI and MORELLI, looking as faultless and uncomfortable, as gentlemen dressed in elaborate coats and painfully tight white kids, are usually apt to look.

The Oratorio was but indifferently performed. Tiberini seemed, off the stage, quite out of his element, and his Cujus animam was poorly done. The only really fine performances were the Pro peccatis by Morelli, and that divine strain, the Inflammatus, which Parodi rendered with true feeling and appreciation. Some of the singers, even the soloists, appeared to pay no regard to the sacred character of the music they were singing, laughing and whispering to each other during the pauses in their parts, in a manner positively disgraceful. But this was not all. A miscellaneous Concert followed the sublime Oratorio, in which Angri pandered to the commonest musical tastes by introducing as repulsive a style of music as could be allowed in a concert room. Think of the sacrilege! To perform at the same concert the solemn Stabat Mater dolorosa and a coarse R-r-r-r-ataplan song;—to have the holy strains of Quando corpus morietur followed by "Yankee Doodle, with variations!"

Yet such was the taste of the crowded and fashionable audience, that the "Yankee Doodle" was received with bursts of delighted enthusiasm, and encored, while Rossini's glorious music elicited only the conventional award of a few lazy claps.

I called the other day on OLE BULL, who is lying sick at the Prescott House. He had announced a concert at Dodworth's Saloon, and a large number of tickets had been disposed of, when, a few hours before the time appointed for the concert, he was suddenly taken ill with an attack of Chagres fever; his anxiety to play in the evening of course increased his illness, and though at present much better, it is still impossible to say when he will be able to appear in public. On seeing him, almost his first words he uttered were about our trying climate—"unfit for any civilized man." He intends speedily returning to Norway with his son, a young man about twenty, also an accomplished violinist, but who is suffering with very poor health, apparently the effect of our changeable climate. Ole Bull hopes, by giving a series of concerts previous to his departure, to in a degree repair his ruined fortunes, ruined by his unfortunate colonizing speculation. That he may be restored to health and competence, is the earnest wish of many sympathizing friends.

The "American Music Association," which I have previously had an opportunity of writing to you about, is progressing favorably, and has recently appointed as conductor, Dr. CHARLES GUILMETTE, late of the Pyne and Harrison Opera troupe, and now a resident of this city. Several new compositions have been handed in for the next concert, and it is to be hoped that the Society will be successful. It has for its chief aim the encouragement of native musical Art, and though at present young and feeble, may be the nucleus of an American Conservatory of Music, that will in a few years be an honor to the country.

CORA DE WILHORST has given us a most successful rendition of Marie, in Donizetti's Figlia del Reggimento. Though she learned the rôle in about two weeks, her performance exhibits but little lack of study. Her action is very spirited and easy, and the singing lesson is given with considerable effect, though of course she can introduce none of those brilliant tricks of vocalization with which poor Sontag, in the same part, so electrified her audiences. Madame De Wilhorst took a benefit last Wednesday evening, which netted her about $3,000. She will shortly proceed to Italy to study.

There is a prospect of quite an exciting Operatic war. STRAKOSCH will remain entrenched at the Academy of Music with his present troupe, reinforced by valuable additions, while MARETZEK will take his stand at Niblo's, with the Philadelphia Opera Company. The operas will be given at the respective establishments on the same evenings, thus throwing the managers and artists into direct competition. Strakosch vs. Maretzek—Parodi vs. Gazzaniga—Tiberini vs. Brignoli—Morelli vs. Amodio—Patti vs. Aldini—and so on to the end of the chapter. The interest already excited, is intense among the opera-goers, but they may be after all disappointed of the pleasurable excitement of the Wagon of the Operas, by a rumored fasion of the belligerent parties. This is, however, at the present time, doubtful.

TROVATOR.

LOUISVILLE, KY., FEB. 23.—Our "Orpheus" (Männer-Chor) can boast of some really fine voices, and the members possess, what few American Music Societies have, a large amount of perseverance and industry. Mr. E. W. GUNTER is their Conductor. At their last Concert, they rendered some of Mendelssohn's, Abt's, and Zöllner's four-part songs in excellent style. They also gave, what I perceive is frequently sung by our namesake in Boston, Mozart's O Isis und Osiris, and gave it well. One cantata especially, Das Gebet der Erde, by Zöllner, a fine composition, full of effective harmony, and requiring much attention to be bestowed on the light and shade, to render successfully the meaning of the composer, they performed admirably, and in really artistic style. Besides the Choruses, we had the Sextuor, from Lucia, Largo al Factotum, and other Solos by our best amateurs. The Concert proved successful, and gave general satisfaction.

To show that I do not exaggerate the merits of the "Orpheus," I will mention that at the last Musical Festival, held in Cincinnati last June, they carried the palm of victory over all their sister associations. Louisville has sufficient material to produce the "Creation," "Messiah," Stabat Mater, &c., with credit. Four years ago we had an excellent Society, the "Mozart," but alas! after two seasons of success, want of union proved their ruin. Now and then, on especial occasions, and with great labor on the part of the zealous ones, a Concert is given for some church or charitable association, and whatever is thus attempted, is generally successful. Recently the Stabat Mater, by Rossini, was produced by the old members of the Mozart, the Solos all being sustained by amateurs. Quis est homo, Fac ut portem, and the Quartet were rendered beautifully; and the Choruses, as usual, were sung well, in excellent time, and with good effect, the parts all being well balanced. I trust we may again resuscitate the Society, but at present the Orpheus is our only permanent institution; the members of the same know the importance of harmony and discipline much better than their American brethren, as their 7th anniversary has recently been celebrated.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., FEB. 28.—The second of the "Mozart Series," on the 18th, was an excellent concert. The quartet was assisted by a chorus of amateur musicians. Mrs. MOZART was enthusiastically received in "I'm a Merry Zingara," which was charmingly rendered. A Scene from "Elijah"—Mrs. Mozart as the youth, Mr. Mozart as Elijah, amateurs as the people—was rather imperfectly delivered. The part of Elijah was heavy, and the chorus, "Thanks be to God," not half as powerful or distinct as when sung at the concerts of the "Institute." "Dreams," by Mrs. WELLS, of this city, was given with much perfection. We do not agree with one of our critics that Mr. FITZHUGH's accompaniment was heavy. Our friend Jones was remarking that it was well conceived and executed.

The "third and last concert" of the series, on the 20th, introduced the "German Trio," of Boston. Their first piece was a "Grand Trio of Beethoven's." It was given with much expression and effect. The lights and shades were well worked up, and the ear drank deep at this new fountain of sound so suddenly opened. Jones sat quietly through the Trio. He seemed in a sort of dream. Some few seconds after the applause at the close of the Trio had subsided, he suddenly turned and remarked: "How I love Beethoven! his music sets a chord vibrating in my heart whenever I hear it. I recollect the first work of his that I ever publicly performed, was the 'Allegretto' that, from the Symphony in F,' by an orchestra in a neighboring city. I then began to appreciate Beethoven. I had only recognized him as the author of 'Beethoven's favorite waltz,' (so named to make it sell), or some light sentimentality for the piano, but now that I had heard him in a higher sphere, I found that the void in my soul, left untouched by inspirations of other authors, was filled to repletion by the sympathetic breathings of Beethoven's noble spirit."

"You speak my sentiments," said a friend at our left, who had listened to the conversation. "Beethoven is too little appreciated. We seldom find his name among familiar authors on our programmes of concerts here in the country. I think your remark true, that too many only think of him as the author (?) of sentimental waltzes! Why are his Sonatas, his Concertos, &c., left unsung by our amateur pianists?"

"They are left unsung, because to perform them satisfactorily, one must appreciate the feeling of that great master, as the music grew under his inspired pen. In his lighter moods he pleases and attracts, but as his own mysterious soul of harmony bursts on the ear, or wails out as a broken spirit, we can only listen, and by listening learn to hear understandingly."

The Solo Violincello, "Swiss Boy," by Mr. JUNGWICKEL, was well executed, and showed to advantage the gentleman's dexterity as a solo performer, but after the trio the music was weak in idea.

Mr. GAERTNER, in the "Third Concerto by De Beriot," for Violin, gave great satisfaction to the audience, by his masterly rendering.

The programme announced a "fantasia for piano, Listz," by Mr. HAUSE. It was an indifferent thing, calculated to show "agility in fingering," rather than one's capability to translate ideas, (of which the fantasia had but few). We strongly suspect the piece was an impromptu!

The "Skylark." Corner, sung by Mrs. Mozart, was the gem of the solos of the evening, and received a hearty encore. The concert was every way successful, and a fit close to the series. Mr. FITZHUGH, our best resident pianist, performed his accompaniments admirably.

Our concert season this winter closed with a concert by the "Old Folks from Reading," in big coats, little coats; high dresses, low dresses; puffed wigs and knee breeches. AD LIBITUM.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAR. 21, 1857.

NOTICE.

NEW VOLUME.—With one more number our Journal will complete its fifth year. During these five years it has never once failed to make its appearance punctually every Saturday, and has earned, we think, a right not only to continue to live, but to begin to remunerate much better than it has done the incessant, anxious care and brain-work which have thus far kept it up to its first promise: It will live on, if we live. It has always paid its own way, if it has only half paid its editor. Its prospects are improving, and were all its subscribers and advertisers as faithful to their very small obligation as we have been to our great one, we should even now have but little reason to complain.

The sixth year, and eleventh volume of DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC will commence on Saturday, April 4th. We trust we shall have to part company with very few of our present subscribers, many of whom have been with us, warmly and strongly, from the first. We hope, too, to have to add many new names to our list. Let it be understood our terms are payment in advance; for we are weary of serving those who (in some instances for two or three years) have made us not the slightest return, and we can no longer afford to take such risks, or, as experience proves, to bear such certain loss.

Renewals of subscription, and new subscriptions for the sixth year are now in order.

CONCERTS.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The closing concert of the series (Tuesday evening of last week) leaves the best impression. The Chickering Saloon was actually crowded, and by the most attentive and delighted audience of the season. Here is the programme:

- PART I.
1—Quartet in A, No. 5, Mozart.
Allegro—Minuetto—Andante—Finale, Allegro.
2—Piano Trio, in B flat, for Piano, Clarinet and Violoncello, Beethoven.
Messrs. Hamann, Ryan and W. Fries.

- PART II.
3—Tema con Variazioni and Finale from the Posthumous Quartet in D minor, Schubert.
(a. "Frühlinglied," Franz.
4—Songs: (b. "Im wunderschönen Monat Mai."
(c. "Willkommen mein Wald."
Mr. Kreissmann.
5—Second Quintet in B flat, op. 87, Mendelssohn.
Allegro vivace—Allegretto Scherzando—Adagio molto—Finale, Allegro vivace.

The novelty here was the Beethoven Trio, with Clarinet, one of his early works, (op. 11.) It consists of the usual Allegro and Adagio, which are quite fresh and buoyant, in the master's happy mood, with passages of deeper feeling, and for a finale takes a popular Italian melody, very bright and piquant, as a theme for variations such as only Beethoven could write. The reed tones add great brightness to the whole, and blended finely with the strings. The pianist evinced progress, but had not overcome the stiffness of comparatively a beginner. The Mozart Quartet is a thing to wile away all feeling of constraint, care, or common-place. Its Andante is a memorable one, by the magical effect of that throbbing rhythm kept up by way of accompaniment in the violoncello, until one by one the other instruments become possessed with it. Of that mysterious sad march, with variations, by Schubert, and the inspired finale, we can only say that we never enjoyed it more, and never felt so clearly before, except when listening to his Symphony, the poetic soul and genius of the man. The second Quintet is one of the strongest and most impassioned works of Mendelssohn, and only grows on one by repetition. The quaint, wild ballad-like melody of the Scherzando is quite captivating.

Mr. KREISSMANN, with the admirable accompaniment of OTTO DRESEL, gave very great pleasure by his truly expressive singing of the finely imaginative songs of Robert Franz.

In congratulating the Club on their eighth season, so successfully closed, we are happily reminded that there still remains their Annual Benefit Concert, which will take place shortly.

The ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB gave, on Saturday evening, the last of their three delightful concerts. Their success, decided at the outset, has gone on crescendo. Forced by the overflowing audience to go to the Melodeon, which holds at least 1,200, they found that also filled. And a more intelligent and truly music-loving audience of that number, has not been seen at any Boston concert. The entire programme passed off with the greatest zest.

It is a rare treat to hear thirty or forty good male voices, blended so perfectly, sing with such precision, spirit, careful light and shade, as these have been trained to do by Mr. KREISSMANN. If we should question any point of style in their performance, it would be a slightly excessive tendency to the staccato, a cutting off of notes too short, sometimes. They gave us six of their German part-songs. The first, by Gade, called Waldlied, or "Forest Song," is full of bright early morning jubilation, and lively sympathy with Nature.

The next was Mendelssohn's "Turkish Drinking Song," a Bacchanalian, in an Oriental, minor strain, at once quaintly jovial, sentimental and superstitious, and of a choice vinous flavor, brightening into the major at the fifth line, where tenor solo, (Kreissmann), alternates with chorus:

Out with thee! hence with thy face so blue!
No wine from a grim looking menial,
Let him who wine brings be jovial too,
And vex not the wine elf so genial;
O come pretty maiden, hither to me,
Why stand there timid and fearful,
Thou shalt my cup bearer henceforth be,
Then the wine shall be sparkling and cheerful.
O prithee come, O prithee come.
Out with thee! hence with thy face so blue, &c.

"The Voyage," also by Mendelssohn, to words by HEINE, woos one irresistibly to its own mood, by its rich sombre harmony, and dreamy melancholy measure.

The other part-songs were Das Kirchlein, (The Chapel), a singularly rich and sombre piece of tone-coloring, in the latter part of which a portion of the deep basses, answered by tenors, make a sort of tolling accompaniment to the rest; a beautiful piece of slow and tranquil harmony, introduced for an encore; and for a finale to the concert, the German National Hymn: Wo ist des Deutschen Vaterland? composed by Reichardt.

This was sung with real patriotic fire, and made a great impression. Perhaps it was taken a little too rapidly than is the custom, but it touched the right chord, and that strongly.

Mr. Kreissmann had arranged his beautiful serenade, published some years since as a solo: Tomme heraus, for four male voices, and it sounded nicely so, although the singing seemed a little mid.

Miss DOANE never looked or sang better, and her selections were excellent. That lovely melody from Mozart's "Figaro," Deh vieni, non tardar, o gioja bella, which was one of the things in which Jenny Lind's singing was most heavenly, as never since been sung to us so satisfactorily by Miss Doane. She was true to the exquisite purity, the simplicity and heart-felt tenderness and rapture of the melody. Sontag injured it by ornament. Miss Doane's voice only lacked one or two good low tones in a single passage; otherwise her fresh, sympathetic, pure soprano was well suited to the song, and she had carefully studied the intention of the music till she made it her own, and sang it with true fervor. OTTO BRESEL kindly volunteered the piano accompaniment, which he had taken the pains to arrange expressly from the orchestral score, reproducing its essential beauties with consummate skill and taste. A repetition was inevitable. In the duet from "Fidelio," which she sang with Mr. Kreissmann: O namenlose Freude—the rapturous duet in which the long separated wife and husband recognize each other in the prison of the latter, an orchestra was much more needed; the piano, admirably as it was played, failed to convey the whole idea; although the effect was bettered by change of position when the duet was repeated. This glorious music, and was finely sung. Miss Doane sang also, most acceptably, the song, Die Lotos Blume, by Robert Franz, in German, and a bright little Rhenish Volkslied by Mendelssohn, in English: "Of all the pretty arlings," &c.

Quite an enjoyable item in the programme was the duet from "Don Giovanni": Eh via, buffone, from the beginning of the second act, where Leporello threatens to leave the service of the Don, and gets laughed at by him, sung by Herren ANGERFELD and SCHRAUBSTAEDTER. It is a buffo piece, in the Italian rapid parlando style. Bulibicheff says: "Let none but Italians sing it; translate it and it ceases to exist." Nevertheless it was sung with gusto and we enjoyed it much, though the German nein, nein, nein, for no, no, no, and other syllabic iterations did indeed sound little awkwardly. The MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB contributed the quaint Scherzo Allegretto, preceded by the Adagio, from Mendelssohn's second Quintet, and a scena from Robert le Diable, in which the flute and clarinet took part quite effectively.

Long as the concert was, we think all went away reluctantly, and it was a common remark that, were the Orpheus to give three more concerts, all would wish to go to them. The announcement of another Concert by the Orpheus, a compliment to Miss DOANE and to Mr. KREISSMANN, to take place next Wednesday evening, will of course be gladly hailed by all who owe so much pleasure to these genuine artists.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. In the two last Afternoon Concerts, we have had another hearing of Schubert's glorious Symphony, by two instalments: at the first, the first and third movements; at the last, the second and fourth, i. e. the Andante, and that marvellously inspired and exciting Finale. We are sure the Symphony won many new admirers. Our friend, who writes of music in the Atlas, and who generally writes so well that it is a pleasure to find ourselves agreeing with him far oftener than we differ, makes a good-humored allusion to our comments on his condemnation, or rather faint praise, of this Schubert Symphony. He says:

"We beg to suggest that a man can never be reasoned out of an impression which he has received while in a candid state of mind. If a musical work seems to him merely pretty and lyrical, no amount of argument will make it grand in his recollection."

The object of our writing was not at all to alter his impression, which was doubtless honest; but to do justice to a noble work, so strangely unappreciated by many who are regarded as in some sense leaders of opinion by the readers of newspaper criticisms. It was to show our public that there are also other impressions about this matter, and that the weight of impressions is mainly with the Symphony, as one of the noblest works of genius in that form.

The two concerts were also enriched by Weber's Overture to "Oberon," and Rossini's to the "Siege of Corinth," and by a plenty of bright dance music, operatic arrangements, &c., ending with Mr. ZERRAHN's "Carnival." The audiences do not begin to fall off, but evince more and more interest in the music.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE "MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM" MUSIC.—My attention was called to an article in one of the evening papers, a few days since, alluding to a performance in our city of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," wherein it was stated that the music to this play was composed by MENDELSSOHN, at the age of sixteen. Now as far as the overture is concerned, this is indeed true, it having been completed in the latter part of the year 1826. It was during the summer of 1843 that Mendelssohn found himself nearly prostrated, mentally and physically, from the almost incessant toil and anxiety which his professional labors had brought upon him—and at the earnest solicitation of his friends, he consented to retire for a time to Switzerland, there hoping to obtain the repose which he so much needed. It was here, while sojourning on the banks of Lake Geneva, that he took upon himself the task of completing the music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," the overture to which had been given to the world seventeen years before. Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with Mendelssohn's music, was performed for the first time at Potsdam, (a short distance from Berlin), on the 12th of October, 1843, in the private theatre connected with the summer residence of Frederic William, King of Prussia. N. B. C.

New Music.

(From Russell & Richardson, 291 Washington St.)

S. THALBERG. Compositions Célèbres. No. 3. Op. 66. Introduction and Variations on the Barcarolle of the Opera, L'Elisire d'Amore, of DONIZETTI. 23 pp. price $1.

No. 5. Op. 67. Grande Fantaisie on motives from the Opera, Don Pasquale, of DONIZETTI. 23 pp. price $1.25.

Two more of Thalberg's most popular, most graceful and most difficult concert pieces. It is useless to speak of them: you must hear him play them. Most of our readers have heard him; many will like to possess a fair authentic copy and remainder of the music, though comparatively few (and yet a goodly number) will undertake to master it in some measure with their own fingers. His Don Pasquale Serenade is a great favorite, and never has that melody seemed so fresh to us as in Thalberg's treatment. As to Messrs. R. & R.'s editions, they present altogether the most clear and beautiful specimens of music engraving, that have made their appearance in this country. The ornamental title pages (differing in style with each number) are tasteful and elegant enough to suggest comparison with the best foreign publications.

FERDINAND BEYER. Op. 134. Les Plaisirs de la Jeunesse. A collection of very easy modern Dances for Piano. No. 1. La Polka; 2. La Valse; 3. La Schottisch; 6. Le Quadrille. Each 5 pages, price 25 cts.

C. ZERRAHN. Traviata Quadrille, for Piano, on themes from VERDI's new Opera. Pp. 7, price 30 cts.

2. Concordia Quadrille, pp. 7. 25 cts.

Brilliant and taking; with a true dance accent. The Concordia has a couple of ad libitum flute-parts to one of its movements.

F. BURGMUELLER. Grand Waltz from Le Prophète. Being No. 11 of "The Varieties," a series of 12 pieces. Pp. 11. 50 cts.

An introduction, consisting of the pastoral Andantino, followed by the second motive of the March du sacre, leads to some of the graceful dances of the skating scene.

TH. OESTEN. Elegant Impromptu on Pepita's March. 30 cts.

G. BEMIS. Kitty Clyde. Song with Guitar. 3 pages. Being No. 23 of the "Guitarist's Repertoire."

(From C. Breusing, New York.)

S. THALBERG. Op. 72. "Home, sweet Home," varié pour le Piano. Pp. 14. Price $1.00.

Souvenir d'Amérique: Valses brillantes, for Piano. Pp. 17. $1.

Two of Thalberg's latest works, composed here in America. His exquisite treatment of "Sweet Home" has given delight wherever he has played, and will be much sought for. His Waltzes have a fascinating grace and brilliancy, that places them along with those of Strauss, Labitzky and Lanner. They are difficult for waltzes, but not difficult for Thalberg music.

Musical Chit-chat.

THALBERG is with us again, accompanied by Madame D'ANGRI, Madame JOHANNSEN, and Herr SCHREIBER. He gives his first evening concert on Tuesday, at the Music Hall; the second on Thursday. For the pieces to be played, or sung, see advertisement. Also, three Matinées, at Chickering's, are announced, for Wednesday, Friday and Monday, at 1 P. M., when he will play some of his own choicest pieces, with selections from Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., to a select audience, paying $5 for the series. Particulars below. . . . We are happy to see the suggestion of a benefit concert to CARL ZERRAHN very generally and warmly responded to. . . . The musical "uccelli," "sweet faces, belli, belli," who sang for "poor CORELLI," at that charming private concert, were as many as fifty, and not fifteen, as our treacherous types made it.

Those who would find a rich supply of Easter music, are referred to Novello's advertisement in another column. . . . A new military band has been organized in this city, under the name of the "Germania Band," composed of members of the Germania Serenade Band, and other excellent musicians. They will make their debut at a grand Military Concert, in the Music Hall, under the auspices of the "Boston City Guard," next Saturday evening. . . . By the way, leaders of bands will find something to their purpose in the announcement of Messrs. Boosey & Co., of London, in another column.

The STRAKOSCH Troupe, in New York, performed Don Giovanni last night, with PARODI as Donna Anna, and Mme. WILBORST as Zerlina. . . . THALBERG, with the German Opera Troupe, the United Sängerbund, and others, gave this week a concert and opera combined, in aid of the German Society. The programme included two acts of Fidelio, the Conspiracy chorus from "Tell," the Tannhäuser overture, &c., &c.... At the splendid new Academy of Music in Philadelphia, the operas have been: March 11th, Il Trovatore; 13th, La Traviata; 14th, Traviata; 16th, Traviata. The bust of MOZART surmounts the stage! The prima donna, Mme. GAZZANIGA, seems to gain favor.... A new pianist is reported in New York, as just from Germany, who "combines the strength of Gottschalk, the grace of Timm, and the delicacy of Thalberg." His name is SCHMEISSER.

The Charlestown Academy of Music, an amateur association, under the direction of Mr. Wm. M. BYRNES, gave a good private performance, week before last, of Romberg's "Transient and Eternal," Mozart's 12th Mass, and Neukomm's Chorus from the "Hymn of the Night."... They have builded them a noble hall in Worcester, Mass.—that is, the Worcester Mechanics' Association have done it, to illustrate their art and handicraft, and make a hall for their own and other exhibitions and great meetings, which is also to serve for a splendid music hall. It is said to be larger than any music hall in the United States. It was inaugurated musically, with Miss PHILLIPS and an orchestra from Boston, on the 19th inst.... Haydn's "Seasons" has been performed by the Musical Institute, at Troy, N. Y.

Mr. F. N. CROUCH, as he now modestly calls himself, and no longer the portentous "Professor F. Nicholls Crouch," seems to be very active in the good cause at Washington, D. C., his present abiding place, where he gives "Historical, Biographical Sketches and readings on the Science and Progress of Music, and the works of early masters, copiously illustrated," at his Academy of Music. The programme to the fourth of the course, (Feb. 26), contains songs, &c., from Handel, Pergolesi, Purcell, Schubert, Shield, Dr. Arne, Storace, Balfe, old English and Irish melodies, &c. Mr. C. will devote one of these evenings to "the portraiture of his own MSS. written to the West."... Fitzgerald's City Item, (Philadelphia), seconds our suggestion of regular Organ Concerts, and promises a series of articles on Organs and Organists in Philadelphia.

The quid-nuncs do not seem quite to have settled it among them whether Liszt shall come to America, or turn monk in a Hungarian convent. We fancy he will keep his own counsel and remain very well contented where he is, in Weimar. It is said he thinks something of gaining money, but not everything—and "will not play," as he says, "where he may be stared at as a rara avis, but not understood or appreciated as an artist." This is an idea which very few virtuosi endorse in our day. Liszt is an artist of rare sensitiveness, and no man is less mercenary; his generous disposition, above all, to his brother artists, is proverbial.... FELICIEN DAVID, who composed the "Desert," announces "The End of the World" as nearly ready.... VERDI has gone to Italy, to bring out his "Simone Boccanera."

The Havana correspondent of the New York Express, after speaking in terms of praises of Mme. Lagrange, tells the following entertaining story of Brignoli:—

"Brignoli, too, has done wonders. Think of it,—Brignoli the insouciant, has been found to sing,—as he can sing,—well. He really exerted, himself stopped flirting and took to study; par consequence, he has learned two good things, how to study and to behave himself. On his first appearance before the discriminating Creole and Spanish audience of Havana in the rôle of Edgardo, he sang no better than he would have done on the stage of the Academy of Music. What was the consequence? No expression of disapprobation was given, for a hiss is mauvaise ton in Havana, but, one by one, the Spaniard and Cuban, left the theatre, until, in the last thrilling scene, Brignoli found he had to sing to empty boxes. Annoyed and mortified at such an exhibition of want of appreciation, he flew to a sympathizing friend for an explanation. It was given in four words:—

"Mon ami, you sing false—you have no heart in your notes—you do not exert yourself—you are passionless, and my compatriots do not pardon such faults a second time."

"Mais, ce n'est pas ma faute—La Grange—she is cold—she freezes me. I cannot sing with her—she is not passionnée." [!]

"Ah! ca—bien, nous verrons." And the sympathizing friend seeks La Grange, advises her of Brignoli's complaint of her, which caused the fair cantatrice much amusement. She determines to be very ardent the following evening to prove to Brignoli that his bad singing was not to be laid to her charge. Brignoli meantime had arrived at a similar conclusion. It is needless to tell how well Sonnambula was given that night, when the tenor and prima donna were striving to rival each other, both in voice and spirit. There were no empty benches that night and the stage was completely carpeted with flowers, while the theatre rang again with the repeated bravos.

Advertisements.

THALBERG'S CONCERTS. MUSIC HALL.

The First Concert, TUESDAY, March 24th.

CARD OF THE MANAGEMENT.

The public are respectfully informed that Mr. THALBERG will give a limited number of Concerts, on which occasion he will make his last appearance this season. The Management is determined to make these Concerts as brilliant as possible, and no effort will be spared to present in each a highly artistic Programme.

The following Artists will appear in the first Concert:

MR. THALBERG;

MADAME D'ANGRI,

(Cantatrice di Camera to the Emperor of Austria);

MADAME JOHANNSEN,

(Prima Donna from the German Opera,) who is engaged for two evenings;

MR. SCHREIBER,

(Solo Trumpet Player to the King of Hanover.)

CONDUCTOR,.....SIG. ABELLA.

MR. THALBERG

Will play Fantasia: Prayer of Moses—Don Giovanni—Elixir d'Amore, and Tarantella.

Mme. D'ANGRI

Will sing Arias: Betty—Villu du Regiment—the Ricci Valtz, and the Ratanian.

Mme. JOHANNSEN

Will sing Aria: Robert le Diable—Gumpet's Valtz—The Swallows, and Kücken's Volkellied.

MR. SCHREIBER will play two brilliant solos.

Tickets $1 to all parts of the Hall. Seats secured without extra charge. The sale of seats will commence each morning at 9 o'clock, at the Music Store of Russell & Richardson, 221 Washington St.

Tickets to be had at the door. Doors open at 7½; to commence at 8 o'clock.

On WEDNESDAY, First Matinée at Chickering's.
On THURSDAY, Second Concert at the Music Hall.

ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB.

The Members of the ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB respectfully inform their friends that they will give a

COMPLIMENTARY CONCERT

—TO—

Miss LUCY A. DOANE & Mr. A. KREISSMANN, TO TAKE PLACE

AT THE MELODEON.

On Wednesday Evening, March 25th, 1857.
The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETT CLUB will kindly assist.
[Particulars hereafter.

BOSTON MUSIC SCHOOL.

The object of this institution is to furnish a solid musical education in all its branches, practical and theoretical, to those who intend fitting themselves for the profession, either as artists or teachers.

Instruction will be given in the following departments,—System of Notation, Harmony, Counterpoint and Fugue, Composition with reference to Musical Form and Instrumentation, Vocalization, Practice in Chorus Singing, Piano Forte, Violin, and any of the Orchestral Instruments. Each pupil will be required to devote himself practically, either to the cultivation of the voice, or to some one instrument, as the main object of his study, with a view to artistic excellence as a solo performer; and, as incidental to this, and necessary to a thorough knowledge of his art, some insight into theory, and a sufficient practice of the Piano Forte to enable him at least to accompany, will also be deemed essential.

There will be two terms each year, commencing on the first Mondays of April and October, and continuing twelve weeks. A pupil may be admitted at any stage of his musical progress, and commence with whichever class the board of instruction may deem him qualified to enter.

Certain evenings in the week will be appointed for the practice of chorus singing by the whole school united, and also for solo performance, vocal and instrumental, before an assembly of invited friends.

The price of tuition will be $20 a term, payable in advance at the commencement of each term, and $3 entrance fee.

The school will go into operation the first Monday in April next. The classes will be formed on the Saturday previous at 11 o'clock A. M. Mercantile Hall, Summer St.

Board of Instruction:—B. F. BAKER, J. W. ADAMS, LEVI P. HONER, and J. C. D. PARKER.

For further information address B. F. BAKER, No. 4 Rowe Place.

THALBERG'S MATINÉES MUSICALES,

—AT—

MESSRS. CHICKERING & SONS' PIANO WAREHOUSE.

MR. THALBERG WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION MATINÉES,

WEDNESDAY, March 25; FRIDAY, March 27; and MONDAY, March 30.

The price of a Subscription Ticket (the room holding but 250 persons) has been fixed at $5 each, which will admit the subscribers to all the three Matinées.

[The Piano being placed in a manner that all seats are equally desirable for hearing and seeing, it has been thought advisable not to reserve seats.]

Hour of Commencement, 1 o'clock P. M. The Doors will be opened precisely at half past 12.

The sale of the subscription tickets will commence on Saturday, March 21st, at Russell & Richardson's, No. 221 Washington Street. No tickets to be had at the door.

Scheme of the Three Matinées.

FIRST MATINÉE. 1—Fantasia Sonnambula; 2—Andante; 3—Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp, minor; 4—Mozart's, from Il Trovatore, on the Alexandre Organ; 5—Chopin's Marche Funebre; 6—Home, sweet Home; 7—Elixir d'Amore

SECOND MATINÉE. 1—Fantasia Don Giovanni; 2—Etude (Repeated Notes); 3—Tarantella; 4—Finale (Puritani) on the Alexandre Organ; 5—Semiramide; 6—Concert Waltzes; 7—Lucresia Borgia.

THIRD MATINÉE. 1—Prayer of Moses; 2—Etude La Legerie; 3—Barcarole; 4—Airs Russes; 5—Two of Mendelssohn's Songs without words; 6—The Last Rose of Summer; 7—Masaniello.

[M. THALBERG will be the only performer.]

ORCHESTRAL UNION.

The above Society respectfully inform the musical public that they will give a Series of

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS,

At the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, commencing on Wednesday, the 14th of January, 1857. There will be a large Orchestra, composed of the best resident musicians.

CARL ZERRAHN,.....Conductor.

For programme, see papers of the day.

Packages containing Six Tickets, $1; Single Tickets, 25 cts. To be had at the music stores of B. H. Wade, Russell & Richardson, Tolman, and at the door.

Doors open at 2; Concert to commence at 3 o'clock.

PIANO-FORTES.

JACOB CHICKERING, 300 Washington Street, Boston,

WOULD invite his friends and the public generally to examine his new and elegant style of PIANO-FORTES, which for purity, firmness, and sweetness of tone, as well as for neatness of touch, completeness of action, and durability, are second to none manufactured in this country.

Our facilities for manufacturing are such, that we can afford to furnish instruments to purchasers on as reasonable terms as they can be obtained elsewhere.

A. NEWHALL & CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO THE LATE D. B. NEWHALL.)

RESPECTFULLY inform their friends and the public, that, having purchased the entire stock of the late D. B. Newhall, they will continue the business at the old stand; and having great facilities for manufacturing, they are now prepared to receive orders for the justly celebrated instruments of their predecessor, with all the modern improvements.

Their instruments will be made in the most faithful and perfect manner, as the proprietors themselves superintend the manufacture, and having had many years personal experience, with the late D. B. Newhall, in manufacturing Piano-Fortes, are determined to make none but the best instruments.

Persons in want of a superior article, are respectfully requested to give us a call.

Warerooms, 344 Washington Street.

ALFRED NEWHALL. JOHN R. MULLIN. NELSON S. REED.

Important to Conductors, Masters and Leaders of Bands.

BOOSEY & SONS, OF LONDON,

BEG to announce that they will forward, postage-free, to any part of the United States a complete Catalogue of the contents of their celebrated Musical Journals for Military Band, Stringed Band, and Brass Band.

These three works have been in course of publication many years, and now comprise the most extensive repertoire of STANDARD & MODERN OPERAS, MARCHES, QUICK-STEPS, DANCES, &c.,

Arranged by C. Boosey, (Band Master Fusilier Guards,) and other eminent Professors. A number of each Journal is published every month.

There are now published 120 numbers of the Military Journal, (for a reed band,) price 15s. each; 60 numbers of the Brass Band Journal, price 7s. each; and 70 numbers of the Orchestral Journal, (for stringed band,) price 6s. each. The Orchestral Journal consists of Dance music only.

An allowance of one third off the marked price is given to the profession and trade. All orders must be accompanied with a remittance payable to

BOOSEY & SONS, MUSIC PUBLISHERS,
24 and 28 HOLLES ST., LONDON. (Eng.)

FIRST PREMIUM PIANO-FORTES.CHICKERING & SONS

Have received the following awards for their exhibition of

PIANO-FORTES

At the Fairs of 1856:

FROM THE

Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association

FOR THE

BEST GRANDS, SEMI-GRANDS, and PARLOR GRANDS,

"For most decided and meritorious Improvements,"

THE GOLD MEDAL.FOR THE BEST SQUARE PIANOS,
THE SILVER MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST PIANO-FORTE CASES,
THE SILVER MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
BRONZE MEDAL.*FOR THE BEST SPECIMEN OF JIG-SAWING, BRONZE MEDAL.

FROM THE

American Institute, New York,

FOR THE

BEST GRAND PIANO, THE GOLD MEDAL.

FROM THE

*Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society,
THE HIGHEST PREMIUM,
A SILVER MEDAL.*

ALSO,

At the Illinois State Fair,
THE HIGHEST PREMIUM,
A SILVER MEDAL.

This House was established in 1823, by JONAS CHICKERING, and up to the present time has furnished 19,000 PIANOS. For the exhibition of these Pianos in the United States and in England, they have been awarded—

Eleven Gold Medals,
Seventeen Silver Medals,
Four Bronze Medals.*WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.*JAMES W. VOSE'S
PREMIUM PIANO-FORTES.

A SILVER PRIZE MEDAL
Was awarded for these Pianos at the last Great Exhibition in Boston, in competition with the best makers in the country, for their fine musical tone and perfect action. Also,

A BRONZE MEDAL,
For the superiority and beauty of the exterior. Every instrument purchased from this establishment will be warranted to give full and perfect satisfaction.

Warerooms 335 Washington St., corner West St.,
BOSTON.*WILLIAM GOOCH,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
AT JAMES W. VOSE'S, No. 335 WASHINGTON STREET.*S. B. BALL,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
Rooms at Rev. A. A. Miner's Church, School Street, Boston.*EDWARD L. BALCH,*Anthems for the coming Season.*Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.EASTER-TIDE.*BOYCE.—IF WE BELIEVE THAT JESUS DIED. Verse, A. S. Vocal score, 83 cts; Vocal parts, 19 cts.HELMORE and NEALE.—CAROLS FOR EASTER-TIDE. Edited by the Rev. THOS. HELMORE and the Rev. J. M. NEALE. 18mo. 13c. Post free, music folio, $1.13.HANDEL.—I KNOW THAT MY REDEEMER LIVETH. Soprano solo, 19c.

—Since by man came death. 13c. Vocal parts, 50c.

—Behold, I tell you a mystery. Recit. a. } 19c.

—The trumpet shall sound. Air, b.

—Then shall be brought to pass. Recit.

—O Death, where is thy sting. Duet, A. T. }

—But thanks be to God. Chorus.

—Ther shall the eyes.—He shall feed his flock. Air, 18c.

—His yoke is easy. Chorus, 19c.

—Behold the Lamb of God; Chorus. He was despised: Air, A. Vocal score, 25c. Vocal parts, 16c.

HERMAN.—JESUS CHRIST IS RISEN TO-DAY.— (Hymn,) 89c.

—Lift up your heads. Anthem, 68c.

JACKSON, (Masham.)—CHRIST OUR PASSOVER. 13c. Vocal parts, 18c.KENT.—HEAR MY PRAYER. Verse, two trebles, and chorus. Folio, 19c. Octavo, 6c. Chorus parts, 8c.

—The Lord is my Shepherd. Verse for treble or tenor and bass, with chorus, 60c. Vocal parts, 25c.

MONK, W. H.—THE EASTER HYMN, "Jesus Christ is risen to-day." Cheadle Prize Composition. 18c.NORRIS, THOS.—HEAR MY PRAYER. Treble solo, with chorus, 44c.NOVELLO.—THE EASTERN HYMN, newly adapted and variously harmonized, as Solo, Trio, Quartet, and Chorus. 25c. Class copy, 3c.

—The Lord is my strength, 19c. Vocal parts, 18c. Class copy, in score, 3c.

PALESTRINA.—BEHOLD THE LAMB OF GOD. A. A. T. T. B. 81c.SEWELL.—EASTER HYMN. 25c.STROUD.—HEAR MY PRAYER. Four voices. Vocal score, 44c. Vocal parts, 25c.WEBBER.—CHRIST BEING RAISED FROM THE DEAD. Vocal score, 19c.

Dedicated (by permission) to the Lord Bishop of Oxford.

CAROLS FOR EASTER-TIDE.

*. In consequence of the great success attending the CAROLS FOR CHRISTMAS-TIDE, there are now ready, by the same Authors, and to be published in the same form,

CAROLS

FOR

EASTER-TIDE,

Set to ancient Melodies by the Rev. THOMAS HELMORE, M. A. Words, principally in imitation of the original, by the Rev. J. M. NEALE, M. A.

WITH MELODIES.

18mo size, sewed.....13
Ditto, in packets of 50.....5 00
Ditto, Compressed four Vocal Parts.....25WITH VOICE-PARTS AND PIANO-FORTE ACCOMP'T.
Folio music size.....1 13

THE WORDS ONLY.

32mo. sewed.....08
Ditto, in packets of 50.....1 25

These Carols may be sung by a Solo voice, with Accompaniment of the Piano and Organ, in which form they are printed in Music Folio. Ad libitum Vocal Parts for Alto, Tenor, and Bass, have been added, in order that, when these voices are present, the harmony may be rendered complete without an instrument.

JOE PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.HALLET, DAVIS & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Parlor Grand,
and Square*PIANO FORTES,

WITH THEIR

PATENT SUSPENSION BRIDGE AND GRAND ACTION.

409 Washington Street, Boston,

(Near Boylston Market.)

Will soon be Published:

COOKE'S CELEBRATED METHOD OF SING-ING. A new and improved edition.INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE GERMAN CON-*CERTINA, with a Collection of popular music arranged for that instrument.In Press: INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE ENG-*LISH CONCERTINA.

Oliver Ditson & Co., 115 Washington St.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,J. C. D. PARKER,Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmony,
3 HAYWARD PLACE.OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
Teacher of the Piano and Singing,
U. S. HOTEL.*SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Gives Instruction in Singing.

Residence No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Piano-Forte Instruction.Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE,
RESIDENCE, 55 HANCOCK STREET.*G. ANDRÉ & CO.,Dépôt of Foreign and American Music,
306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,*

Agents of J. André, Offenbach, Publisher of the complete Editions of Beethoven's, Clementi's, Haydn's and Mozart's works.

WILLIAM A. JOHNSON,
ORGAN BUILDER,
WESTFIELD, MASS.*WILLIAM SCHULTZE,
GIVES Instruction on the VIOLIN, the PIANO-FORTE, and in the THEORY OF MUSIC. Address at his residence, No. 1 Winter Place, or at the Music Stores.*HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, M.*SCHARFENBERG & SONS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.*J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.*C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.*J. H. HIDLEY,
PUBLISHER OF MUSIC,
And Dealer in Musical Merchandise,
544 BROADWAY, ALBANY.*GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
(Late at St. Paul's Church.)
ORGANIST OF SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CH.
ALBANY, N. Y.*DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.*TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 260.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1857.

VOL. X. No. 26.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By RUSSELL & RICHARDSON, 291 Wash'n St.
" CLAPP & CORY, Providence, R. I.
" C. HREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 306 Chestnut St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELIOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

NOTICE.

The sixth year, and eleventh volume of DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC will commence on Saturday, April 4th. We trust we shall have to part company with very few of our present subscribers, many of whom have been with us, warmly and strongly, from the first. We hope, too, to have to add many new names to our list. Let it be understood our terms are payment in advance; for we are weary of serving those who (in some instances for two or three years) have made us not the slightest return, and we can no longer afford to take such risks, or, as experience proves, to bear such certain loss.

Renewals of subscription, and new subscriptions for the sixth year are now in order.

Garrick, Kean, Booth, Rachel, Mrs. Kemble.

Mr. Verplanck's interesting article upon GARRICK, in the last Crayon, induces us to say a few words of actors and acting. Some general distinctions became indispensable in assigning a place to RACHEL, as it is evident that they must again in the case of Miss HERON, whom we hope shortly to see, and of whom the very able critics of the N. Y. Courier and Evening Post express such diverse opinions. It seems strange that when less than a century has passed since Garrick died, and when he was the first eminent English actor whose name will be forever associated with the great statesmen, artists and men of letters of his own time, we should really know nothing of the secret of his power and the characteristics of his genius. Such friends as Johnson, Goldsmith and Burke have left nothing but general expressions of admiration, and whether he had creative and interpretative genius as an actor of Shakspeare, or whether he was what Macaulay (in his late life of Dr. Johnson) would make him—only the most incomparable and versatile of mimics—no one can determine. Mr. Verplanck's interesting article throws no new light upon this question. No William Hazlitt or Richard H. Dana (senior) of Garrick's time has (as they have in the case of the elder Kean) given us his genius re-presented imaginatively and distinctively. That kind of criticism did not then exist in England. It is only necessary to turn to John Philip Kemble and Macready to see that Macaulay may be substantially right, and that Garrick, like them, may have done for Shakspeare all that full and graceful appreciation and rendering of details, intelligent and elaborate study and admirable elocution can do, without that genius which in the elder KEAN and BOOTH struck, with true imaginative conception, intuitively and directly to the centre of the natures of Shakspeare's creations, and embodied them with such truth and with such complete abandonment and merging of the actor's own individuality, that he was lost in transformation.

The first method is analytic, and the actor studies a part superficially, and plays the inference, so that characters become little better than generalities; the latter is synthetic and creative, and the conceptions as played become concrete embodiments. Actors of the first class, like almost all of our summer painters among the White Mountains, are mere copyists of nature; this is their merit, and when they attempt more, it is very clearly their limitation; those of the latter, like Turner, give imaginative realizations. When we hear actors of consummate talent, like Kemble and Macready, we can admire grace of gesture, beauty of tone, exquisite rendering of particular passages, and can come from the theatre to talk of an admirable "reading" of Hamlet or Othello, and to gather up golden fragments for memory; when we hear actors of consummate genius, like the elder Kean and Booth, we see face to face Hamlet or Othello as an overpowering presence and fearful reality; we are too much lost in the awful problems and trials of the man before us, whose life and struggles of thought and passion are realized visibly to our senses and imaginatively to our sympathies, to be able coolly to criticize and admire details, though full of the "unbought grace" of nature, and we come away forgetful of the actor and overcome by Shakspeare as brought home to us by the actor's embodiment, forgetful of details, in that we have "plucked out the heart of the mystery" to which details, however exquisite, are trifles—and, instead of trying from fragmentary suggestions to construct a consistent Hamlet or Othello, we have one, grasped and embodied intuitively, imaginatively and with unerring reference to the central laws of his nature, by which to reconcile old critical difficulties and symmetrize seeming disproportions. Booth's acting of Hamlet gave one more insight into his nature than all criticisms of Hamlet from Dr. Johnson up to Schlegel and Coleridge. It gave him at once unity and reality, though of course we do not mean to say that it conclusively settled those great questions as to Hamlet which have been the puzzles of great thinkers. These must remain open forever.

We have used the word "intuitively" in no vague sense. To make our meaning plain, we shall refer to that kind of creative genius in which or near which no actor can ever be classed. We believe in "instantaneousness of conception"—but to have any clear idea of Shakspeare creating Hamlet, of Napoleon flashing out the most marvellous combinations in the exigencies of battle, of Turner seeing in his mind, before he painted, sky and cloud greater than the temple of Paestum, over which he hung them, one must fully recognize precedent labor, mastery of detail, assimilation of resources into mind and character—vast, rapid, and as impossible to mere talent as the completed creations themselves. No such man was ever the mere "vehicle of inspiration." Newton or Leibnitz could no more have swept to or foreseen conclusions with a rapidity baffling every mind's power to follow but one of equal genius, without a swift and complete precedent mastery of processes, than one can be a great pianist, whatever his genius, without first mastering his instrument. Acceleration and rapidity are of the essence of genius, and one of its invariable accompaniments is that the details and processes are as much more complete as they are more rapid than the elaborations of talent. Shakspeare's little things are as much greater than the little things of men of great talent, as his conceptions are greater than their constructions. Napoleon, just surrendered, showing the marine on board the Bellerophon the French "Exercise," Turner found alone in a boat which he was gently moving from side to side, while he was taking down in a kind of short-hand, inexplicable to others, the ripples which would be ready for use years after, in some great picture, are instructive specimens of the universal truth to detail—as distinct from slavery to it—of men of genius.

These suggestions imperfectly cover and express the simpler and more important laws and distinctions to be applied in estimating the relative positions of actors. It is much more easy to state them in themselves than to apply them justly to players—for there is such a thing as partial genius, and such a thing as high genius with expression limited or modified by some personal idiosyncrasy or peculiarity, or by some national type of character. We are quite ready to concede that Rachel is inferior to Mrs. Siddons, and that she may be inferior to Ristori, in queenly sweep and impassioned abandonment of nature. We can see that she is rather intellectual than emotional, and that she cannot, like them, give magnetism to goodness—but that because of these, and because she always acts the same play in the same way, to the last detail, it follows, as some maintain, that she is not an imaginative artist, we confidently deny. The real question is behind all these—whether her characters, as she plays them, do not, because of their artistic integrity and unity, as judged from a central and not an external point of view, necessarily presuppose high imaginative conception of character. If so, then these objections are trivial. Had not the world already decided this in her favor, it would be a labor of love to demonstrate it. We cannot regard it as an open question. Some one said of Michel Angelo that he was so purely imaginative that fancy was excluded; it may be a question whether this is not her limitation, explaining her exact repetition of details. At any rate, it is as inconsequential in relation to an estimate of her genius, as it is, with Macready, illustrative of his want of imaginative conception and embodiment. Booth was almost Protean in his transformations, and we recall with admiration and delight how completely the whole character of his looks, tones, gestures, and all the smallest details were naturally and necessarily marked by as absolute a line of separation in his acting Shylock, Iago, Lear, Hamlet and Othello, as were his conceptions of the characters themselves. Inferior in this respect as was Rachel, we should have been violently unjust to her capacity for perfect loss of her own personality in embodiment, had we not seen her transformation in the "Marseillaise," which was as fearful as it was unexpected, in which she seemed half sybil and half Cassandra, and prophetically shrieked the fatal entrance of revolution.

Of Garrick it is too late, and of Miss Heron it is too early for us to attempt to decide the question whether, with either or both, it has been imaginative realization or merely literal representation of character. When we see Miss Heron, and especially if she will submit herself to the severe test of acting Ophelia, Desdemona or Juliet, it will not be difficult to form an opinion. We hope, in a future article, to speak somewhat at length of Mrs. KEMBLE's eminent merits, and of what we conceive to be her limitations. We shall only say now that, to our minds, she has not sufficiently high, delicate and subtle imagination and insight to grasp Shakspeare's characters, vitally, and to give them that ideal power and grace which sets them high and apart from all other English dramatic creations, and that, consequently, (for instance), her conceptions of Imogen and Perdita are not imaginatively distinguished in respects most vital to their characters; her Richard III. and Macbeth are mannish, like harsh contralto voices; her distinctiveness of characterization external and general instead of true and characteristic, and her rendering of those passages of imagination, which have no resting place in all literature but in his works, wanting apprehension of the ecstasy which they embody. We find this view entirely confirmed by reading her poetry, which has spirit, fire and directness, but is bleak from subjectivity, from want of poetic atmosphere, and of subtle, ideal and "majestic and airy" grace and repose of movement. In other words, it seems clear to us that she has versatility as distinguished from variety—that she has neither the delicacy and depth of nature, nor the power and subtlety of imagination to act or read Shakspeare interpretatively, and that her powers would be tasked to their full capacity in reading Ben. Jonson and Massinger. But we have applied the severest of tests, and it must be remembered that very few English actresses have ever lived to whose claims to the highest honors the application of such a test would not be fatal. We turn with admiration and gratitude to what Mrs. Kemble's readings have done. Her apprehension and conception of Shakspeare are superior to those of a large majority of her audience, and she has filled the thinking mind of this city full of Shakspeare; many who cannot read him without effort, and many who scarcely read him at all, have learned through her with delight; and many have had these fountains of inspiration, as immortal as the soul, opened upon them like a new life. Never in this country, on any stage, have the plays of Shakspeare been given with such general and uniform fullness and completeness. In the many cases where she gives the conceptions and general rendering of the characters in which her father, uncles and others were famous, she shows imitative ability of the highest order, and calls up the great "Kemble family," on which she has reflected such lustre. And then what wonderful compass, power, variety and modulation of voice, what power of transition of passion and face, how honestly and earnestly attempting to do full justice to the author, and how absolutely true to her own thought! To be sure, such as we have described them, we have no doubt are the limitations of her power, but when we think of her, we forget these, to marvel that one strong, earnest and impulsive woman can have placed before us, with such general impressiveness and distinctiveness, so many and such diverse creations of the greatest of men.

As we have made Mr. Verplanck's article upon Garrick the occasion of these remarks, we cannot better close them than with Charles Lamb's justly indignant language, referring to the nonsense, as common now as it was then, of making the genius of the actor of character the same in kind with that of its creator.

"Taking a turn the other day in the Abbey, I was struck with the affected attitude of a figure, which I do not remember to have seen before, and which, upon examination, proved to be a whole-length of the celebrated Mr. Garrick. Going nearer, I found inscribed under this harlequin figure the following lines:

To paint fair Nature, by divine command,
A Shakspeare rose; then to expand his fame
Wide o'er this breathing world, a Garrick came.
Though sunk in death the forms the poet drew,
The actor's genius bade them breathe anew;
Though, like the bard himself, in night they lay,
Immortal Garrick called them back to day;
And till Eternity with pow'r sublime
Shall mark the mortal hour of hoary Time,
Shakspeare and Garrick like twin-stars shall shine
And earth irradiate with a beam divine.

It would be an insult to my readers' understanding to attempt anything like a criticism on this farrago of false thoughts and nonsense. But the reflection it led me into was a kind of wonder, how, from the days of the actor here celebrated to our own, it should have been the fashion to compliment every performer in his turn, that has had the lack to please the town in any of the great characters of Shakspeare, with the notion of possessing a mind congenial with the poet's; how people should come thus unaccountably to confound the power of originating poetical images and conceptions with the faculty of being able to read or recite the same when put into words; or what connection that absolute mastery over the heart and soul of man, which a great dramatic poet possesses, has with those tricks upon the eye and ear, which a player by observing a few general effects, which some common passion, as grief, anger, &c., usually has upon the gestures and exterior, can so easily compass. It is observable that we fall into this confusion only in dramatic recitations. We never dream that the gentleman who reads Lucretius in public with great applause, is therefore a great poet and philosopher; nor do we find that Tom Davis, the bookseller, who is recorded to have recited the Paradise Lost better than any man in England in his day, was therefore by his friends set upon a level with Milton. Did not Garrick shine, and was he not ambitious of shining in every drawing tragedy that his wretched day produced, and shall he have that honor to dwell in our minds forever as an inseparable concomitant with Shakspeare? A kindred mind! O who can read that affecting Sonnet of Shakspeare, which alludes to his profession as a player:—

Oh for my sake do you with fortune chide,
The guilty goddess of my harmless deeds,
That did not better for my life provide
Than public means which public custom breeds—
Thence comes it that my name receives a brand;
And almost thence my nature is subdued
To what it works in like the dyer's hand.

Or that other confession:—

Alas! 'tis true, I have gone here and there,
And made myself a motley to thy view,
Gored mine own thoughts, sold cheap what is most dear.

Who can read these instances of jealous self-watchfulness in our sweet Shakspeare, and dream of any congeniality between him and an actor like Garrick? W.

A correspondent in Dwight's Journal favors the exclusive employment of boys in church choirs. Whatever may be the temporary charm of childish voices, we think that the banishment of women from choral performances is a step back towards barbarism. The practice had its origin in an age which we are accustomed to call dark and ignorant, when false views of the relations of the sexes prevailed, and when the celibate monk was revered as the highest style of man. The voice of woman was never heard in the music of the church; it was considered as profane as an organ is now in Scotland. When one reads of such atrocious rules as were enacted at the Jeronymite Convent at Yuste, where Charles V. ended his days—ordering that women found within a certain distance from the gate should be flogged—it would seem that it would be but a short step for such people to the Mussulman doctrine, which barred woman out of Paradise.

Neither sex can express the whole of human thought and emotion; each is the necessary complement of the other. So neither sex can express the whole of music; the two voices united form but one instrument. In this, as in all things that concern the race, the plain dictates of the Creator cannot be overlooked: "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."—Boston Atlas.

We fully coincide with the above, which now reminds us that we accidentally omitted to accompany the two articles of our correspondent (on "Music in the Public Schools,") with a few words of editorial comment. Some of the views expressed by "Precentor," and those which seemed to us to touch the most important issues, had our hearty sympathy; to others we were simply hospitable. The main question was—first started and mooted in the Transcript—how and how far should Music be taught in our public schools. In his first article "Precentor" argued that it was not enough to teach all the children in a school en masse to sing by rote a few trivial and taking tunes; that those who have really a talent and a voice for music should be separated from those who have not, and should have that talent recognized and made the subject of thorough and far-seeing culture to some practicable extent. We cannot but agree in principle with this. In principle, all education, beyond a few common indispensables, like reading, writing and arithmetic, should be the development of special talents. Each child demands, by the individuality of his nature, a training different from other children. Society, in taking charge of education at all, acknowledges, in principle, the duty of complete, true education to its rising members. But principles must needs be modified in practice; social ideals are in the far future; what we do and can do is but a pitiful shadow of what we would and one day shall do; and the duty of society to the young in this matter of education thus far necessarily limits itself to a very distantly approximative and Procrustean provision.

Some say, and perhaps rightly, that it is not in the spirit of our Democratic institutions to provide special education; that all should be general and common, all should be taught alike, and only with reference to qualifying them for voters, &c. If our system, if our schools can do no more, these reasoners are right. But any slightest attempt at education involves progress, and the list of the indispensables gets to be greater and greater, and the very idea of "freedom and equality" is found more and more to involve the protection and consequently the education of individuality, of special gifts and uses. Now with regard to music, it was one great step gained (and we should be grateful to those by whose continued efforts it was gained) to have music at all recognized and admitted, as it now is generally, into our schools. Here is a point established. And now comes up a further question: How shall we make that teaching most efficient and most useful? And here we think our correspondent's views, whether immediately practicable or not, are to the point, and worthy to be seriously weighed.

Now for "Precentor's" second article. Here he points out one among other openings which present society affords to boys who shall have been trained in schools to be good singers of sacred music: namely the choirs of certain Episcopal churches. Here the writer gets upon the ground of his own speciality, with which of course we and most of our readers are not specially concerned. But we do not understand him to maintain that Music was created for the special benefit of the Episcopal church of England. For the purposes of his general argument regarding the public schools, it was enough for him to suggest that here would be one field for musical talent trained in the manner he had before suggested. Whether the English church music should employ boys' voices for the soprano, is a question for that Church, and not for us, general advocates and lovers of the Art of Music. It was "Precentor's" general view of the importance of thorough training, that commended his articles to the hospitality of our columns. With their Episcopalianism, their boy soprano theory, we have nothing to do. But we do think there is a great deal of truth in what he said about the "juvenile oratorios," and about "Professors" making it their only care to popularize themselves.

The question of music in the schools demands and shall receive our attention at more length.

M. Thalberg's Return.

The great pianist is with us again, and is stirring up the musical activities of Boston in all its various channels. He has already given us two concerts in the Music Hall, before great audiences. The first was on Tuesday evening. He played only pieces made familiar by his former visit, namely: his Fantasias on Don Giovanni, the Prayer from Moses, and L'Elisir d'Amore, his Tarantella, and, for an encore, "Sweet Home." These gave the same measure and quality of delight as before, approving him still the most elegant and brilliant of pianists; cool, gentlemanly, quiet in the execution of wondrous difficulties; faultless in taste, in command of form and characteristic treatment; neither exciting nor excited, but giving the enjoyment of most finished beauty in the present moment. The Tarantella interested us the most. He plays two; one from Masaniello; but this is his own, and is one of his most graceful and individual works.

The programme generally was of a "popular" and hacknied character, and there was rather an excess of accessory attractions. Herr SCHREIBER opened each part with a long piece of variations on the trumpet, as tedious, flute-like and sentimental as they were skilful in execution. We do not see but he plays quite as well as Koenig, but what is it all worth? Mme. D'ANGRI's rich and luscious Contralto charmed as much as ever, when she did not trench too closely on the soprano or indulge in mannish very low tones. She sang the air from Bely, from the Fille du Regiment, and the "Ricci Waltz" with much skill and effect, all hacknied pieces. The coarseness of the R-r-r-rataplän and the Spanish song could well have been spared; and her swaggering delivery of the Borgia Brindisi was not of the most refined. Mme. JOHANNSEN was really an attraction, but suffered with such an inflammation of the throat as fully justified the apology upon the programme, and made it a cruelty to herself to sing the everlasting Robert, in which, however, she won much applause. In the little German songs, sung at the piano, she triumphed over physical drawbacks and gave rare delight. These were: "The Swallows," by Abt, the arch and bright little Volkslied, by Kücken, and for an encore what seemed to us a wild snatch of Hungarian melody.

On Thursday evening Thalberg played his Norma, Masaniello and Lucrezia Borgia fantasias, and "Home, Sweet Home;" Herr Schreiber a fantasia and "Katy Darling;" Mme. Johannsen sang the Romance from "Tell," a waltz, and a duet from Semiramide with D'Angri; and the latter sang airs from the Huguenots and La Gazza Ladra, and the Rondo from Cenerentola.

The first Matinée at 1 P. M., on Wednesday, drew about as many listeners as Chickering's Saloon would hold. It was not in any poor sense a "fashionable" audience, (as the very odd card of the management, in some of the papers, since prudently retracted, had led many to fear it would be), but as intelligent, refined and musical an assemblage as one would wish to see. The great majority were ladies, and the scene beautiful and social. Here is the programme:

- 1—Fantasia. "Sonnambula".....Thalberg.
- 2—Andante.....Thalberg.
- 3—Sonata in G sharp minor.....Beethoven.
- INTERMISSION.
- 4—The Miserere. "Il Trivatore".....Verdi.
On the Alexandre Organ.
- INTERMISSION.
- 5—Marche Funebre.....Chopin.
- 6—Home, Sweet Home.....Thalberg.
- 7—Fantasia. "L'Elisir d'Amore".....Thalberg.

We have no room for critical detail. Of course Thalberg's own pieces were played as he only can play them. His Andante we enjoyed most. In his Sonnambula fantasia he happily touches at the outset, in two consecutive phrases, and afterwards expands, the two finest ideas in that opera. The Beethoven Sonata, (the "Moonlight"), was played rather with exquisite grace and beauty than with that Beethoven-like depth and earnestness of feeling, which we have been wont to find, especially in the slow first movement. Was it not a trifle too fast, and were the triplets of the accompaniment made significant enough? But we had rather think the fault was in our own listening mood. The Orgue Alexandre is one of the finest, perhaps the finest, of reed organs, and was handled with artistic skill; the stops used for solos in the Miserere were of beautiful quality, but the full organ has still the something that we cannot quite abide in all reed organs. We were obliged to lose the third part. The piano, made upon a new scale, by the Chickering, was one of most rare excellence.

ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB.—The Complimentary Concert given by this band of German singers to Miss LUCY A. DOANE, whose fine soprano songs have added such charm to their three subscription concerts, and to Herr AUGUST KREISSMANN, their conductor and sweet singer, filled the Melodeon on Wednesday evening with an enthusiastic audience. It was in all respects an admirable and an inspiring concert; indeed each concert of the "Orpheus" has seemed better than the last. No concert as a whole have we enjoyed more this winter:—all was so genial and so genuine; no empty commonplace or clap-trap; nothing to overlay and spoil a good impression. The part songs sounded even better than before. They were the gems out of the past collection, to-wit: Die jungen Musikanten, by Kücken, with Kreissmann's tenor solo: "Sleep, sweetest maiden," &c.; Marschner's old Minnesinger Serenade: "Why art thou from me so far, O my love," &c., one of the most deep and tender pieces of harmony imaginable; the exhilarating "Hunter's Joy," by Astholz; "The Cheerful Wanderer," and the strange "Turkish Drinking Song," by Mendelssohn; "The Bard," by Silcher, and that rich, cool, tranquil Wanderers Nachtlied of Goethe, by Lenz.

Miss DOANE and Mr. KREISSMANN sang beautifully the duet from Idomeneo; and the lady added new freshness to her laurels in the Dove sono of Mozart, and the "Spring Song," by Mendelssohn,—OTTO DRESEL again kindly playing the accompaniments. Miss Doane was recalled every time, and the last time responded with "Comin' thro' the rye," which we have not heard sung with such winning grace and archness since Jenny Lind. The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB played the Adagio and Finale from Mozart's charming Quintet, with clarinet, and repeated the scene from Robert le Diable. Decidedly these concerts have been left off with an appetite.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The eleventh Afternoon Concert was rich with the Symphony in C (the "Jupiter") by Mozart, the Allegretto from Beethoven's eight Symphony, and the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Siege of Corinth." Mr. Ribas played very finely a "Theme and variations" on that by no means brilliant, but quaint and honest sounding uncle of the hautboy, the English Horn; and there was bright store of dance music.

Chat from Paris.

(From the Indépendance Belge.)

ROSSINI.—A few days since, the author of Le Comte Ory, happening to pass along the Boulevards, stopped before a bill promising a concert of fifteen hundred musicians. On seeing this, the maestro, with that Italian mimicry, so comic in its demonstration, began to groan, and indulge in small suppressed sighs, begging for pity and mercy from this terrible bill.

You are aware that Rossini is quite one of ourselves. He is no longer a stranger passing through Paris, but a Parisian who has returned to his home; only you must not talk to him about music: he will tell you: "He has forgotten all that." Last summer, he met, at Wildbad, the Dowager Empress of Russia, who lavished on him all the most delicate touches of imperial coquetry. She had the audacity to ask him for a simple brindisi. Rossini replied that Germany was a beautiful country. One day, however, the Empress thought she had induced him to accompany on the piano a young lady of her suite, who is rather fond of singing. Rossini sat down resignedly to the instrument, struck two or three chords, and then, giving way to that nervous irritation that has detached him from the art to which he owes his immortality, said, as he rose from his chair, "You see, Madame, I know nothing about it—nothing—I have forgotten it all!"

A few weeks later I met him at Baden, where I witnessed a touching exhibition. A select audience was assembled at the Théâtre de la Conversation for the first performance of the French company. Rossini was in the house. The orchestra executed the overture to Guillaume Tell. At the very first bars, the Duchesses of Cambridge, and the ladies about her, rose and turned in mute, but profoundly expressed, homage towards the author of that immortal masterpiece. Ceding to an electric impulse, the entire assembly imitated this movement, and it was in this attitude, standing up, that they listened to the most wonderful melodies to which the human brain ever gave birth. I watched Rossini, who was leaning on his stick, with his eyes fixed on the ground. Not the slightest emotion flitted across his impassible physiognomy. He appeared to be resigned to his glory, as he would be to the consequences of some act of youthful indiscretion.

Guillaume Tell is, however, still the breach by which he is accessible. When the person talking to him is neither a frequenter of the green-room nor a speculator in cafés-chantants, Rossini will support being told that Guillaume Tell is "a fine thing." But the speaker must not dwell upon the subject, or rise to the lyric height of enthusiasm, for Rossini will immediately begin talking about mararoni, or something equally relevant.

Rossini resides in the Rue Basse du Rempart. Whenever a ray of sunshine lights up and warms our foggy sky, he is fond of going out on the Boulevard and walking two hours arm-in-arm with a friend. In the evening he receives a very limited number of intimate acquaintances: Carafa, the composer; Henri Blaze, who published a notice full of charming and delicate touches about the maestro; Vivier, the horn-player; Antoni Deschamps, the poet; and Madame D., a lady of fashion, and a distinguished amateur singer. The lamp, sobered down by a shade, only doubtfully illuminates the apartment, for the maestro cannot bear a strong light. His guests chat, while he walks up and down, to calm his nerves, which are in a constant state of irritation. Despite all that has been said, there is a piano in the room; it is, however, true that this piece of furniture makes but little noise and does but little work. It would be altogether useless to ask Rossini to go near it. This would be the very way to drive him from it, and, consequently, no one thinks of such a thing, but sometimes, when people least expect it, he suddenly places his fingers on the keys, and evokes some piece or other of celestial harmony, for instance, most frequently, the Septet from Don Juan. "All music is contained in that," said Rossini, one day; "the rest is useless." This decision is somewhat discouraging for young composers, but we may appeal against it, and it is lucky this admiration for Mozart did not prevent Rossini from writing Il Barbiere, La Gazza, Otello, Le Comte Ory, Guillaume Tell, and other useless works.

People long clung to the hope that Rossini's silence was simply a whim, but this illusion is no longer admissible. It seems pretty certain that no consideration could ever prevail on the maestro to face a public who appear to him perverted, not to say brutalized, by the systems of music. After his decease, an attempt will probably be made to collect some scattered leaves, and something called a posthumous opera of Rossini will be produced, but as long as he lives he will never authorize any such proceeding.

Rossini still suffers from that rather imaginary disease called a nervous affection—that is to say, that the illness is more especially in the brain, which is attacked by a thousand imaginary phantoms. Invalids of this class—who have something of the child about them—groan a great deal, eat very well, are always afraid of being shivered, by coming in contact with a piece of furniture, and pass their time in arranging their funerals, which fortunately are very distant, and which they see pass before them while living, like Charles V. But the peculiar feature of such a state is to deprive the patient of all interest in labor and glory. Rossini is in this state, and this is the reason why his music is dumb.

PORTRAIT OF HANDEL.—An interesting portrait of Handel—the one by Denner, "painted in 1736 or 1737," and engraved for Cox's "Anecdotes" of Handel and Smith in 1799—has just been presented by Lady Rivers to the Sacred Harmonic Society. The head, though timidly painted and dry in its coloring, is nevertheless full of character and expression. We have there something of the inspiration of the Poet, who when he wrote the Messiah 'Hallelujah' fancied that he beheld the heavens with their ineffable glories opened above him,—something of the passion of the man who held the refractory prima donna out of the window till she consented to sing as he bade her,—and who called Janson, the Chester chorister, "scoundrel," because, having undertaken to sing at "sight," he proved unable to sing at "first sight." Grandeur, fire, and humor are in the face. The accessories have been less carefully studied,—the ambrosial curls of the perruque are confused and dusty,—the robe, instead of coming to a hem, dies away like a dream. Can any friend tell us whether there were more Denners than one who painted portraits? This interesting contribution to the museum of the Sacred Harmonic Society can surely not be from the hand of Balthazar Denner, whose over-finished heads, like so many colored compounds of marrow and marble, with every pore and eyelash discernible, are familiar to all who know foreign galleries.—London Athenæum.

Musical Correspondence.

CINCINNATI, MARCH 22.—Last Thursday our Philharmonic Society gave their third Concert to a pretty good and apparently much delighted audience. The greater part of our most musical amateurs have been in their day New England boys and girls, and have their relatives and friends spread all over New England, from which fact it may be inferred that the majority of the readers of your Journal will be somewhat interested in our musical doings, and so I venture to send you a few more lines regarding them. The above concert was made up of the following programme:—

PART I.
Overture—"Echoes of Orestes".....	Gade.
Fantasia—Caprice for the Violin.....	Vieuxtemps.
Mr. J. De Clercq.
Symphony, No. 8, in E flat.....	Haydn.
PART II.
Concerto for the Piano, in C major.....	Beethoven.
Mr. Fr. Werner.
Fantasia—Burlesque for the Violin.....	De Clercq.
Overture—"Egmont".....	Beethoven.

The Orchestra played a good deal better than in any of the preceding concerts. There was precision in some of their former performances, but there is now, as it were, more unity, more blending of the different instruments. The general character of their manner of rendering the above compositions deserved, I think, considerable praise, and in a few respects would seem superior to some performances of Orchestras in New York and Boston under the popular leaders, which I have heard, although the latter of course excel ours in most details. In those Orchestras I have been sometimes led to find fault, in a small measure, with rather too much drill, with too military an expression, with too much of a business air about them. The most gifted leader, when he assumes this business air, fails in some important points. Artistic performances should always have at least the semblance of spontaneity. Musical performers, when on a travelling tour, and when giving concerts nearly every night, are very apt to appear with an air of routine, which is very unfavorable to the highest results of our artistic performances. It is similar with leaders in large cities, who swing their baton every night. In this respect, for instance, the celebrated Gungl's Band might be somewhat blamed, it having been drilled in Berlin, which is reputed to be the most military looking city in all Europe; and on the other hand an absence of that marshaling spirit, and an easy southern "abandon" constitutes the charm of the Viennese orchestras of a similar character. We do not mean to claim the high merits alluded to for our orchestra. I rather suggested those discriminations as a matter of general application, and would merely say that a laudable characteristic of our late performances has been a certain degree of that spontaneity in the expression and execution. For the audiences, also, these first Philharmonic Concerts in this hemisphere, have been a matter of entire novelty, and of the most spontaneous interest, and therefore, in both respects these concerts have been very delightful, and bore a somewhat rare character.

All the compositions on the programme are familiar to the Boston public, and need not be dwelled upon. Gade's Poetical Ossian Overture seemed to be taking with many, and impressed me anew as exceedingly characteristic and high-toned. It is gratifying to have the form of an Overture differ slightly from others, which as a general thing are, to my taste, made rather too much after the same pattern, viz.: first Andante and then Allegro. Gade's Overture has some sympathetic characteristics, and these make it doubly interesting.

Our pianist, Mr. WERNER, is a genuine pupil of Chopin—geniality all over, but little Beethoven pathos and force. The former makes his playing taking with the ladies, and in fact with the greater part of the audience, who value the sweets in music the highest. His sweets, however, differ from others in this, that they are chaste and real graces. Mr. De Clercq is a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatory, and a thoroughly educated musician; he possesses considerable execution on the violin, and has a fine "tone," but his performance as yet is somewhat unripe, and lacks in fineness. He, however, is a young man yet, and has no doubt a great deal of talent.

I will add a few words regarding an amusing "pen-war," in our daily papers, which occurred last week. The owners of our best Music Hall, which seats some 2,000 persons, announced in a most bland and suave card to the musical public, (the dear people), that as there had lately been "such a dearth of first class music in our city," they were glad to have been able to make an arrangement with Miss Pyne and Troupe, for some concerts, and so forth. This card excited some hot replies, charging those gentlemen with deviation from the truth, and unfairness towards our excellent home societies, some one adding, that as a usual thing, travelling troupes "gave us little else but trashy music, blew their trumpets and humbugged the public." The gentlemen then explained in another card, that "a dearth of first class music" meant, in English, "a scarcity of concerts," that they certainly "appreciated the quality of our home performances, but were not satisfied with the quantity." There is nothing like a discussion in the papers, and this one no doubt has helped the cause of good music in these parts, for by reiterated assertions of connoisseurs in the papers, the general public has been made aware that never before, has so much first class music been offered to our musical public, as this winter.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream," read by Mrs. FRANCES ANN KEMBLE, and enriched with the entire music by MENDELSSOHN, for the benefit of the Mercantile Library Association, made an occasion of rare interest at the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The scene was extremely beautiful. The superb vases of flowers on each side of